The second movement, based on Palestinan dances, at the least of it is not dismal. But though a composer of today can hardly treat folk tunes archaically, still, unless he is stirred to some extent to picture the conditions under which folk tunes thrive, might he not better let them alone? To pull those dances about—pleasant in themselves—in Mr. Achron's way, helped them not at all. Neither did it result in music either beautiful or picturesque. Mr. Achron played the solo music smoothly and with evident ease. Grateful for a violinist, it did not sound.

The program also brought to a hearing Vaughan Williams's first "Norfolk Rhapsody." Mr. Achron might study it to advantage, for Mr. Vaughan Williams has made music out of folk songs that at all events does not run counter to their spirit—agreeable music to hear.

The n[illegible] concert will take place Feb

THIRD OF MONDAY EVENING CONCERTS

Achron Plays Solo Part in New Violin Concerto

GLOBE JAN 24

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Works Previously Given

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night its third concert of the Monday evening series. With the exception of a new violin concerto by Joseph Achron, who himself played the solo part, all the works forming the program had already been heard at concerts of the Friday and Saturday series. There are none, however, that it was not pleasing to hear again, even after so short a lapse of time.

There was the Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra—music which in its original, modest setting must have worn a simpler dignity, a more naive charm, than when sung by so large, so sonorous and so well disciplined a body of strings as that to which it was confided last night.

The Vaughan Williams "Norfolk Rhapsody, which followed, is an extremely beautiful and sincere work. Its marvelous evocation of the Norfolk land scape, the tang of its salt air and the plaintive notes of its waterfowl, wrought their charm even upon those, and they were of course the majority, to whom it brought no memories. The skill with which folk songs have been used to build up the picture without seeming to have been dragged in by the hair, the extraordinary charm and economy of the orchestration and the coherence of the structure are all evidence of a technique none the less masterly for being unobtrusive.

Joseph Achron's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, op 60, is a work which at first repels the hearer with the blatancy of its orchestration, the relentless cacophony of its harmonies and the whirling illusiveness of its melodic scheme. Of its two parts, the first is built upon Hebrew synagogue chants, 15 of them, elaborately and contrapuntally developed and much extended, as the composer's program notes tell us. The second part is based upon two Palestinian dance melodies, handled in a manner which Mr Achron himself describes as "jugglery."

Despite its undoubted clumsiness and overelaboration the work does succeed in conveying to an uncanny degree the spirit of the Jewry of the ghettos, its fanaticism, its hysteria and stridency, its naive humor and sentimentality and that disorderliness and apparent irreverence which Pepys was so shocked to observe in its synagogues.

Mr Achron, who played the difficult violin part with transcendent virtuosity, received warm, if somewhat puzzled, applause.

The evening ended more mildly with Schumann's "First Symphony" in B flat, a work ingratiating in a variety of ways, all romantic, in which Mr. Koussevitzky spread himself with great gusto and tremendous effectiveness.

The next concert in this series takes place Feb 21.

THIS CLIPPING FROM [illegible]URANT
[illegible]FORD, CONN.
[illegible]N 24 1927

[illegible]ston Symphony

[illegible]e of the interesting pro-[illegible]ed for the coming Hartford [illegible] the Orchestra at the Cap-[illegible]er, February 6, will be Wag-[illegible]engrin." Liszt described Wag-[illegible]lude to "Lohengrin" as "a [illegible]magic formula which, like a [illegible]ous initiation, prepares our [illegible]or the sight of unaccustomed [illegible] and of a higher signification [illegible] that of our terrestrial life." It [illegible]s with soft, unearthly chords in [illegible]topmost register of the orchestra. [illegible]s Wagner's first music of the Holy [illegible]ail. It descends and becomes full-[illegible]odied, as man struggles to rise to the [illegible]ivine, ineffable gift. The prelude [illegible]ads as it began, in the "clear blue [illegible] heaven, and the presence of the [illegible]ngelic hosts." Public opinion pre-[illegible]ails that Mr. Koussevitkky's brilliant [illegible]nd sympathetic interpretations serve [illegible]he music to full measure. Reservations may be obtained by calling Frank A. Sedgwick at McCoy's music [illegible]tore, No. 89 Asylum street,—2-2251.

[illegible]ager for [illegible]-Speaker

[illegible]Ty and [illegible]' see the [illegible]g a re-[illegible]Baltimore [illegible]) for his [illegible] not yet [illegible]t.

[illegible]s to play [illegible]plied: [illegible]ou know [illegible]hat is, I [illegible] myself.

[illegible]Hartford con-[illegible]lymphony orchestra [illegible]ar, February 6, will [illegible]fgrin."

[illegible]agner's prelude to [illegible]ort of magic for-[illegible]ysterious initiation, [illegible]or the sight of un-[illegible]and of a higher sig-[illegible]l of our terrestrial [illegible]th soft, unearthly [illegible]ps register of the [illegible]agner's first music [illegible]t descends and be-[illegible]man struggles to [illegible]effable gift. The [illegible]an—in the "clear [illegible]e presence of the

[illegible]vails that Mr. [illegible] and sympathetic [illegible]e music to full

[illegible]btained by call-[illegible] McCoy's Music [illegible]treet, telephone

[illegible]AY [illegible]AME

ACHRON PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

TRAV JAN 25

Violinist Performs Own Composition at Symphony Concert

Joseph Achron, violinist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the third of this season's series of Monday evening concerts.

Mr. Achron played with the orchestra his new violin concerto. In addition, the program included the Concerto Grosso by Handel, which was played at the regular concerts of the orchestra last week; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody and Schumann's first symphony.

Mr. Achron's concerto makes lavish use of Hebrew themes. The first movement, which boast no less than 15 themes of varied lengths, is built, according to the composer's own description, on elements of synagogue chants treated freely. The result is brilliant snatches, but more frequently incoherent and baffling. The second part, which juggles dextrously two Palestinian dance melodies, has more to reward a first hearing. The concerto is dedicated to Jascha Heifetz, fittingly, for it seems prodigiously difficult. Mr. Achorn played with skill and plenty of fire.

Vaughan Williams's lively rhapsody bridged the gap neatly between Handel and Achron. The concert ended with a very notable performance of Schumann's charming "Spring" symphony.

The next concert of this series will take place Feb. 21.

[illegible]en
[illegible]rd
[illegible]id
[illegible]to [illegible]ce
30
[illegible]nt
[illegible]L.
[illegible]ne
[illegible]n-
[illegible]e);
[illegible]ic-
[illegible]lle
[illegible]n.
[illegible]or [illegible]s"
M.
S [illegible]nts
[illegible]has [illegible]for
M.
[illegible]lson,
[illegible]olph
[illegible]Kee-
[illegible]iller
[illegible]t L.
[illegible]g.
[illegible]nery,
[illegible]stella
[illegible]Phil
[illegible]d J
[illegible]bone,
[illegible]pelly
[illegible]na L
[illegible]Doro
[illegible]Kim [illegible]rman
[illegible]Frank [illegible]es E
[illegible]et M
[illegible]Beau
[illegible]Mar
[illegible]ul E
[illegible]Long
[illegible]bbins
[illegible]nohue
[illegible]Charles [illegible]olden
[illegible]hn F
[illegible]Devitt

HANDEL'S DAY AND THIS

PANS JAN 25

Koussevitzky Blends the Eighteenth [illegible]ntury with Music of Today—Vaughan [illegible]lliams and Schumann — Achron and Multiple Themes for Contrast [illegible]was an evening in which pure [illegible]eauty was first in men's minds—[illegible]nd that from negative as well as [illegible]ve considerations. The occasion [illegible]the third Monday evening concert [illegible]he Boston Symphony Orchestra. [illegible]the program stood Handel's twelfth [illegible]rto Grosso, forgotten these many [illegible]until last week's concerts brought [illegible]come revival; Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, based on five [illegible]elodies from Old England; Joseph [illegible]'s Violin Concerto, Opus 60, with [illegible]hposer as soloist; Schumann's first [illegible]ony—of the Spring.

[illegible]a composition such as Han-[illegible]ncerto should gather the dust [illegible]rs on library shelves is an [illegible]. Master works there are in [illegible]uantity, in great variety, upon [illegible]elves of the library at Sym-[illegible]Hall. Not too many of them [illegible]im pure beauty such as that [illegible]heres in this concerto. In other [illegible]any of them interest, justify [illegible]es. But for beauty in and of [illegible]ne can surpass this work. With [illegible]striding dignity, warm and so[illegible] of the opening Largo, the play [illegible]llegro, the unearthly melody of [illegible]ghetto, the color of the next [illegible]e rhythms of the final Allegro. [illegible]his last Allegro does not main-[illegible]sustained plane of elevation of [illegible]movements? Standing by itself [illegible]would call it most excellent [illegible]coming after the exceptional [illegible]vements it does in no wise de-[illegible] the impression made by them [illegible]does it matter? If ever Han-[illegible]nsported to the heavens while [illegible]of composition, as he is sup-[illegible]ve said to himself while com-[illegible]"Messiah," it must have [illegible]writing some of the music of [illegible]o. And to play such music th[illegible] strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with their leader, Mr. Koussevitzky, are ideal vehicle. Does one consider performance from the point of view of tone, or of balance of parts, or of purity of line or sweep of rhythm, of imaginative expressiveness, or—most important of all—from the point of view of spiritual message, one can only reiterate, it was ideal.

Again, pure beauty sat upon every note, every measure of Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody. Oh, the delicious sonorities he summons! And when were ever two three-note motives so freighted with mysterious significance, so utterly weighted down with inexpressible poetry as those two motives which Mr. Vaughan Williams so lovingly fondles at the beginning and near the close of his Rhapsody? From one beauty one passes to another. The tones, the pliant curves of the ciola solo are lovely sequel to the imaginative beginning. Increasing in motion as in volume, the climactic sections conceal all their contrapuntal tricks, maintain and amplify the mood in which the beginnings have already drenched the hearer. And the descent to the simplicities and the graces of the beginning is as laden with beauty as the beginning itself. If this be folk-song, there must be sweetness unlimited in the soul of him who gives it such setting. And a match for him last evening were Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Lefranc, and the gentlemen of the orchestra. Yes, last evening Mr. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. J. Lefranc, and a hundred others, were high priests in the temple of pure beauty. Nothing less—pure beauty.

After an intermission one listened to the joys of Schumann's Spring Symphony. If some of the procedures of dear Robert (he was little more than a newly-wed when he composed this symphony) by their occasional naiveté of orchestration or of rhythmic grouping or of theme itself, tend to draw a smile from the experienced listener, what matters it? Again beauty stands high in the list of qualities which one must ascribe to this symphony. But its exuberance, its youthful freshness, makes it a perennial joy. One always likes to listen to this symphony. With Dr. Muck it gave surprising pleasure; with Mr. Koussevitzky not a whit less. With a strong arm he hurls out its occasional martial motives; but with delicacy and finesse he etches its playful, sportive measures; while with full voice he sings its songs. The whole leaves a good taste in the mouth. It is, as the common phrase runs, "delightfully refreshing."

Between Williams's Rhapsody and Schumann's Symphony stood Mr. Achron's concerto. "Pure beauty" may still be our text, but considered now somewhat regretfully, because of its temporary eclipse. Mr. Achron tells us (also a bit naively?) in a program note, "The themes are fifteen in number, some being many measures in length; others, only a few." And this applied only to the first of the two parts. Before one heard a single note, the violin[illegible]

[illegible]themes brought uneasiness to the mind. Mr. Achron takes his seventeen themes (there were two in the last division) from Hebraic sources. As Mr. Vaughan Williams busies himself with the folk lore of England, so Mr. Achron would busy himself with the folk lore of his race. He has written violin pieces in which he has done high service for this folk lore. But in the concerto of last evening he sought to deck it out with all the harmonic trappings which the art of music spewed out during that noisy period of from about 1912 to about 1924. Two representations one must make to Mr. Achron. The genius who could succeed [illegible]producing a movement well knit, uni-[illegible] coherent orderly, out of fifteen un-[illegible]ed themes, is yet to be born. [illegible]ody, the harmonic noises of the era [illegible]924 as a rule find their justification [illegible]me unusual programmatic scheme, [illegible] were the result of a search to [illegible] the bounds of musical expressive-[illegible]ot expressiveness as one finds it [illegible]act music, but the expressiveness [illegible]esires to communicate or picture or amplify certain things outside of musical art itself. As such they usually made their point, created a little astonishment on the side, and were promptly discarded by their makers in favor of new experiments. From such discarded devices Mr. Achron has made choice, has juxtaposed them as background for his seventeen themes. But what would make sense with programmatic justification (possibly even at second-hand) is utterly sterile without.

TRAN JAN 25

Blessed be the modernists! Every great period in the history of music has had its imitators, its hangers-on, its followers of method without message. From such parasites Wagner and Debussy have perhaps suffered the worst. But when one of these 1912-24 modernists (to use a common phrase) "crawls into a hole" with a given piece, he "takes the hole in after him" and none thereafter, no, not the composer himself (the figure breaks down here, the fact remains) may explore in those same regions with impunity. Further, this entire group of composers seem to have broken with its past, to be going back to the eighteenth century for its ideals. This break is so definite, so complete, so thorough-going, that none may dare ignore it without labelling himself definitely as of a discarded and wornout past. Thus the copier of models in the year 1927 on two scores knows not where to [illegible] his weary and s[illegible] Blessed [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol theater, February 6.

The score is dedicated to Georges Hartman, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in analysis arrived at the conclusion "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is, perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance." Philip Hale in reviewing the Boston concert comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so gorgeous, so thrilling, so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

Boston Symphony

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol Theater, February sixth. The score is dedicated to Georges Hartman, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in analysis arrived at the conclusion; "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is, perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

[illegible]RTON SYMPHONY

[illegible]mme of exceeding brilli-[illegible] represents the foremost [illegible]ts of symphonic music, [illegible]ade by Sergei Kousse-[illegible] the coming visit of the [illegible]phony Orchestra of 108 [illegible]o Hartford, in the Capitol [illegible] Sunday afternoon, Feb-sixth at 8 o'clock.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this programme will be a Suite from Prokoffeff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close the Symphonic poem "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $4.45. Phone 497.

TEN PERSONS INJURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 25 1927

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following splendid program will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of its first appearance in Wilmington, at The Shubert Playhouse on Monday evening, January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association:

Concerto in D Major for Orchestra
J. S. Bach

Overture, "Roman Carnival" Berlioz
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Prelude to the "Master Singers"
Wagner

Symphony No. 4 in F Minor
Tschaikovsky

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Theodorowicz, Soloist, Delights Children

Post JAN 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Children, as well as grown-ups, respond to the personal equation in musical performance. In other words, the playing of a soloist, be his portion ever so small, is apt to seem the chief feature and culmination of an orchestral concert. Thus at the Boston Symphony Orchestra young people's concert of yesterday, Julius Theodorowicz's skillful playing of an introduction and Russian dance, for violin with orchestral accompaniment, from Tchaikovsky's ballet, "The Swan Lake," called forth much the heartiest applause of the afternoon; and after Mr. Theodorowicz had bowed repeatedly Mr. Burgin, who was conducting, signalled for a repetition of the dance.

And for these youthful listeners of yesterday, as well as those who will hear the repetition of the concert this afternoon, Mr. Burgin had made a programme rich in attractive music that even the most experienced of their elders do not hear too often.

To begin with, there was Auber's gay and rhythmic overture to "Fra Diavolo" and, in addition to the charming and unfamiliar piece of Tchaikovsky's already mentioned, the programme also listed the Gluck-Mottl Ballet-Suite, that fascinating bundle of orchestral tricks; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Grieg's richly harmonized "Spring," for string orchestra; Grainger's infectious "Molly on the Shore"; and the imposing march from "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 26 1927

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson Greene's Philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program of captivating brilliance that will include Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," Haendel's "Twelfth Concerto" and other numbers to be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a most attractive program for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

Carnegie hall overflowed at the opening New York concert of the orchestra on Thanksgiving night. The occasion was one of the sort which is long re-

music.

Mr. Koussevitzky, as conductor of this renowned orchestra, has surely filled all expectations. A most remarkable man, most sincere and genuine. With each appearance in America, his public admiration for him waxes stronger. One feels throughout his interpretations of the masterpieces, so he thinks and so he expresses himself and how well he does it!

Reservations may be obtained at McCoy's No. 89 Asylum street, telephone, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
Hartford Conn
JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol Theater, February sixth. The score is dedicated to Georges Hartmann, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in analysis arrived at the conclusion; "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitsky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 26 1927

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed on his return to the conductor's desk The demonstration was the more significant, perhaps, because during the week the news had been given out that for two more seasons at least he has agreed to remain at the head of the organization.

This week Friday and Saturday he has set on the programs a new Concerto for piano and orchestra by the young American composer, Aaron Copland, whose "Music for the Theatre" he introduced in Paris after performances in Boston and in New York The new Concerto will be given its first public hearing this week, since it has been completed within a few days. New to Boston also will be Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Schumann's Symphony in B flat major will round out the programs.

Next Monday evening the orchestra will give the third concert in the supplementary series, with Joseph Achron, violinist and composer, as the soloist in a Concerto founded upon Jewish melodies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 27 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FIRST BOW WITH BOSTONIANS

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has re-established that famous organization on the high artistic plane it occupied prior to the war, will conduct the Boston Symphroy when it makes its first appearance of the current season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the season at Poli's next Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course. Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program that will include Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Haendel's 12th concerto, and other numbers to be announced later.

Seats are now selling at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Loop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILLIMANTIC
CONN.
CHRONICLE
JAN 27 1927

CAPITOL THEATRE
HARTFORD
A program of exceeding brilliance

which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to the Capitol Theatre, Hartford, Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock. The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America, and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's baton. The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokokieff's Opera "The Love of Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be DeBussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and to close, the Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PRESS
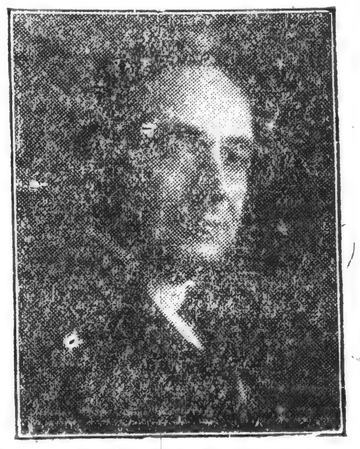
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serg Koussivitzky came to America a the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1924. The fact that a conduct about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest



KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 27 1927

Boston Symphony

The opening New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Sergei Koussevitzky called forth the following comments:

"The four movements of Beethoven's Symphony were read with a sincerity and understanding that had comulative effect. One seeks in vain, among recent performances of the 'Eroica' in this city for such stirring and dramatic treatment of the variations that make the finale. Here, as in the other selections, masterly balance and self-control are united with a thrilling emotional intensity." "New York Times."

"Remarkable beauty of tone, splendid artistic quality and evident discipline of a high order combine to make it once more one of the world's finest orchestras." New York Evening Post."

Reservations for the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater February 6 may be secured at McCoy's. No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAPITOL

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Sergei Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports wer heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world put our public in a state of expectancy.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. The coming concert here offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the orchestra's own city.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's music store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. Phone 497.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UN
JAN 28 1927

Koussevitzky to Present Piano Concerto by Brooklyn Composer.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a new American work, Aaron Copland's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday evening, Feb. 3. The composer will play the piano part.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn and is now 27 years old. His first work in large form to be presented was the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, twice played by Nadia Boulanger under the batons of Walter Damrosch and Mr. Koussevitzky. His "Music for the Theatre" suite, composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contemporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. The suite was heard at a Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn last season.

Mr. Copland's piano concerto, though played without interruption, is divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section and the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 28 1927

Boston Symphony

A varied program has been arranged by Sergei Koussevitzky for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol Theater February 6 at 3 o'clock. A novel number to be introduced will be Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges." Prokofieff's opera, from which this suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. There seems to be no limitation for Mr. Koussevitzky and combined with the fine precision and superb technique of his conducting, this music proves original and captivating. Philip Hale, in reviewing a Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations for the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater February 6 may be secured at McCoy's. No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 29 1927

Boston Symphony

That the conducting of Mr. Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the "Toronto Globe":

"No wonder that the ovation which had been theratened all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. One seldom hears cheering and stamping in Massey Hall, least of all for a symphony and probably never before for a Brahms Symphony!

"This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard without any feeling of conflict or separation. Through the intricate symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations roused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The seat sale for the Hartford Concert at the Capitol Theater. Februar sixth is now in progress. Reservation may be secured at McCoy's Music Stor 89 Asylum street, Management of Fran Sedgwick. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Hartford Conn
JAN 28 1927

86

Boston Symphony In Hartford Concert Soon

A programme of exceeding brilliance which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America, and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the finest in the world has in general opinion never sounded more eloquest than under Koussevitzky's baton.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica". A notable novelty on this Programme will be a Suite from Prokokieff's Opera "The Love for Three Oranges". The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and to close the Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum Street, Hartford or by phone 2-2251. Prices $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. Management of Mr. Frank A. Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS BEE
TOLEDO, OHIO
JAN 29 192

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony for at least two years more, according to reliable information, having agreed to extend his term of activity with the organization until May, 1929. The terms of his contract are described as "flexible."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS RADIO'S BEST

Orchestra, College Harmony and Pythian Male Quartet Each Have Place on Local Wave

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra holds the honors on f WBZ. The each Saturfamous or- the hearty f listeners. Koussevitsky. n variety as of the past. t off by the orchestra ave been

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 29 192

COPLAND GUEST ARTIST

The fourteenth Saturday night concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast through WJZ at 8:10 tonight

Featuring the concert, Aaron Copland, one of the regular American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn. The concerto was written, for the most part, during the summer of 1925, while the composer was at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program. This work, called a Classic Symphony, was written in Leningrad in 1916-17.

sixth at 5 o'clock.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this programme will be a Suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close the Symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $4.45. Phone 497.

TEN PERSONS INJURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 25 1927

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following splendid program will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of its first appearance in Wilmington, at The Shubert Playhouse on Monday evening, January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association:

Concerto in D Major for Orchestra
J. S. Bach
Overture, "Roman Carnival" Berlioz
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Prelude to the "Master Singers"
Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor
Tschaikovsky

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Theodorowicz, Soloist, Delights Children

POST JAN 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Children, as well as grown-ups, respond to the personal equation in musical performance. In other words, the playing of a soloist, be his portion ever so small, is apt to seem the chief feature and culmination of an orchestral concert. Thus at the Boston Symphony Orchestra young people's concert of yesterday, Julius Theodorowicz's skillful playing of an introduction and Russian dance, for violin with orchestral accompaniment, from Tchaikovsky's ballet, "The Swan Lake," called forth much the heartiest applause of the afternoon; and after Mr. Theodorowicz had bowed repeatedly, Mr. Burgin, who was conducting, signalled for a repetition of the dance.

And for these youthful listeners of yesterday, as well as those who will hear the repetition of the concert this afternoon, Mr. Burgin had made a programme rich in attractive music that even the most experienced of their elders do not hear too often.

To begin with, there was Auber's gay and rhythmic overture to "Fra Diavolo" and, in addition to the charming and unfamiliar piece of Tchaikovsky's already mentioned, the programme also listed the Gluck-Mottl Ballet-Suite, that fascinating bundle of orchestral tricks; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Grieg's richly harmonized "Spring," for string orchestra; Grainger's infectious "Molly on the Shore"; and the imposing march from "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 26 1927

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson Greene's Philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program of captivating brilliance that will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin, Haendel's "Twelfth Concerto" and other numbers to be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a most attractive program for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

Carnegie hall overflowed at the opening New York concert of the orchestra on Thanksgiving night. The occasion [illegible] of the effort which is long re-sixth at 5 o'clock.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this programme will be a Suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close the Symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $4.45. Phone 497.

TEN PERSONS INJURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 25 1927

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following splendid program will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of its first appearance in Wilmington, at The Shubert Playhouse on Monday evening, January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association:

Concerto in D Major for Orchestra
J. S. Bach
Overture, "Roman Carnival" Berlioz
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Prelude to the "Master Singers"
Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor
Tschaikovsky

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Theodorowicz, Soloist, Delights Children

POST JAN 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Children, as well as grown-ups, respond to the personal equation in musical performance. In other words, the playing of a soloist, be his portion ever so small, is apt to seem the chief feature and culmination of an orchestral concert. Thus at the Boston Symphony Orchestra young people's concert of yesterday, Julius Theodorowicz's skillful playing of an introduction and Russian dance, for violin with orchestral accompaniment, from Tchaikovsky's ballet, "The Swan Lake," called forth much the heartiest applause of the afternoon; and after Mr. Theodorowicz had bowed repeatedly, Mr. Burgin, who was conducting, signalled for a repetition of the dance.

And for these youthful listeners of yesterday, as well as those who will hear the repetition of the concert this afternoon, Mr. Burgin had made a programme rich in attractive music that even the most experienced of their elders do not hear too often.

To begin with, there was Auber's gay and rhythmic overture to "Fra Diavolo" and, in addition to the charming and unfamiliar piece of Tchaikovsky's already mentioned, the programme also listed the Gluck-Mottl Ballet-Suite, that fascinating bundle of orchestral tricks; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Grieg's richly harmonized "Spring," for string orchestra; Grainger's infectious "Molly on the Shore"; and the imposing march from "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 26 1927

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson Greene's Philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program of captivating brilliance that will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin, Haendel's "Twelfth Concerto" and other numbers to be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a most attractive program for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

Carnegie hall overflowed at the opening New York concert of the orchestra on Thanksgiving night. The occasion [illegible] of the effort which is long re[illegible] sixth at 5 o'clock.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this programme will be a Suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close the Symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $4.45. Phone 497.

TEN PERSONS INJURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 25 1927

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following splendid program will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of its first appearance in Wilmington, at The Shubert Playhouse on Monday evening, January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association:

Concerto in D Major for Orchestra
J. S. Bach
Overture, "Roman Carnival" Berlioz
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Prelude to the "Master Singers"
Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor
Tschaikovsky

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Theodorowicz, Soloist, Delights Children

POST JAN 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Children, as well as grown-ups, respond to the personal equation in musical performance. In other words, the playing of a soloist, be his portion ever so small, is apt to seem the chief feature and culmination of an orchestral concert. Thus at the Boston Symphony Orchestra young people's concert of yesterday, Julius Theodorowicz's skillful playing of an introduction and Russian dance, for violin with orchestral accompaniment, from Tchaikovsky's ballet, "The Swan Lake," called forth much the heartiest applause of the afternoon; and after Mr. Theodorowicz had bowed repeatedly, Mr. Burgin, who was conducting, signalled for a repetition of the dance.

And for these youthful listeners of yesterday, as well as those who will hear the repetition of the concert this afternoon, Mr. Burgin had made a programme rich in attractive music that even the most experienced of their elders do not hear too often.

To begin with, there was Auber's gay and rhythmic overture to "Fra Diavolo" and, in addition to the charming and unfamiliar piece of Tchaikovsky's already mentioned, the programme also listed the Gluck-Mottl Ballet-Suite, that fascinating bundle of orchestral tricks; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Grieg's richly harmonized "Spring," for string orchestra; Grainger's infectious "Molly on the Shore"; and the imposing march from "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 26 1927

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson Greene's Philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program of captivating brilliance that will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin, Haendel's "Twelfth Concerto" and other numbers to be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a most attractive program for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

Carnegie hall overflowed at the opening New York concert of the orchestra on Thanksgiving night. The occasion [illegible] of the effort which is long re-

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD

JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol Theater, February sixth. The score is dedicated to Georges Hartmann, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in analysis arrived at the conclusion; "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitsky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be obtained at McCoy's No. 89 Asylum street, telephone, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 26 1927

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed on his return to the conductor's desk. The demonstration was the more significant, perhaps, because during the week the news had been given out that for two more seasons at least he has agreed to remain at the head of the organization.

This week Friday and Saturday he has set on the programs a new Concerto for piano and orchestra by the young American composer, Aaron Copland, whose "Music for the Theatre" he introduced in Paris after performances in Boston and in New York. The new Concerto will be given its first public hearing this week, since it has been completed within a few days. New to Boston also will be Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Schumann's Symphony in B flat major will round out the programs.

Next Monday evening the orchestra will give the third concert in the supplementary series, with Joseph Achron, violinist and composer, as the soloist in a Concerto founded upon Jewish melodies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 27 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FIRST BOW WITH BOSTONIANS

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has re-established that famous organization on the high artistic plane it occupied prior to the war, will conduct the Boston Symphnoy when it makes its first appearance of the current season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the season at Poli's next Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course. Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program that will include Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin," Haendel's 12th concerto, and other numbers to be announced later.

Seats are now selling at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Loop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WILLIMANTIC
CONN.
CHRONICLE
JAN 27 1927

CAPITOL THEATRE HARTFORD

A program of exceeding brilliance which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to the Capitol Theatre, Hartford, Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock. The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America, and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's baton. The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokokieff's Opera "The Love of Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be DeBussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and to close, the Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PRESS

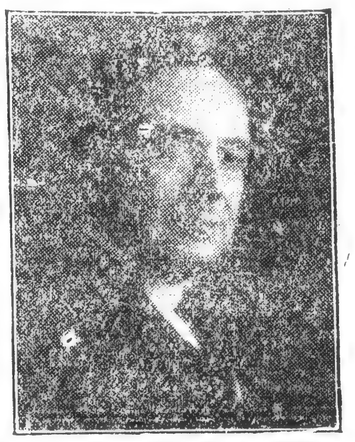
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two, eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest



KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 27 1927

Boston Symphony

The opening New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Sergei Koussevitzky called forth the following comments:

"The four movements of Beethoven's Symphony were read with a sincerity and understanding that had comulative effect. One seeks in vain, among recent performances of the 'Eroica' in this city for such stirring and dramatic treatment of the variations that make the finale. Here, as in the other selections, masterly balance and self-control are united with a thrilling emotional intensity." "New York Times."

"Remarkable beauty of tone, splendid artistic quality and evident discipline of a high order combine to make it once more one of the world's finest orchestras." New York Evening Post."

Reservations for the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater February 6 may be secured at McCoy's. No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAPITOL

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Sergei Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports wer heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world put our public in a state of expectancy.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. The coming concert here offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the orchestra's own city.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's music store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. Phone 497.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UN
JAN 28 1927

Koussevitzky to Present Piano Concerto by Brooklyn Composer.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a new American work, Aaron Copland's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday evening, Feb. 3. The composer will play the piano part.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn and is now 27 years old. His first work in large form to be presented was the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, twice played by Nadia Boulanger under the batons of Walter Damrosch and Mr. Koussevitzky. His "Music for the Theatre" suite, composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contemporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. The suite was heard at a Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn last season.

Mr. Copland's piano concerto, though played without interruption, is divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section and the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 28 1927

Boston Symphony

A varied program has been arranged by Sergei Koussevitzky for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol Theater February 6 at 3 o'clock. A novel number to be introduced will be Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges." Prokofieff's opera, from which this suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. There seems to be no limitation for Mr. Koussevitzky and combined with the fine precision and superb technique of his conducting, this music proves original and captivating. Philip Hale, in reviewing a Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. [illegible] thrilli- heard e con- music phone

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 29 1927

Boston Symphony

That the conducting of Mr. Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the "Toronto Globe":

"No wonder that the ovation which had been theratened all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. One seldom hears cheering and stamping in Massey Hall, least of all for a symphony and probably never before for a Brahms Symphony!

"This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard without any feeling of conflict or separation. Through the intricate symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations roused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The seat sale for the Hartford Concert at the Capitol Theater, February sixth is now in progress. Reservation may be secured at McCoy's Music Store 89 Asylum street, Management of Frank Sedgwick. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

JAN 28 1927

86

Boston Symphony In Hartford Concert Soon

A programme of exceeding brilliance which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America, and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the finest in the world has in general opinion never sounded more eloquest than under Koussevitzky's baton.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica". A notable novelty on this Programme will be a Suite from Prokokieff's Opera "The Love for Three Oranges". The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and to close the Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum Street, Hartford or by phone 2-2251. Prices $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. Management of Mr. Frank A. Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS BEE
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 29 192

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony for at least two years more, according to reliable information, having agreed to extend his term of activity with the organization until May, 1929. The terms of his contract are described as "flexible."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS RADIO'S BEST

Orchestra, College Harmony and Pythian Male Quartet Each Have Place on Local Wave

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra holds the honors on [illegible] WBZ. The [illegible] each Saturday [illegible] famous orchestra [illegible] the hearty [illegible] of listeners. [illegible] Koussevitsky [illegible] n variety as [illegible] of the past. [illegible] et off by the [illegible] orchestra [illegible] ave been

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 29 192[illegible]

COPLAND GUEST ARTIST

The fourteenth Saturday night concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast through WJZ at 8:10 tonight

Featuring the concert, Aaron Copland, one of the regular American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn. The concerto was written, for the most part, during the summer of 1925, while the composer was at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program. This work, called a Classic Symphony, was written in Leningrad in 1916-17.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

sixth at 3 o'clock.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this programme will be a Suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close the Symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $4.45. Phone 497.

TEN PERSONS INJURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 25 1927

ANNOUNCE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following splendid program will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of its first appearance in Wilmington, at The Shubert Playhouse on Monday evening, January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association:

Concerto in D Major for Orchestra
J. S. Bach

Overture, "Roman Carnival". Berlioz
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Prelude to the "Master Singers"
Wagner

Symphony No. 4 in F Minor
Tschaikovsky

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Theodorowicz, Soloist, Delights Children

Post JAN 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Children, as well as grown-ups, respond to the personal equation in musical performance. In other words, the playing of a soloist, be his portion ever so small, is apt to seem the chief feature and culmination of an orchestral concert. Thus at the Boston Symphony Orchestra young people's concert of yesterday, Julius Theodorowicz's skillful playing of an introduction and Russian dance, for violin with orchestral accompaniment, from Tchaikovsky's ballet, "The Swan Lake," called forth much the heartiest applause of the afternoon; and after Mr. Theodorowicz had bowed repeatedly, Mr. Burgin, who was conducting, signalled for a repetition of the dance.

And for these youthful listeners of yesterday, as well as those who will hear the repetition of the concert this afternoon, Mr Burgin had made a programme rich in attractive music that even the most experienced of their elders do not hear too often.

To begin with, there was Auber's gay and rhythmic overture to "Fra Diavolo" and, in addition to the charming and unfamiliar piece of Tchaikovsky's already mentioned, the programme also listed the Gluck-Mottl Ballet-Suite, that fascinating bundle of orchestral tricks; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Grieg's richly harmonized "Spring," for string orchestra; Grainger's infectious "Molly on the Shore"; and the imposing march from "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 26 1927

Symphony.

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's Theater next Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program of captivating brilliance that will include Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," Haendel's "Twelfth Concerto" and other numbers to be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 26 1927

BO
Furniture moving by Reasonable prices Phone Most cert of at the o'clock Carnegie
ing New Y n Thanksg

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
JAN 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol Theater, February sixth. The score is dedicated to Georges Hartmann, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in analysis arrived at the conclusion; "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitsky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 26 1927

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed on his return to the conductor's desk The demonstration was the more significant, perhaps, because during the week the news had been given out that for two more seasons at least he has agreed to remain at the head of the organization.

This week Friday and Saturday he has set on the programs a new Concerto for piano and orchestra by the young American composer, Aaron Copland, whose "Music for the Theatre" he introduced in Paris after performances in Boston and in New York The new Concerto will be given its first public hearing this week, since it has been completed within a few days. New to Boston also will be Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Schumann's Symphony in B flat major will round out the programs.

Next Monday evening the orchestra will give the third concert in the supplementary series, with Joseph Achron, violinist and composer, as the soloist in a Concerto founded upon Jewish melodies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 27 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FIRST BOW WITH BOSTONIANS

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has re-established that famous organization on the high artistic plane it occupied prior to the war, will conduct the Boston Symphnoy when it makes its first appearance of the current season in Washington at Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert will be the second in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course of afternoon concerts.

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its first appearance of the season at Poli's next Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course. Mr. Koussevitzky has selected a program that will include Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Haendel's 12th concerto, and other numbers to be announced later.

Seats are now selling at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WILLIMANTIC
CONN.
CHRONICLE
JAN 27 1927

CAPITOL THEATRE HARTFORD

A program of exceeding brilliance

which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to the Capitol Theatre, Hartford, Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock. The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America, and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's baton. The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica." A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokokieff's Opera "The Love of Three Oranges." The remaining numbers will be DeBussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and to close, the Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RESS
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two, eminent names joined gether for one purpose when Ser Koussivitzky came to America a the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1924. The fact that a conduct ahout whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest

KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 27 1927

Boston Symphony

The opening New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Sergei Koussevitzky called forth the following comments:

"The four movements of Beethoven's Symphony were read with a sincerity and understanding that had comulative effect. One seeks in vain, among recent performances of the 'Eroica' in this city for such stirring and dramatic treatment of the variations that make the finale. Here, as in the other selections, masterly balance and self-control are united with a thrilling emotional intensity." "New York Times."

"Remarkable beauty of tone, splendid artistic quality and evident discipline of a high order combine to make it once more one of the world's finest orchestras." New York Evening Post."

Reservations for the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater February 6 may be secured at McCoy's. No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 27 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT CAPITOL

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Sergei Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports wer heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world put our public in a state of expectancy.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. The coming concert here offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the orchestra's own city.

For the convenience of the New Britain public, orders may be left at McCoy's music store for reservations. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. Phone 497.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
DARD UN
JAN 28 1927

Koussevitzky to Present Piano Concerto by Brooklyn Composer.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a new American work, Aaron Copland's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, on Thursday evening, Feb. 3. The composer will play the piano part.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn and is now 27 years old. His first work in large form to be presented was the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, twice played by Nadia Boulanger under the batons of Walter Damrosch and Mr. Koussevitzky. His "Music for the Theatre" suite, composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contemporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. The suite was heard at a Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn last season.

Mr. Copland's piano concerto, though played without interruption, is divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section and the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 28 1927

Boston Symphony

A varied program has been arranged by Sergei Koussevitzky for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol Theater February 6 at 3 o'clock. A novel number to be introduced will be Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges." Prokofieff's opera, from which this suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. There seems to be no limitation for Mr. Koussevitzky and combined with the fine precision and superb technique of his conducting, this music proves original and captivating. Philip Hale, in reviewing a Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitsky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston." Reservations for the concert may be secured at McCoy's music store, 89 Asylum street, telephone

HARTF
JAN 29

Boston Symphony

That the conducting of Mr. Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the "Toronto Globe":

"No wonder that the ovation which had been theratened all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. One seldom hears cheering and stamping in Massey Hall, least of all for a symphony and probably never before for a Brahms Symphony!

"This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard without any feeling of conflict or separation. Through the intricate symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations roused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The seat sale for the Hartford Concert at the Capitol Theater, Februar sixth is now in progress. Reservation may be secured at McCoy's Music Stor 89 Asylum street, Management of Fran Sedgwick. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 28 1927

86

Boston Symphony In Hartford Concert Soon

A programme of exceeding brilliance which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America, and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquest than under Koussevitzky's baton.

The principal number on the programme will be Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica". A notable novelty on this Programme will be a Suite from Prokokieff's Opera "The Love for Three Oranges". The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" ("Festivals") the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and to close the Symphonic Poem "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum Street, Hartford or by phone 2-2251. Prices $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. Management of Mr. Frank A. Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS BEE
TOLEDO, OHIO
JAN 29 192

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony for at least two years more, according to reliable information, having agreed to extend his term of activity with the organization until May, 1929. The terms of his contract are described as "flexible."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS RADIO'S BEST

Orchestra, College Harmony and Pythian Male Quartet Each Have Place on Local Wave

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra holds the honors on broadcast of WBZ. The

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN TI
JAN 29 192

famous orchestra the hearty listeners. Koussevitsky in variety as of the past. et off by the orchestra ave been

COPLAND GUEST ARTIST

The fourteenth Saturday night concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast through WJZ at 8:10 tonight

Featuring the concert, Aaron Copland, one of the regular American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn. The concerto was written, for the most part, during the summer of 1925, while the composer was at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program. This work, called a Classic Symphony, was written in Leningrad in 1916-17.

SPECIAL SERIES OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Beethoven to Be Honored March 22 to 29

Globe Jan 29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a special series of concerts in commemoration of Beethoven, who died March 26, 1827. The dates of this Beethoven festival are March 22-29. There will be seven concerts, all with Beethoven programs. The nine symphonies, the "Missa Solemnis," and much chamber music will be heard. The advance sale of tickets began yesterday at Symphony Hall.

The assisting artists include the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, Carl Friedberg, Florence Austral, the London String Quartet, the Lenox Quartet, and a number of well-known vocalists for the solo parts in the mass and the ninth symphony.

Ernest Newman, distinguished English writer on musical topics, will journey from London to make a commemorative address on Beethoven as part of this series.

It is doubtful whether any of the commemorations planned the world over in every musical capital will surpass this Boston tribute to Beethoven's immortal genius on the 100th anniversary of his death.

TO PAY BEETHOVEN GREAT TRIBUTE

HER — JAN 29

Boston Orchestra to Play All Nine Symphonies March 26

Of the many tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, none will equal the centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall in that week. The outline of this festival, now announced, is such that it is debatable whether a precedent could be found, if one considers both the participants and the scope of the programs.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist. Ernest Newman, the English critic, will journey from London to Boston, to give an address on Beethoven. The festival will comprise seven concerts from Tuesday, March 22 through March 29.

In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven.

Solo singers to appear in the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS RADIO'S BEST

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra holds the honors on this evening's broadcast of WBZ. The concerts that are offered each Saturday evening by this world famous organization, have met with the hearty approval of thousands of listeners. The concert that Serge Koussevitsky has prepared is as wide in variety as have been the concerts of the past. With a dash of the old, set off by the new the offerings of the orchestra under Mr Koussevitsky have been greatly successful.

Dick Newcomb, and his Masters of Modern Melody, will open the broadcast of the evening with dance offerings. The orchestra will introduce its program tonight with its usual trademark "Who," at 6 o'clock.

At 6.45 p. m., the students of the Massachusetts Agricultural college will visit the local studio to entertain for a few moments with a bit of college harmony.

The Knights of Pythias Male quartet, whose Saturday evening concerts have been one of the most popular features on the Westinghouse wave will be heard again this evening. One of the outstanding features of this organization, is the work of Antonio Martone, the second tenor of the quartet. In addition to having a remarkable tenor voice Mr [illegible] one is a violinist and pianist of [illegible]rst rank and his work on these [illegible]ments helps to make this [illegible]ast one of the most popular on [illegible] Programs:—

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes Copland, Prokofieff, Schumann, and Bach Pieces

CONCERT TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

HER — JAN 29

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings; Prokofieff, "Classic" symphony (first time in Boston); Copland, concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra (first performance); Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, No. 1 op. 38. Mr. Copland was the pianist.

After a virile, strongly rhythmed performance of Bach's music, came the "Classic" symphony of Prokofieff. Were those who were disturbed by the "Scythian" suite and "They are Seven" of this composer, reassured by the word "Classic"? Did they enter the hall free from fear of the "Wild" Russian and his splendid savagery? The statemenot that his idea in this symphony was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores," did not inspire confidence or kindle joyful anticipation, for one remembered that the Stravinsky of the latter years insists that he is writing in the manner of Bach. And with what dire results!

Prokofieff's symphony turned out to be a delightful little work, fresh, melodious, vivacious, with significant themes; masterly, not pedantic treatment of them; charming orchestration achieved by apparently simple means, but showing consummate skill. The first movement and the finale were in many measures truly Mozartian in mood, the Larghetto and the Gavotte were more modern but in no way aggressively contradictory. The piquancy of the two middle movements was especially enjoyed by the audience, warmly applausive of the whole work, as it had been of the Suite by Bach.

One should be sorry for Mr. Copland. His "Music for the Theatre, played here late in 1925, was much more to his credit than his Symphony for organ and orchestra heard earlier in that year. One hoped to note continued progress in the invention of thematic material; in firmness of control, so that one could say he was leaving the experimental state and writing with surety, no longer relying on what he thought would attract attention by novelty and audacity.

If this concerto shows the present condition of Mr. Copland's musical mind, he is on the wrong track. One is not easily annoyed in these days by a free use of dissonances, by daring juxtapositions of tonalities, if they are effective; if they serve in establishing a mood, contemplative, fiery, sombre; if there is a revelation of strength, however barbaric, of beauty, however strange and fantastical. In this Concerto we found little to attract, little to admire, much to repel.

Jazz is not the monster it has been called; it has already had its uses; it has stimulated symphonic composers to greater rhythmic energy and freedom. It all depends on the use made of this form of music. There must also be originality in the "tune" and in the treatment when it is allowed to influence a work of importance. Mr. Copland is not yet an adept in this field.

The Concerto also shows a shocking lack of taste, of proportion. The first measures are proof enough. After thunderous, blaring measures in which one brass instrument vies with another in arrogant announcement—announcements without logical connection, though the composer says this introduction proclaims the principal thematic material—there are gentle, purposeless measures for the piano, which is struck by fingers apparently directed at random, as a child amuses itself by making noises when it is restless in the room.

We do not doubt Mr. Copland's honesty of purpose; it is the purpose, the musical scheme that is to be deplored. Yesterday some in the audience laughed, as if the Concerto were a huge joke played on the hearers, also on Mr. Koussevitzky, who, as Mr. Copland says, suggested to him the composition of it.

The question comes up legitimately: Does Mr. Copland hear music in this way? Is his musical speech natural or acquired? His next composition may answer satisfactorily these questions.

Let us not forget that the leading English reviewers characterized Schumann's Symphony in B flat when they first heard it as belonging to the "Broken Crockery School." Our objection to Mr. Copland's broken crockery is that it is not of the first quality.

This Symphony of Schumann's was eloquently performed, so eloquently that one forgot the various adverse judgments that have been passed upon it from the days of Chorley and Davidson to those of Vincent d'Indy.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. The program of Feb. 11 and 12 is as follows: Langendoen, Variations for strings on a Dutch Theme of A. Valerius; Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2, B flat minor (Moriz Rosenthal, pianist); Elgar, Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Langendoen is a violoncellist in the orchestra.

COPLAND'S LATEST IS POOR STUFF

Post — JAN 29

Symphony in Banal Piece With the Composer

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There are some who do not hold in especially high regard the First Symphony of Robert Schumann, but the harshest critic of this simple-minded music must have warmed to it at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon since, repeating the Symphony from the concerts of a few weeks ago, Mr. Koussevitzky gave it on this occasion a singularly flattering setting.

PROKOFIEFF'S SYMPHONY

By way of beginning to as oddly assorted a Symphony programme as one hears often, came the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, already conducted here by Mr. Koussevitzky. A work in which Bach is less the poet in tones than the spinner of an intricate and somewhat monotonous contrapuntal web, this concerto was magnificently played by the orchestra's string choir, and Mr. Koussevitzky bade these gentlemen rise in response to the warm applause.

From Bach the programme leapt a couple of centuries to the so-called "classic" Symphony of Prokofieff. But the leap proved not such a wide one after all, since in this work of his 27th year the gifted Russian set out, and with a measure of success, to ape the manner, style and idiom of Mozart. Brief, tuneful, cleverly made, this symphony in miniature is pleasant enough to hear, and yesterday's audience received it gracefully. Only a captious critic would suggest that Mozart wrote better "Mozart" than Prokofieff possibly could, and that Prokofieff writes "Prokofieff" far better than he does "Mozart."

And then came the aural sensation not merely of the afternoon, but of the season, the first performance on any concert stage of Aaron Copland's new Concerto for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself as pianist assisting in the deed. Thrice has this young-est of recognized American composers been honored by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

To question Mr. Copland's sincerity would be unjust and unkind. It was necessary only to watch him yesterday to be convinced that he is in deadly earnest. But if there exists anywhere in the world of music a stranger concatenation of meaninglessly ugly sounds and distorted rhythms, Boston has been spared it. Since there must be a bit of jazz in all American music nowadays, Mr. Copland has his measures in that vein, but as one young man in the audience remarked, no dance-hall would tolerate jazz of such utter badness. No doubt a European audience would have hissed Mr. Copland's Concerto. That of yesterday merely snickered, and was politely applausive when the piece was done.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 29 1927

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY TO LEAD FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, will give its first Washington concert this season on Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30, as the second attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts, at Poli's Theater.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Handel "Concerto Grosso" in B minor, for strings; playing also the Prokofieff "Classic Symphony," opus 25; the Ravel choreographis poem, "La Valse;" and the Schumann Symphony, B flat.

This program is expected to prove tremendously interesting to Washington lovers of orchestral music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, since its last appearance in Washington last season, has steadily advanced in popularity both at home and on tour.

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W., and will be on sale at Poli's Theater box office on the afternoon of the concert.

COPLAND HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

His New Concerto Proves Sensational

GLOBE — JAN 29

Aaron Copland, "born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900," as the program had it, was the soloist at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. He played the piano part in a new concerto, written at the suggestion of Mr Koussevitzky, and performed yesterday for the first time anywhere.

No music heard at these concerts in the past 15 seasons has created so great a sensation. The audience forgot its manners, exchanged scathing verbal comments, and giggled nervously while the piece was being played, creating so great a bustle that at times it was difficult to hear the music clearly. The writer had the misfortune to be near a particularly perturbed portion of the congregation, but there was a distinct undercurrent of commotion all over the hall during the final allegro.

At the close of the piece there were a few scattered hisses, a few scattered handclaps, and a general appearance of stupefaction. Mr Koussevitzky led out Mr Copland to acknowledge the applause which thereupon swelled to respectable proportions.

The scandal was created by the wholly incidental use of saxophones, muted trumpets, bits of jazz rhythm and other effects which the public has come to associate with modern dancing rather than with the Symphony concerts. Since Mr Copland has written in this concerto compact, clearly thought out and almost excessively formal music, not melodramatic and not intrinsically incoherent or vulgar, it is perhaps to be regretted that he chose to score it with such self-conscious audacity.

Though still a young man, he ought by the age of 27 to have learned to restrain what is sometimes a pardonable desire to thumb one's nose at the stupidities of audiences. One could not see that the offending bits of tone color were essential to his artistic design.

Difficult to Judge Work

It is impossible to judge a new work finally at a first hearing, but this new concerto, the aforesaid experiments in scoring apart, sounded yesterday like the early work of a man who may become a great composer The themes are salient and memorable.

His treatment of them in the slow first section is long-breathed and assured, attaining lyric utterance, with very little fumbling. In the allegro finale, the capricious and fragmentary use of rhythm is a bit questionable. But even here it is at Copland's episodes, at details in his development, not at his themes or at the main outlines of his music, that one cavils.

The piano in this concerto is not treated as a solo instrument, but as a member of the orchestra with a function near the percussion section, akin to that of the harp. But the audience, of course, giggled at watching Mr Copland in one portion of the finale solemnly pounding rhythmically at a handful of the extreme top notes of the keyboard, not realizing that his proper place on the stage was momentarily not that of a piano soloist but up in a humble rear corner near the triangle and the Chinese drum. He is too good a pianist, by the way, to deserve the old gibe that some may inflict upon him of "playing like a composer."

The other new piece at this concert Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" an amusing bit of light music, written in an attempt to create out of an ingenious musical imagination the style which Mozart, if miraculously brought to life in the present decade, might conceivably use. The four movements are very brief, deftly turned, with rather obvious prettiness of detail. They were gracefully played and very warmly applauded.

Program Lengthened

The program has been lengthened by prefixing to it the familiar G major third "Brandenburg" concerto of Bach, a nobly energetic piece always gladly listened to. The scoring again was not that of the original. No piano replaced the missing "cembalo," as it has on some previous occasions. The performance was eloquent and full of energy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 29 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will make their third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall for concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At the Thursday concert, Aaron Copland, the young American composer, will play the piano part in his latest score, a "Pianoforte Concerto" which had its first performance in Boston the other day. The program will open with the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, and close with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

On the Saturday program, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a Suite in F, composed by Albert Roussel for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and dedicated to its conductor last summer. The other number will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 7. Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, and the First Symphony of Schumann in B-flat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 29 1927

COPELAND TO BE HEARD TO-NIGHT IN RADIO CONCERT

Noted Composer-Pianist to Broadcast Own Work Through WBZ, WJZ

The fourteenth Saturday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast for the audiences of stations WBZ and WJZ at 8:10 o'clock to-night through the courtesy of Mr. W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, producers of La Touraine Coffee and Tea, whose slogan is — "You might as well have the best." On account of previous commitments to-night's concert will not be broadcast by KDKA, but definite arrangements have been completed whereby the Westinghouse pioneer station will send out the remaining ten concerts of the Symphony series. Because of previous arrangements, WJZ will tie in with only six of the remaining ten concerts.

Featuring the concert to-night, Aaron Copland, one of the younger American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is now living in New York city. The concerts was written for the most part during the summer of 1925, when the composer was at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program. This work, called a Classic Symphony, was written in Leningrad in 1916-17, and was first performed there by the orchestra called by the Bolshevists the State Orchestra, but which was formerly under the control of the Imperial Court. The symphony is written in strict classical form, and Prokofieff states that what he tried to do in the work was to catch the spirit of Mozart, and write that which Mozart might have written were he alive today.

A large proportion of the comments received after the program of the Boston Symphony pay high tribute to the help gained in appreciation of the works through the remarks of Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College. Professor Marshall will discuss during the intermission Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, which is given its second performance of the present season by the orchestra. Besides analyzing this symphony and illustrating the themes, Professor Marshall will tell of the romantic movement of which Schumann was the leader. He will be assisted in the illustrations before the concert and during the intermission by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain and Mr. Nicholas Slonimsky, pianists.

The complete program follows:

Classic Symphony, Op. 25.....Prokofieff
- I. Allegro
- II. Larghetto
- III. Gavotte
- IV. Finale

Concerto for Pianoforte.....Copland
Aaron Copland, soloist.

Symphony in B flat major,
No. 1, Op. 38.....Schumann
- I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace
- II. Larghetto
- III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I; Molto piu vivace; Trio II
- IV. Allegro animato a grazioso

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JAN 29 1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will make their third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall for concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Thursday concert Aaron Copland, the young American composer, will play the piano part in his latest score, a "Pianoforte Concerto." The program will open with the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and close with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

SPECIAL SERIES OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Beethoven to Be Honored March 22 to 29

Globe Jan 29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a special series of concerts in commemoration of Beethoven, who died March 26, 1827. The dates of this Beethoven festival are March 22-29. There will be seven concerts, all with Beethoven programs. The nine symphonies, the "Missa Solemnis," and much chamber music will be heard. The advance sale of tickets began yesterday at Symphony Hall.

The assisting artists include the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, Carl Friedberg, Florence Austral, the London String Quartet, the Lenox Quartet, and a number of well-known vocalists for the solo parts in the mass and the ninth symphony.

Ernest Newman, distinguished English writer on musical topics, will journey from London to make a commemorative address on Beethoven as part of this series.

It is doubtful whether any of the commemorations planned the world over in every musical capital will surpass this Boston tribute to Beethoven's immortal genius on the 100th anniversary of his death.

TO PAY BEETHOVEN GREAT TRIBUTE

HER — JAN 29

Boston Orchestra to Play All Nine Symphonies March 26

Of the many tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, none will equal the centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall in that week. The outline of this festival, now announced, is such that it is debatable whether a precedent could be found, if one considers both the participants and the scope of the programs.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist. Ernest Newman, the English critic, will journey from London to Boston, to give an address on Beethoven. The festival will comprise seven concerts from Tuesday, March 22 through March 29.

In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven.

Solo singers to appear in the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS RADIO'S BEST

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra holds the honors on this evening's broadcast of WBZ. The concerts that are offered each Saturday evening by this world famous organization, have met with the hearty approval of thousands of listeners. The concert that Serge Koussevitsky has prepared is as wide in variety as have been the concerts of the past. With a dash of the old, set off by the new the offerings of the orchestra under Mr Koussevitsky have been greatly successful.

Dick Newcomb, and his Masters of Modern Melody, will open the broadcast of the evening with dance offerings. The orchestra will introduce its program tonight with its usual trademark "Who," at 6 o'clock.

At 6.45 p. m., the students of the Massachusetts Agricultural college will visit the local studio to entertain for a few moments with a bit of college harmony.

The Knights of Pythias Male quartet, whose Saturday evening concerts have been one of the most popular features on the Westinghouse wave will be heard again this evening. One of the outstanding features of this organization, is the work of Antonio Martone, the second tenor of the quartet. In addition to having a remarkable tenor voice Mr Martone is a violinist and pianist of first rank and his work on these instruments helps to make this quartet one of the most popular on the air. Programs:—

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes Copland, Prokofieff, Schumann, and Bach Pieces

CONCERT TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

HER — JAN 29

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings; Prokofieff, "Classic" symphony (first time in Boston); Copland, concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra (first performance); Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, No. 1 op. 38. Mr. Copland was the pianist.

After a virile, strongly rhythmed performance of Bach's music, came the "Classic" symphony of Prokofieff. Were those who were disturbed by the "Scythian" suite and "They are Seven" of this composer, reassured by the word "Classic"? Did they enter the hall free from fear of the "Wild" Russian and his splendid savagery? The statemenot that his idea in this symphony was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores," did not inspire confidence or kindle joyful anticipation, for one remembered that the Stravinsky of the latter years insists that he is writing in the manner of Bach. And with what dire results!

Prokofieff's symphony turned out to be a delightful little work, fresh, melodious, vivacious, with significant themes; masterly, not pedantic treatment of them; charming orchestration achieved by apparently simple means, but showing consummate skill. The first movement and the finale were in many measures truly Mozartian in mood, the Larghetto and the Gavotte were more modern but in no way aggressively contradictory. The piquancy of the two middle movements was especially enjoyed by the audience, warmly applausive of the whole work, as it had been of the Suite by Bach.

One should be sorry for Mr. Copland. His "Music for the Theatre, played here late in 1925, was much more to his credit than his Symphony for organ and orchestra heard earlier in that year. One hoped to note continued progress in the invention of thematic material; in firmness of control, so that one could say he was leaving the experimental state and writing with surety, no longer relying on what he thought would attract attention by novelty and audacity.

If this concerto shows the present condition of Mr. Copland's musical mind, he is on the wrong track. One is not easily annoyed in these days by a free use of dissonances, by daring juxtapositions of tonalities, if they are effective; if they serve in establishing a mood, contemplative, fiery, sombre; if there is a revelation of strength, however barbaric, of beauty, however strange and fantastical. In this Concerto we found little to attract, little to admire, much to repel.

Jazz is not the monster it has been called; it has already had its uses; it has stimulated symphonic composers to greater rhythmic energy and freedom. It all depends on the use made of this form of music. There must also be originality in the "tune" and in the treatment when it is allowed to influence a work of importance. Mr. Copland is not yet an adept in this field.

The Concerto also shows a shocking lack of taste, of proportion. The first measures are proof enough. After thunderous, blaring measures in which one brass instrument vies with another in arrogant announcement—announcements without logical connection, though the composer says this introduction proclaims the principal thematic material—there are gentle, purposeless measures for the piano, which is struck by fingers apparently directed at random, as a child amuses itself by making noises when it is restless in the room.

We do not doubt Mr. Copland's honesty of purpose; it is the purpose, the musical scheme that is to be deplored. Yesterday some in the audience laughed, as if the Concerto were a huge joke played on the hearers, also on Mr. Koussevitzky, who, as Mr. Copland says, suggested to him the composition of it.

The question comes up legitimately: Does Mr. Copland hear music in this way? Is his musical speech natural or acquired? His next composition may answer satisfactorily these questions.

Let us not forget that the leading English reviewers characterized Schumann's Symphony in B flat when they first heard it as belonging to the "Broken Crockery School." Our objection to Mr. Copland's broken crockery is that it is not of the first quality.

This Symphony of Schumann's was eloquently performed, so eloquently that one forgot the various adverse judgments that have been passed upon it from the days of Chorley and Davidson to those of Vincent d'Indy.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. The program of Feb. 11 and 12 is as follows: Langendoen, Variations for strings on a Dutch Theme of A. Valerius; Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2, B flat minor (Moriz Rosenthal, pianist); Elgar, Variations on an Original Theme. Mr. Langendoen is a violoncellist in the orchestra.

COPLAND'S LATEST IS POOR STUFF

Post — JAN. 29

Symphony in Banal Piece With the Composer

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There are some who do not hold in especially high regard the First Symphony of Robert Schumann, but the harshest critic of this simple-minded music must have warmed to it at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon since, repeating the Symphony from the concerts of a few weeks ago, Mr. Koussevitzky gave it on this occasion a singularly flattering setting.

PROKOFIEFF'S SYMPHONY

By way of beginning to as oddly assorted a Symphony programme as one hears often, came the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, already conducted here by Mr. Koussevitzky. A work in which Bach is less the poet in tones than the spinner of an intricate and somewhat monotonous contrapuntal web, this concerto was magnificently played by the orchestra's string choir, and Mr. Koussevitzky bade these gentlemen rise in response to the warm applause.

From Bach the programme leapt a couple of centuries to the so-called "classic" Symphony of Prokofieff. But the leap proved not such a wide one after all, since in this work of his 27th year the gifted Russian set out, and with a measure of success, to ape the manner, style and idiom of Mozart. Brief, tuneful, cleverly made, this symphony in miniature is pleasant enough to hear, and yesterday's audience received it gracefully. Only a captious critic would suggest that Mozart wrote better "Mozart" than Prokofieff possibly could, and that Prokofieff writes "Prokofieff" far better than he does "Mozart."

And then came the aural sensation not merely of the afternoon, but of the season, the first performance on any concert stage of Aaron Copland's new Concerto for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself as pianist assisting in the deed. Thrice has this young master of recognized American composers been honored by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

To question Mr. Copland's sincerity would be unjust and unkind. It was necessary only to watch him yesterday to be convinced that he is in deadly earnest. But if there exists anywhere in the world of music a stranger concatenation of meaninglessly ugly sounds and distorted rhythms, Boston has been spared it. Since there must be a bit of jazz in all American music nowadays, Mr. Copland has his measures in that vein, but as one young man in the audience remarked, no dance-hall would tolerate jazz of such utter badness. No doubt a European audience would have hissed Mr. Copland's Concerto. That of yesterday merely snickered, and was politely applausive when the piece was done.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 29 1927

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY TO LEAD FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, will give its first Washington concert this season on Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30, as the second attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts, at Poli's Theater.

Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with the Handel "Concerto Grosso" in B minor, for strings; playing also the Prokofieff "Classic Symphony," opus 25; the Ravel choreographis poem, "La Valse;" and the Schumann Symphony, B flat.

This program is expected to prove tremendously interesting to Washington lovers of orchestral music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, since its last appearance in Washington last season, has steadily advanced in popularity both at home and on tour.

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W., and will be on sale at Poli's Theater box office on the afternoon of the concert.

COPLAND HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

His New Concerto Proves Sensational

GLOBE — JAN 29

Aaron Copland, "born in Brooklyn, N Y, in 1900," as the program had it, was the soloist at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. He played the piano part in a new concerto, written at the suggestion of Mr Koussevitzky, and performed yesterday for the first time anywhere.

No music heard at these concerts in the past 15 seasons has created so great a sensation. The audience forgot its manners, exchanged scathing verbal comments, and giggled nervously while the piece was being played, creating so great a bustle that at times it was difficult to hear the music clearly. The writer had the misfortune to be near a particularly perturbed portion of the congregation, but there was a distinct undercurrent of commotion all over the hall during the final allegro.

At the close of the piece there were a few scattered hisses, a few scattered handclaps, and a general appearance of stupefaction. Mr Koussevitzky led out Mr Copland to acknowledge the applause which thereupon swelled to respectable proportions.

The scandal was created by the wholly incidental use of saxophones, muted trumpets, bits of jazz rhythm and other effects which the public has come to associate with modern dancing rather than with the Symphony concerts. Since Mr Copland has written in this concerto compact, clearly thought out and almost excessively formal music, not melodramatic and not intrinsically incoherent or vulgar, it is perhaps to be regretted that he chose to score it with such self-conscious audacity.

Though still a young man, he ought by the age of 27 to have learned to restrain what is sometimes a pardonable desire to thumb one's nose at the stupidities of audiences. One could not see that the offending bits of tone color were essential to his artistic design.

Difficult to Judge Work

It is impossible to judge a new work finally at a first hearing, but this new concerto, the aforesaid experiments in scoring apart, sounded yesterday like the early work of a man who may become a great composer The themes are salient and memorable.

His treatment of them in the slow first section is long-breathed and assured, attaining lyric utterance, with very little fumbling. In the allegro finale, the capricious and fragmentary use of rhythm is a bit questionable. But even here it is at Copland's episodes, at details in his development, not at his themes or at the main outlines of his music, that one cavils.

The piano in this concerto is not treated as a solo instrument, but as a member of the orchestra with a function near the percussion section, akin to that of the harp. But the audience, of course, giggled at watching Mr Copland in one portion of the finale solemnly pounding rhythmically at a handful of the extreme top notes of the keyboard, not realizing that his proper place on the stage was momentarily not that of a piano soloist but up in a humble rear corner near the triangle and the Chinese drum. He is too good a pianist, by the way, to deserve the old gibe that some may inflict upon him of "playing like a composer."

The other new piece at this concert Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" an amusing bit of light music, written in an attempt to create out of an ingenious musical imagination the style which Mozart, if miraculously brought to life in the present decade, might conceivably use. The four movements are very brief, deftly turned, with rather obvious prettiness of detail. They were gracefully played and very warmly applauded.

Program Lengthened

The program has been lengthened by prefixing to it the familiar G major third "Brandenburg" concerto of Bach, a nobly energetic piece always gladly listened to. The scoring again was not that of the original. No piano replaced the missing "cembalo," as it has on some previous occasions. The performance was eloquent and full of energy.

The final number was Schumann's First Symphony, already performed this season at these concerts. Mr Koussevitzky again gave a brilliant and on the whole unusually successful reading, revivifying music which has sometimes seemed half faded, half inarticulate, so that it sounded like new.

There are no Boston Symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. P. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JAN 29 1927

COPELAND TO BE HEARD TO-NIGHT IN RADIO CONCERT

Noted Composer-Pianist to Broadcast Own Work Through WBZ, WJZ

The fourteenth Saturday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast for the audiences of stations WBZ and WJZ at 8:10 o'clock to-night through the courtesy of Mr. W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, producers of La Touraine Coffee and Tea, whose slogan is — "You might as well have the best." On account of previous commitments to-night's concert will not be broadcast by KDKA, but definite arrangements have been completed whereby the Westinghouse pioneer station will send out the remaining ten concerts of the Symphony series. Because of previous arrangements, WJZ will tie in with only six of the remaining ten concerts.

Featuring the concert to-night, Aaron Copland, one of the younger American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is now living in New York city. The concerts was written for the most part during the summer of 1925, when the composer was at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program. This work, called a Classic Symphony, was written in Leningrad in 1916-17, and was first performed there by the orchestra called by the Bolshevists the State Orchestra, but which was formerly under the control of the Imperial Court. The symphony is written in strict classical form, and Prokofieff states that what he tried to do in the work was to catch the spirit of Mozart, and write that which Mozart might have written were he alive to-day.

A large proportion of the comments received after the program of the Boston Symphony pay high tribute to the help gained in appreciation of the works through the remarks of Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College. Professor Marshall will discuss during the intermission Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, which is given its second performance of the present season by the orchestra. Besides analyzing this symphony and illustrating the themes, Professor Marshall will tell of the romantic movement of which Schumann was the leader. He will be assisted in the illustrations before the concert and during the intermission by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain and Mr. Nicholas Slonimsky, pianists.

The complete program follows:

Classic Symphony, Op. 25..Prokofieff
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale

Concerto for Pianoforte.....Copland
Aaron Copland, soloist.

Symphony in B flat major,
No. 1, Op. 38.....Schumann
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I; Molto piu vivace; Trio II
IV. Allegro animato a grazioso

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JAN 29 1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will make third visit of the season to Carnegie Hall for concerts next Thursday afternoon and Saturday afternoon. At Thursday concert Aaron Copland, young American composer, will play the piano part in his latest score, "Pianoforte Concerto." The program will open with the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and close with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

On the Saturday program, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a Suite in F, composed by Albert Roussel for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and dedicated to its conductor last summer. The other number will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, and the First Symphony of Schumann in B-flat.

On the Saturday program Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a Suite in F, composed by Albert Roussel for the orchestra. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12; Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, and the First Symphony of Schumann in B flat.

Albert Roussel wrote his Suite in F last year, from March to August. The score is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky and was performed from the manuscript at the Boston concerts of January 21 and 22. The French composer divides his music into three movements—Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue, observing to an extent these classical forms.

Serge Prokofieff composed his "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, in 1916 and 1917. His intention, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." The score has the traditional four movements—allegro, larghetto, gavotta and finale—and scrupulously follows sonata form.

Aaron Copland wrote his Piano Concerto at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky. He began it in January, 1926, worked upon it last summer in France and completed it last November. It was first performed by the orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 29 1927

PHILA. ORCHESTRA'S REVISED CONCERT

Rodzinski Conducts Varied Programme That Creates Conflicting Impressions

German Novelty and Fourth Tchaikovski Symphony Are the Features

BY LINTON MARTIN

The Philadelphia Orchestra concer in the Academy yesterday afternoo was programmed and presented b Artur Rodzinski, fortuitous circum stances having somewhat unexpectedl brought forward the assistant conduct or in this capacity, since Fritz Reine had been temporarily released as gue conductor in Stokowski's absence, t direct the New York Philharmonic Or chestra in the dilemma of Toscanini illness. The result was something an emergency offering, consisting of substantial symphony, a moderate modern German novelty, and two m lodious offerings, all of which emph sized Rodzinski's qualities as conduct that have already been made quite f miliar here.

The symphony was the Tchaikovs Fourth. The novelty was Franz Schre er's "Prelude to a Drama." The pr gramme included Charpentier's ingr tiating orchestral suite, "Impressions Italy," and it began, in summer amus ment park style, with Rossini's "Ba ber of Seville" Overture, which, course, isn't actually even the authe tic overture to that ancient opera, a seems exceedingly simple judged prevailing symphonic standards.

The Schreker work is a curio combination of sententious sentiment ism suggesting Victor Herbert in more florid flight, a pompous parade the pathy, and an obvious Orientalis of the pseudo-sort. It sounds st prisingly old-fashioned in many of roundly resolved harmonies, althou it has its dissonant details as well, its more Oriental aspects. The pie is tediously long, and has no commar ing characteristics, in all its excess nineteen minutes.

It would be cruel to compare y terday's presentation of the Tchaik ski fateful Fourth Symphony w Koussevitsky's thrilling interpretat here last season with his Bos Symphony Orchestra, or the Stok ski style. Rodzinski's reading ran from routine to ragged. It complet missed the tingling intensity which the outstanding aspect of this sup symphony, and sounded slack stodgy. Rodzinski is as earnest as is uninspired in works of command calibre, although he has a fair fact in obvious and melodious music. was as rash as it was regrettable him to tackle the Tchaikovski Fou

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927

AARON COPLAND IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourteenth of the Radio Series Will Feature American Composer Tonight From Boston

The 14th Saturday evening concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast for the audiences of stations WBZ and WJZ at 8.10 tonight. On account of previous commitments, tonight's concert will not be broadcast by KDKA but definite arrangements have been completed whereby the Westinghouse pioneer station will send out the remaining 10 concerts.

Featuring the concert of tonight, Aaron Copland, one of the younger American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr Copland was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is now living in New York city. The concerto was written for the most part during the summer of 1925, while the composer was at the MacDowell colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program and Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college will discuss during the intermission Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat major, which is given its second performance of the present season by the orchestra. The complete program follows:—

Classic symphony, opus 25.....Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
Concerto for pianoforte.....Copland
Aaron Copland, soloist
Symphony in B flat major, No 1, opus 38. Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo; molto vivace; trio I; molto piu vivace; trio II
Allegro animato e grazioso

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

One to Be Given Here Monday Is Entirely Out of the Ordinary

Is One Which Will Undoubtedly Appeal to All Lovers of Music

Much interest attaches to the program which Serge Koussevitzky has made for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Shubert Playhouse, Wilmington, on January 31, under his direction.

The first number will be a Concerto of Philip Emanual Bach, the most talented son of Johann Sebastion Bach. This Concerto has been especially arranged for Mr. Koussevitzky by Maximlian Steinberg, the talented nephew of Rimsky-Korsakov. Steinberg has used a string orchestra with a small choir of wind instruments. His scoring is not in strict acordance with the period, since he gives much of the melody of the slow movement to the English horn, an instrument of modern usage. In spirit, however, Steinberg's treatment is considered by on means irreverent or anachronistic.

The next number will be Berlioz Overture, "The Roman Carnival". This great composer, founder of the French national school of music, was perhaps never more highly and brilliantly effective than in the overture to this opera. This short piece in itself would be sufficient to establish his rank by its striking originality in the use of "color". This number figured on Koussevitzky's first concert in America, when Warren Storey-Smith called it, in the Boston Post, "a performance that for expressiveness and corruscating brilliance must have come to each individual in the hall as a revelation both of the potentialities of Berlioz's thrice-familiar music and of the powers and the prowess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra". Penfield Roberts then likewise remarked upon this performance in the Boston Globe: "One will remember in hearing the piece years later from other hands how it sounded yesterday afternoon."

There will be two notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the first called "Waldweben" ("Forest Murmurs"), is drawn from the second act of Siegfried, which in turn is the third drama of the "Ring" cycle. Reclining in the forest, Sieggried listens to the soft and drowsy sounds of nature, and is especially enchanted by the bird calls which by magic e is soon to be able to understand. This gentle and dreamy music of ature figures among the finest ages of Wagner.

The other Wagner excerpt will e the Prelude of his gay music rama, "The Mastersingers of Nuemberg". Using the principal emes of this music drama, and ting them in the propore order, agner made his prelude a sort of ngation of the entire work with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama, are so eloquently, if more tersely expressed in the brilliant prelude.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

The principal number on the programe will be the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in F minor. This symphony is considere by many as the Russian composer's masterpiece, and was even finer than the Sixth or "Pathetic" Symphony. It is a score of exceeding brilliance and dramatic effectiveness, with a lovely songful slow movement and a delightful scherzo in which the entire string orchestra, laying down their bows, play pizzicato throughout.

Mr. Koussevitzky, at whose suggestion Aaron Copland wrote his piano concerto to be heard here next Thursday, was to produce the work in Boston in the last two days. The composition was sketched out last January and Mr. Copland worked on it last Summer in France, completing it on his return in November. Though played without interruption, the concerto is in two contrasted parts, the first a slow, lyric section and the second a fast and rhythmic one.

Serge Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony" in the same program is dated ten years ago and aims "to catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put in his scores."

Albert Roussel's classic Suite in F on next Saturday's matinee bill, is a new work composed for the Boston Symphony and dedicated to Koussevitzky. The matinee also hears Schumann's romantic symphony, "Spring."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Brooklyn for the third time this season, giving a concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening.

The Russian conductor will present as the principal number on his program, the symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor. A novelty of interest will be the "Classic" Symphony of Prokofieff. In this score the young Russian composer reverts in form and spirit to the simple grace and charm of the 18th century.

The program will open with the twelfth "Concerto Grosso" of Handel in which the string sections of the orchestra will be heard alone, and also includes Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," which depicts the evolution of the Viennese waltz.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Copland will play the piano part. This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place under Rubin Goldmark in New York and later under Nadia Boulanger in Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist in January, 1925, and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.
JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, will make its first concert appearance of the season Wednesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, as the second attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course, at Poli's Theater. Koussevitzky has a program opening with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, for string orchestrated in B minor; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony, Opus 25; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, Opus 38, No. 1.

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau in Droop's 1300 G St. N. W. and will be on sale at Poli's Theater box office on the afternoon of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 30 1927

Bostonians Coming With Koussevitzky

Their First Concert Of The Season Will Take Place Tuesday Evening. New York Symphony Here Wednesday

Musical Events Of The Week.

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Lyric.

Wednesday—New York Symphony Orchestra, Oscar Klemperer conducting, at the Lyric.

Friday—Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, at the Peabody, 4 P. M.

By W. G. OWST.

THE first of the series of two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Tuesday evening under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Coming to this country heralded as a great conductor, Koussevitzky has lived up to his reputation. As a result of his fine work, the Boston Orchestra has again been brought to the high standard which characterized its work of the pre-war days.

The program is as follows:

Concerta Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, No. 12.....Handel Largo.
Allegro.
Larghetta e piano.
Largo.
Allegro.
Le Valse.....Ravel
Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Les Ridicules.
Marche.
Scherzo.
Le Prince et la Princesse.
La Fuite.
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Lento; Allegro non troppe.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppe.

Wherever the Boston organization has appeared during the present season comment has been heard as to the big strides made by it under the direction of Koussevitzky

And this is not surprising, for the Boston leader is simply carrying on the work that made him famous in Europe, which fame resulted in his being invited by the Boston management when a great leader was being sought—one who could reestablish the organization's former prestige

BROOKLYN
JAN 30 1927

Will Present a New Concerto by Copeland

Serge Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland on Feb. 3, in Carnegie Hall at the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Copland will play the piano part.

This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section; the second, a fast rhythmic one.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place in New York and Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a Symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist in January 1925 and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. His suite for small orchestra, "Music for the Theatre", composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in November 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contehporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. Two violin pieces, "Nocturne" and "Serenade" written last summer will be presented at a League of Composers recital on Feb. 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 30 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will make its third New York visit of the season this week, with concerts Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On Thursday Aaron Copland, young American composer of this city, will play the piano part in his latest score. He wrote this piano concerto at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, began it in January, 1926, worked on it last summer in France and finished it in November. He describes it as follows:

"Though played without interruption, the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts, which are linked thematically. The first is a slow, lyric section; the second a fast, rhythmic one.

"A short orchestral introduction announces the principal thematic material. The piano enters quietly and improvises around this for a short space, then the principal theme is sung by a flute and clarinet in unison over an accompaniment of muted strings. This main idea recurs twice during the course of the movement—once in the piano with imitations by the woodwind and French horns and later in triple canon in the strings, mounting to a sonorous climax.

"A few transitional measures lead directly to the second part, which, roughly speaking, is in sonata form without recapitulation. The first theme, announced immediately by the solo piano, is considerably extended and developed before the second idea is introduced by a soprano saxophone. The development, based entirely on these two themes, contains a short cadenza presenting difficulties of a rhythmic nature. Before the end a part of the first movement is recalled. This is followed by a brief coda.

"The concerto is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, clarinet piccolo in E-flat, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double bassoon, alto saxophone (interchangeable with soprano saxophone), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, tam-tam, Chinese drum, woodblock, triangle, xylophone, celesta and strings.

"The score is dedicated to Alma Wertheim."

This concerto had its first performance in the symphony concerts in Boston on January 28 and 29. Mr. Koussevitzky has also played in the last two seasons Copland's "Organ Symphony" and "Music for the Theater."

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, which was composed in 1916-'17, and has four movements: Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotta and Finale. Prokofieff's intention, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." The Franck symphony will close the program.

On Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite in F composed by Albert Roussel last year, from March to August, for the Boston Symphony, and dedicated to its conductor. It was first performed in the Boston concerts of January 21-22. The work is in three movements: Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue; the composer states that this is not program music. Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, Vaughan William's Norfolk B

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 31 1927

served.

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT SHUBERT TONIGHT

A rare treat is in store for music lovers tonight, who will hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Shubert Playhouse. The Delaware Musical Association, of which Mrs. William N. Bannard is head, brings the orchestra here for one concert. Conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston organization takes rank with the best symphony orchestras in America and Europe.

Combined in the personnel of 106 is a wealth of talent and artistry. Koussevitsky has continued the work of his predecessors in maintaining the high standard of Boston Symphony concerts, and tonight's program is sure to be one of excellence.

On the Saturday program Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a Suite in F, composed by Albert Roussel for the orchestra. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12; Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, and the First Symphony of Schumann in B flat.

Albert Roussel wrote his Suite in F last year, from March to August. The score is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky and was performed from the manuscript at the Boston concerts of January 21 and 22. The French composer divides his music into three movements—Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue, observing to an extent these classical forms.

Serge Prokofieff composed his "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, in 1916 and 1917. His intention, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." The score has the traditional four movements—allegro, larghetto, gavotta and finale—and scrupulously follows sonata form.

Aaron Copland wrote his Piano Concerto at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky. He began it in January, 1926, worked upon it last summer in France and completed it last November. It was first performed by the orchestra [illegible]day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 29 1927

PHILA. ORCHESTRA'S REVISED CONCERT

Rodzinski Conducts Varied Programme That Creates Conflicting Impressions

German Novelty and Fourth Tchaikovski Symphony Are the Features

BY LINTON MARTIN

The Philadelphia Orchestra concer in the Academy yesterday afternoo was programmed and presented b Artur Rodzinski, fortuitous circum stances having somewhat unexpectedl brought forward the assistant conduct or in this capacity, since Fritz Reine had been temporarily released as gues conductor in Stokowski's absence, t direct the New York Philharmonic Or chestra in the dilemma of Toscanini illness. The result was something an emergency offering, consisting of substantial symphony, a moderate modern German novelty, and two m lodious offerings, all of which emph sized Rodzinski's qualities as conduct that have already been made quite f miliar here.

The symphony was the Tchaikovs Fourth. The novelty was Franz Schre er's "Prelude to a Drama." The pr gramme included Charpentier's ingr tiating orchestral suite, "Impressions Italy," and it began, in summer amus ment park style, with Rossini's "Ba ber of Seville" Overture, which, course, isn't actually even the authe tic overture to that ancient opera, a seems exceedingly simple judged prevailing symphonic standards.

The Schreker work is a curio combination of sententious sentiment ism, suggesting Victor Herbert in more florid flight, a pompous parade the paltry, and an obvious Orientalis of the pseudo-sort. It sounds st prisingly old-fashioned in many of roundly resolved harmonies, althou it has its dissonant details as well, its more Oriental aspects. The pie is tediously long, and has no commar ing characteristics, in all its excessi nineteen minutes.

It would be cruel to compare y terday's presentation of the Tchaik ski fateful Fourth Symphony w Koussevitsky's thrilling interpretat here last season with his Bos Symphony Orchestra, or the Stoko ski style. Rodzinski's rending ran from routine to ragged. It complet missed the tingling intensity which the outstanding aspect of this sup symphony, and sounded slack stodgy. Rodzinski is as earnest as is uninspired in works of command calibre, although he has a fair faci in obvious and melodious music. was as rash as it was regrettable him to tackle the Tchaikovski Fou

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 29 1927
JAN 30 1927

AARON COPLAND IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourteenth of the Radio Series Will Feature American Composer Tonight From Boston

The 14th Saturday evening concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast for the audiences of stations WBZ and WJZ at 8.10 tonight. On account of previous commitments, tonight's concert will not be broadcast by KDKA but definite arrangements have been completed whereby the Westinghouse pioneer station will send out the remaining 10 concerts.

Featuring the concert of tonight, Aaron Copland, one of the younger American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr Copland was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is now living in New York city. The concerto was written for the most part during the summer of 1925, while the composer was at the MacDowell colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program and Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college will discuss during the intermission Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat major, which is given its second performance of the present season by the orchestra. The complete program follows:—

Classic symphony, opus 25.....Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
Concerto for pianoforte.....Copland
Aaron Copland, soloist
Symphony in B flat major, No 1, opus 38.....Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo; molto vivace; trio I; molto piu vivace; trio II
Allegro animato e grazioso

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

One to Be Given Here Monday Is Entirely Out of the Ordinary

Is One Which Will Undoubtedly Appeal to All Lovers of Music

Much interest attaches to the program which Serge Koussevitzky has made for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Shubert Playhouse, Wilmington, on January 31, under his direction.

The first number will be a Concerto of Philip Emanual Bach, the most talented son of Johann Sebastion Bach. This Concerto has been especially arranged for Mr. Koussevitzky by Maximlilian Steinberg, the talented nephew of Rimsky-Korsakov. Steinberg has used a string orchestra with a small choir of wind instruments. His scoring is not in strict acordance with the period, since he gives much of the melody of the slow movement to the English horn, an instrument of modern usage. In spirit, however, Steinberg's treatment is considered by on means irreverent or anachronistic.

The next number will be Berlioz Overture, "The Roman Carnival". This great composer, founder of the French national school of music, was perhaps never more highly and brilliantly effective than in the overture to this opera. This short piece in itself would be sufficient to establish his rank by its striking originality in the use of "color". This number figured on Koussevitzky's first concert in America, when Warren Storey-Smith called it, in the Boston Post, "a performance that for expressiveness and corruscating brilliance must have come to each individual in the hall as a revelation both of the potentialities of Berlioz's thrice-familiar music and of the powers and the prowess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra". Penfield Roberts then likewise remarked upon this performance in the Boston Globe: "One will remember in hearing the piece years later from other hands how it sounded yesterday afternoon."

There will be two notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the first called "Waldweben" ("Forest Murmurs"), is drawn from the second act of Siegfried, which in turn is the third drama of the "Ring" cycle. Reclining in the forest, Siegfried listens to the soft and drowsy sounds of nature, and is especially enchanted by the bird calls which by magic [illegible]e is soon to be able to understand. This gentle and dreamy music of [illegible]ature figures among the finest [illegible]ages of Wagner.

The other Wagner excerpt will [illegible] the Prelude of his gay music [illegible]rama, "The Mastersingers of Nu[illegible]mberg". Using the principal [illegible]emes of this music drama, and [illegible]ating them in the propore order, [illegible]agner made his prelude a sort of [illegible]condensation of the entire work, with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama, are so eloquently, if more tersely expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The principal number on the programe will be the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in F minor. This symphony is considere by many as the Russian composer's masterpiece, and was even finer than the Sixth or "Pathetic" Symphony. It is a score of exceeding brilliance and dramatic effectiveness, with a lovely songful slow movement and a delightful scherzo in which the entire string orchestra, laying down their bows, play pizzicato throughout.

[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Mr. Koussevitzky, at whose suggestion Aaron Copland wrote his pianc concerto to be heard here next Thursday, was to produce the work in Boston in the last two days. The composition was sketched out last January and Mr. Copland worked on it last Summer in France, completing it on his return in November. Though played without interruption, the concerto is in two contrasted parts, the first a slow, lyric section and the second a fast and rhythmic one.

Serge Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony" in the same program is dated ten years ago and aims "to catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put in his scores."

Albert Roussel's classic Suite in F on next Saturday's matinee bill, is a new work composed for the Boston Symphony and dedicated to Koussevitzky. The matinee also hears Schumann's romantic symphony, "Spring."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Brooklyn for the third time this season, giving a concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening.

The Russian conductor will present as the principal number on his program, the symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor. A novelty of interest will be the "Classic" Symphony of Prokofieff. In this score the young Russian composer reverts in form and spirit to the simple grace and charm of the 18th century.

The program will open with the twelfth "Concerto Grosso" of Handel in which the string sections of the orchestra will be heard alone, and also includes Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," which depicts the evolution of the Viennese waltz.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Copland will play the piano part. This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts, which are linked thematically.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place under Rubin Goldmark in New York and later under Nadia Boulanger in Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist in January, 1925, and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.
JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, will make its first concert appearance of the season Wednesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, as the second attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course, at Poli's Theater. Koussevitzky has a program opening with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, for string orchestrated in B minor; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony, Opus 25; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, Opus 38, No. 1.

Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W., and will be on sale at Poli's Theater box office on the afternoon of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 30 1927

Bostonians Coming With Koussevitzky

Their First Concert Of The Season Will Take Place Tuesday Evening. New York Symphony Here Wednesday

Musical Events Of The Week.

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Lyric.

Wednesday—New York Symphony Orchestra, Oscar Klemperer conducting, at the Lyric.

Friday—Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, at the Peabody, 4 P. M.

BY W. G. OWST.

THE first of the series of two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Tuesday evening under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Coming to this country heralded as a great conductor, Koussevitzky has lived up to his reputation. As a result of his fine work, the Boston Orchestra has again been brought to the high standard which characterized its work of the pre-war days.

The program is as follows:

Concerta Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, No. 12.....Handel Largo.
Allegro.
Larghetta e piano.
Largo.
Allegro.
Le Valse.....Revel
Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Les Ridicules.
Marche.
Scherzo.
Le Prince et la Princesse.
La Fuite.
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Lento; Allegro non troppe.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppe.

Wherever the Boston organization has appeared during the present season comment has been heard as to the big strides made by it under the direction of Koussevitzky

And this is not surprising, for the Boston leader is simply carrying on the work that made him famous in Europe, which fame resulted in his being invited by the Boston management when a great leader was being sought—one who could reestablish the organization's former prestige

BROOKLYN
JAN 30 1927

Will Present a New Concerto by Copeland

Serge Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland on Feb. 3, in Carnegie Hall at the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Copland will play the piano part.

This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section; the second, a fast rhythmic one.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place in New York and Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a Symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist in January 1925 and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. His suite for small orchestra, "Music for the Theatre", composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in November 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contehporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. Two violin pieces, "Nocturne" and "Serenade" written last summer will be presented at a League of Composers recital on Feb. 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 30 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will make its third New York visit of the season this week, with concerts Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On Thursday Aaron Copland, young American composer of this city, will play the piano part in his latest score. He wrote this piano concerto at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, began it in January, 1926, worked on it last summer in France and finished it in November. He describes it as follows:

"Though played without interruption, the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts, which are linked thematically. The first is a slow, lyric section; the second a fast, rhythmic one.

"A short orchestral introduction announces the principal thematic material. The piano enters quietly and improvises around this for a short space, then the principal theme is sung by a flute and clarinet in unison over an accompaniment of muted strings. This main idea recurs twice during the course of the movement—once in the piano with imitations by the woodwind and French horns and later in triple canon in the strings, mounting to a sonorous climax.

"A few transitional measures lead directly to the second part, which, roughly speaking, is in sonata form without recapitulation. The first theme, announced immediately by the solo piano, is considerably extended and developed before the second idea is introduced by a soprano saxophone. The development, based entirely on these two themes, contains a short cadenza presenting difficulties of a rhythmic nature. Before the end a part of the first movement is recalled. This is followed by a brief coda.

"The concerto is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, clarinet piccolo in E-flat, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double bassoon, alto saxophone (interchangeable with soprano saxophone), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, tam-tam, Chinese drum, woodblock, triangle, xylophone, celesta and strings.

"The score is dedicated to Alma Wertheim."

This concerto had its first performance in the symphony concerts in Boston on January 28 and 29. Mr. Koussevitzky has also played in the last two seasons Copland's "Organ Symphony" and "Music for the Theater."

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, which was composed in 1916-'17, and has four movements: Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotta and Finale. Prokofieff's intention, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." The Franck symphony will close the program.

On Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite in F composed by Albert Roussel last year, from March to August, for the Boston Symphony, and dedicated to its conductor. It was first performed in the Boston concerts of January 21-22. The work is in three movements: Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue; the composer states that this is not program music. Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, Vaughan William's Norfolk B[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 31 1927

* * *

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT SHUBERT TONIGHT

A rare treat is in store for music lovers tonight, who will hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Shubert Playhouse. The Delaware Musical Association, of which Mrs. William N. Bannard is head, brings the orchestra here for one concert. Conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston organization takes rank with the best symphony orchestras in America and Europe.

Combined in the personnel of 106 is a wealth of talent and artistry. Koussevitzky has continued the work of his predecessors in maintaining the high standard of Boston Symphony concerts, and tonight's program is sure to be one of excellence.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

On the Saturday program Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a Suite in F, composed by Albert Roussel for the orchestra. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12; Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, and the First Symphony of Schumann in B flat.

Albert Roussel wrote his Suite in F last year, from March to August. The score is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky and was performed from the manuscript at the Boston concerts of January 21 and 22. The French composer divides his music into three movements—Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue, observing to an extent these classical forms.

Serge Prokofieff composed his "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, in 1916 and 1917. His intention, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." The score has the traditional four movements—allegro, larghetto, gavotta and finale—and scrupulously follows sonata form.

Aaron Copland wrote his Piano Concerto at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky. He began it in January, 1926, worked upon it last summer in France and completed it last November. It was first performed by the orchestra [illegible]day.

arrangements have been completed whereby the Westinghouse pioneer station will send out the remaining 10 concerts.

Featuring the concert of tonight, Aaron Copland, one of the younger American composers, will appear as guest soloist on the occasion of the performance of his own work, a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr Copland was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is now living in New York city. The concerto was written for the most part during the summer of 1925, while the composer was at the MacDowell colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Mr Koussevitzky has arranged to present another of the works of his life-long friend and countryman, Serge Prokofieff, as the opening number of the program and Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college will discuss during the intermission Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat major, which is given its second performance of the present season by the orchestra. The complete program follows:—

Classic symphony, opus 25.....Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
Concerto for pianoforte.....Copland
Aaron Copland, soloist
Symphony in B flat major, No 1, opus 38. Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
Larghetto
Scherzo; molto vivace; trio I; molto piu vivace; trio II
Allegro animato e grazioso

with alternate passages of romantic loveliness which characterize Wagner's one humorous music drama, are so eloquently, if more tersely expressed in the brilliant prelude.

The principal number on the programe will be the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in F minor. This symphony is considere by many as the Russian composer's masterpiece, and was even finer than the Sixth or "Pathetic" Symphony. It is a score of exceeding brilliance and dramatic effectiveness, with a lovely songful slow movement and a delightful scherzo in which the entire string orchestra, laying down their bows, play pizzicato throughout.

Salisbury Man Pays

Mr. Koussevitzky, at whose suggestion Aaron Copland wrote his piano concerto to be heard here next Thursday, was to produce the work in Boston in the last two days. The composition was sketched out last January and Mr. Copland worked on it last Summer in France, completing it on his return in November. Though played without interruption, the concerto is in two contrasted parts, the first a slow, lyric section and the second a fast and rhythmic one.

Serge Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony" in the same program is dated ten years ago and aims "to catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put in his scores."

Albert Roussel's classic Suite in F on next Saturday's matinee bill, is a new work composed for the Boston Symphony and dedicated to Koussevitzky. The matinee also hears Schumann's romantic symphony, "Spring."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 29 1927

PHILA. ORCHESTRA'S REVISED CONCERT

Rodzinski Conducts Varied Programme That Creates Conflicting Impressions

German Novelty and Fourth Tchaikovski Symphony Are the Features

BY LINTON MARTIN

The Philadelphia Orchestra concer in the Academy yesterday afternoo was programmed and presented b Artur Rodzinski, fortuitous circum stances having somewhat unexpectedl brought forward the assistant conduct or in this capacity, since Fritz Reine had been temporarily released as gue conductor in Stokowski's absence, t direct the New York Philharmonic O chestra in the dilemma of Toscanini illness. The result was something an emergency offering, consisting of substantial symphony, a moderate modern German novelty, and two m lodious offerings, all of which emph sized Rodzinski's qualities as conduct that have already been made quite f miliar here.

The symphony was the Tchaikovs Fourth. The novelty was Franz Schre er's "Prelude to a Drama." The pr gramme included Charpentier's ingr tiating orchestral suite, "Impressions Italy," and it began, in summer amus ment park style, with Rossini's "Ba ber of Seville" Overture, which, course, isn't actually even the authe tic overture to that ancient opera, a seems exceedingly simple judged prevailing symphonic standards.

The Schreker work is a curio combination of sententious sentiment ism, suggesting Victor Herbert in more florid flight, a pompous parade the paltry, and an obvious Orientalis of the pseudo-sort. It sounds st prisingly old-fashioned in many of roundly resolved harmonies, althou it has its dissonant details as well, its more Oriental aspects. The pie is tediously long, and has no commar ing characteristics, in all its excessi nineteen minutes.

It would be cruel to compare y terday's presentation of the Tchaik ski fateful Fourth Symphony w Koussevitsky's thrilling interpretat here last season with his Bost Symphony Orchestra, or the Stoko ski style. Rodzinski's reading ran from routine to ragged. It complet missed the tingling intensity which the outstanding aspect of this sup symphony, and sounded slack stodgy. Rodzinski is as earnest as is uninspired in works of command calibre, although he has a fair faci in obvious and melodious music. was as rash as it was regrettable him to tackle the Tchaikovski Fou

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 29 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

One to Be Given Here Monday Is Entirely Out of the Ordinary

Is One Which Will Undoubtedly Appeal to All Lovers of Music

Much interest attaches to the program which Serge Koussevitzky has made for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Shubert Playhouse, Wilmington, on January 31, under his direction.

The first number will be a Concerto of Philip Emanual Bach, the most talented son of Johann Sebastion Bach. This Concerto has been especially arranged for Mr. Koussevitzky by Maximllian Steinberg, the talented nephew of Rimsky-Korsakov. Steinberg has used a string orchestra with a small choir of wind instruments. His scoring is not in strict acordance with the period, since he gives much of the melody of the slow movement to the English horn, an instrument of modern usage. In spirit, however, Steinberg's treatment is considered by on means irreverent or anachronistic.

The next number will be Berlioz Overture, "The Roman Carnival". This great composer, founder of the French national school of music, was perhaps never more highly and brilliantly effective than in the overture to this opera. This short piece in itself would be sufficient to establish his rank by its striking originality in the use of "color". This number figured on Koussevitzky's first concert in America, when Warren Storey-Smith called it, in the Boston Post, "a performance that for expressiveness and corruscating brilliance must have come to each individual in the hall as a revelation both of the potentialities of Berlioz's thrice-familiar music and of the powers and the prowess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra". Penfield Roberts then likewise remarked upon this performance in the Boston Globe: "One will remember in hearing the piece years later from other hands how it sounded yesterday afternoon."

There will be two notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the first called "Waldweben" ("Forest Murmurs"), is drawn from the second act of Siegfried, which in turn is the third drama of the "Ring" cycle. Reclining in the forest, Sieggried listens to the soft and drowsy sounds of nature, and is especially enchanted by the bird calls which by magic ne is soon to be able to understand. This gentle and dreamy music of nature figures among the finest pages of Wagner.

The other Wagner excerpt will be the Prelude of his gay music drama, "The Mastersingers of Nurembeyg". Using the principal themes of this music drama, and stating them in the propore order, Wagner made his prelude a sort of condensation of the entire work,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Brooklyn for the third time this season, giving a concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening.

The Russian conductor will present as the principal number on his program, the symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor. A novelty of interest will be the "Classic" Symphony of Prokofieff. In this score the young Russian composer reverts in form and spirit to the simple grace and charm of the 18th century.

The program will open with the twelfth "Concerto Grosso" of Handel in which the string sections of the orchestra will be heard alone, and also includes Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," which depicts the evolution of the Viennese waltz.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Copland will play the piano part. This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption t cehoncerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as composer took place under Rubin Goldmark in New York and later under Nadia Boulanger in Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist January, 1925, and later played Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.
JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, will make its first concert appearance of the season Wednesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, as the second attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic Course, at Poli's Theater. Koussevitzky has a program opening with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, for string orchestrated in B minor; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony, Opus 25 Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, Opus 38, No. 1.

Seats are now on sale at Mrs Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau in Droop's, 1300 G St. N. W. and will be on sale at Poli's Th[illegible]x office on the afternoon of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 30 1927

Bostonians Coming With Koussevitzky

Their First Concert Of The Season Will Take Place Tuesday Evening. New York Symphony Here Wednesday

Musical Events Of The Week.

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Lyric.

Wednesday—New York Symphony Orchestra, Oscar Klemperer conducting, at the Lyric.

Friday—Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, at the Peabody, 4 P. M.

By W. G. OWST.

THE first of the series of two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Tuesday evening under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Coming to this country heralded as a great conductor, Koussevitzky has lived up to his reputation. As a result of his fine work, the Boston Orchestra has again been brought to the high standard which characterized its work of the pre-war days.

The program is as follows:

Concerta Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, No. 12.....Handel Largo.
Allegro.
Larghetta e piano.
Largo.
Allegro.
Le Valse.....Revel
Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Les Ridicules.
Marche.
Scherzo.
Le Prince et la Princesse.
La Fulte.
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Lento: Allegro non troppe.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppe.

Wherever the Boston organization has appeared during the present season comment has been heard as to the big strides made by it under the direction of Koussevitzky

And this is not surprising, for the Boston leader is simply carrying on the work that made him famous in Europe, which fame resulted in his being invited by the Boston management when a great leader was being sought—one who could reestablish the organization's former prestige

BROOKLYN
JAN 30 1927

Present a New Concerto by Copeland

Serge Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland on Feb. 3, in Carnegie Hall at the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Copland will play the piano part.

This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section; the second, a fast rhythmic one.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place in New York and Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a Symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist in January 1925 and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. His suite for small orchestra, "Music for the Theatre", composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in November 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contehporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. Two violin pieces, "Nocturne" and "Serenade" written last summer will be presented at a League of Composers recital on Feb. 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 30 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will make its third New York visit of the season this week, with concerts Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

On Thursday Aaron Copland, young American composer of this city, will play the piano part in his latest score. He wrote this piano concerto at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, began it in January, 1926, worked on it last summer in France and finished it in November. He describes it as follows:

"Though played without interruption, the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts, which are linked thematically. The first is a slow, lyric section; the second a fast, rhythmic one.

"A short orchestral introduction announces the principal thematic material. The piano enters quietly and improvises around this for a short space, then the principal theme is sung by a flute and clarinet in unison over an accompaniment of muted strings. This main idea recurs twice during the course of the movement—once in the piano with imitations by the woodwind and French horns and later in triple canon in the strings, mounting to a sonorous climax.

"A few transitional measures lead directly to the second part, which, roughly speaking, is in sonata form without recapitulation. The first theme, announced immediately by the solo piano, is considerably extended and developed before the second idea is introduced by a soprano saxophone. The development, based entirely on these two themes, contains a short cadenza presenting difficulties of a rhythmic nature. Before the end a part of the first movement is recalled. This is followed by a brief coda.

"The concerto is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, clarinet piccolo in E-flat, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double bassoon, alto saxophone (interchangeable with soprano saxophone), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, tam-tam, Chinese drum, woodblock, triangle, xylophone, celesta and strings.

"The score is dedicated to Alma Wertheim."

This concerto had its first performance in the symphony concerts in Boston on January 28 and 29. Mr. Koussevitzky has also played in the last two seasons Copland's "Organ Symphony" and "Music for the Theater."

The program will open with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, which was composed in 1916-'17, and has four movements: Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotta and Finale. Prokofieff's intention, according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." The Franck symphony will close the program.

On Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York a suite in F composed by Albert Roussel last year, from March to August, for the Boston Symphony, and dedicated to its conductor. It was first performed in the Boston concerts of January 21-22. The work is in three movements: Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue; the composer states that this is not program music. Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, Vaughan William's Norfolk [illegible]B

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 31 1927

served.

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT SHUBERT TONIGHT

A rare treat is in store for music lovers tonight, who will hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Shubert Playhouse. The Delaware Musical Association, of which Mrs. William N. Bannard is head, brings the orchestra here for one concert. Conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston organization takes rank with the best symphony orchestras in America and Europe.

Combined in the personnel of 108 is a wealth of talent and artistry. Koussevitzky has continued the work of his predecessors in maintaining the high standard of Boston Symphony concerts, and tonight's program is sure to be one of excellence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible]
JAN 29 1927

AARON CO[illegible] SYM[illegible]

Fourteenth [illegible] Will Featu[illegible] poser To[illegible]

The 14th S[illegible] by the Bost[illegible] will be broa[illegible] of stations w[illegible] night. On a[illegible] mitments, t[illegible] be broadca[illegible] employes, w[illegible]ty in the g[illegible] as Washing[illegible]ernment ha[illegible] stem after[illegible]ustries, so may be prov[illegible] days. In W[illegible] from their [illegible] funds from [illegible] the governm[illegible]

Much

There is [illegible] jection to r[illegible] the clerks, [illegible] receive will [illegible] ary they ha[illegible] this is never[illegible] employ. Als[illegible] a life with [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~NEWS~~
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

SERGE KOUSSEVIT
Polis (Wednesda

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra, by Aaron Copland, on February 3 in Carnegie Hall, at the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Copland will play the piano part.

This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section; the second, a fast rhythmic one.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place under Rubin Goldmark in New York and later under Nadia Boulanger in Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist, in January, 1925, and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. His suite for small orchestra, "Music for the Theatre," composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in November, 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contemporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. Two violin pieces, "Nocturne" and "Serenade," written last Summer, will be presented at the League of Composers' recital on February 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Baltimore will receive a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, on Feb. 1. The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Otto Klemperer, will give the third and last of its Baltimore series of season on Feb. 2.

From AMERICAN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony To Give Recital At Lyric

THE first of the series of two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Lyric next Tuesday night under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The present marks the third season under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Coming to this country heralded as one of the greatest of living conductors, Koussevitzky has lived up to his advance reputation. As a result of his fine work the Boston Orchestra has again been brought to the high standard that characterized its work in the pre-war days when Dr. Karl Muck wielded the baton.

Wherever the Boston organization has appeared this season comment has been aroused as to the further big strides made by it under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. This is not surprising, and the Boston leader is merely carrying on the work that made him famous in Europe and which fame resulted in the Boston management naming him when world-famous leader was being sought to bring the orchestra back to the pinnacle it occupied for quite some years before the war.

Every indication points to a very large audience on Tuesday night, when Mr. Koussevitzky can be assured of the same enthusiastic reception that has been in evidence at his other Baltimore appearances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~NEWS~~
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, will make its first concert appearance of the 1926-27 season in Washington Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course at Poli's Theater. For this concert the program will be:

Concerto, "Grosso No. 12, for Strings, in B Minor" ..... Handel
"Classis Symphony, Opus 25" ..... Prokofieff
"La Valse" (choregraphic poem) ..... Ravel
"Symphony in B Flat Major, Opus 38, No 1" ..... Schuman

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

First Concert Here Wednesday Afternoon

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first concert appearance of the 1926-27 season in Washington on Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second attraction in the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts at Poli's theater.

For his first Washington appearance of the season, Koussevitzky has carefully selected a program opening with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for strings, orchestrated in B minor; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony, Opus 25; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 38, No. 1.

The Boston Symphony orchestra since its appearance in Washington last season, has steadily advanced in popularity both at home and on tour and its coming on Wednesday afternoon is expected to offer one of the outstanding high lights of the current musical season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

The contract of Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been extended until May, 1929. Mr. Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. During Mr. Koussevitzky's vacation, Alfredo Casella was guest-conductor at the concerts on Jan. 14 and 15, with Walter Gieseking as the soloist. Mr. Casella had a sweeping success.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
JAN 31 1927

Saturday night I listened to a va riety of programs but found tha offered by the Boston Symphony o
chestra through WJZ to be bes
This program was of a higher mu
ical character than is broadcast u ually and probably for that reaso did not appeal to a large group hearers. One work in particula termed a jazz symphony, aroused n interest and likewise my amazeme
that it is called music. But for t fact the listener was warned th
the discords to be heard were a pa
of the work I would have thoug
the pianist, who is the compos was enjoying a nice, public, music
jag. I wonder what Beethoven
Chopin would think if they coul hear such modern "music" if th word "music" can be aptly applie to such ravings. The Bach concert while dry in passages, was far mor interesting and the remainder of th program could be enjoyed even b such an old-fashioned music love
as myself. Incidentally I think th composer of the modern work wa
Aaron Copland, at least, that is th way I understood it over the radio

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 31 1927

hospital group.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN THE PLAYHOUSE TONIGHT

Many music lovers in the city will take advantage of the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be presented at the Shubert Playhouse this evening under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. The program has been arranged with care, and will be one of brilliance and beauty.

Among the most popular will be, perhaps, the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikovsky in F Minor. Serge Koussevitzky, the noted leader, has [illegible] to please his hear-

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
JAN 31 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony In Hartford Feb. 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in concert in Hartford Feb. 6, under the management of Frank Sedgwick.

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Sergei Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The 108 musicians respond as a single rare instru-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 31 1927
101

TO CONDUCT CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

SERGE KOWA[illegible]ITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The week of March 22 will be devoted by the Boston Symphony orchestra to a Centenary Festival in Symphony hall, Boston. The schedule will consist of the rendering of Beethoven's "Nine Symphonies" and commemorative addresses. The Harvard Glee club, Radcliffe Choral society and the London and Lenox String quartet will also participate.

Ludwig van Beethoven died in Vienna, March 26, 1827. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the famous Eroica Symphony and its performance in Hartford, this coming Sunday will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven.

Hartford is fortunate in being numbered among the few New England cities visited by the renowned orchestra and their illustrious leader. Reservations for the concert may be obtained at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

Boston Symphony

The week of March 22 will be devoted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a centenary festival in Symphony Hall, Boston. The schedule will lonsist of Beethoven's nine symphonies and commemorative addresses. The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the London and Lenox String Quartet will also participate. Ludwig von Beethoven died in Vienna, March 26, 1827. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the famous "Eroica Symphony," and its performance in Hartford next Sunday will also be as a tribute to Beethoven. Hartford is fortunate in being numbered among the few New England cities visited by this renounced orchestra and its illustrious leader. Reservations for the at McCoy's hone 2-2251

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.
JAN 31 1927

Concert Cellist Given Tribute

The winter concert of the Woman's Choral Society will be held on Wednesday evening of this week at Frye Hall, the assisting artist to be Alwin Schroeder, veteran cellist of the Boston Symphony Company. This group of women, under the direction of Robert Neily, is an especially fine organization, and the concerts are among the finest of the season.

With the addition of so fine an artist as Mr. Schroeder, the program is sure to call out a fine representation of music lovers. Mr. Schroeder has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartette for many years and he ranks among the finest of artists.

At a concert given in Boston a few months ago, the orchestra and audience rose in greeting as he appeared upon the stage and at the conclusion of his playing he was recalled many times. Mr. Schroeder has always maintained a noble conception of his instrument the violoncello. He has never made use of the sickly sentimental style to which the instrument easily lends itself, but rather chooses such pieces as Dvorak's Waldesruhe and Bach's Sarabande.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULETTIN
NORWICH, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Boston Symphony in Hartford

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock. The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the [illegible] famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the fine performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony Eroica. A notable novelty on this program will be a Suite from Prokofieff's opera The Love for Three Oranges. The remaining number will be Debussy's Nocturne, Fetes (Festivals) the Prelude to Wagner's Lohengrin, and to close the symphonic, Finlandia, by Sibelius.

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum street, Hartford. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A special train will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitsky, to Hartford next Sunday. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the musicians, and an entire baggage car for the transportation of the instruments—such instruments as harps and double-basses requiring especially constructed trunks.

When the concert in the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Del. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the Orchestra visits. The only annual series of the Boston Symphony outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn being the series in Providence. When their auditorium was demolished last spring, the citizens of that city carried through a campaign raising more than sufficient funds to buy out performances at the largest vaudeville theater. Thus expressing their appreciation and assuring the orchestra's return.

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TRENTON, N. J.
FEB 1 1927

Boston Symphony Keeps Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky has agreed to remain in Boston through two more seasons, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The decision of the trustees to invite the eminent Russian leader to continue in that capacity is hardly surprising in view of the extraordinary success which he has enjoyed in this city since his advent three years ago. Indeed, not only in Boston, but also in New York and other cities visited by the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has been greeted with more enthusiasm than has been vouchsafed any Boston leader since the reign of Karl Muck. This success may be attributed both to his personal magnetism as a leader, and also to the fact that he has restored the Boston Symphony to that high degree of orchestral virtuosity which was associated with this organization in the time of Gericke, Nikisch, and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 1 1927

Boston Symphony

A special train wil bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitzky to Hartford next Sunday, February sixth. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the instruments.

When the concert in the Capitol Theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Del. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the orchestra visits.

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

SERGE KOUSSEVIT
Polis (Wednesda

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra, by Aaron Copland, on February 3 in Carnegie Hall, at the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Copland will play the piano part.

This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section; the second, a fast rhythmic one.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place under Rubin Goldmark in New York and later under Nadia Boulanger in Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist, in January, 1925, and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. His suite for small orchestra, "Music for the Theatre," composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in November, 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contemporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. Two violin pieces, "Nocturne" and "Serenade," written last Summer, will be presented at the League of Composers' recital on February 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Baltimore will receive a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, on Feb. 1. The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Otto Klemperer, will give the 3rd and last of its Baltimore series this season on Feb. 2.

From AMERICAN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony To Give Recital At Lyric

THE first of the series of two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Lyric next Tuesday night under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The present marks the third season under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Coming to this country here aided as one of the greatest of living conductors, Koussevitzky has lived up to his advance reputation. As a result of his fine work the Boston Orchestra has again been brought to the high standard that characterized its work in the pre-war days when Dr. Karl Muck wielded the baton.

Wherever the Boston organization has appeared this season comment has been aroused as to the further big strides made by it under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. This is not surprising, and the Boston leader is merely carrying on the work that made him famous in Europe and which fame resulted in the Boston management naming him when world-famous leader was being sought to bring the orchestra back to the pinnacle it occupied for quite some years before the war.

Every indication points to a very large audience on Tuesday night, when Mr. Koussevitzky can be assured of the same enthusiastic reception that has been in evidence at his other Baltimore appearances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, will make its first concert appearance of the 1926-27 season in Washington Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course at Poli's Theater.

For this concert the program will be:

Concerto, "Grosso No. 12, for Strings, in B Minor" ..... Handel
"Classis Symphony, Opus 25" ..... Prokofieff
"La Valse" (choregraphic poem) ..... Ravel
"Symphony in B Flat Major, Opus 38, No 1" ..... Schuman

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

First Concert Here Wednesday Afternoon

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first concert appearance of the 1926-27 season in Washington on Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second attraction in the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts at Poli's theater.

For his first Washington appearance of the season, Koussevitzky has carefully selected a program opening with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for strings, orchestrated in B minor; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony, Opus 25; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 38, No. 1.

The Boston Symphony orchestra since its appearance in Washington last season, has steadily advanced in popularity both at home and on tour and its coming on Wednesday afternoon is expected to offer one of the outstanding high lights of the current musical season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

The contract of Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been extended until May, 1929. Mr. Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. During Mr. Koussevitzky's vacation, Alfredo Casella was guest-conductor at the concerts on Jan. 14 and 15, with Walter Gieseking as the soloist. Mr. Casella had a sweeping success.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
JAN 31 1927

Saturday night I listened to a variety of programs but found that offered by the Boston Symphony orchestra through WJZ to be best. This program was of a higher musical character than is broadcast usually and probably for that reason did not appeal to a large group of hearers. One work in particular termed a jazz symphony, aroused my interest and likewise my amazement that it is called music. But for the fact the listener was warned that the discords to be heard were a part of the work I would have thought the pianist, who is the composer, was enjoying a nice, public, musical jag. I wonder what Beethoven or Chopin would think if they could hear such modern "music" if that word "music" can be aptly applied to such ravings. The Bach concerto while dry in passages, was far more interesting and the remainder of the program could be enjoyed even by such an old-fashioned music lover as myself. Incidentally I think the composer of the modern work was Aaron Copland, at least, that is the way I understood it over the radio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 31 1927

hospital group.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN THE PLAYHOUSE TONIGHT

Many music lovers in the city will take advantage of the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be presented at the Shubert Playhouse this evening under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. The program has been arranged with care, and will be one of brilliance and beauty.

Among the most popular will be, perhaps, the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikovsky in F Minor. Serge Koussevitzky, the noted leader, has left nothing undone to please his hear-

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
JAN 31 19

Boston Symphony In Hartford Feb. 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in concert in Hartford Feb. 6, under the management of Frank Sedgwick.

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Sergei Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The 108 musicians respond as a single rare instru-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 31 1927

TO CONDUCT CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The week of March 22 will be devoted by the Boston Symphony orchestra to a Centenary Festival in Symphony hall, Boston. The schedule will consist of the rendering of Beethoven's "Nine Symphonies" and commemorative addresses. The Harvard Glee club, Radcliffe Choral society and the London and Lenox String quartet will also participate.

Ludwig van Beethoven died in Vienna, March 26, 1827. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the famous Eroica Symphony and its performance in Hartford, this coming Sunday will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven.

Hartford is fortunate in being numbered among the few New England cities visited by the renowned orchestra and their illustrious leader. Reservations for the concert may be obtained at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

Boston Symphony

The week of March 22 will be devoted by the Boston Symphony orchestra to a centenary festival in Symphony Hall, Boston. The schedule will lonsist of Beethoven's nine symphonies and commemorative addresses. The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the London and Lenox String Quartet will also participate. Ludwig von Beethoven died in Vienna, March 26, 1827. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the famous "Eroica Symphony," and its performance in Hartford next Sunday will also be as a tribute to Beethoven. Hartford is fortunate in being numbered among the few New England cities visited by this renounced orchestra and its illustrious leader. Reservations for the at McCoy's hone 2-2251

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.
JAN 31 1927

Concert Cellist Given Tribute

The winter concert of the Woman's Choral Society will be held on Wednesday evening of this week at Frye Hall, the assisting artist to be Alwin Schroeder, veteran cellist of the Boston Symphony Company. This group of women, under the direction of Rubert Neily, is an especially fine organization, and the concerts are among the finest of the season.

With the addition of so fine an artist as Mr. Schroeder, the program is sure to call out a fine representation of music lovers. Mr. Schroeder has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartette for many years and he ranks among the finest of artists.

At a concert given in Boston a few months ago, the orchestra and audience rose in greeting as he appeared upon the stage and at the conclusion of his playing he was recalled many times. Mr. Schroeder has always maintained a noble conception of his instrument the violoncello. He has never made use of the sickly sentimental style to which the instrument easily lends itself, but rather chooses such pieces as Dvorak's Waldesruhe and Bach's Sarabande.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULETTIN
NORWICH, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Boston Symphony in Hartford

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock. The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

and for this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony Eroica. A notable novelty on this program will be a Suite from Prokofieff's opera The Love for Three Oranges. The remaining number will be Debussy's Nocturne, Fetes (Festivals) the Prelude to Wagner's Lohengrin, and to close the symphonic, Finlandia, by Sibelius.

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum street, Hartford. Prices for seats are $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A special train will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitsky, to Hartford next Sunday. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the musicians, and an entire baggage car for the transportation of the instruments—such instruments as harps and double-basses requiring especially constructed trunks.

When the concert in the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Del. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the orchestra visits. The only annual series of the Boston Symphony outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn being the series in Providence. When their auditorium was demolished last spring, the citizens of that city cooked through a campaign raising more than sufficient funds to buy out performances at the largest vaudeville theater. Thus expressing their appreciation and assuring the orchestra's return.

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TRENTON, N. J.
FEB 1 1927

Boston Symphony Keeps Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky has agreed to remain in Boston through two more seasons, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The decision of the trustees to invite the eminent Russian leader to continue in that capacity is hardly surprising in view of the extraordinary success which he has enjoyed in this city since his advent three years ago. Indeed, not only in Boston, but also in New York and other cities visited by the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has been greeted with more enthusiasm than has been vouchsafed any Boston leader since the reign of Karl Muck. This success may be attributed both to his personal magnetism as a leader, and also to the fact that he has restored the Boston Symphony to that high degree of orchestral virtuosity which was associated with this organization in the time of Gericke, Nikisch, and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 1 1927

Boston Symphony

A special train wil bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitzky to Hartford next Sunday, February sixth. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the instruments.

When the concert in the Capitol Theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston atfer a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Del. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the orchestra visits.

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

SERGE KOUSSEVIT
Polis (Wednesdo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky will present a new American work, a concerto for piano and orchestra, by Aaron Copland, on February 3 in Carnegie Hall, at the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Copland will play the piano part.

This work was begun at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and completed in New York last November. Though played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section; the second, a fast rhyhmic one.

Mr. Copland was born in Brooklyn in 1900. His entire training as a composer took place under Rubin Goldmark in New York and later under Nadia Boulanger in Paris. His first work in large form to be presented in this country was a symphony for organ and orchestra introduced by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Mlle. Boulanger as soloist, in January, 1925, and later played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. His suite for small orchestra, "Music for the Theatre," composed for and introduced here by the League of Composers in November, 1925, has been recently selected by the International Society for Contemporary Music as one of two works to represent America at the next festival in Frankfort. Two violin pieces, "Nocturne" and "Serenade," written last Summer, will be presented at the League of Composers' recital on February 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

Baltimore will receive a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, on Feb. 1. The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Otto Klemperer, will give the first and last of its Baltimore series this season on Feb. 2.

From AMERICAN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 30 1927

Boston Symphony To Give Recital At Lyric

THE first of the series of two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Lyric next Tuesday night under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The present marks the third season under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Coming to this country heralded as one of the greatest of living conductors, Koussevitzky has lived up to his advance reputation. As a result of his fine work the Boston Orchestra has again been brought to the high standard that characterized it's work in the pre-war days when Dr. Karl Muck wielded the baton.

Wherever the Boston organization has appeared this season comment has been aroused as to the further big strides made by it under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. This is not surprising, and the Boston leader is merely carrying on the work that made him famous in Europe and which fame resulted in the Boston management naming him when world-famous leader was being sought to bring the orchestra back to the pinnacle it occupied for quite some years before the war.

Every indication points to a very large audience on Tuesday night, when Mr. Koussevitzky can be assured of the same enthusiastic reception that has been in evidence at his other Baltimore appearances.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, will make its first concert appearance of the 1926-27 season in Washington Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course at Poli's Theater.

For this concert the program will be:

Concerto, "Grosso No. 12, for Strings, in B Minor" ..... Handel
"Classis Symphony, Opus 25" ..... Prokofieff
"La Valse" (choregraphic poem) ..... Ravel
"Symphony in B Flat Major, Opus 38, No 1" ..... Schumann

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 30 1927

First Concert Here Wednesday Afternoon

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first concert appearance of the 1926-27 season in Washington on Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock, as the second attraction in the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts at Poli's theater.

For his first Washington appearance of the season, Koussevitzky has carefully selected a program opening with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for strings, orchestrated in B minor; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony, Opus 25; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 38, No. 1.

The Boston Symphony orchestra since its appearance in Washington last season, has steadily advanced in popularity both at home and on tour and its coming on Wednesday afternoon is expected to offer one of the outstanding high lights of the current musical season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 30 1927

The contract of Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been extended until May, 1929. Mr. Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. During Mr. Koussevitzky's vacation, Alfredo Casella was guest-conductor at the concerts on Jan. 14 and 15, with Walter Gieseking as the soloist. Mr. Casella had a sweeping

THIS CLIPPING FROM BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
JAN 31 1927

Saturday night I listened to a va riety of programs but found tha offered by the Boston Symphony o
chestra through WJZ to be bes
This program was of a higher mu
ical character than is broadcast u
ually and probably for that reaso
did not appeal to a large group hearers. One work in particula termed a jazz symphony, aroused n
interest and likewise my amazeme
that it is called music. But for t fact the listener was warned th
the discords to be heard were a pa
of the work I would have thoug
the pianist, who is the compos
was enjoying a nice, public, music
jag. I wonder what Beethoven o
Chopin would think if they coul
hear such modern "music" if th
word "music" can be aptly applie to such ravings. The Bach concerto while dry in passages, was far mor
interesting and the remainder of th
program could be enjoyed even b such an old-fashioned music love
as myself. Incidentally I think th
composer of the modern work wa
Aaron Copland, at least, that is th
way I understood it over the radio

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 31 1927

hospital group.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN THE PLAYHOUSE TONIGHT

Many music lovers in the city will take advantage of the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be presented at the Shubert Playhouse this evening under the auspices of the Delaware Music Association. The program has been arranged with care, and will be E. of brilliance and beauty.

Among the most popular will perhaps, the Fourth Symphony Tschaikovsky in F Minor. Of Koussevitzky, the noted lead

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

Boston Symphony In Hartford Feb. 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in concert in Hartford Feb. 6, under the management of Frank Sedgwick.

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Sergei Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The 108 musicians respond as a single rare instru

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 31 1927

TO CONDUCT CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The week of March 22 will be devoted by the Boston Symphony orchestra to a Centenary Festival in Symphony hall, Boston. The schedule will consist of the rendering of Beethoven's "Nine Symphonies" and commemorative addresses. The Harvard Glee club, Radcliffe Choral society and the London and Lenox String quartet will also participate.

Ludwig van Beethoven died in Vienna, March 26, 1827. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the famous Eroica Symphony and its performance in Hartford, this coming Sunday will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven.

Hartford is fortunate in being numbered among the few New England cities visited by the renowned orchestra and their illustrious leader. Reservations for the concert may be obtained at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

Boston Symphony

The week of March 22 will be devoted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a centenary festival in Symphony Hall, Boston. The schedule will lonsist of Beethoven's nine symphonies and commemorative addresses. The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the London and Lenox String Quartet will also participate. Ludwig von Beethoven died in Vienna, March 26, 1827. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the famous "Eroica Symphony," and its performance in Hartford next Sunday will also be as a tribute to Beethoven. Hartford is fortunate in being numbered among the few New England cities visited by this renounced orchestra and its illustrious leader. Reservations for the at McCoy's hone 2-2251

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.
JAN 31 1927

Concert Cellist Given Tribute

The winter concert of the Woman's Choral Society will be held on Wednesday evening of this week at Frye Hall, the assisting artist to be Alwin Schroeder, veteran cellist of the Boston Symphony Company. This group of women, under the direction of Rubert Neily, is an especially fine organization, and the concerts are among the finest of the season.

With the addition of so fine an artist as Mr. Schroeder, the program is sure to call out a fine representation of music lovers. Mr. Schroeder has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartette for many years and he ranks among the finest of artists.

At a concert given in Boston a few months ago, the orchestra and audience rose in greeting as he appeared upon the stage and at the conclusion of his playing he was recalled many times. Mr. Schroeder has always maintained a noble conception of his instrument the violoncello. He has never made use of the sickly sentimental style to which the instrument easily lends itself, but rather chooses such pieces as Dvorak's Waldesruh and Bach's Sarabande.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULETTIN
NORWICH, CONN.
JAN 31 1927

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Boston Symphony in Hartford

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February sixth at 3 o'clock. The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A special train will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitsky, to Hartford next Sunday. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the musicians, and an entire baggage car for the transportation of the instruments—such instruments as harps and double-basses requiring especially constructed trunks.

When the concert in the Capitol theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Del. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the Orchestra visits. The only annual series of the Boston Symphony outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn being the series in Providence. When their auditorium was demolished last spring, the citizens of that city carried through a campaign raising more than sufficient funds to buy out performances at the largest vaudeville theater. Thus expressing their appreciation and assuring the orchestra's return.

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TRENTON, N. J.
FEB 1 1927

Boston Symphony Keeps Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky has agreed to remain in Boston through two more seasons, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The decision of the trustees to invite the eminent Russian leader to continue in that capacity is hardly surprising in view of the extraordinary success which he has enjoyed in this city since his advent three years ago. Indeed, not only in Boston, but also in New York and other cities visited by the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has been greeted with more enthusiasm than has been vouchsafed any Boston leader since the reign of Karl Muck. This success may be attributed both to his personal magnetism as a leader, and also to the fact that he has restored the Boston Symphony to that high degree of orchestral virtuosity which was associated with this organization in the time of Gericke, Nikisch, and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 1 1927

Boston Symphony

A special train wil bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader. Sergei Koussevitzky to Hartford next Sunday, February sixth. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the instruments.

When the concert in the Capitol Theater is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearances in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Del. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the orchestra visits. Tickets are on sale at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
FEB 1 1927
TUESDAY,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Unusual and Delightful Program Given to Crowded House at Shubert Playhouse

Serge Koussevitsky, Director, Easily Wins Those Present With His Splendid Work

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a very unusual and delightful program before a crowded house last night at the Shubert Playhouse.

The first number was the Concerto in D Major, by C. P. E. Bach, in three movements, Allegro moderato, Andante lento moto and Allegro, arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg. The concerto is characterized by a melancholy strain running through it, like a gray thread in a tapestry of muted colors. It was in direct contrast to the Overture, "Le Carneval Roman," by Berlioz, which was the second offering of the orchestra, performed with spirit and a certain almost pyrotechnical flare that won the whole?hearted applause of the audience, resulting in repeated encores, which Mr. Koussevitzky responded to by bowing.

"Forrest Murmurs," Wagner's concert arrangement of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of Sigfried, was almost cinemic in its portrayal of the scene and the dramatic episodes in which Siegfried hears and reflects upon the forest noises and the birds. The performance was especially excellent and the rich organ tones of the cellos, the clear voices of the flutes, together with the other instruments, conveyed to the listening cear the stirring life of the forest denizons.

Wagner's prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg" came next, and in this, perhaps more than any of its predecessors, one fe't the guiding individuality of the conductor, M. Koussevitzky. Magnificent in its Wagnerian disonances. the theme changes as suddenly as the sky on an April day and a motif of pure lyricism, like a Spring breeze, wanders across the bowed heads of the musicians.

These numbers concluded the first part of the program and were followed by thunderous applause, a theme in itself which showed the one mind which swayed performers and audience.

In a different manner was the 'ast number, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F. minor, Op. 36, which, although well received did not find the same popular favor as did the former numbers.

The theme was, to this reviewer, a bit ponderous, lightened, it is true, by thrilling and short passages of exquisite beauty. The symphony as a whole, however, is amorphous, blurred, tending to no defined end and is inclined to grow a bit restless under the ceaseless flow of the symphony which impresses one as a bit futile. Perhaps it takes a Slavic temperament to find the lasting beauty.

FEBRUARY 1, 1927

The program as a whole was varied and unusual and last night's performance was indeed a hyacinth for the soul.

E. M. D.

From AMERICAN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC TONIGHT

The last of the large orchestras to make its appearance in Baltimore this season in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give the first concert of its course tonight at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian leader, who is now in the third season with the Boston, will wield the baton

Mr. Koussevitzky has made good in every sense and again brought this famous roganization to the high peak which it occupied in pre-war days, just before its director of that time got into some arguments regarding the conflict which resulted in his departure and a general weakening of the orchestra.

A most interesting program has been arranged for tonight including a suite from the opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," which was produced in this country for the first time last season. The symphony of the evening will be the Franck in D. Minor.

The complete program is as follows:

Concerto Gross for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12; (I) Largo,

Of the many tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, none will equal the centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week. The outline of this festival, now announced, is such that it is debatable whether a precedent could be found, if one considers both the participants and the scope of the programs.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist. The festival will comprise seven concerts from Tuesday, March 22 through March 29.

In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth.

Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven.

Solo singers to appear in the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
FEB 2 1927

TO HONOR BEETHOVEN.

Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Society to Join in Festival.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 1.—The Harvard Glee Club, together with the Radcliffe Choral Society, will give two Beethoven concerts in March at Symphony Hall, Boston, singing "Missa-Solemnis," the famous mass and the "Ninth Symphony." The program will be given as a part of the Beethoven festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestral Association.

The two college organizations consist of 500 students. Shortly before the festival, which is to be given during the week of March 22, 300 of the singers will be chosen for the performances. The work is being rehearsed under the direction of A. T. Davison, '06, and will be directed finally by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Augustus Barratt, director of the musical comedy, "Dearest Enemy," engaged to coach the annual

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the Toronto Globe:

"No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard without any feeling of conflict or separation. The themes and their accompanying filligree were played with exceptional ease and smoothness. Through the intricate development section there was perfect symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations aroused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The personnel of the Boston Symphony will arrive by special train for the concert in Capitol theater this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. After the concert here, the 108 musicians and their illustrious conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, will board their train and return to Boston after a week's absence. Tickets may be secured at McCoy's No. 89 Asylum street; Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 2 1927

LOCAL BROADCAST OF SYMPHONY MAY COME NEXT SEASON

W. S. Quinby, Sponsor of Concerts, Promises to Try to Have Relay Resumed as Result of Pleas Forwarded to Him by Mrs. Misch.

Through the efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch and other music lovers here whom she enlisted in the cause, Providence stands a chance of again enjoying local broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season. W. S. Quinby, sponsor of the concerts now broadcast through Boston and Springfield stations, has promised to "do his best" for this city during the next music season.

Mrs. Misch declared yesterday that she had given to Mr. Quinby the names and some of the letters of 698 persons in this vicinity who had expressed the desire for a continuance of the local broadcasts which this city enjoyed a year ago.

Some of these names, Mrs. Misch said, had been solicited, while others came to her spontaneously. Excerpts from many of the letters were given to Mr. Quinby to convince him that this city enjoyed and desired to hear the symphony over the radio.

One of the reasons for the discontinuance was the difficulty of obtaining wire communication with Boston to a local station, but the greatest reason, according to Mrs. Misch and Mr. Quinby, was that so few letters of appreciation were received from persons here that the sponsor of the concerts believed this city did not want the music.

Knowing that this was not so, Mrs. Misch marshalled her forces and secured tangible evidence to submit to Mr. Quinby.

"Providence people must show their appreciation, not only of this series, if it is resumed, but of all other such things," Mrs. Misch declared.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 2 1927

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RADIO MAY RESUME

While there is no definite assurance that broadcasting of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts through a Providence radio station will be restored, W. S. Quinby of Boston, sponsor of the concert broadcasts, is making every effort to effect the restoration.

Quinby's efforts to reinstate concert broadcasts, which were discontinued because he received so few letters of appreciation from Rhode Island that he felt the concerts were not appreciated here, are a result of efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch who recently handed Quinby a petition signed by nearly 700 Rhode Islanders who wish to have the air concerts continued.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

Boston Symphony

Of the many musical tributes Beethoven which are to take plac every part of the musical world March 26, the hundredth annive of the composer's death, it is do ful whether any will excel the tenary festival to be given in phony Hall, Boston, that week.

All of the nine Symphonies w performed by the Boston Sym Orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzk the Ninth Symphony, the orc will combine forces with the H Glee Club and the Radcliffe Society. Orchestra and choru likewise combine to perform the Solennis, the master's great which is seldom performed on ac of extreme difficulties. Quartet be performed by the London Quartet and the Lenox String Qu There will be other distinguished sts. Ernest Newman of London writer and authority on mu

Sale of tickets for the conc Capitol Theatear this Sunday n progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 2 1927

CITY STATION MAY RELAY SYMPHONIES

W. S. Quinby, Sponsor, Promises to Work for Providence Broadcasts Next Season.

MRS. MISCH MAKES PLEA

Presents Appeals from 698 Local Music Lovers.—Failure to Express Desire for Concerts Reason for Discontinuance

Providence may enjoy local broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again next season, if the efforts of W. S. Quinby, sponsor of that concerts broadcasts through Boston and Springfield stations, are successful. If it does, it will be because of the efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch and other music lovers here whom she has enlisted in the cause.

Mrs. Misch reported yesterday that she had handed over to Mr. Quinby the names of 698 Providence people who earnestly desire that the concerts through a local broadcasting station be resumed. Some of the names had been solicited, she said, while others came to her spontaneously. Some she obtained with letters from music lovers who pleaded for the resumption of the concerts, and some of these she gave to Mr. Quinby to prove to him that Providence people were not unappreciative of the concerts.

The reason for discontinuance of the broadcasting through a local station was that Mr. Quinby received so few letters from people in this vicinity after a concert had been given that he believed this city did not want the music. Knowing that this was not so, Mrs. Misch marshalled her forces and secured tangible evidence that there were music lovers here who ardently desired to hear the orchestra over the radio.

"Providence people must show their appreciation, not only of this series, if it is resumed, but of all other such things," said Mrs. Misch yesterday. "Otherwise they will lose the enjoyable music events that are available to them. There is no applause over the radio, and there is but one way for such a man as Mr. Quinby to discover whether his time and effort and expenditure of money are being appreciated. People must write to him and tell him they want the concerts. After each concert they must write of their appreciation and in that way make radio concert sponsors feel that they must keep on with their offerings because so many people enjoy them.

"I proved to Mr. Quinby that people here wanted to hear the symphony. I showed him one letter from a woman out in the country who had not heard a symphony for 40 years, and he read of that woman's joy at being able to hear it over the radio. It is such appreciation, if anything, that will bring the concert broadcasting back to Providence.

"I cannot thank in person all those who have helped me in this effort to have the broadcasting resumed, but I want to take this opportunity of thanking them through the columns of the press."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULETTIN
NORWICH, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

Boston Symphony In Hartford

A special train will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitzky, to Hartford, next Sunday, Feb. 6th. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the musicians, and an entire baggage car for the transportation of the instruments.

When the concert in the Capitol theatre is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearance in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Delaware. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the orchestra visits. The only annual series of the Boston Symphony outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn is the series in Providence.

Reservations may be secured for the Hartford concert at McCoy's music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251. Orchestra seats $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. First balcony, $2.30. Second balcony, $1.73. Boxes and loges, $3.45. Management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Mail orders filled. See adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

BOSTON TO HEAR BEETHOVEN'S NINE

All of Composer's Symphonies on Centenary Program.

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solennis," the master's great mass, which is seldom performed on account of extreme difficulties. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists. Ernest N Newman of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven, as a part of the festival.

If this is to be the Boston Symphony orchestra's greatest tribute to Beethoven it will not be the first. The master has always been given the place of honor before all symphonic composers. In Music hall, the orchestra's original home, a large bronze statue of Beethoven was prominently placed before the organ. Here, in its first season (1881-2), all of the nine symphonies were played. When Symphony hall was built for the orchestra in 1900, the name of Beethoven was inscribed on the cartouche which surmounts the proscenium arch, and Symphony hall was inaugurated with a performance of Beethoven's great "Missa Solennis."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 2 1927

Boston Orchestra At The Lyric

Thanks to Mrs. Wilson-Greene, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last night to the Lyric, where, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, it played Handel, Prokofieff and the Franck whose first name is Cesar. And, by this time, it goes without saying that the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" was included.

As conductors go, Serge Koussevitzky is effective and affected. Yet, beneath his face-making, his imitation of a leader chewing gum, his penchant for placing forefinger and thumb most preciously together, the Boston Symphony's captain is a thoroughgoing, painstaking, most excellently endowed musician.

Last night a much-too-slim audience made more appreciative noises than you'd have thought possible. The Handel "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra in B minor opened the evening. Serge Koussevitzky projected it with loving—at times, overly loving—care. The Wagner prelude that followed was at least more human.

Listening to Prokofieff's suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," you wondered why, six years ago in Chicago, wisecracking critics wrote of it as "The Love for Three Lemons" or something of the kind. As Serge Koussevitzky conducted five fleeting episodes they were whimsical and charming.

Opening the suite with "Les Ridicules," the march followed. After the march came the scherzo. Then "Le Prince et la Princess"—which, ever so often, forgot itself while thinking of Debussy. The fifth and final episode—"La Fuite"—is that abomination: descriptive music. Yet, it's descriptive music with a sense of humor.

It was the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor that brought the concert to a close.

ROBERT GARLAND.

NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.

FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Unusual and Delightful Program Given to Crowded House at Shubert Playhouse

Serge Koussevitsky, Director, Easily Wins Those Present With His Splendid Work

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a very unusual and delightful program before a crowded house last night at the Shubert Playhouse.

The first number was the Concerto in D Major, by C. P. E. Bach, in three movements, Allegro moderato, Andante lento moto and Allegro, arranged by Maxmilian Stenberg. The concerto is characterized by a melancholy strain running through it, like a gray thread in a tapestry of muted colors. It was in direct contrast to the Overture, "Le Carneval Roman," by Berlioz, which was the second offering of the orchestra, performed with spirit and a certain almost pyrotechnical flare that won the whole?hearted applause of the audience, resulting in repeated encores, which Mr. Koussevitzky responded to by bowing.

"Forrest Murmurs," Wagner's concert arrangement of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of Sigfried, was almost cinemic in its portrayal of the scene and the dramatic episodes in which Siegfried hears and reflects upon the forest noises and the birds. The performance was especially excellent and the rich organ tones of the cellos, the clear voices of the flutes, together with the other instruments, conveyed to the listening cear the stirring life of the forest denizons.

Wagner's prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg" came next, and in this, perhaps more than any of its predecessors, one fe't the guiding individuality of the conductor, M. Koussevitzky. Magnificent in its Wagnerian disonances. the theme changes as suddenly as the sky on an April day and a motif of pure lyricism, like a Spring breeze, wanders across the bowed heads of the musicians.

These numbers concluded the first part of the program and were followed by thunderous applause, a theme in itself which showed the one mind which swayed performers and audience.

In a different manner was the last number, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F. minor, Op. 36, which, although well received did not find the same popular favor as did the former numbers.

The theme was, to this reviewer, a bit ponderous, lightened, it is true, by thrilling and short passages of exquisite beauty. The symphony as a whole, however, is amorphous, blurred, tending to no defined end and is inclined to grow a bit restless

Mr. Koussevitzky has made good in every sense and again brought this famous roganization to the high peak which it occupied in pre-war days, just before its director of that time got into some arguments regarding the conflict which resulted in his departure and a general weakening of the orchestra.

A most interesting program has been arranged for tonight including a suite from the opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," which was produced in this country for the first time last season. The symphony of the evening will be the Franck in D. Minor.

The complete program is as follows:

Concerto Gross for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12: (I) Largo,

Of the many tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, none will equal the centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week. The outline of this festival, now announced, is such that it is debatable whether a precedent could be found, if one considers both the participants and the scope of the programs.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist. The festival will comprise seven concerts from Tuesday, March 22 through March 29. LOWELL

In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth. COURIER

Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. FEB 2

Solo singers to appear in the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
FEB 2 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 2 1927

LOCAL BROADCAST OF SYMPHONY MAY COME NEXT SEASON

W. S. Quinby, Sponsor of Concerts, Promises to Try to Have Relay Resumed as Result of Pleas Forwarded to Him by Mrs. Misch.

Through the efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch and other music lovers here whom she enlisted in the cause, Providence stands a chance of again enjoying local broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season. W. S. Quinby, sponsor of the concerts now broadcast through Boston and Springfield stations, has promised to "do his best" for this city during the next music season.

Mrs. Misch declared yesterday that she had given to Mr. Quinby the names and some of the letters of 698 persons in this vicinity who had expressed the desire for a continuance of the local broadcasts which this city enjoyed a year ago.

Some of these names, Mrs. Misch said, had been solicited, while others came to her spontaneously. Excerpts from many of the letters were given to Mr. Quinby to convince him that this city enjoyed and desired to hear the symphony over the radio.

One of the reasons for the discontinuance was the difficulty of obtaining wire communication with Boston to a local station, but the greatest reason, according to Mrs. Misch and Mr. Quinby, was that so few letters of appreciation were received from persons here that the sponsor of the concerts believed this city did not want the music.

Knowing that this was not so, Mrs. Misch marshalled her forces and secured tangible evidence to submit to Mr. Quinby.

"Providence people must show their appreciation, not only of this series, if it is resumed, but of all other such things," Mrs. Misch declared.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 2 1927

CITY STATION MAY RELAY SYMPHONIES

W. S. Quinby, Sponsor, Promises to Work for Providence Broadcasts Next Season.

MRS. MISCH MAKES PLEA

Presents Appeals from 698 Local Music Lovers.—Failure to Express Desire for Concerts Reason for Discontinuance

Providence may enjoy local broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again next season, if the efforts of W. S. Quinby, sponsor of that concerts broadcasts through Boston and Springfield stations, are successful. If it does, it will be because of the efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch and other music lovers here whom she has enlisted in the cause.

Mrs. Misch reported yesterday that she had handed over to Mr. Quinby the names of 698 Providence people who earnestly desire that the concerts through a local broadcasting station be resumed. Some of the names had been solicited, she said, while others came to her spontaneously. Some she obtained with letters from music lovers who pleaded for the resumption of the concerts, and some of these she gave to Mr. Quinby to prove to him that Providence people were not unappreciative of the concerts.

The reason for discontinuance of the broadcasting through a local station was that Mr. Quinby received so few letters from people in this vicinity after a concert had been given that he believed this city did not want the music. Knowing that this was not so, Mrs. Misch marshalled her forces and secured tangible evidence that there were music lovers here who ardently desired to hear the orchestra over the radio.

"Providence people must show their appreciation, not only of this series, if it is resumed, but of all other such things," said Mrs. Misch yesterday. "Otherwise they will lose the enjoyable music events that are available to them. There is no applause over the radio, and there is but one way for such a man as Mr. Quinby to discover whether his time and effort and expenditure of money are being appreciated. People must write to him and tell him they want the concerts. After each concert they must write of their appreciation and in that way make radio concert sponsors feel that they must keep on with their offerings because so many people enjoy them.

"I proved to Mr. Quinby that people here wanted to hear the symphony. I showed him one letter from a woman out in the country who had not heard a symphony for 40 years, and he read of that woman's joy at being able to hear it over the radio. It is such appreciation, if anything, that will bring the concert broadcasting back to Providence.

"I cannot thank in person all those who have helped me in this effort to have the broadcasting resumed, but I want to take this opportunity of thanking them through the columns of the press."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

BOSTON TO HEAR BEETHOVEN'S NINE

All of Composer's Symphonies on Centenary Program.

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solennis," the master's great mass, which is seldom performed on account of extreme difficulties. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists. Ernest N Newman of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven, as a part of the festival.

If this is to be the Boston Symphony orchestra's greatest tribute to Beethoven it will not be the first. The master has always been given the place of honor before all symphonic composers. In Music hall, the orchestra's original home, a large bronze statue of Beethoven was prominently placed before the organ. Here, in its first season (1881-2), all of the nine symphonies were played. When Symphony hall was built for the orchestra in 1900, the name of Beethoven was inscribed on the cartouche which surmounts the proscenium arch, and Symphony hall was inaugurated with a performance of Beethoven's great "Missa Solennis."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 2 1927

Boston Orchestra At The Lyric

Thanks to Mrs. Wilson-Greene, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last night to the Lyric, where, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, it played Handel, Prokofieff and the Franck whose first name is Cesar. And, by this time, it goes without saying that the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" was included.

As conductors go, Serge Koussevitzky is effective and affected. Yet, beneath his face-making, his imitation of a leader chewing gum, his penchant for placing forefinger and thumb most preciously together, the Boston Symphony's captain is a thoroughgoing, painstaking, most excellently endowed musician.

Last night a much-too-slim audience made more appreciative noises than you'd have thought possible. The Handel "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra in B minor opened the evening. Serge Koussevitzky projected it with loving—at times, overly loving—care. The Wagner prelude that followed was at least more human.

Listening to Prokofieff's suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," you wondered why, six years ago in Chicago, wisecracking critics wrote of it as "The Love for Three Lemons" or something of the kind. As Serge Koussevitzky conducted five fleeting episodes they were whimsical and charming.

Opening the suite with "Les Ridicules," the march followed. After the march came the scherzo. Then "Le Prince et la Princess"—which, ever so often, forgot itself while thinking of Debussy. The fifth and final episode—"La Fuite"—is that abomination: descriptive music. Yet, it's descriptive music with a sense of humor.

It was the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor that brought the concert to a close.

ROBERT GARLAND.

TO HONOR BEETHOVEN.

Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Society to Join in Festival.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 1.—The Harvard Glee Club, together with the Radcliffe Choral Society, will give two Beethoven concerts in March at Symphony Hall, Boston, singing "Missa Solemnis," the famous mass and the "Ninth Symphony." The program will be given as a part of the Beethoven festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestral Association.

The two college organizations consist of 500 students. Shortly before the festival, which is to be given during the week of March 22, 300 of the singers will be chosen for the performances. The work is being rehearsed under the direction of A. T. Davison, '06, and will be directed finally by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Augustus Barratt, director of the musical comedy, "Dearest Enemy," [illegible] engaged to coach the annual

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 2 1927

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RADIO MAY RESUME

While there is no definite assurance that broadcasting of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts through a Providence radio station will be restored, W. S. Quinby of Boston, sponsor of the concert broadcasts, is making every effort to effect the restoration.

Quinby's efforts to reinstate the concert broadcasts, which were discontinued because he received so few letters of appreciation from Rhode Island that he felt the concerts were not appreciated here, are a result of efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch who recently handed Quinby a petition signed by nearly 700 Rhode Islanders who wish to have the air concerts continued.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULETTIN
NORWICH, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

Boston Symphony In Hartford

A special train will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitzky, to Hartford, next Sunday, Feb. 6th. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the musicians, and an entire baggage car for the transportation of the instruments.

When the concert in the Capitol theatre is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board their train for return to Boston after a week's absence. The orchestra is devoting this week to its annual appearance in Washington and Baltimore, as well as Hartford, playing also in Wilmington, Delaware. The latter part of the week the orchestra gives its third series of concerts in greater New York. This is one of the busiest trips of the orchestra which has compelled, by the exceeding demand in Boston, the curtailing of its traveling schedule. Indeed, Hartford is fortunate in being one of the few New England cities the orchestra visits. The only annual series of the Boston Symphony outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn is the series in Providence.

Reservations may be secured for the Hartford concert at McCoy's music store, 89 Asylum street, Phone 2-2251. Orchestra seats $2.30, $2.88, $3.45. First balcony, $2.30. Second balcony, $1.73. Boxes and loges, $3.45. Management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Mail orders filled. See adv.

FEBRUARY 1, 1927

under the ceaseless flow of the symphony which impresses one as a bit futile. Perhaps it takes a Slavic temperament to find the lasting beauty.

The program as a whole was varied and unusual and last night's performance was indeed a hyacinth for the soul. E. M. D.

From AMERICAN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC TONIGHT

The last of the large orchestras to make its appearance in Baltimore this season in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give the first concert of its course tonight at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian leader, who is now in the third season with the Boston, will wield the baton

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the Toronto Globe:

"No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard without any feeling of conflict or separation. The themes and their accompanying filligree were played with exceptional ease and smoothness. Through the intricate development section there was perfect symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations aroused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The personnel of the Boston Symphony will arrive by special train for the concert in Capitol theater this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. After the concert here, the 108 musicians and their illustrious conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, will board their train and return to Boston after a week's absence. Tickets may be secured at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street; Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 2 1927

Boston Symphony

Of the many musical tributes Beethoven which are to take pla every part of the musical world March 26, the hundredth annive of the composer's death, it is do ful whether any will excel the tenary festival to be given in phony Hall, Boston, that week.

All of the nine Symphonies w performed by the Boston Symp Orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzk the Ninth Symphony, the orc will combine forces with the H Glee Club and the Radcliffe Society. Orchestra and choru likewise combine to perform the Solennis, the master's great which is seldom performed on ac of extreme difficulties. Quartet be performed by the London Quartet and the Lenox String Qu There will be other distinguished sts. Ernest Newman of London, most writer and authority on mu

Sale of tickets for the conc Capitol Theatear this Sunday n progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Phone 2-2251.

1927

NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.

FEB 1 1927

TUESDAY,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Unusual and Delightful Program Given to Crowded House at Shubert Playhouse

Serge Koussevitsky, Director, Easily Wins Those Present With His Splendid Work

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a very unusual and delightful program before a crowded house last night at the Shubert Playhouse.

The first number was the Concerto in D Major, by C. P. E. Bach, in three movements, Allegro moderato, Andante lento moto and Allegro, arranged by Maxmillan Steinberg. The concerto is characterized by a melancholy strain running through it, like a gray thread in a tapestry of muted colors. It was in direct contrast to the Overture, "Le Carneval Roman," by Berlioz, which was the second offering of the orchestra, performed with spirit and a certain almost pyrotechnical flare that won the whole?hearted applause of the audience, resulting in repeated encores, which Mr. Koussevitzky responded to by bowing.

"Forrest Murmurs," Wagner's concert arrangement of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of Sigfried, was almost cinematic in its portrayal of the scene and the dramatic episodes in which Siegfried hears and reflects upon the forest noises and the birds. The performance was especially excellent and the rich organ tones of the cellos, the clear voices of the flutes, together with the other instruments, conveyed to the listening ear the stirring life of the forest denizons.

Wagner's prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg" came next, and in this, perhaps more than any of its predecessors, one fe't the guiding individuality of the conductor, M. Koussevitzky. Magnificent in its Wagnerian disonances, the theme changes as suddenly as the sky on an April day and a motif of pure lyricism, like a Spring breeze, wanders across the bowed heads of the musicians.

These numbers concluded the first part of the program and were followed by thunderous applause, a theme in itself which showed the one mind which swayed performers and audience.

In a different manner was the last number, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F. minor, Op. 36, which, although well received did not find the same popular favor as did the former numbers.

The theme was, to this reviewer, a bit ponderous, lightened, it is true, by thrilling and short passages of exquisite beauty. The symphony as a whole, however, is amorphous, blurred, tending to no defined end and is inclined to grow a bit restless under the ceaseless flow of the symphony which impresses one as a bit futile. Perhaps it takes a Slavic temperament to find the lasting beauty.

FEBRUARY 1, 1927

The program as a whole was varied and unusual and last night's performance was indeed a hyacinth for the soul.

E. M. D.

From AMERICAN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC TONIGHT

The last of the large orchestras to make its appearance in Baltimore this season in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give the first concert of its course tonight at the Lyric under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian leader, who is now in the third season with the Boston, will wield the baton

Mr. Koussevitzky has made good in every sense and again brought this famous roganization to the high peak which it occupied in pre-war days, just before its director of that time got into some arguments regarding the conflict which resulted in his departure and a general weakening of the orchestra.

A most interesting program has been arranged for tonight including a suite from the opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," which was produced in this country for the first time last season. The symphony of the evening will be the Franck in D. Minor.

The complete program is as follows:

Concerto Gross for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12; (I) Largo,

Of the many tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, none will equal the centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week. The outline of this festival, now announced, is such that it is debatable whether a precedent could be found, if one considers both the participants and the scope of the programs.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist. The festival will comprise seven concerts from Tuesday, March 22 through March 29. LOWELL

In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth. COURIER

Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. FEB 2

Solo singers to appear in the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

FEB 2 1927

TO HONOR BEETHOVEN.

Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Society to Join in Festival.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 1.—The Harvard Glee Club, together with the Radcliffe Choral Society, will give two Beethoven concerts in March at Symphony Hall, Boston, singing "Missa-Solemnis," the famous mass and the "Ninth Symphony." The program will be given as a part of the Beethoven festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestral Association.

The two college organizations consist of 500 students. Shortly before the festival, which is to be given during the week of March 22, 300 of the singers will be chosen for the performances. The work is being rehearsed under the direction of A. T. Davison, '06, and will be directed finally by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Augustus Barratt, director of the musical comedy, "Dearest Enemy," ... engaged to coach the annual

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 2 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the Toronto Globe:

"No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard without any feeling of conflict or separation. The themes and their accompanying filligree were played with exceptional ease and smoothness. Through the intricate development section there was perfect symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations aroused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The personnel of the Boston Symphony will arrive by special train for the concert in Capitol theater this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. After the concert here, the 108 musicians and their illustrious conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, will board their train and return to Boston after a week's absence. Tickets may be secured at McCoy's No. 89 Asylum street; Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 2 1927

LOCAL BROADCAST OF SYMPHONY MAY COME NEXT SEASON

W. S. Quinby, Sponsor of Concerts, Promises to Try to Have Relay Resumed as Result of Pleas Forwarded to Him by Mrs. Misch.

Through the efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch and other music lovers here whom she enlisted in the cause, Providence stands a chance of again enjoying local broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season. W. S. Quinby, sponsor of the concerts now broadcast through Boston and Springfield stations, has promised to "do his best" for this city during the next music season.

Mrs. Misch declared yesterday that she had given to Mr. Quinby the names and some of the letters of 698 persons in this vicinity who had expressed the desire for a continuance of the local broadcasts which this city enjoyed a year ago.

Some of these names, Mrs. Misch said, had been solicited, while others came to her spontaneously. Excerpts from many of the letters were given to Mr. Quinby to convince him that this city enjoyed and desired to hear the symphony over the radio.

One of the reasons for the discontinuance was the difficulty of obtaining wire communication with Boston to a local station, but the greatest reason, according to Mrs. Misch and Mr. Quinby, was that so few letters of appreciation were received from persons here that the sponsor of the concerts believed this city did not want the music.

Knowing that this was not so, Mrs. Misch marshalled her forces and secured tangible evidence to submit to Mr. Quinby.

"Providence people must show their appreciation, not only of this series, if it is resumed, but of all other such things," Mrs. Misch declared.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 2 1927

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RADIO MAY RESUME

While there is no definite assurance that broadcasting of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts through a Providence radio station will be restored, W. S. Quinby of Boston, sponsor of the concert broadcasts, is making every effort to effect the restoration.

Quinby's efforts to reinstate the concert broadcasts, which were discontinued because he received so few letters of appreciation from Rhode Island that he felt the concerts were not appreciated here, are a result of efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch who recently handed Quinby a petition signed by nearly 700 Rhode Islanders who wish to have the air concerts continued.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 2 1927

Boston Symphony

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, that week.

All of the nine Symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great Mass which is seldom performed on account of extreme difficulties. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists. Ernest Newman, of London, foremost writer and authority on music.

Sale of tickets for the concert at Capitol Theatear this Sunday now in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

1927

...te is over, the personnel of the ...stra will board their train for ...n to Boston after a week's ab... The orchestra is devoting this ... to its annual appearance in ...lington and Baltimore, as well as ...ford, playing also in Wilmington, ...ware. The latter part of the ... the orchestra gives its third ... of concerts in greater New ... This is one of the busiest trips ... orchestra which has compelled, ... exceeding demand in Boston, ...rtailing of its traveling sched... indeed. Hartford is fortunate in ... one of the few New England ... orchestra visits. The only ...eries of the Boston Symphony ...tra of Boston, New York and ... is the series in Providence. ...ons may be secured for ...ted concert at McCoy's ... 89 Asylum street, Phone ...hestra seats $2.30, $2.88, ... balcony, $2.30. Second ... Boxes and loges, $3.45. ... of Frank A. Sedgwick. ...lled. See adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 2 1927

CITY STATION MAY RELAY SYMPHONIES

W. S. Quinby, Sponsor, Promises to Work for Providence Broadcasts Next Season.

MRS. MISCH MAKES PLEA

Presents Appeals from 698 Local Music Lovers.—Failure to Express Desire for Concerts Reason for Discontinuance

Providence may enjoy local broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again next season, if the efforts of W. S. Quinby, sponsor of that concerts broadcasts through Boston and Springfield stations, are successful. If it does, it will be because of the efforts of Mrs. Caesar Misch and other music lovers here whom she has enlisted in the cause.

Mrs. Misch reported yesterday that she had handed over to Mr. Quinby the names of 698 Providence people who earnestly desire that the concerts through a local broadcasting station be resumed. Some of the names had been solicited, she said, while others came to her spontaneously. Some she obtained with letters from music lovers who pleaded for the resumption of the concerts, and some of these she gave to Mr. Quinby to prove to him that Providence people were not unappreciative of the concerts.

The reason for discontinuance of the broadcasting through a local station was that Mr. Quinby received so few letters from people in this vicinity after a concert had been given that he believed this city did not want the music. Knowing that this was not so, Mrs. Misch marshalled her forces and secured tangible evidence that there were music lovers here who ardently desired to hear the orchestra over the radio.

"Providence people must show their appreciation, not only of this series, if it is resumed, but of all other such things," said Mrs. Misch yesterday. "Otherwise they will lose the enjoyable music events that are available to them. There is no applause over the radio, and there is but one way for such a man as Mr. Quinby to discover whether his time and effort and expenditure of money are being appreciated. People must write to him and tell him they want the concerts. After each concert they must write of their appreciation and in that way make radio concert sponsors feel that they must keep on with their offerings because so many people enjoy them.

"I proved to Mr. Quinby that people here wanted to hear the symphony. I showed him one letter from a woman out in the country who had not heard a symphony for 40 years, and he read of that woman's joy at being able to hear it over the radio. It is such appreciation, if anything, that will bring the concert broadcasting back to Providence.

"I cannot thank in person all those who have helped me in this effort to have the broadcasting resumed, but I want to take this opportunity of thanking them through the columns of the press."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BULETTIN
NORWICH, CONN.

FEB 2 1927

Boston Symphony In Hartford

A special train will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians and its illustrious leader, Sergei Koussevitzky, to Hartford, next Sunday, Feb. 6th. Several cars are required for the accommodation of the musicians and an entire baggage car for the transportation of the instruments.

When the concert in the Capitol

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 2 1927

BOSTON TO HEAR BEETHOVEN'S NINE

All of Composer's Symphonies on Centenary Program.

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solennis," the master's great mass, which is seldom performed on account of extreme difficulties. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists. Ernest Newman of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven, as a part of the festival.

If this is to be the Boston Symphony orchestra's greatest tribute to Beethoven it will not be the first. The master has always been given the place of honor before all symphonic composers. In Music hall, the orchestra's original home, a large bronze statue of Beethoven was prominently placed before the organ. Here, in its first season (1881-2), all of the nine symphonies were played. When Symphony hall was built for the orchestra in 1900, the name of Beethoven was inscribed on the cartouche which surmounts the proscenium arch, and Symphony hall was inaugurated with a performance of Beethoven's great "Missa Solennis."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST
BALTIMORE, MD.

FEB 2 1927

Boston Orchestra At The Lyric

Thanks to Mrs. Wilson-Greene, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last night to the Lyric, where, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, it played Handel, Prokofieff and the Franck whose first name is Cesar. And, by this time, it goes without saying that the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" was included.

As conductors go, Serge Koussevitzky is effective and affected. Yet, beneath his face-making, his imitation of a leader chewing gum, his penchant for placing forefinger and thumb most preciously together, the Boston Symphony's captain is a thoroughgoing, painstaking, most excellently endowed musician.

Last night a much-too-slim audience made more appreciative noises than you'd have thought possible. The Handel "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra in B minor opened the evening. Serge Koussevitzky projected it with loving—at times, overly loving—care. The Wagner prelude that followed was at least more human.

Listening to Prokofieff's suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," you wondered why, six years ago in Chicago, wisecracking critics wrote of it as "The Love for Three Lemons" or something of the kind. As Serge Koussevitzky conducted five fleeting episodes they were whimsical and charming.

Opening the suite with "Les Ridicules," the march followed. After the march came the scherzo. Then "Le Prince et la Princess"—which, ever so often, forgot itself while thinking of Debussy. The fifth and final episode—"La Fuite"—is that abomination: descriptive music. Yet, it's descriptive music with a sense of humor.

It was the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor that brought the concert to a close.

ROBERT GARLAND.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 3 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In Concert Sunday Afternoon at Capitol Theater.

Symphony music in its finest moments is moving and impressive—music that is not easy to forget. Indeed, music in all its beauty and significance can hardly be surpassd by symphony orchestra achievements. Surely the press, everywhere, has acclaimed the imaginative and sympathetic readings of Sergei Koussevitsky, the extremely gifted leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For after all, music on the page is rather futile until performed and much depends on the intelligence and emotional nature of the interpreter. There seem to be no limitations for Mr. Koussevitzky and through his fine precision and superb technique and discipline, our public admiration of him has grown very strong. By remarkable beauty of tone and splendid artistic quality, the Boston Symphony orchestra has become known as one of the world's finest orchestras.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY.

A varied and brilliant program will be performed this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Capitol theater. The concert Sunday will prove a festal and captivating occasion.

It is advisable to secure reservations at once at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Requests for tickets will be filled at the Capitol theater, Sunday morning at 9 o'clock; telephone 2-0375.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 _ 1927

WASHINGTON

Mrs. Coolidge attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon and had with her Mrs. Henry Wilder Keyes, wife of Senator Keyes, of New Hampshire, and their son, Mr. Henry Wilder Keyes jr., who accompanied his mother on her recent trip around the world. He is a Harvard student.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 _ 1927

Symphony to Repeat "Classic"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made one change in the program which Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Instead of Albert Roussel's suite, Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony, which is also on to-night's Carnegie Hall program of the Boston orchestra, will be repeated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Star
FEB 3 - 1927

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, brought that admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has regained its supremacy in orchestral ranks, to Washington yesterday for the first concert of the current season. A capacity audience showed marked enthusiasm over the well balanced program. Twice during the afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky had his orchestra rise to acknowledge the applause.

Oddly enough, although Handel and Schumann were on the program, it was a work by an ultra-modernist, Serge Prokofieff, which won the real ovation of the afternoon. It wasn't one of Mr. Prokofieff's more hectic pieces, but his "Classical" Symphony, opus 25, which is a delightfully clever, sophisticated example of musical writ-especially in the larghetto and gavotta movements. As Felix Borowski, another young composer, is quoted in the notes: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Mr. Prokofieff seems to have achieved this admirably in atmosphere and tone, if not in actual content. The "Classical" Symphony is a work that should prove popular on orchestra programs.

The other real feature of the afternoon was Robert Schumann's "Symphony No. 1 in B Flat Major," a work large in scope, broad in themes and beautifully performed, so that the mastery of the singing quality that is so essentially the leading characteristic of this composer was brought out consistently throughout the work. This work, which is known as the "Spring" symphony, is another of the increasingly important list of original autographed scores which are in the possession of the music division of the Library of Congress.

A comparative novelty was Ravel's "La Valse," described in the program as a choreographic poem. It was first heard in Washington in January, 1924, as played by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, under Frederick Stock, guest conductor. It is a brilliant, scintillating thing, almost a sarcastic caricature, yet frequently assuming only a modernistic cloak for sincere romanticism. As Lawrence Gilman remarked in his notes on this work for the Philadelphia program: "The fancy and virtuosity which Ravel has expended upon this metamorphosis are as dazzling as the images he evokes. He has achieved a reincarnation of the old Viennese idioms of Strauss and Lanner, extraordinary for its invention, its gusto, its imaginative and poetic transmutation of material whose original charm he has neither forgotten nor obscured. But this is only half of the achievement. 'La Valse,' despite its surface charm and scintillation, is essentially a work of tragic irony. It is as perturbing and ominous as a mobilization order."

The opening selection was Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12." It was excellently played, but seemed a bit drawn out and not nearly so interesting as the other numbers of the afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 3 - 1927

Boston Symphony

Symphony music in its finest moments is moving and impressive, music that is not easy to forget. The press, everywhere, has acclaimed the imaginative and sympathetic readings of Sergei Koussevitzky, the gifted leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After all, music on the page is nothing until performed and much depends upon the intelligence and emotional nature of the interpreter. There seem to be no limitations for Mr. Koussevitzky, and through his fine precision and superb technique and discipline, public admiration of him has grown strong. By remarkable beauty of tone and splendid artistic quality, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become known as one of the world's finest orchestras. A varied and brilliant program will be performed this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Capitol

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASH. D. C.
FEB 3 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

By LEE SOMERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, is experiencing a noteworthy progress toward the position it formerly held as the foremost organization of its kind in the United States, gave a varied and interesting program at Poli's yesterday afternoon, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Koussevitzky's achievements with this orchestra are remarkable, in view of the rather rundown condition in which he inherited it. He has developed now an instrument keenly responsive to his handling, and has already brought it to highly efficient musicianship.

A number of more than ordinary interest was Ravel's "La Valse," a choreographic poem in the modernist manner and with the tempo of a Viennese waltz. It is a delightful revelation of the possibilities of modernist experimentation, and the orchestra's rendition could hardly have been surpassed. It was enthusiastically applauded.

Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Op. 25, an "attempt to catch the spirit of Mozart," was equally enjoyable. Koussevitzky's reading was in full sympathy with the aim of the composer, and Mozart might well have been an interested and appreciative listener were he alive today.

The first number of the program, in striking contrast to the Ravel composition, was Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, B minor. The symphony was Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Op. 38, a work not spectacular but genuinely enjoyable throughout its four movements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 3 - 1927

MUSIC

By RUTH HOWELL

LONG remembered among the orchestral concerts of this season will be the program yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Seldom does an orchestra give us in one afternoon so much that is wholesome, satisfactory and musically worthwhile. There was Handel with its classical beauty, played by an augmented string orchestra which gave it a big and sweeping quality.

Then there was Prokofieff, the modernist, writing in the classical style of Mozart, whose Symphony Op. 25, was played with delicacy and precision, finding particular favor with the audience. The ultra modern Ravel was represented by the orchestral poem, "La Valse," a strange number which was beautiful in spite of itself; and the romantic age of great musical writing was recalled in Schumann's First Symphony, a composition of immense proportions and marvelous inspiration.

Serge Koussevitzky is still another kind of conductor, more like Mengelberg than anyone, but bringing more rhythm and greater precision to his readings. His serious and determined manner in leading seemed to pass into the orchestra, lending an atmosphere of studied perfection thruout the afternoon, and making each succeeding number more satisfactory. The program mounted in interest and beauty to the end of the symphony, leaving the audience reluctant to go even at a late hour.

* * *

THE Washington Civic Orchestra, local colored organization under the direction of Wesley I. Howard, teacher of violin at Howard University, will present the following program tonight at 8:30 in the Wesley A. M. E. Zion Church, 14th and Corcoran streets, with Mayme Holden as piano soloist and accompanist:

Festival March ..... Mendelssohn
Unfinished Symphony ..... Schubert
Enchanted Forest ..... Spitalny
Concerto in A Minor ..... Grieg

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 3 - 1927

By Jessie MacDrue

KOUSSEVITZKY BRINGS US HUMOR AND ROMANCE

Koussevitzky has again restored the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its unassailable place among the great orchestras of America, or of the world. What an exquisite choir of strings he has achieved! I doubt if we have any body of strings in America who play with the exquisite beauty that Serge Koussevitzky obtained from those choirs at yesterday's concert, that was given to a "sold out" house in the Wilson-Greene series of the philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky fooled us, too. He brought us a Prokofieff "classic symphony," opus 25, that was as lucid as Mozart with not a dissonance, yet with an orchestration that was intriguing in its "Harlequin" vagaries, that was Italian in some exquisite arias. It held many bizarre elements, yet contained a clarity that was refreshing.

The orchestra made it an exquisite thing, concluding with a sort of perpetual motion of lightest swiftness, that was a scurrying of tone created in fascinating manner and delineated with color, charm and vitality.

Between a noble Handel, big in the drama form of oratorio, and a Schumann symphony, No. 1, never in my memory played here before, Mr. Koussevitzky placed first the gay Prokofieff and then a bewildering parody. It was Ravel's "choreographic" poem, "La Valse," which was none other than an eccentric [illegible] of the [illegible] waltz of Johann Strauss, akin to his "Blue Danube."

It opened with a far-off deep vibration, scarcely a real sound, then swung into a three-four measure that suggested a clownish Viennese waltz, a sort of "Blue Danube" "a la Russe," a decadent flash of tone-color of green and yellow with dark tones of viola and 'cello that might have been the big splashed effects of a Boris Anisfeld canvas for a Metropolitan Opera ballet. Ravel rather inhibited his rhythm by freakishness, and wound up with a typical Russian mob with the abandon of the Ballet Russe.

It was fascinating for the curious-minded. It would be splendidly spectacular to see. And Mr. Koussevitzky gave it with the humor and gayety that characterized his entire program.

For even the Schumann, with its lovely lyric song of the Larghetto, that was so beautifully played, held in the Scherzo a tripping lightness that was a-quiver with life and that contrasted rarely with the martial timbre that he put into the opening movement. It was almost melodramatic at times. Mr. Koussevitzky made of its themes perfect sense, that sent his audience home singing the infectious melodies with lighthearted gayety.

Such programs are experiences that both enrich our artistic appreciations and add zest to imaginative fancy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the Toronto Globe:

"No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard without conflict or separation. The themes and their accompanying filligree were played with exceptional ease and smoothness. Through the intricate development section there was symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations roused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The personnel of the Boston Symphony will arrive by special train for the concert in Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

Reservations should be secured at once for this prominent musical occasion. Tickets may be secured at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 4 - 1927

Mu

By LAWREN

A New American Concerto at the Boston Symphony Concert

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Aaron Copland composer-pianist.

PROGRAM

1. Brandenburg Concerto No. 3.J. S. Bac
2. "Classic" Symphony, Op. 25 Serge Prokofie
3. Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (one movement).....Aaron Coplan First time in New York Mr. Copland, pianist
4. Symphony in D minor....Cesar Franc

MR. AARON COPLAND, the youn Brooklyn modernist, was natural ly the star of last night's Boston Sym phony concert; for not only was hi new piano concerto the novelty of th evening, but the composer himsel played the solo part.

Moreover, the new piece came to u trailing clouds of blood-red glory from the place of its "world premiere," which was, of course, Boston: since Mr. Copland is the protégé of Mr Koussevitzky, and wrote his concert last year at the suggestion of that re doubtable maestro.

* * *

Mr. Parker, reviewing in "The Boston Transcript" last week's première of Mr. Copland's so-called "jazz concerto," declared that the new work "burst like a hail storm upon the sunli scene"—the sunlit scene in questio having been spread before the audienc at Symphony Hall by the exhilaratin brilliance of the Third Brandenbur Concerto of the sovereign Johann Se bastian and by the artificial illumina tion of Mr. Prokofieff's ersatz Mozar Mr. Parker reported hissing after th Copland work. Altogether, one gather that the new piece, for many of it first hearers, was somewhat less tha laetificant.

* * *

Nothing could have been more en couraging to those who were yet t hear the concerto; for some of us are very weary of manicured jazz; jazz that is too genteel to point; jazz that was born wearing a morning coat and spats; jazz that asks us to "excuse its glove." We have longed for a jazz ruthless and draconian; a jazz mutinous and nonconformist and alarming. And Mr. Copland's essay seemed promising.

We were not disappointed. There is nothing tame or otiose about this concerto. It avoids the chief peril that confronts all current attempts of jazz to move into Carnegie Hall and pretend to be at home there: the peril of anxious and sterilizing conformity to a tradition of musical respectability misconceived and misapplied.

The last time we listened in a concert hall to jazz endeavoring to be serious and achieving the quite different result of being merely tragical, we found ourselves crying pitifully for the qualities that we fancied an American musicmaker might bring out of an attempt to turn the rawness of popular idioms into vigorous and fine-fibered art. We asked for a melodic design that should be daring, individual, sharp edged, unsentimental; for a harmonic texture pregnant and savorous and free from clichés; for an enriched and more adventurous complex of rhythmic patterns. We wanted to hear an American composer forgetting to be "serious," forgetting the stale platitudes of the concert hall—forgetting Liszt and Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky and Debussy and Stravinsky; and daring to take his problem to his own corner of the universe and work it out in his own untrammelled way, even if it were an outrageous way.

* * *

Mr. Copland has gone a long way toward giving us what we wanted. Parts of his concerto are probably outrageous—we are willing to grant the possibility without being greatly concerned one way or the other. Certainly this music is at times as raucous and blatant as Longacre Square—and as indigenous. But Mr. Copland knows a [illegible] hook from a henshaw. His

SIC

E GILMAN

Aaron Copland

Whose new American "Jazz" Concerto was performed at last night's Boston Symphony Concert

offenses are deliberate, not unwitting. What he does he does knowingly, shrewdly, and with extraordinary cunning.

Unlike certain of his more naïve colleagues, he does not have to seek painfully to be "serious." He was "serious" to begin with. In other words, he has the brains and the equipment of a musician. He is an expert craftsman. He is musically literate. He has not had to worry about his symphonic table manners, for he knows them intimately enough to be at liberty to forget them. He is aware, as the late Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger once sagely observed, that it is only a gentleman who can with impunity eat with his knife, if he sees fit.

* * *

The concerto is in two parts: a slow section, and a fast one which succeeds the first without pause. The opening movement is the more remarkable of the two—music of impressive austerity, of true character; music bold in outline and of singular power. Astringent, unassuaging, no doubt unpalatable, it will bring Mr. Copland no easy rewards from the immortalizing disc. No one is going to hunger and thirst after this music; but some may return to it for stimulus and invigoration and reinforcement.

* * *

It is in the second section that Mr. Copland makes play with his "polyrhythmic" jazz; and amazing play it is. This frenetic and untamed music makes the average "serious" treatment of jazz sound like a nocturne by John Field. For Mr. Copland has done with his material what we have long hoped that some adventurous and unhampered composer would do: he has cleansed it of its melodic and harmonic triteness, heightened its rhythmic interest, charged it with character, sharpened and released it, incited it to corybantic and affronting revelries, filled it full of a glorious and criard rudeness. Perhaps it is vulgar; but this is the racy and exhialrating vulgarity of an artist who means to be vulgar, not that of genteel pretender whose only offense is his spurious refinement.

If Mr. Copeland's music is vulgar, it is vulgar as soil and crowds are vulgar, with a fullness and authenticity of life which makes it at once perturbing and richly treasurable.

The music is not wholly free of echoes. But there is so much of what is obviously pure Copeland in it that one can afford to forgive its occasional tributes to those who are, after all, merely Mr. Copeland's musical parents.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 3 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In Concert Sunday Afternoon at Capitol Theater.

Symphony music in its finest moments is moving and impressive—music that is not easy to forget. Indeed, music in all its beauty and significance can hardly be surpassd by symphony orchestra achievements. Surely the press, everywhere, has acclaimed the imaginative and sympathetic readings of Sergei Koussevitsky, the extremely gifted leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For after all, music on the page is rather futile until performed and much depends on the intelligence and emotional nature of the interpreter. There seem to be no limitations for Mr. Koussevitzky and through his fine precision and superb technique and discipline, our public admiration of him has grown very strong. By remarkable beauty of tone and splendid artistic quality, the Boston Symphony orchestra has become known as one of the world's finest orchestras.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY.

A varied and brilliant program will be performed this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Capitol theater. The concert Sunday will prove a festal and captivating occasion.

It is advisable to secure reservations at once at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Requests for tickets will be filled at the Capitol theater, Sunday morning at 9 o'clock; telephone 2-0375.

especially in the larghetto and gavotta movements. As Felix Borowski, another young composer, is quoted in the notes: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Mr. Prokofieff seems to have achieved this admirably in atmosphere and tone, if not in actual content. The "Classical" Symphony is a work that should prove popular on orchestra programs.

The other real feature of the afternoon was Robert Schumann's "Symphony No. 1 in B Flat Major," a work large in scope, broad in themes and beautifully performed, so that the mastery of the singing quality that is so essentially the leading characteristic of this composer was brought out consistently throughout the work. This work, which is known as the "Spring" symphony, is another of the increasingly important list of original autographed scores which are in the possession of the music division of the Library of Congress.

A comparative novelty was Ravel's "La Valse," described in the program as a choreographic poem. It was first heard in Washington in January, 1924, as played by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, under Frederick Stock, guest conductor. It is a brilliant, scintillating thing, almost a sarcastic caricature, yet frequently assuming only a modernistic cloak for sincere romanticism. As Lawrence Gilman remarked in his notes on this work for the Philadelphia program: "The fancy and virtuosity which Ravel has expended upon this metamorphosis are as dazzling as the images he evokes. He has achieved a reincarnation of the old Viennese idioms of Strauss and Lanner, extraordinary for its invention, its gusto, its imaginative and poetic transmutation of material whose original charm he has neither forgotten nor obscured. But this is only half of the achievement. 'La Valse,' despite its surface charm and scintillation, is essentially a work of tragic irony. It is as perturbing and ominous as a mobilization order."

The opening selection was Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12." It was excellently played, but seemed a bit drawn out and not nearly so interesting as the other numbers of the afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 3 - 1927

Boston Symphony

Symphony music in its finest moments is moving and impressive, music that is not easy to forget. The press, everywhere, has acclaimed the imaginative and sympathetic readings of Sergei Koussevitzky, the gifted leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After all, music on the page is nothing until performed and much depends upon the intelligence and emotional nature of the interpreter. There seem to be no limitations for Mr. Koussevitzky, and through his fine precision and superb technique and discipline, public admiration of him has grown strong. By remarkable beauty of tone and splendid artistic quality, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become known as one of the world's finest orchestras. A varied and brilliant program will be performed this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Capitol

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 3 - 1927

MUSIC

By RUTH HOWELL

LONG remembered among the orchestral concerts of this season will be the program yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Seldom does an orchestra give us in one afternoon so much that is wholesome, satisfactory and musically worthwhile. There was Handel with its classical beauty, played by an augmented string orchestra which gave it a big and sweeping quality.

Then there was Prokofieff, the modernist, writing in the classical style of Mozart, whose Symphony Op. 25, was played with delicacy and precision, finding particular favor with the audience. The ultra modern Ravel was represented by the orchestral poem, "La Valse," a strange number which was beautiful in spite of itself; and the romantic age of great musical writing was recalled in Schumann's First Symphony, a composition of immense proportions and marvelous inspiration.

Serge Koussevitzky is still another kind of conductor, more like Mengelberg than anyone, but bringing more rhythm and greater precision to his readings. His serious and determined manner in leading seemed to pass into the orchestra, lending an atmosphere of studied perfection thruout the afternoon, and making each succeeding number more satisfactory. The program mounted in interest and beauty to the end of the symphony, leaving the audience reluctant to go even at a late hour.

* * *

THE Washington Civic Orchestra, local colored organization under the direction of Wesley I. Howard, teacher of violin at Howard University, will present the following program tonight at 8:30 in the Wesley A. M. E. Zion Church, 14th and Corcoran streets, with Mayme Holden as piano soloist and accompanist:

Festival March ..... Mendelssohn
Unfinished Symphony ..... Schubert
Enchanted Forest ..... Spitalny
Concerto in A Minor ..... Grieg

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 3 - 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY BRINGS US HUMOR AND ROMANCE

By Jessie MacDride

Koussevitzky has again restored the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its unassailable place among the great orchestras of America, or of the world. What an exquisite choir of strings he has achieved! I doubt if we have any body of strings in America who play with the exquisite beauty that Serge Koussevitzky obtained from those choirs at yesterday's concert, that was given to a "sold out" house in the Wilson-Greene series of the philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky fooled us, too. He brought us a Prokofieff "classic symphony," opus 25, that was as lucid as Mozart with not a dissonance, yet with an orchestration that was intriguing in its "Harlequin" vagaries, that was Italian in some exquisite arias. It held many bizarre elements, yet contained a clarity that was refreshing.

The orchestra made it an exquisite thing, concluding with a sort of perpetual motion of lightest swiftness, that was a scurrying of tone created in fascinating manner and delineated with color, charm and vitality.

Between a noble Handel, big in the drama form of oratorio, and a Schumann symphony, No. 1, never in my memory played here before, Mr. Koussevitzky placed first the gay Prokofieff and then a bewildering parody. It was Ravel's "choreographic" poem, "La Valse," which was none other than an eccentric [illegible] waltz of Johann Strauss, akin to his "Blue Danube."

It opened with a far-off deep vibration, scarcely a real sound, then swung into a three-four measure that suggested a clownish Viennese waltz, a sort of "Blue Danube" "a la Russe," a decadent flash of tone-color of green and yellow with dark tones of viola and 'cello that might have been the big splashed effects of a Boris Anisfeld canvas for a Metropolitan Opera ballet. Ravel rather inhibited his rhythm by freakishness, and wound up with a typical Russian mob with the abandon of the Ballet Russe.

It was fascinating for the curious-minded. It would be splendidly spectacular to see. And Mr. Koussevitzky gave it with the humor and gayety that characterized his entire program.

For even the Schumann, with its lovely lyric song of the Larghetto, that was so beautifully played, held in the Scherzo a tripping lightness that was a-quiver with life and that contrasted rarely with the martial timbre that he put into the opening movement. It was almost melodramatic at times Mr. Koussevitzky made of its themes perfect gems, that sent his audience home singing the infectious melodies with light-hearted gayety.

Such programs are experiences that both enrich our artistic appreciations and add zest to imaginative fancy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the Toronto Globe:

"No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard without conflict or separation. The themes and their accompanying filligree were played with exceptional ease and smoothness. Through the intricate development section there was symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations roused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The personnel of the Boston Symphony will arrive by special train for the concert in Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

Reservations should be secured at once for this prominent musical occasion. Tickets may be secured at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 4 - 1927

Mu

By LAWREN

A New American Concerto at the Boston Symphony Concert

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Aaron Copland composer-pianist.

PROGRAM

1. Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 J. S. Bach
2. "Classic" Symphony, Op. 25 Serge Prokofieff
3. Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (one movement) ..... Aaron Copland First time in New York Mr. Copland, pianist
4. Symphony in D minor .... Cesar Franck

MR. AARON COPLAND, the young Brooklyn modernist, was naturally the star of last night's Boston Symphony concert; for not only was his new piano concerto the novelty of the evening, but the composer himself played the solo part.

Moreover, the new piece came to us trailing clouds of blood-red glory from the place of its "world premiere," which was, of course, Boston: since Mr. Copland is the protégé of Mr. Koussevitzky, and wrote his concerto last year at the suggestion of that redoubtable maestro.

* * *

Mr. Parker, reviewing in "The Boston Transcript" last week's première of Mr. Copland's so-called "jazz concerto," declared that the new work "burst like a hail storm upon the sunlit scene"—the sunlit scene in question having been spread before the audience at Symphony Hall by the exhilarating brilliance of the Third Brandenburg Concerto of the sovereign Johann Sebastian and by the artificial illumination of Mr. Prokofieff's ersatz Mozart. Mr. Parker reported hissing after the Copland work. Altogether, one gathers that the new piece, for many of its first hearers, was somewhat less than laetificant.

* * *

Nothing could have been more encouraging to those who were yet to hear the concerto; for some of us are very weary of manicured jazz; jazz that is too genteel to point; jazz that was born wearing a morning coat and spats; jazz that asks us to "excuse its glove." We have longed for a jazz ruthless and draconian; a jazz mutinous and nonconformist and alarming. And Mr. Copland's essay seemed promising.

We were not disappointed. There is nothing tame or otiose about this concerto. It avoids the chief peril that confronts all current attempts of jazz to move into Carnegie Hall and pretend to be at home there: the peril of anxious and sterilizing conformity to a tradition of musical respectability misconceived and misapplied.

The last time we listened in a concert hall to jazz endeavoring to be serious and achieving the quite different result of being merely tragical, we found ourselves crying pitifully for the qualities that we fancied an American musicmaker might wring out of an attempt to turn the rawness of popular idioms into vigorous and fine-fibered art. We asked for a melodic design that should be daring, individual, sharp edged, unsentimental; for a harmonic texture pregnant and savorous and free from clichés; for an enriched and more adventurous complex of rhythmic patterns. We wanted to hear an American composer forgetting to be "serious," forgetting the stale platitudes of the concert hall—forgetting Liszt and Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky and Debussy and Stravinsky; and daring to take his problem to his own corner of the universe and work it out in his own untrammelled way, even if it were an outrageous way.

* * *

Mr. Copland has gone a long way toward giving us what we wanted. Parts of his concerto are probably outrageous—we are willing to grant the possibility without being greatly concerned one way or the other. Certainly this music is at times as raucous and blatant as Longacre Square—and as indigenous. But Mr. Copland knows a [illegible] hawk from a henshaw. His offenses are deliberate, not unwitting. What he does he does knowingly, shrewdly, and with extraordinary cunning.

Unlike certain of his more naïve colleagues, he does not have to seek painfully to be "serious." He was "serious" to begin with. In other words, he has the brains and the equipment of a musician. He is an expert craftsman. He is musically literate. He has not had to worry about his symphonic table manners, for he knows them intimately enough to be at liberty to forget them. He is aware, as the late Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger once sagely observed, that it is only a gentleman who can with impunity eat with his knife, if he sees fit.

* * *

The concerto is in two parts: a slow section, and a fast one which succeeds the first without pause. The opening movement is the more remarkable of the two—music of impressive austerity, of true character; music bold in outline and of singular power. Astringent, unassuaging, no doubt unpalatable, it will bring Mr. Copland no easy rewards from the immortalizing disc. No one is going to hunger and thirst after this music; but some may return to it for stimulus and invigoration and reinforcement.

* * *

It is in the second section that Mr. Copland makes play with his "polyrhythmic" jazz; and amazing play it is. This frenetic and untamed music makes the average "serious" treatment of jazz sound like a nocturne by John Field. For Mr. Copland has done with his material what we have long hoped that some adventurous and unhampered composer would do: he has cleansed it of its melodic and harmonic triteness, heightened its rhythmic interest, charged it with character, sharpened and released it, incised it to corybantic and affronting revelries filled it full of a glorious and criard rudeness. Perhaps it is vulgar; but this is the racy and exhilarating vulgarity of an artist who means to be vulgar, not that of genteel pretender whose only offense is his spurious refinement.

If Mr. Copeland's music is vulgar, it is vulgar as soil and crowds are vulgar, with a fullness and authenticity of life which makes it at once perturbing and richly treasurable.

The music is not wholly free of echoes. But there is so much of what is obviously pure Copeland in it that one can afford to forgive its occasional tributes to those who are, after all, merely Mr. Copeland's musical parents.

* * *

SIC

CE GILMAN

Aaron Copland

Whose new American "Jazz" Concerto was performed at last night's Boston Symphony Concert

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1927

Symphony to Repeat "Classic"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made one change in the program which Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Instead of Albert Roussel's suite, Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony, which is also on to-night's Carnegie Hall program of the Boston orchestra, will be repeated.

WASHINGTON

Mrs. Coolidge attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon and had with her Mrs. Henry Wilder Keyes, wife of Senator Keyes, of New Hampshire, and their son, Mr. Henry Wilder Keyes jr., who accompanied his mother on her recent trip around the world. He is a Harvard student.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

By LEE SOMERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, is experiencing a noteworthy progress toward the position it formerly held as the foremost organization of its kind in the United States, gave a varied and interesting program at Poli's yesterday afternoon, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Koussevitzky's achievements with this orchestra are remarkable, in view of the rather rundown condition in which he inherited it. He has developed now an instrument keenly responsive to his handling, and has already brought it to highly efficient musicianship.

A number of more than ordinary interest was Ravel's "La Valse," a choreographic poem in the modernist manner and with the tempo of a Viennese waltz. It is a delightful revelation of the possibilities of modernist experimentation, and the orchestra's rendition could hardly have been surpassed. It was enthusiastically applauded.

Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Op. 25, an "attempt to catch the spirit of Mozart," was equally enjoyable. Koussevitzky's reading was in full sympathy with the aim of the composer, and Mozart might well have been an interested and appreciative listener were he alive today.

The first number of the program, in striking contrast to the Ravel composition, was Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, B minor. The symphony was Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Op. 38, a work not spectacular but genuinely enjoyable throughout its four movements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~NEWS~~
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Star
FEB 3 - 1927

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, brought that admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has regained its supremacy in orchestral ranks, to Washington yesterday for the first concert of the current season. A capacity audience showed marked enthusiasm over the well balanced program. Twice during the afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky had his orchestra rise to acknowledge the applause.

Oddly enough, although Handel and Schumann were on the program, it was a work by an ultra-modernist, Serge Prokofieff, which won the real ovation of the afternoon. It wasn't one of Mr. Prokofieff's more hectic pieces, but his "Classical" Symphony, opus 25, which is a delightfully clever, sophisticated example of musical writ-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 3 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

In Concert Sunday Afternoon at Capitol Theater.

Symphony music in its finest moments is moving and impressive—music that is not easy to forget. Indeed, music in all its beauty and significance can hardly be surpassd by symphony orchestra achievements. Surely the press, everywhere, has acclaimed the imaginative and sympathetic readings of Sergei Koussevitsky, the extremely gifted leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For after all, music on the page is rather futile until performed and much depends on the intelligence and emotional nature of the interpreter. There seem to be no limitations for Mr. Koussevitzky and through his fine precision and superb technique and discipline, our public admiration of him has grown very strong. By remarkable beauty of tone and splendid artistic quality, the Boston Symphony orchestra has become known as one of the world's finest orchestras.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY.

A varied and brilliant program will be performed this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Capitol theater. The concert Sunday will prove a festal and captivating occasion.

It is advisable to secure reservations at once at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Requests for tickets will be filled at the Capitol theater, Sunday morning at 9 o'clock; telephone 2-0375.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1927

WASHINGTON

Mrs. Coolidge attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon and had with her Mrs. Henry Wilder Keyes, wife of Senator Keyes, of New Hampshire, and their son, Mr. Henry Wilder Keyes jr., who accompanied his mother on her recent trip around the world. He is a Harvard student.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1927

Symphony to Repeat "Classic"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made one change in the program which Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Instead of Albert Roussel's suite, Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony, which is also on to-night's Carnegie Hall program of the Boston orchestra, will be repeated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
~~NEWS~~
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Star
FEB 3 - 1927

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, brought that admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has regained its supremacy in orchestral ranks, to Washington yesterday for the first concert of the current season. A capacity audience showed marked enthusiasm over the well balanced program. Twice during the afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky had his orchestra rise to acknowledge the applause.

Oddly enough, although Handel and Schumann were on the program, it was a work by an ultra-modernist, Serge Prokofieff, which won the real ovation of the afternoon. It wasn't one of Mr. Prokofieff's more hectic pieces, but his "Classical" Symphony, opus 25, which is a delightfully clever, sophisticated example of musical writ-especially in the larghetto and gavotta movements. As Felix Borowski, another young composer, is quoted in the notes: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Mr. Prokofieff seems to have achieved this admirably in atmosphere and tone, if not in actual content. The "Classical" Symphony is a work that should prove popular on orchestra programs.

The other real feature of the afternoon was Robert Schumann's "Symphony No. 1 in B Flat Major," a work large in scope, broad in themes and beautifully performed, so that the mastery of the singing quality that is so essentially the leading characteristic of this composer was brought out consistently throughout the work. This work, which is known as the "Spring" symphony, is another of the increasingly important list of original autographed scores which are in the possession of the music division of the Library of Congress.

A comparative novelty was Ravel's "La Valse," described in the program as a choreographic poem. It was first heard in Washington in January, 1924, as played by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, under Frederick Stock, guest conductor. It is a brilliant, scintillating thing, almost a sarcastic caricature, yet frequently assuming only a modernistic cloak for sincere romanticism. As Lawrence Gilman remarked in his notes on this work for the Philadelphia program: "The fancy and virtuosity which Ravel has expended upon this metamorphosis are as dazzling as the images he evokes. He has achieved a reincarnation of the old Viennese idioms of Strauss and Lanner, extraordinary for its invention, its gusto, its imaginative and poetic transmutation of material whose original charm he has neither forgotten nor obscured. But this is only half of the achievement. 'La Valse,' despite its surface charm and scintillation, is essentially a work of tragic irony. It is as perturbing and ominous as a mobilization order."

The opening selection was Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12." It was excellently played, but seemed a bit drawn out and not nearly so interesting as the other numbers of the afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 3 - 1927

Boston Symphony

Symphony music in its finest moments is moving and impressive, music that is not easy to forget. The press, everywhere, has acclaimed the imaginative and sympathetic readings of Sergei Koussevitzky, the gifted leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After all, music on the page is nothing until performed and much depends upon the intelligence and emotional nature of the interpreter. There seem to be no limitations for Mr. Koussevitzky, and through his fine precision and superb technique and discipline, public admiration of him has grown strong. By remarkable beauty of tone and splendid artistic quality, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become known as one of the world's finest orchestras. A varied and brilliant program will be performed this Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Capitol Theater. It is advisable to secure reservations at once, at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Requests for tickets will be filled at the Capitol Theater Sunday at 9 a. m., telephone 2-0375.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

By LEE SOMERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, is experiencing a noteworthy progress toward the position it formerly held as the foremost organization of its kind in the United States, gave a varied and interesting program at Poli's yesterday afternoon, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Koussevitzky's achievements with this orchestra are remarkable, in view of the rather rundown condition in which he inherited it. He has developed now an instrument keenly responsive to his handling, and has already brought it to highly efficient musicianship.

A number of more than ordinary interest was Ravel's "La Valse," a choreographic poem in the modernist manner and with the tempo of a Viennese waltz. It is a delightful revelation of the possibilities of modernist experimentation, and the orchestra's rendition could hardly have been surpassed. It was enthusiastically applauded.

Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Op. 25, an "attempt to catch the spirit of Mozart," was equally enjoyable. Koussevitzky's reading was in full sympathy with the aim of the composer, and Mozart might well have been an interested and appreciative listener were he alive today.

The first number of the program, in striking contrast to the Ravel composition, was Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, B minor. The symphony was Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Op. 38, a work not spectacular but genuinely enjoyable throughout its four movements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 3 - 1927

MUSIC

By RUTH HOWELL

LONG remembered among the orchestral concerts of this season will be the program yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Seldom does an orchestra give us in one afternoon so much that is wholesome, satisfactory and musically worthwhile. There was Handel with its classical beauty, played by an augmented string orchestra which gave it a big and sweeping quality.

Then there was Prokofieff, the modernist, writing in the classical style of Mozart, whose Symphony Op. 25, was played with delicacy and precision, finding particular favor with the audience. The ultra modern Ravel was represented by the orchestral poem, "La Valse," a strange number which was beautiful in spite of itself; and the romantic age of great musical writing was recalled in Schumann's First Symphony, a composition of immense proportions and marvelous inspiration.

Serge Koussevitzky is still another kind of conductor, more like Mengelberg than anyone, but bringing more rhythm and greater precision to his readings. His serious and determined manner in leading seemed to pass into the orchestra, lending an atmosphere of studied perfection thruout the afternoon, and making each succeeding number more satisfactory. The program mounted in interest and beauty to the end of the symphony, leaving the audience reluctant to go even at a late hour.

* * *

THE Washington Civic Orchestra, local colored organization under the direction of Wesley I. Howard, teacher of violin at Howard University, will present the following program tonight at 8:30 in the Wesley A. M. E. Zion Church, 14th and Corcoran streets, with Mayme Holden as piano soloist and accompanist:

Festival March ..... Mendelssohn
Unfinished Symphony ..... Schubert
Enchanted Forest ..... Spitalny
Concerto in A Minor ..... Grieg

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 3 - 1927

By Jessie MacDrue

KOUSSEVITZKY BRINGS US HUMOR AND ROMANCE

Koussevitzky has again restored the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its unassailable place among the great orchestras of America, or of the world. What an exquisite choir of strings he has achieved! I doubt if we have any body of strings in America who play with the exquisite beauty that Serge Koussevitzky obtained from those choirs at yesterday's concert, that was given to a "sold out" house in the Wilson-Greene series of the philharmonic course.

Mr. Koussevitzky fooled us, too. He brought us a Prokofieff "classic symphony," opus 25, that was as lucid as Mozart with not a dissonance, yet with an orchestration that was intriguing in its "Harlequin" vagaries, that was Italian in some exquisite arias. It held many bizarre elements, yet contained a clarity that was refreshing.

The orchestra made it an exquisite thing, concluding with a sort of perpetual motion of lightest swiftness, that was a scurrying of tone created in fascinating manner and delineated with color, charm and vitality.

Between a noble Handel, big in the drama form of oratorio, and a Schumann symphony, No. 1, never in my memory played here before, Mr. Koussevitzky placed first the gay Prokofieff and then a bewildering parody. It was Ravel's "choreographic" poem, "La Valse," which was none other than an eccentric [illegible] waltz of Johann Strauss, akin to his "Blue Danube."

It opened with a far-off deep vibration, scarcely a real sound, then swung into a three-four measure that suggested a clownish Viennese waltz, a sort of "Blue Danube" "a la Russe," a decadent flash of tone-color of green and yellow with dark tones of viola and 'cello that might have been the big splashed effects of a Boris Anisfeld canvas for a Metropolitan Opera ballet. Ravel rather inhibited his rhythm by freakishness, and wound up with a typical Russian mob with the abandon of the Ballet Russe.

It was fascinating for the curious-minded. It would be splendidly spectacular to see. And Mr. Koussevitzky gave it with the humor and gayety that characterized his entire program.

For even the Schumann, with its lovely lyric song of the Larghetto, that was so beautifully played, held in the Scherzo a tripping lightness that was a-quiver with life and that contrasted rarely with the martial timbre that he put into the opening movement. It was almost melodramatic at times. Mr. Koussevitzky made of its themes perfect gems, that sent his audience home singing the infectious melodies with lighthearted gayety.

Such programs are experiences that both enrich our artistic appreciations and add zest to imaginative fancy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

That the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky is quite overwhelming is revealed in the contribution of the Toronto Globe:

"No wonder that the ovation which had been threatening all evening broke out at last and almost passed all bounds. This unusual demonstration was justified by the imaginative and lucent reading of the Russian leader. Every section of the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard without conflict or separation. The themes and their accompanying filligree were played with exceptional ease and smoothness. Through the intricate development section there was symmetry and clarity of outline. The remaining movements fulfilled the expectations roused by the first and at the end the audience arose and clapped as if hoping to hear the whole symphony played over again."

The personnel of the Boston Symphony will arrive by special train for the concert in Capitol theater, Sunday afternoor, at 3 o'clock.

Reservations should be secured at once for this prominent musical occasion. Tickets may be secured at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 4 - 1927

Mu

By LAWREN

A New American Concerto at the Boston Symphony Concert

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Aaron Copland composer-pianist.

PROGRAM

1. Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 J. S. Bach
2. "Classic" Symphony, Op. 25 Serge Prokofieff
3. Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (one movement) ..... Aaron Copland First time in New York Mr. Copland, pianist
4. Symphony in D minor .... Cesar Franck

MR. AARON COPLAND, the young Brooklyn modernist, was naturally the star of last night's Boston Symphony concert; for not only was his new piano concerto the novelty of the evening, but the composer himself played the solo part.

Moreover, the new piece came to us trailing clouds of blood-red glory from the place of its "world premiere," which was, of course, Boston: since Mr. Copland is the protégé of Mr. Koussevitzky, and wrote his concerto last year at the suggestion of that redoubtable maestro.

* * *

Mr. Parker, reviewing in "The Boston Transcript" last week's première of Mr. Copland's so-called "jazz concerto," declared that the new work "burst like a hail storm upon the sunlit scene"—the sunlit scene in question having been spread before the audience at Symphony Hall by the exhilarating brilliance of the Third Brandenburg Concerto of the sovereign Johann Sebastian and by the artificial illumination of Mr. Prokofieff's ersatz Mozart. Mr. Parker reported hissing after the Copland work. Altogether, one gathers that the new piece, for many of its first hearers, was somewhat less than laetificant.

* * *

Nothing could have been more encouraging to those who were yet to hear the concerto; for some of us are very weary of manicured jazz; jazz that is too genteel to point; jazz that was born wearing a morning coat and spats; jazz that asks us to "excuse its glove." We have longed for a jazz ruthless and draconian; a jazz mutinous and nonconformist and alarming. And Mr. Copland's essay seemed promising.

We were not disappointed. There is nothing tame or otiose about this concerto. It avoids the chief peril that confronts all current attempts of jazz to move into Carnegie Hall and pretend to be at home there: the peril of anxious and sterilizing conformity to a tradition of musical respectability misconceived and misapplied.

The last time we listened in a concert hall to jazz endeavoring to be serious and achieving the quite different result of being merely tragical, we found ourselves crying pitifully for the qualities that we fancied an American musicmaker might wring out of an attempt to turn the rawness of popular idioms into vigorous and fine-fibered art. We asked for a melodic design that should be daring, individual, sharp edged, unsentimental; for a harmonic texture pregnant and savorous and free from clichés; for an enriched and more adventurous complex of rhythmic patterns. We wanted to hear an American composer forgetting to be "serious," forgetting the stale platitudes of the concert hall—forgetting Liszt and Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky and Debussy and Stravinsky; and daring to take his problem to his own corner of the universe and work it out in his own untrammelled way, even if it were an outrageous way.

* * *

Mr. Copland has gone a long way toward giving us what we wanted. Parts of his concerto are probably outrageous—we are willing to grant the possibility without being greatly concerned one way or the other. Certainly this music is at times as raucous and blatant as Longacre Square—and as indigenous. But Mr. Copland knows a musical hawk from a hanshaw. His

[illegible]
[illegible] GILMAN
Aaron Copland

Whose new American "Jazz" Concerto was performed at last night's Boston Symphony Concert

offenses are deliberate, not unwitting. What he does he does knowingly, shrewdly, and with extraordinary cunning.

Unlike certain of his more naïve colleagues, he does not have to seek painfully to be "serious." He was "serious" to begin with. In other words, he has the brains and the equipment of a musician. He is an expert craftsman. He is musically literate. He has not had to worry about his symphonic table manners, for he knows them intimately enough to be at liberty to forget them. He is aware, as the late Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger once sagely observed, that it is only a gentleman who can with impunity eat with his knife, if he sees fit.

* * *

The concerto is in two parts: a slow section, and a fast one which succeeds the first without pause. The opening movement is the more remarkable of the two—music of impressive austerity, of true character; music bold in outline and of singular power. Astringent, unassuaging, no doubt unpalatable, it will bring Mr. Copland no easy rewards from the immortalizing disc. No one is going to hunger and thirst after this music; but some may return to it for stimulus and invigoration and reinforcement.

* * *

It is in the second section that Mr. Copland makes play with his "polyrhythmic" jazz; and amazing play it is. This frenetic and untamed music makes the average "serious" treatment of jazz sound like a nocturne by John Field. For Mr. Copland has done with his material what we have long hoped that some adventurous and unhampered composer would do: he has cleansed it of its melodic and harmonic triteness, heightened its rhythmic interest, charged it with character, sharpened and released it, incited it to corybantic and affronting revelries, filled it full of a glorious and criard rudeness. Perhaps it is vulgar; but this is the racy and exhialrating vulgarity of an artist who means to be vulgar, not that of genteel pretender whose only offense is his spurious refinement.

If Mr. Copeland's music is vulgar, it is vulgar as soil and crowds are vulgar, with a fullness and authenticity of life which makes it at once perturbing and richly treasurable.

The music is not wholly free of echoes. But there is so much of what is obviously pure Copeland in it that one can afford to forgive its occasional tributes to those who are, after all, merely Mr. Copeland's musical parents.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1927

Boston Symph Give Notab

By GRENA BENNETT.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were hosts to a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall last night. The New Englanders provided a programme notable for the variety of its fare. The single novelty on the list was a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland, the solo part played by the composer.

Mr. Copland, a native of Brooklyn and still in the twenties, has composed many works in his few creative years. The concerto, which had its first local hearing last night, is an ambitious work, the scoring well done, the composer evidently having thoroughly studied the handling of a large orchestra. The themes have originality and their development is sufficiently individual to hold the attention of the auditor. His performance of the piano part was scholarly.

Brilliant Tone

The concert began with Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3. At each hearing of any of that group one wonders anew at the marvelous ingenuity of Bach, whose "busy" music resembles nothing so much as a remarkable tapestry with a multitude of designs. Every measure has its surprise, a new paraphrase or another sparkling theme born and presently grown to maturity. The concerto blazed and glowed with brilliant tone. Its interpretation was uplifting, and Mr. Koussevitsky was recalled several times after its performance.

There were two symphonies in the programme, Prokofieff's "Classic," which after the Bach number was tenuous and often commonplace, and Francks D minor symphony, the closing number.

But Mr. Copland surrounded it with all the machinery of sound and fury, and the most raucous modernistic fury at that. The composer-pianist smote his instrument at random; the orchestra, under the impassioned baton of Mr. Koussevitzky, heaved and shrieked and fumed and made anything but sweet moan until both pianist and conductor attained such a climax of absurdity that many in the audience giggled with delight. Mr. Copland was evidently seriously engaged in saying something of vital importance to himself, and played away frantically, aided and abetted by the orchestra, which made barnyard and stable noises in the intervals of proclaiming imposing Scriabinish fanfares. When it was all over, a man in back of me involuntarily exclaimed, "Thank God." All the same, the piece created the sensation expected of it and was generously applauded.

The Prokofieff Classic Symphony, which followed the G Major Brandenburg Concerto of Bach is an old morsel, having been played here by the now defunct Russian Symphony Orchestra. It is a rather pointless imitation of Mozart, whose brevity seemed to me its only merit. Mr. Felix Borowski the critic says of it: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." It is rather difficult to say just what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living now, but one can safely hazard that he would not have written a note of Mr. Prokofieff's Classic Symphony. Nevertheless, last night's audience loved it and applauded it frantically.

In the Bach Concerto and the Franck Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky had music worthier of his efforts. A large audience attended and listened to the whole of the concert in an extraordinarily appreciative mood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 4 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New compositions by Prokofieff and Aaron Copland were played for the first time in New York at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, last night in Carnegie Hall. Prokofieff contributed to the program his "Classic Symphony," op. 25, and Aaron Copland was present to appear as soloist in the performance of his concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra. The third Brandenburg concerto of J. S. Bach opened the concert, and Franck's symphony brought it to an end.

There was a lusty, two-fisted performance of Bach's music. The performance of Prokofieff's "Symphony" in the "classic" manner would have unquestionably have delighted the composer. It was technically transparent as air; it was witty and spirited. These same words might be used as description of the character of Prokofieff's writing, which appears in a singularly innocent guise. Gone is the barbarity and outrage of the Scythian Suite or the brilliant ribaldry of the ballet "Chout" which Mr. Koussevitsky per formed earlier this season. In place of the bizarre and outré characteristics of these and other of Mr. Prokofieff's compositions we encounter music as light as a feather and as guiltless as the key of C major.

But hist! It seems that Mr. Prokofieff—according, at least, to Felix Browski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago orchestra—sought in this symphony to emulate Mozart, at least, in the words of the programmatist, "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." It is a tall order. It would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. Mozart when he lived was more than once an ultra-modern; and the greatness of Mozart lies not at all in the fact that he used eighteenth century idioms known and employed by every Tom, Dick and Harry of a composer about him.

There is a quality in Mozart not to be captured or imitated by another man, or even by so ingenious and gifted a modern composer as Mr. Prokofieff. What have we actually in this specimen of a "classic symphony?" We have music written with extraordinary facility, esprit and technical finish, music that is melodious in a diatonic manner and engagingly humorous in its vein. That is a great deal, but it is not enough to be "the spirit of Mozart." Beside the representative Mozart symphony that of Mr. Prokofieff is a joke, if not precisely the joke that the composer intended. Its short movements are far more in the genre of a divertimento or suite than a symphony; they are amusing, delightfully unpretentious, they have a certain airy mockery of the classic style which is infectious. They just escape being music of the superficially popular kind and they could take a position more convincing and creditable to themselves if they would kindly emerge from behind the statue of Mozart.

Mr. Copland's concerto has some effective ideas. It also has vim and gusto, and its highly peppered treatment of phrases and rhythms in the manner of jazz music is exhilarating to hear. The opening phrases, heard in imitation, are, however, short-lived when the composer attempts to develop them, and the work is not organic. It progresses by fits and starts, impressing the listener anew with the talent of the composer and confirming his suspicions that Mr. Copland needs a firmer hold of principles of musical structure than he has before he will do his own ideas justice. But here is a temperament. Here is a young man who can surely not remain content with the praise of partisans or knowledge of his own artistic shortcomings. He has produced a concerto with something in it, more especially interesting instrumental sonorities and intensively treated rhythms. From its composer more can be expected—and better. Mr. Copland played the piano part with a composer's authority, and Mr. Koussevitsky aided and abetted him as a willing conspirator should, for it was at Mr. Koussevitsky's suggestion that Mr. Copland wrote this concerto.

The concluding performance of the Franck symphony was one of obvious sincerity, of many fine nuances and a half-rhapsodic manner that suited well the nature of the composition. Mr. Koussevitsky avoided exaggeration or merely theatrical effects. He maintained the unique and characteristic "color" of Franck, the organist and the mystic of Paris of the Third Empire. The orchestra uttered noble and tender thoughts in a spirit of devotion and reverence to the composer. The conductor proved his right to the individual treatment of certain details of the score, and his instrument displayed its fine sonority and its constantly increasing virtuosity. At the end of the concert there were many [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
FEB 4 - 1927

Moderns T

Serge Koussevitzky C Copland at C

By Pitts

The program with which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra regaled a very large audience at Carnegie Hall last evening indisputably achieved variety. Bach began it. Prokofieff followed. Then came a concerto for piano and orchestra in a single movement (but what a singularity!) by Mr. Aaron Copland, of Brooklyn and sometimes of Paris, with the composer, as the cheery saying goes, at the piano. To soothe the savage breast of anybody who had been unduly wrought up by the youthful disclosures of Mr. Copland, the visitors administered in parting balm the D minor symphony of the Sainted Papa Franck. Seldom has any program provoked such resounding applause.

Bach—the modish creature!—contributed his third "Brandenburg" concerto for string orchestra, couched in the amiable key of G. The music itself, let us believe, as well as the incisive, rhythmic, scintillant performance won the first ovation of the evening, which Mr. Koussevitzky recognized with special ceremony by bidding his men stand up. After Bach Prokofieff!

This was no Prokofieff let loose among the Scythians, nor yet the multi-colored plucker of the oranges of love. It was Prokofieff enedeavoring to "catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Those of us who have maintained all along that this young Russian, however he may choose to appear at times, has been always in his heart of hearts a classicist had our well earned night of triumph thanks to this "Classical" symphony.

It is a delightful little work, of pleasant themes and crisp and clever rhythms, ingenious in its development, sparkling in its instrumental dress, and the surpassing wit of each of the four movements is its perfect brevity. One finds here, to be sure, progressions, modulations, instrumental devices, a kind of complexity that are not of the eighteenth century. But remember, it is Mozart "if he were living now" that M. Prokofieff has set out to serve. And he has served him well.

The most recognizably Mozartean of the four movements are the initial allegro and the rollicking finale. A wistful Rimskyan cadence breathes from the larghetto, and the gavotte (which [illegible] of a minuet) is appre-

MU

By Samue

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Classic Symphony, Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Piano concerto (new).....Aaron Copland
(Composer at the piano)
Symphony in D Minor.....Cesar Franck

Another Jazz Concerto

Mr. Aaron Copland, one of the more serious members of the American branch of the modernist school of composition, was the hero of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Copland, whose "Music for the Theatre" has become, through frequent performances, tolerably familiar to local audiences, appeared on Mr. Koussevitzky's program in the double role of composer and performer, playing his latest opus, a "concerto" for pianoforte and orchestra. The concerto, finished in November, 1926, was written at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and calls for a large orchestra, with a few extra trappings like a tam-tam, Chinese drum, woodblock and xylophone.

Mr. Copland, as is the habit with modern composers, submits a description of the genesis and contents of his latest work. We are informed that though it is played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section, the second a fast rhythmic one. Mr. Copland says a lot more about the themes and their manipulation in the usual obscure fashion of program notes, which mystifies more than it elucidates and which I refrain from quoting. One thing he carefully omits telling—the presence of a good deal of jazz in the concerto. Furthermore, it is jazz strongly reminiscent of George Gershwin's Concerto in F.

SIC

Chotzinoff

However, the resemblance is superficial. For Mr. Gershwin, who knows nothing about form, having had disreputable beginnings in Tin Pan Alley, seems a veritable Beethoven as regards musical form compared to Mr. Copland in his latest composition. Last night's concerto, which started in grandiose fashion with one of those themes which smells of Scriabine, suddenly hitched on to jazz. The jazz theme [illegible] in fact, a pretty poor pick, as ia Boston.

nducts Prokofieff an arnegie Hall.

Sanborn.

ciably less distinguished than its f lows. Still, as a whole, this sinfonie (it is no more than that) is most gratiating, and yesterday's audie took it immediately and vociferously its heart.

Mr. Copland's piano concerto is va different matter and nothing that is be judged with even an approach finality from a single unprepared he ing. It opens with a tremendous chestral fracas—embracing an impos dialogue of brasses and strings, throu which growls a deep, lowering note of menace or warning. The still, sm voice of the piano enters in a childi infantile expostulation. There are [illegible] of elephants engaged in jungle rivalry of Charleston and dances further south. Rhythm runs away with rhythm and key shatters its sabre against key.

And yet 'cellos and fiddles lilt their occasional syrupy cantilena as though Mme. Chaminade had lent the laboring Copland a gracile helping hand. A curious and puzzling performance, this concerto, but at the very least it is more ponderable stuff than the piano concerto perpetrated for personal uses by M. Stravinsky, and with respect to sheer quantity of sound, it makes that doughty Russian's "Sacre" sound like early Haydn or the first hesitant lispings of Johann Christian Bach. Last evening the concerto in its course drew fourth a little not unfriendly laughter. When it was over, the house responded with salvos of tumultuous applause.

It is worth remembering that less than thirty years ago the decorous and respectable composition of the Pere Franck was called in some quarters a veritable negation of music, and that indignant Bostonians walked out on it when the immaculate Gericke made so bold as to lead it at a concert of their sacrosanct orchestra.

The program yesterday was exact, of course, in marking the Copland concerto "first time in New York." The same legend would have applied with equal accuracy to M. Prokofieff's symphony. Each work was played superlatively well.

A concert rich in varied emotions and assorted thrills.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1927

Music

Boston Symphony Concert Introduces Two Unfamiliar Works—Rosenthal Writes

BACH and Cesar Franck, in the third Brandenburg Concerto and the D minor Symphony, respectively, were the real moderns on last night's Boston Symphony program—at least so far as living originality is concerned. Between these two works Prokofieff's Classic Symphony Op. 25 and Copland's Concerto for piano and orchestra (first time in New York) were performed, with the composer as piano soloist in the latter work. As Casella has sought inspiration in Scarlatti, and Strawinsky Pergolesi, so Prokofieff had in min according to Borowski, quoted in M Philip Hale's always illuminating pr gram notes, the idea to "catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Olga Samaroff

Let us hope this claim was made for Prokofieff and not by him. For much as I admire Prokofieff in general, I must confess that nothing resembling a Mozartian afflatus exists in this little Classic Symphony, so far as I could discover. It rather brought to my mind the question whether these modern composers are in league to reconcile restive audiences to new idioms through proving how futile it is to try to continue writing in old ones. Mr. Copland's piano Concerto, of which Mr. Koussewitzky is the musical godfather, seemed to me singularly dry and dull. An endless development of uninteresting thematic material, salted with modern devices which a thorough course of ultra modern music administered by the various propaganda societies in New York effectually robs of any startling novelty.

Ornstein was writing piano music in which the omnipresent semi-tone figured as it did in last night's concerto in 1916. Gershwin has done much more interesting things with jazz elements in his Rhapsody in Blue and I failed to find any characteristic ideas, quality or element of instrumentation making the work in question important even from the point of view of originality. It had for me its amusing moments and its painful ones. It found a polite reception. Mr. Koussewitzky conducted the whole program with ardor and with a fine response from the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 - 1927

Boston Symphony

The 108 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their famous Russian leader, Sergei Koussevitzzky, will arrive by special train for the concert in the Capitol Theater Sunday at 3 o'clock. When the concert in Hartford is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board the train for return to Boston after a week's absence, [illegible] this week

[illegible] orchestra having [illegible] annual appearances in Washington, Baltimore and Wilmington. The only other annual series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn is the series in Providence. When its auditorium was demolished last spring, the citizens of that city carried through a campaign, raising more than sufficient funds to buy out performances at the largest vaudeville theater, thus showing their appreciation and assuring the orchestra's return. Reservations should be placed at once for this prominent musical occasion. Telephone McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, 2-2251. Frank A. Sedgwick, management. Prices $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
FEB 4 - 1927

REALM C

By Richard

ONCE upon a time, the legend go from the zoological bastille in studio, clapped simian paws on nd splashed over a panel with a bedla ognized this masterpiece instantly a erectus; but spirits more subtle affirme himself in vigor of line and sweep of gorilla, though lacking Raphael's brai more bulging.

Aaron Copland, a young composer of this city, laid hands on the tools of Bach and Beethoven, slashed about him with harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation, and fashioned a concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra, which had its first New York hearing yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At least one hearer, when the din grew unsupportable, sprang from his seat and fled into the foyer. Others of us, less courageous, bore it out to the end. To the present chronicler, the concerto seemed the most horrific and insulting perversion of music that ever affronted these inveterate ears. But there were to be found persons who exclaimed over its primitive vitality and robust urge.

The composer had at least the courage of his dissonances, for he officiated in person at the piano and belabored it from time to time with the insensitive and defiant pertinacity of a Hottentot thumping a gourd. The so-called American idiom was often employed, but with a violence totally at odds with the grace and delicacy affected by professional jazz virtuosi.

That such a work could be written, could win a performance from a leading orchestra and be heard with outward patience by a New York audience is the best possible evidence that his-

F MUSIC

L. Stokes

es—or should go—a gorilla escaped Rome, found its way into Raphael's the painter's brushes and pigments m of colors. Some connoisseurs rec- s the handicraft of pithecanthropus d that the ape had surpassed Raphael hue. This may have been so, for the in, possessed longer arms and thews torians a few centuries hence will dub our times as the Dark Ages of music, as an era of Goths and Vandals succeeding the Athenian epoch of Handel and Bach.

It was with Bach, by the way, that Mr. Koussevitzky began his program. The composition was the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major, for string orchestra. Other numbers were Prokofieff's Classic Symphony No. 25 and Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The Bostonian chieftain gave the Brandenburg concerto a rude and vigorous performance, during which he contrived to hound even such modest instruments as the violas into unmusical noises. The very aim of the Prokofieff symphony—"to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, he might put into his score"—withheld the conductor's hand from its full weight, so that this work proved the most charming and refined of the evening.

The Franck symphony may not be a creation of first rank, but it is of the sort a classic. Mr. Koussevitzky read the score as if it were written for a brass band. Again and again the trumpets and drums, which after all in an orchestra are subsidiary instruments, were incited to drown the principal strings. In both the first and third movements so much clamor was [illegible] to incidental passages that no [illegible] left for the chief climaxes. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed inebriated with the intoxication of his own tumultous clangors.

The Boston Orchestra, if left to its own devices, could play with excellent fine and delicate skill. This was proved in the second movement of the Franck symphony and in other passages which imposed a certain gentleness on the conductor. But it is at the mercy of a leader more obstreperous than John Philip Sousa.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1927

Boston Symph
Give Notab

By GRENA BENNETT.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were hosts to a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall last night. The New Englanders provided a programme notable for the variety of its fare. The single novelty on the list was a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland, the solo part played by the composer.

Mr. Copland, a native of Brooklyn and still in the twenties, has composed many works in his few creative years. The concerto, which had its first local hearing last night, is an ambitious work, the scoring well done, the composer evidently having thoroughly studied the handling of a large orchestra. The themes have originality and their development is sufficiently individual to hold the attention of the auditor. His performance of the piano part was scholarly.

Brilliant Tone

The concert began with Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3. At each hearing of any of that group one wonders anew at the marvelous ingenuity of Bach, whose "busy" music resembles nothing so much as a remarkable tapestry with a multitude of designs. Every measure has its surprise, a new paraphrase or another sparkling theme born and presently grown to maturity. The concerto blazed and glowed with brilliant tone. Its interpretation was uplifting, and Mr. Koussevitsky was recalled several times after its performance.

There were two symphonies in the programme, Prokofieff's "Classic," which after the Bach number was tenuous and often commonplace, and Francks D minor symphony, the closing number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB 4 - 1927

But Mr. Copland surrounded it with all the machinery of sound and fury, and the most raucous modernistic fury at that. The composer-pianist smote his instrument at random; the orchestra, under the impassioned baton of Mr. Koussevitzky, heaved and shrieked and fumed and made anything but sweet moan until both pianist and conductor attained such a climax of absurdity that many in the audience giggled with delight. Mr. Copland was evidently seriously engaged in saying something of vital importance to himself, and played away frantically, aided and abetted by the orchestra, which made barnyard and stable noises in the intervals of proclaiming imposing Scriabinish fanfares. When it was all over, a man in back of me involuntarily exclaimed, "Thank God." All the same, the piece created the sensation expected of it and was generously applauded.

The Prokofieff Classic Symphony, which followed the G Major Brandenburg Concerto of Bach is an old morsel, having been played here by the now defunct Russian Symphony Orchestra. It is a rather pointless imitation of Mozart, whose brevity seemed to me its only merit. Mr. Felix Borowski the critic says of it: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." It is rather difficult to say just what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living now, but one can safely hazard that he would not have written a note of Mr. Prokofieff's Classic Symphony. Nevertheless, last night's audience loved it and applauded it frantically.

In the Bach Concerto and the Franck Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky had music worthier of his efforts. A large audience attended and listened to the whole of the concert in an extraordinarily appreciative mood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 4 1927

Mr. Copland's concerto has some effective ideas. It also has vim and gusto, and its highly peppered treatment of phrases and rhythms in the manner of jazz music is exhilarating to hear. The opening phrases, heard in imitation, are, however, short-lived when the composer attempts to develop them, and the work is not organic. It progresses by fits and starts, impressing the listener anew with the talent of the composer and confirming his suspicions that Mr. Copland needs a firmer hold of principles of musical structure than he has before he will do his own ideas justice. But here is a temperament. Here is a young man who can surely not remain content with the praise of partisans or knowledge of his own artistic shortcomings. He has produced a concerto with something in it, more especially interesting instrumental sonorities and intensively treated rhythms. From its composer more can be expected—and better. Mr. Copland played the piano part with a composer's authority, and Mr. Koussevitsky aided and abetted him as a willing conspirator should, for it was at Mr. Koussevitsky's suggestion that Mr. Copland wrote this concerto.

The concluding performance of the Franck symphony was one of obvious sincerity, of many fine nuances and a half-rhapsodic manner that suited well the nature of the composition. Mr. Koussevitsky avoided exaggeration or merely theatrical effects. He maintained the unique and characteristic "color" of Franck, the organist and the mystic of Paris of the Third Empire. The orchestra uttered noble and tender thoughts in a spirit of devotion and reverence to the composer. The conductor proved his right to the individual treatment of certain details of the score, and his instrument displayed its fine sonority and its constantly increasing virtuosity. At the end of the concert there were many re-

Mr. K...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
FEB 4 - 1927

...antic dance measures, as of a herd of elephants engaged in jungle rivalry of Charleston and dances further south. Rhythm runs away with rhythm and key shatters its sabre against key.

And yet 'cellos and fiddles lift their occasional syrupy cantilena as though Mme. Chaminade had lent the laboring Copland a gracile helping hand. A curious and puzzling performance, this concerto, but at the very least it is more ponderable stuff than the piano concerto perpetrated for personal uses by M. Stravinsky, and with respect to sheer quantity of sound, it makes that doughty Russian's "Sacre" sound like early Haydn or the first hesitant lispings of Johann Christian Bach. Last evening the concerto in its course drew fourth a little not unfriendly laughter. When it was over, the house responded with salvos of tumultuous applause.

It is worth remembering that less than thirty years ago the decorous and respectable composition of the Pere Franck was called in some quarters a veritable negation of music, and that indignant Bostonians walked out on it when the immaculate Gericke made so bold as to lead it at a concert of their sacrosanct orchestra.

The program yesterday was exact, of course, in marking the Copland concerto "first time in New York." The same legend would have applied with equal accuracy to M. Prokofieff's symphony. Each work was played superlatively well.

A concert rich in varied emotions and assorted thrills.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1927

Music

Boston Symphony Concert Introduces Two Unfamiliar Works—Rosenthal Writes

BACH and Cesar Franck, in the third Brandenburg Concerto and the D minor Symphony, respectively, were the real moderns on last night's Boston Symphony program—at least so far as living originality is concerned. Between these two works Prokofieff's Classic Symphony Op. 25 and Copland's Concerto for piano and orchestra (first time in New York) were performed, with the composer as piano soloist in the latter work. As Casella has sought inspiration in Scarlatti, and Strawinsky Pergolesi, so Prokofieff had in mind according to Borowski, quoted in Philip Hale's always illuminating program notes, the idea to "catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Olga Samaroff

Let us hope this claim was made for Prokofieff and not by him. For much as I admire Prokofieff in general, I must confess that nothing resembling a Mozartian afflatus exists in this little Classic Symphony, so far as I could discover. It rather brought to my mind the question whether these modern composers are in league to reconcile restive audiences to new idioms through proving how futile it is to try to continue writing in old ones. Mr. Copland's piano Concerto, of which Mr. Koussewitzky is the musical godfather, seemed to me singularly dry and dull. An endless development of uninteresting thematic material, salted with modern devices which a thorough course of ultra modern music administered by the various propaganda societies in New York effectually robs of any startling novelty.

Ornstein was writing piano music in which the omnipresent semi-tone figured as it did in last night's concerto in 1916. Gershwin has done much more interesting things with jazz elements in his Rhapsody in Blue and I failed to find any characteristic ideas, quality or element of instrumentation making the work in question important even from the point of view of originality. It had for me its amusing moments and its painful ones. It found a polite reception. Mr. Koussewitzky conducted the whole program with ardor and with a fine response from the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 - 1927

Boston Symphony

The 108 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their famous Russian leader, Sergei Koussevitzzky, will arrive by special train for the concert in the Capitol Theater Sunday at 3 o'clock. When the concert in Hartford is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board the train for return to Boston after a week's absence,

...chestra having ... annual appearances in Washington, Baltimore and Wilmington. The only other annual series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn is the series in Providence. When its auditorium was demolished last spring, the citizens of that city carried through a campaign, raising more than sufficient funds to buy out performances at the largest vaudeville theater, thus showing their appreciation and assuring the orchestra's return. Reservations should be placed at once for this prominent musical occasion. Telephone McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, 2-2251. Frank A. Sedgwick, management. Prices $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
FEB 4 - 1927

REALM C

By Richard

ONCE upon a time, the legend go... from the zoological bastille in ... studio, clapped simian paws on ...nd splashed over a panel with a badla... ognized this masterpiece instantly as ... erectus; but spirits more subtle affirme... himself in vigor of line and sweep of ... gorilla, though lacking Raphael's brai... more bulging.

Aaron Copland, a young composer of this city, laid hands on the tools of Bach and Beethoven, slashed about him with harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation, and fashioned a concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra, which had its first New York hearing yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At least one hearer, when the din grew unsupportable, sprang from his seat and fled into the foyer. Others of us, less courageous, bore it out to the end. To the present chronicler, the concerto seemed the most horrific and insulting perversion of music that ever affronted these inveterate ears. But there were to be found persons who exclaimed over its primitive vitality and robust urge.

The composer had at least the courage of his dissonances, for he officiated in person at the piano and belabored it from time to time with the insensitive and defiant pertinacity of a Hottentot thumping a gourd. The so-called American idiom was often employed, but with a violence totally at odds with the grace and delicacy affected by professional jazz virtuosi.

That such a work could be written, could win a performance from a leading orchestra and be heard with outward patience by a New York audience is the best possible evidence that historians a few centuries hence will dub our times as the Dark Ages of music, as an era of Goths and Vandals succeeding the Athenian epoch of Handel and Bach.

OF MUSIC

L. Stokes

...es—or should go—a gorilla escaped ... Rome, found its way into Raphael's ... the painter's brushes and pigments ...m of colors. Some connoisseurs rec... ...s the handicraft of pithecanthropus ...d that the ape had surpassed Raphael ...hue. This may have been so, for the ...n, possessed longer arms and thews ...

It was with Bach, by the way, that Mr. Koussevitzky began his program. The composition was the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major, for string orchestra. Other numbers were Prokofieff's Classic Symphony No. 25 and Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The Bostonian chieftain gave the Brandenburg concerto a rude and vigorous performance, during which he contrived to hound even such modest instruments as the violas into unmusical noises. The very aim of the Prokofieff symphony—"to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, he might put into his score"—withheld the conductor's hand from its full weight, so that this work proved the most charming and refined of the evening.

The Franck symphony may not be a creation of first rank, but it is of the sort a classic. Mr. Koussevitzky read the score as if it were written for a brass band. Again and again the trumpets and drums, which after all in an orchestra are subsidiary instruments, were incited to drown the principal strings. In both the first and third movements so much clamor was ...d to incidental passages that no ... left for the chief climaxes. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed ineb...

briated with the intoxication of his own tumultous clangors.

The Boston Orchestra, if left to its own devices, could play with excellent fine and delicate skill. This was proved in the second movement of the Franck symphony and in other passages which imposed a certain gentleness on the conductor. But it is at the mercy of a leader more obstreperous than John Philip Sousa.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New compositions by Prokofieff and Aaron Copland were played for the first time in New York at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, last night in Carnegie Hall. Prokofieff contributed to the program his "Classic Symphony," op. 25, and Aaron Copland was present to appear as soloist in the performance of his concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra. The third Brandenburg concerto of J. S. Bach opened the concert, and Franck's symphony brought it to an end.

There was a lusty, two-fisted performance of Bach's music. The performance of Prokofieff's "Symphony" in the "classic" manner would have unquestionably have delighted the composer. It was technically transparent as air; it was witty and spirited. These same words might be used as description of the character of Prokofieff's writing, which appears in a singularly innocent guise. Gone is the barbarity and outrage of the Scythian Suite or the brilliant ribaldry of the ballet "Chout" which Mr. Koussevitsky per formed earlier this season. In place of the bizarre and outré characteristics of these and other of Mr. Prokofieff's compositions we encounter music as light as a feather and as guiltless as the key of C major.

But hist! It seems that Mr. Prokofieff—according, at least, to Felix Browski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago orchestra—sought in this symphony to emulate Mozart, at least, in the words of the programatist, "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." It is a tall order. It would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. Mozart when he lived was more than once an ultra-modern; and the greatness of Mozart lies not at all in the fact that he used eighteenth century idioms known and employed by every Tom, Dick and Harry of a composer about him.

There is a quality in Mozart not to be captured or imitated by another man, or even by so ingenious and gifted a modern composer as Mr. Prokofieff. What have we actually in this specimen of a "classic symphony?" We have music written with extraordinary facility, esprit and technical finish, music that is melodious in a diatonic manner and engagingly humorous in its vein. That is a great deal, but it is not enough to be "the spirit of Mozart." Beside the representative Mozart symphony that of Mr. Prokofieff is a joke, if not precisely the joke that the composer intended. Its short movements are far more in the genre of a divertimento or suite than a symphony; they are amusing, delightfully unpretentious they have a certain airy mockery of the classic style which is infectious They just escape being music of the superficially popular kind and the ...ould take a position more convincin... ...d creditable to themselves if the ...uld kindly emerge from behind th... ...tue of Mozart.

Moderns ...

Serge Koussevitzky C... Copland at ...

By Pitts...

The program with which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra regaled a very large audience at Carnegie Hall last evening indisputably achieved variety. Bach began it. Prokofieff followed. Then came a concerto for piano and orchestra in a single movement (but what a singularity!) by Mr. Aaron Copland, of Brooklyn and sometimes of Paris, with the composer, as the cheery saying goes, at the piano. To soothe the savage breast of anybody who had been unduly wrought up by the youthful disclosures of Mr. Copland, the visitors administered in parting balm the D minor symphony of the Sainted Papa Franck. Seldom has any program provoked such resounding applause.

Bach—the modish creature!—contributed his third "Brandenburg" concerto for string orchestra, couched in the amiable key of G. The music itself, let us believe, as well as the incisive, rhythmic, scintillant performance won the first ovation of the evening, which Mr. Koussevitzky recognized with special ceremony by bidding his men stand up. After Bach Prokofieff!

This was no Prokofieff let loose among the Scythians, nor yet the multi-colored plucker of the oranges of love. It was Prokofieff endeavoring to "catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Those of us who have maintained all along that this young Russian, however he may choose to appear at times, has been always in his heart of hearts a classicist had our well earned night of triumph thanks to this "Classical" symphony.

It is a delightful little work, of pleasant themes and crisp and clever rhythms, ingenious in its development, sparkling in its instrumental dress, and the surpassing wit of each of the four movements is its perfect brevity. One finds here, to be sure, progressions, modulations, instrumental devices, a kind of complexity that are not of the eighteenth century. But remember, it is Mozart "if he were living now" that M. Prokofieff has set out to serve. And he has served him well.

The most recognizably Mozartean of the four movements are the initial allegro and the rollicking finale. A wistful Rimskyan cadence breathes from the larghetto, and the gavotte (which ... of a minuet) is appre...

SIC

Chotzinoff

scription of the genesis and contents of his latest work. We are informed that though it is played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section, the second a fast rhythmic one. Mr. Copland says a lot more about the themes and their manipulation in the usual obscure fashion of program notes, which mystifies more than it elucidates and which I refrain from quoting. One thing he carefully omits telling—the presence of a good deal of jazz in the concerto. Furthermore, it is jazz strongly reminiscent of George Gershwin's Concerto in F.

However, the resemblance is superficial. For Mr. Gershwin, who knows nothing about form, having had disreputable beginnings in Tin Pan Alley, seems a veritable Beethoven as regards musical form compared to Mr. Copland in his latest composition. Last night's concerto, which started in grandiose fashion with one of those themes which smells of Scriabine, suddenly

...hitched on to jazz. The jazz theme ... in fact, a pretty poor pick, as

MU...

By Samuel...

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Classic Symphony, Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Piano concerto (new).....Aaron Copland
(Composer at the piano)
Symphony in D Minor.....Cesar Franck

Another Jazz Concerto

Mr. Aaron Copland, one of the more serious members of the American branch of the modernist school of composition, was the hero of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Copland, whose "Music for the Theatre" has become, through frequent performances, tolerably familiar to local audiences, appeared on Mr. Koussevitzky's program in the double role of composer and performer, playing his latest opus, a "concerto" for pianoforte and orchestra. The concerto, finished in November, 1926, was written at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and calls for a large orchestra, with a few extra trappings like a tam-tam, Chinese drum, woodblock and xylophone.

Mr. Copland, as is the habit with modern composers, submits a de-

...ia Boston.

...nducts Prokofieff an... ...arnegie Hall.

...Sanborn.

...ciably less distinguished than its ... lows. Still, as a whole, this sinfonie... (it is no more than that) is most ...gratiating, and yesterday's audie... took it immediately and vociferously ... its heart.

Mr. Copland's piano concerto is va... different matter and nothing that is ... be judged with even an approach ... finality from a single unprepared he... ing. It opens with a tremendous ... chestral fracas—embracing an impos... dialogue of brasses and strings, throt... which growls a deep, lowering note ... of menace or warning. The still, sm... voice of the piano enters in a childi... infantile expostulation. There are s...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1927

Boston Symph Give Notab

By GRENA BENNETT.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were hosts to a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall last night. The New Englanders provided a programme notable for the variety of its fare. The single novelty on the list was a concerto for piano and orchestra by Aaron Copland, the solo part played by the composer.

Mr. Copland, a native of Brooklyn and still in the twenties, has composed many works in his few creative years. The concerto, which had its first local hearing last night, is an ambitious work, the scoring well done, the composer evidently having thoroughly studied the handling of a large orchestra. The themes have originality and their development is sufficiently individual to hold the attention of the auditor. His performance of the piano part was scholarly.

Brilliant Tone

The concert began with Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3. At each hearing of any of that group one wonders anew at the marvelous ingenuity of Bach, whose "busy" music resembles nothing so much as a remarkable tapestry with a multitude of designs. Every measure has its surprise, a new paraphrase or another sparkling theme born and presently grown to maturity. The concerto blazed and glowed with brilliant tone. Its interpretation was uplifting, and Mr. Koussevitsky was recalled several times after its performance.

There were two symphonies in the programme, Prokofieff's "Classic," which after the Bach number was tenuous and often commonplace, and Francks D minor symphony, the closing number.

But Mr. Copland surrounded it with all the machinery of sound and fury, and the most raucous modernistic fury at that. The composer-pianist smote his instrument at random; the orchestra, under the impassioned baton of Mr. Koussevitzky, heaved and shrieked and fumed and made anything but sweet moan until both pianist and conductor attained such a climax of absurdity that many in the audience giggled with delight. Mr. Copland was evidently seriously engaged in saying something of vital importance to himself, and played away frantically, aided and abetted by the orchestra, which made barnyard and stable noises in the intervals of proclaiming imposing Scriabinish fanfares. When it was all over, a man in back of me involuntarily exclaimed, "Thank God." All the same, the piece created the sensation expected of it and was generously applauded.

The Prokofieff Classic Symphony, which followed the G Major Brandenburg Concerto of Bach is an old morsel, having been played here by the now defunct Russian Symphony Orchestra. It is a rather pointless imitation of Mozart, whose brevity seemed to me its only merit. Mr. Felix Borowski the critic says of it: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." It is rather difficult to say just what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living now, but one can safely hazard that he would not have written a note of Mr. Prokofieff's Classic Symphony. Nevertheless, last night's audience loved it and applauded it frantically.

In the Bach Concerto and the Franck Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky had music worthier of his efforts. A large audience attended and listened to the whole of the concert in an extraordinarily appreciative mood.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 4 1927

Mr. Copland's concerto has some effective ideas. It also has vim and gusto, and its highly peppered treatment of phrases and rhythms in the manner of jazz music is exhilarating to hear. The opening phrases, heard in imitation, are, however, short-lived when the composer attempts to develop them, and the work is not organic. It progresses by fits and starts, impressing the listener anew with the talent of the composer and confirming his suspicions that Mr. Copland needs a firmer hold of principles of musical structure than he has before he will do his own ideas justice. But here is a temperament. Here is a young man who can surely not remain content with the praise of partisans or knowledge of his own artistic shortcomings. He has produced a concerto with something in it, more especially interesting instrumental sonorities and intensively treated rhythms. From its composer more can be expected—and better. Mr. Copland played the piano part with a composer's authority, and Mr. Koussevitsky aided and abetted him as a willing conspirator should, for it was at Mr. Koussevitsky's suggestion that Mr. Copland wrote this concerto.

The concluding performance of the Franck symphony was one of obvious sincerity, of many fine nuances and a half-rhapsodic manner that suited well the nature of the composition. Mr. Koussevitsky avoided exaggeration or merely theatrical effects. He maintained the unique and characteristic "color" of Franck, the organist and the mystic of Paris of the Third Empire. The orchestra uttered noble and tender thoughts in a spirit of devotion and reverence to the composer. The conductor proved his right to the individual treatment of certain details of the score, and his instrument displayed its fine sonority and its constantly increasing virtuosity. At the end of the concert there were many recalls for Mr. Koussevitsky.

New York ...
FEB 4 - 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New compositions by Prokofieff and Aaron Copland were played for the first time in New York at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, last night in Carnegie Hall. Prokofieff contributed to the program his "Classic Symphony," op. 25, and Aaron Copland was present to appear as soloist in the performance of his concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra. The third Brandenburg concerto of J. S. Bach opened the concert, and Franck's symphony brought it to an end.

There was a lusty, two-fisted performance of Bach's music. The performance of Prokofieff's "Symphony" in the "classic" manner would have unquestionably have delighted the composer. It was technically transparent as air; it was witty and spirited. These same words might be used as description of the character of Prokofieff's writing, which appears in a singularly innocent guise. Gone is the barbarity and outrage of the Scythian Suite or the brilliant ribaldry of the ballet "Chout" which Mr. Koussevitsky per formed earlier this season. In place of the bizarre and outré characteristics of these and other of Mr. Prokofieff's compositions we encounter music as light as a feather and as guiltless as the key of C major.

But hist! It seems that Mr. Prokofieff—according, at least, to Felix Browski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago orchestra—sought in this symphony to emulate Mozart, at least, in the words of the programatist, "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." It is a tall order. It would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. Mozart when he lived was more than once an ultra-modern; and the greatness of Mozart lies not at all in the fact that he used eighteenth century idioms known and employed by every Tom, Dick and Harry of a composer about him.

There is a quality in Mozart not to be captured or imitated by another man, or even by so ingenious and gifted a modern composer as Mr. Prokofieff. What have we actually in this specimen of a "classic symphony?" We have music written with extraordinary facility, esprit and technical finish, music that is melodious in a diatonic manner and engagingly humorous in its vein. That is a great deal, but it is not enough to be "the spirit of Mozart." Beside the representative Mozart symphony that of Mr. Prokofieff is a joke, if not precisely the joke that the composer intended. Its short movements are far more in the genre of a divertimento or suite than a symphony; they are amusing, delightfully unpretentious they have a certain airy mockery of the classic style which is infectious They just escape being music of the superficially popular kind and the would take a position more convincing and creditable to themselves if the would kindly emerge from behind the statue of Mozart.

Moderns T

Serge Koussevitzky C Copland at C

By Pitts

The program with which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra regaled a very large audience at Carnegie Hall last evening indisputably achieved variety. Bach began it. Prokofieff followed. Then came a concerto for piano and orchestra in a single movement (but what a singularity!) by Mr. Aaron Copland, of Brooklyn and sometimes of Paris, with the composer, as the cheery saying goes, at the piano. To soothe the savage breast of anybody who had been unduly wrought up by the youthful disclosures of Mr. Copland, the visitors administered in parting balm the D minor symphony of the Sainted Papa Franck. Seldom has any program provoked such resounding applause.

Bach—the modish creature!—contributed his third "Brandenburg" concerto for string orchestra, couched in the amiable key of G. The music itself, let us believe, as well as the incisive, rhythmic, scintillant performance won the first ovation of the evening, which Mr. Koussevitzky recognized with special ceremony by bidding his men stand up. After Bach Prokofieff!

This was no Prokofieff let loose among the Scythians, nor yet the multi-colored plucker of the oranges of love. It was Prokofieff enedeavoring to "catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Those of us who have maintained all along that this young Russian, however he may choose to appear at times, has been always in his heart of hearts a classicist had our well earned night of triumph thanks to this "Classical" symphony.

It is a delightful little work, of pleasant themes and crisp and clever rhythms, ingenious in its development, sparkling in its instrumental dress, and the surpassing wit of each of the four movements is its perfect brevity. One finds here, to be sure, progressions, modulations, instrumental devices, a kind of complexity that are not of the eighteenth century. But remember, it is Mozart "if he were living now" that M. Prokofieff has set out to serve. And he has served him well.

The most recognizably Mozartean of the four movements are the initial allegro and the rollicking finale. A wistful Rimskyan cadence breathes from the larghetto, and the gavotte (which takes the place of a minuet) is appre

MU

By Samuel

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Classic Symphony, Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Piano concerto (new).....Aaron Copland
(Composer at the piano)
Symphony in D Minor.....Cesar Franck

Another Jazz Concerto

Mr. Aaron Copland, one of the more serious members of the American branch of the modernist school of composition, was the hero of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Copland, whose "Music for the Theatre" has become, through frequent performances, tolerably familiar to local audiences, appeared on Mr. Koussevitzky's program in the double role of composer and performer, playing his latest opus, a "concerto" for pianoforte and orchestra. The concerto, finished in November, 1926, was written at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky and calls for a large orchestra, with a few extra trappings like a tam-tam, Chinese drum, woodblock and xylophone.

Mr. Copland, as is the habit with modern composers, submits a description of the genesis and contents of his latest work. We are informed that though it is played without interruption the concerto is really divided into two contrasted parts which are linked thematically. The first is a slow lyric section, the second a fast rhythmic one. Mr. Copland says a lot more about the themes and their manipulation in the usual obscure fashion of program notes, which mystifies more than it elucidates and which I refrain from quoting. One thing he carefully omits telling—the presence of a good deal of jazz in the concerto. Furthermore, it is jazz strongly reminiscent of George Gershwin's Concerto in F.

SIC

Chotzinoff

However, the resemblance is superficial. For Mr. Gershwin, who knows nothing about form, having had disreputable beginnings in Tin Pan Alley, seems a veritable Beethoven as regards musical form compared to Mr. Copland in his latest composition. Last night's concerto, which started in grandiose fashion with one of those themes which smells of Scriabine, suddenly hitched on to jaz... in fact, it

...a Boston.

...nducts Prokofieff an... Carnegie Hall.

Sanborn.

...ciably less distinguished than its f... lows. Still, as a whole, this sinfonic... (It is no more than that) is most ...gratiating, and yesterday's audie... took it immediately and vociferously ... its heart.

Mr. Copland's piano concerto is va... different matter and nothing that is ... be judged with even an approach ... finality from a single unprepared he... ing. It opens with a tremendous ... chestral fracas—embracing an impos... dialogue of brasses and strings, throu... which growls a deep, lowering note ... of menace or warning. The still, sm... voice of the piano enters in a childi... infantile expostulation. There are Ga...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1927

Music :

Boston Symphony Concert Introduces Two Unfamiliar Works—Rosenthal Writes

BACH and Cesar Franck, in the third Brandenburg Concerto and the D minor Symphony, respectively, were the real moderns on last night's Boston Symphony program—at least so far as living originality is concerned. Between these two works Prokofieff's Classic Symphony Op. 25 and Copland's Concerto for piano and orchestra (first time in New York) were performed, with the composer as piano soloist in the latter work. As Casella has sought inspiration in Scarlatti, and Strawinsky Pergolesi, so Prokofieff had in mind according to Borowski, quoted in M... Philip Hale's always illuminating pr... gram notes, the idea to "catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Olga Samaroff

Let us hope this claim was made for Prokofieff and not by him. For much as I admire Prokofieff in general, I must confess that nothing resembling a Mozartian afflatus exists in this little Classic Symphony, so far as I could discover. It rather brought to my mind the question whether these modern composers are in league to reconcile restive audiences to new idioms through proving how futile it is to try to continue writing in old ones. Mr. Copland's piano Concerto, of which Mr. Koussewitzky is the musical godfather, seemed to me singularly dry and dull. An endless development of uninteresting thematic material, salted with modern devices which a thorough course of ultra modern music administered by the various propaganda societies in New York effectually robs of any startling novelty.

Ornstein was writing piano music in which the omnipresent semi-tone figured as it did in last night's concerto in 1916. Gershwin has done much more interesting things with jazz elements in his Rhapsody in Blue and I failed to find any characteristic ideas, quality or element of instrumentation making the work in question important even from the point of view of originality. It had for me its amusing moments and its painful ones. It found a polite reception. Mr. Koussewitzky conducted the whole program with ardor and with a fine response from the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 4 - 1927

Boston Symphony

The 108 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their famous Russian leader, Sergei Koussevitzzky, will arrive by special train for the concert in the Capitol Theater Sunday at 3 o'clock. When the concert in Hartford is over, the personnel of the orchestra will board the train for return to Boston after a week's absence,

...chestra having ... its annual appearances in Washington, Baltimore and Wilmington. The only other annual series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, outside of Boston, New York and Brooklyn is the series in Providence. When its auditorium was demolished last spring, the citizens of that city carried through a campaign, raising more than sufficient funds to buy out performances at the largest vaudeville theater, thus showing their appreciation and assuring the orchestra's return. Reservations should be placed at once for this prominent musical occasion. Telephone McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, 2-2251. Frank A. Sedgwick, management. Prices $1.73, $2.30, $2.88, $3.45.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
FEB 4 - 1927

REALM C

By Richard

ONCE upon a time, the legend go... from the zoological bastille in ... studio, clapped simian paws on ...nd splashed over a panel with a badla... ognized this masterpiece instantly as ... erectus; but spirits more subtle affirme... himself in vigor of line and sweep of ... gorilla, though lacking Raphael's brai... more bulging.

Aaron Copland, a young composer of this city, laid hands on the tools of Bach and Beethoven, slashed about him with harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation, and fashioned a concerto in one movement for piano and orchestra, which had its first New York hearing yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall, under the auspices of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At least one hearer, when the din grew unsupportable, sprang from his seat and fled into the foyer. Others of us, less courageous, bore it out to the end. To the present chronicler, the concerto seemed the most horrific and insulting perversion of music that ever affronted these inveterate ears. But there were to be found persons who exclaimed over its primitive vitality and robust urge.

The composer had at least the courage of his dissonances, for he officiated in person at the piano and belabored it from time to time with the insensitive and defiant pertinacity of a Hottentot thumping a gourd. The so-called American idiom was often employed, but with a violence totally at odds with the grace and delicacy affected by professional jazz virtuosi.

That such a work could be written, could win a performance from a leading orchestra and be heard with outward patience by a New York audience is the best possible evidence that his-

...F MUSIC

...L. Stokes

...es—or should go—a gorilla escaped ... Rome, found its way into Raphael's ... the painter's brushes and pigments ... m of colors. Some connoisseurs rec... ...s the handicraft of pithecanthropus ...d that the ape had surpassed Raphael ...hue. This may have been so, for the ...in, possessed longer arms and thews

...torians a few centuries hence will dub our times as the Dark Ages of music, as an era of Goths and Vandals succeeding the Athenian epoch of Handel and Bach.

It was with Bach, by the way, that Mr. Koussevitzky began his program. The composition was the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major, for string orchestra. Other numbers were Prokofieff's Classic Symphony No. 25 and Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The Bostonian chieftain gave the Brandenburg concerto a rude and vigorous performance, during which he contrived to hound even such modest instruments as the violas into unmusical noises. The very aim of the Prokofieff symphony—"to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, he might put into his score"—withheld the conductor's hand from its full weight, so that this work proved the most charming and refined of the evening.

The Franck symphony may not be a creation of first rank, but it is of the sort a classic. Mr. Koussevitzky read the score as if it were written for a brass band. Again and again the trumpets and drums, which after all in an orchestra are subsidiary instruments, were incited to drown the principal strings. In both the first and third movements so much clamor was ...d to incidental passages that no ... were left for the chief climaxes. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed inebriated with the intoxication of his own tumultous clangors.

The Boston Orchestra, if left to its own devices, could play with excellent tone and delicate skill. This was proved in the second movement of the Franck symphony and in other passages which imposed a certain gentleness on the conductor. But it is at the mercy of a leader more obstreperous than John Philip Sousa.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting; Aaron Copland, pianist, assisting artist. Program: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, in G; Prokofieff, Classic Symphony; Copland, Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Franck, D minor Symphony. At Carnegie Hall last evening.

* * *

MUSIC of substance, rude and vital in its expression, has Aaron Copland written into his new Piano Concerto, performed for the first time in New York at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In tumult the piece begins, with cries flung fiercely upward by trumpet and trombone and horn fiercely dissonant, yet urgent and aspiring and resolving at length for a radiant moment upon a great E major chord. A superb introduction, as arresting as the apocryphal sunrise in the brazen first measures of Strauss' "Zarathustra." Mr. Copland has given us in the past no music of such intensity and conviction. All that he has written, it is true, has proven interesting; he has never fatigued or annoyed us; he has animated our ideas, opened for us fields of speculation and experiment, sometimes charmed, less often satisfied us, but never has he moved us. Now, with the Concerto, he becomes important in a new way, exhibiting a capacity for emotional utterance, occupying himself with the creation of drama in tone, heedless for a time of that tiresome cry, Music for Music's sake!

* * *

IN THIS Mr. Copland suddenly severs himself from other young musicians of the day and their established traditions, and he becomes, for us, the most important of young Americans concerned with the business of writing music. In the Concerto everything is old and everything is new. The evolutionary line once more taken up; gone are sinuous fiddlings with small orchestras, and all other contemporary gauches. Mr. Copland adopts melody; what is more, he adopts it for its inherent expressiveness. He writes with warmth, with force, with the consciousness of his people and environment molding his thought, creating his pattern and his means. He is not afraid to give offense either to the old or the new idea in his desire to find his way eagerly and conscientiously to the satisfaction of his artistic need. Mr. Copland has, we believe, reason to be easy on the scores of his Concerto.

* * *

IT DOES not matter severely that the momentous introduction is followed by a few footling measures that lack direction, or that the piano part is gracelessly imagined. The music recovers its impetus quickly, and in the second and faster section of the Concerto Mr. Copland treats us to a rhythmic and dynamic orgy of brutal and stunning force. If we must have symphonic jazz, then let Mr. Copland write it. There is biting irony and tragic eloquence in his treatment of our national music. Compare the Concerto with Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and you will see what the real thing is beside the ersatz article. Mr. Copland does not employ jazz to the end of achieving novelty or sensation, but to the end of vitalizing an emotional program not otherwise approachable. His symphonic jazz matters; you do not easily forget its bite and pressure.

* * *

MR. COPLAND played the piano part of his work with ample virtuosity, but with a hard and ugly quality of tone. The orchestral body, under Mr. Koussewitsky, performed its portion brilliantly. The program included a Brandenburg Concerto, of which Mr. Koussewitsky gave a vulgar interpretation; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony and the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Accomplish as Much as Anything

[Toledo Blade.]

Even if Congress can do nothing else for the farmer it might pass a resolution denouncing the corn borer in scathing phraseology.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 4 1927

Third Boston Sy

Prokofieff, Bach, Cop
Included in Progra

By W. J.

The Boston Symphony Orc evening in Carnegie Hall. T third Brandenburg concerto, phony," opus 25; Aaron Cop Franck's lone symphony. Mr in his own composition. Mr. duced in this town by the Ru back as 1918 and has since slu

It is called a classic symphony because it is in four movements and constructed generally on the classic last. The composer has enlightened us but little, but the scholarly and illuminating Felix Borowski has informed us that the musician's idea was to treat us to the sort of music Mozart might write were he living at this time.

It is a most tantalizing thought. What indeed would Mozart write if he were now living? Alas, it seems more to the point to ask how could Mozart be possible in this delirious age? Mr. Prokofieff's little symphony may not be the answer, but it is a gleeful and cheering bit of musical sportiveness and it will probably not sleep so long after last evening's performance as it did after that of Mr. Altschuler's defunct organization. The themes are short and graphic and the rhythms sharply drawn. The harmonies are juicy, but not acid, and the whole work radiates tunefulness and good humor. The gavotte, which is very short, delighted the audience which tried hard to induce Mr. Koussevitzky to repeat it. But the stern Cato of the baton would have no such trifling. The finale seemed to this hearer to be the most ingenious of the four movements. But there is no attempt anywhere at profundity. The classic symphony is just a delicious musical humoresque.

Mr. Copland, a writer well and favorably known to those who keep watch and ward in the musical towers of this town, made a piano concerto at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky. He began it in January of last year, labored on it in a Basque village through the summer and finished it in this city in November. The work is performed without pause, but has two movements, one slow and lyric and the other fast and rhythmic.

Mr. Copland's concerto dwells in the land of the future. It is music of tomorrow. It should have been revealed at one of the exciting entertainments of the International Composers Guild. There were moments when some of last evening's listeners were shaken with ribald laughter. This would not be the case at a Guild affair, where music of this futurist type is understood. Yet why was there any failure last night to realize that the use of jazz style in clarinet parts was intentional and that the jazz rhythms did not occur accidentally? Mr. Copland was doubtless endeavoring to continue in the field of the concerto the business of illustrating the pure American spirit, begun so felicitously by Mr. Carpenter in "Skyscrapers."

This is not the time to give a profound analysis of this new work. One must hear it more than once. But will one? Is this characteristic creation of the native breed of futurist music to be set aside to permit more vain repetitions of Beethoven? Mr. Copland must have put much hard work into it. He is entitled to another hearing. Those who laughed last evening may find themselves blushing with shame the next time because they did not rightly value this composition at the first hearing. The writer hereof dares not go further lest he betray the lamentable fact that he did not discover what the young composer was trying to do. That is why he wishes to hear the piece again. But will he?

The Bach music offered no such problems to the mind, but we have all had so many opportunities to consider Bach and be wise. There was also Cesar Franck. Some sceptical people are beginning to say that the Franck symphony is not as great as we thought it was when we first heard it. Maybe that is true. And maybe the Copland concerto is much greater than we thought it. But one thing can be pronounced certain, namely, that time alone will tell. With which venerable bromide the story ends.

HENDERSON.

mphony Concer
and Franck Wor
Hall estra gave its third concert las he program consisted of Bach's
Serge Prokofieff's "Classic Sym
land's piano concerto and Cesa
Copland executed the solo par
Prokofieff's symphony was pro
ssion Symphony Soci

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 5 - 1927

Boston Symphony

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston that week.

All the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great Mass which is seldom performed, on account of extreme difficulties. Quarters will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists.

Tickets for the Hartford concert tomorrow in Capitol Theater may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street until 10 o'clock this evening. Phone to Capitol Theater Box Office 2-0375 after 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
FEB5 -1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rare Opportunity to Hear Famous Orchestra at Hartford.

A rare opportunity is offered to hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow afternoon under the baton of one of the world's greatest conductors, Sergei Koussevitzky.

Lawrence Gilman in this week's New York Herald comments on the famous Eroica Symphony which will be performed at the concert in the Capitol theatre, Hartford.

Phone Capitol theatre box office, 2-0375, after 9 o'clock Sunday for reservations. Tickets may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street, until 9 o'clock this evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 5 - 1927

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE LAST CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its last concert of the season in the Albee theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the great Fifth Symphony in C-minor as the closing number. The soloist will be Miss Harriet Van Emden, soprano.

The rest of the program will include J. S. Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G-major, for string orchestra, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
Meriden
FEB 5 - 1927

Boston Symphony At Capitol Theater, Hartford, Sunday

A rare opportunity is offered to hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, Hartford, tomorrow afternoon under the baton of one of the world's greatest conductor's, Sergei Koussevitzky.

Lawrence Gilman in this week's New York Herald comments on the famous "Erocla" Symphony which will be performed at the concert in Capitol theater.

"Hearing the "Eroica" we wondered again over the mystery of the creative power in man — and thought what a mixed and heedless torrent it can be at times, offering us stones and dead limbs of trees, as well as clear, unsullied waters and measureless depths. The temporal extent of the "Eroica" is commensurate with its greatness of substance. The stream flows deeply, at times thunderously over its rock and precipices, terrible in its dark beauty and its violent grandeur; but it is never cluttered with dead matter nor does it flow shallowly through a dull and flattoned landscape. The "Eroica" is unfaded throughout its prodigious length, a thing to marvel at, with the detachment from period and manner that stamps the surpassing masterwork. Nothing in it sounds outworn. From the beginning to the end the music companions worthily the transcendent first movement. Listening to this titanic music, with its dark, unplumbable depths [illegible] we are reminded of Beethoven's lonely soul, tender, heroic and great!"

Tickets may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street until 9 o'clock this evening. Phone to Capitol Theater box office 2-0375 after 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 5 - 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Handel, Concerto Grosso in D minor; Prokofieff, Classic Symphony, Op. 25; Ravel, "La Valse"; Franck, Symphony in D minor. At the Academy of Music last evening.

* * *

WE WONDER, having heard Serge Prokofieff's Classic Symphony at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, why this music has not been played since the Russian Symphony, under the perspicacious Mr. Altschuler, first brought it before a metropolitan audience in 1918 or thereabouts. Prokofieff we know—largely through the good offices of Mr. Koussewitsky—as a composer of harmless stage trifles, program music of one sort or another, vapid and timidly "modern" excursions, that most frequently fail to come off, that lack authentic humor and novelty. We have not greatly admired this favorite Prokofieff of Mr. Koussewitsky's. He is a tiresome spellbinder, speaking a language picked from his betters, a bright young man (at that, we fear, no longer so young) who would serve us Rimsky with a sauce piquant, a second, a seventh, a ninth or two to sharpen the edges of casual diatonicism.

* * *

THE Classic Symphony is another story. It is a delightful score, full of graceful, delicate touches that balance its burlesque of Mozart. One realizes that Prokofieff is thumbing his nose at sobriety, that he is having a mild joke at the expense of nobody in particular, but one does not care. The music is acceptable without apology. Its lack of seriousness saves it from the stigma of charlatanism that attaches to so many of the "neo-classic" products of the contemporary school. Prokofieff has written it in D major, with traditional invasions of related tonalities. He has striven to suggest the character of 18th Century music and to retain at the same time his harmonic advantage. Mozart would never have contrived themes such as suffice Prokofieff for his Larghetto and his Gavotte, yet despite the anachronistic character of the intervals employed the music evokes for us the age of periwigs and elegance. It is not without its sentiment, this score, not without its suggestions of loveliness. It is at once ironic and serious in its feeling; it implies the theater, the opera bouffa; it is delicate and witty. Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra gave of it a splendid performance.

* * *

LESS satisfactory was the playing of the Haendel Concerto. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Koussewitsky permits his string band to produce at times so offensive a tone. Perhaps his demands for force and precision create the necessity for this unlovely, metallic sharpness that mars occasionally the sonority of a string piece. In Ravel's "La Valse" both conductor and orchestra achieved the summit of virtuosity. The music itself has worn a bit since we first heard it some years ago. Its irony seems less impressive, its power appears to be a matter of mere orchestral facility. Of the Franck Symphony Mr. Koussewitsky gave a hard-boiled interpretation. He treated it much as he is given to treating Wagner—in a [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
FEB 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

M. Serge Koussevitsky served up a varied musical fare last night at the Academy of Music, in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this borough for the third time this eventful season. Chief interest naturally attached to the "Classical Symphony" of the conductor's countryman, Prokofieff, which was played last night for the first time in Brooklyn.

The "Classical Symphony" is described as an attempt by the composer to put into the music the spirit of Mozart—a Mozart [illegible] be better to forget this anachronism, and regard the symphony rather merely as a charming, dilletante, refreshing affair, for it was indeed a spindling Mozart that Prokofieff put into his composition, if he succeeded in putting him in it at all. Far more dignified, and startlingly different from most of Prowofieff's work, the "Classical Symphony" is bereft of clamor and dissonance, but instead blows a light fantastic bubble, cheerful in its clarity, and pleasantly amusing in its musicianly daintiness.

The symphony is in four short movements, elaborating in a careless, sportive way a simple harmonious melody in triplets, by which, no doubt, the composer sought to imitate the spirit of the gladsome Mozart. The third movement is a joyous gavotte, best expressive of the tuneful cheer with which the ingenious composer set about his work.

Ravel's deeply philosophic choregraphic poem, "The Waltz," followed. In it the composer strove to set to harmony the enigmatic course of human life, and to do it he chose a ballroom of the Second Empire, sketching the spirit of the dance, first clouded in filmy mist, then progressing to its climax, and ending in a transport of dissonance meant to exemplify the unsolvable enigma of destiny. The composition provided M. Koussevitsky with an opportunity to display his splendidly analytical touch and the magnificent story-telling qualities of his baton.

Cesar Franck's voluptuous Symphony in D Minor was played with a charming sincerity, the orchestra responding to M. Koussevitsky with exquisite nuances and reverent respect to the peculiar characteristiics of the composer. The symphony, calling in great part upon the woodwinds and brass, showed the Boston Orchestra in all its magnificent, and ever-increasing, tonal opulence. The Bach Concerto Grosso in B Minor for strings, was played with the scholarly fidelity which has come to be expected of M. Koussevitsky and his organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
FEB 6 - 1927

With the Boston Symphony, Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, will play for the first time in New York a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello dedicated to her by Manuel de Falla. The work was first performed on November 5 last in Barcelona with Mme. Landowska as soloist and Pablo Casals conducting. Of the concerto, Mme. Landowska writes:

"The story of De Falla's concerto is very interesting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend De Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his 'Retablo,' a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being, of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument. He became more and more interested, and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1927

Beethoven Festival

Boston Will Commemorate the Centenary in March

Boston will hold an intensive commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death (March 26) with a centenary festival during that week, March 22 to 29, in Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play all nine of the symphonies, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose director is Dr. Archibald T. Davison, singing the chorus in the Ninth Symphony. The same orchestral and choral forces will perform the "Missa Solemnis" in D. The London and Lenox String Quartets will play Beethoven's quartets. Other artists taking part in the festival include Walter Gieseking, pianist; Florence Austral and Jeannette Vreeland, sopranos; Jeanne Gordon and Nevada Van der Veer, contraltos; Tudor Davies and Charles Stratton, tenors, and Arthur Middleton and Fred Patton, barytones.

Ernest Newman, the noted English critic and writer on musical subjects, who was guest critic of "The New York Evening Post" in 1924-'25, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony's trustees to come to America in order to pay a verbal tribute, as a part of the festival, to Beethoven's genius.

A large bronze statue of Beethoven was placed prominently before the organ in the Boston Symphony's original home, Music Hall, and the orchestra played all the Beethoven symphonies in its first season, 1881-'82. When Symphony Hall was built for the orchestra, in 1900, the name of Beethoven was inscribed on the cartouche surmounting the proscenium arch, and the hall was inaugurated with a performance of the "Missa Solemnis."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting; Aaron Copland, pianist, assisting artist. Program: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, in G; Prokofieff, Classic Symphony; Copland, Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Franck, D minor Symphony. At Carnegie Hall last evening.

* * *

MUSIC of substance, rude and vital in its expression, has Aaron Copland written into his new Piano Concerto, performed for the first time in New York at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In tumult the piece begins, with cries flung fiercely upward by trumpet and trombone and horn, fuelly dissonant, yet urgent and aspiring and resolving at length for a radiant moment upon a great E major chord. A superb introduction, as arresting as the apocryphal sunrise in the brazen first measures of Strauss' "Zarathustra." Mr. Copland has given us in the past no music of such intensity and conviction. All that he has written, it is true, has proven interesting: he has never fatigued or annoyed us; he has animated our ideas, opened for us fields of speculation and experiment, sometimes charmed, less often satisfied us, but never has he moved us. Now, with the Concerto, he becomes important in a new way, exhibiting a capacity for emotional utterance, occupying himself with the creation of drama in tone, heedless for a time of that tiresome cry, Music for Music's sake!

* * *

IN THIS Mr. Copland suddenly severs himself from other young musicians of the day and their established traditions, and he becomes, for us, the most important of young Americans concerned with the business of writing music. In the Concerto everything is old and everything is new. The evolutionary line is once more taken up; gone are tuous fiddlings with small orchestras, and all other contemporary catches. Mr. Copland adopts melody; what is more, he adopts it for its inherent expressiveness. He writes with warmth, with force, with the consciousness of his people and environment molding his thought, creating his pattern and his means. He is not afraid to give offense either to the old or the new idea in his desire to find his way eagerly and conscientiously to the satisfaction of his artistic need. Mr. Copland has, we believe, reason to be easy on the score of his Concerto.

* * *

IT DOES not matter severely that the momentous introduction is followed by a few footling measures that lack direction, or that the piano part is gracelessly imagined. The music recovers its impetus quickly, and in the second and faster section of the Concerto Mr. Copland treats us to a rhythmic and dynamic orgy of brutal and stunning force. If we must have symphonic jazz, then let Mr. Copland write it. There is biting irony and tragic eloquence in his treatment of our national music. Compare the Concerto with Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and you will see what the real thing is beside the ersatz article. Mr. Copland does not employ jazz to the end of achieving novelty or sensation, but to the end of vitalizing an emotional program not otherwise approachable. His symphonic jazz matters; you do not easily forget its bite and pressure.

* * *

MR. COPLAND played the piano part of his work with ample virtuosity, but with a hard and ugly quality of tone. The orchestral body, under Mr. Koussewitsky, performed its portion brilliantly. The program included a Brandenburg Concerto, of which Mr. Koussewitsky gave a vulgar interpretation; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony and the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Accomplish as Much as Anything

[Toledo Blade.]

Even if Congress can do nothing else for the farmer it might pass a resolution denouncing the corn borer in scathing phraseology.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 4 1927

Third Boston Sy

Prokofieff, Bach, Cop Included in Progra

By W. J.

The Boston Symphony Orc evening in Carnegie Hall. T third Brandenburg concerto, phony," opus 25; Aaron Cop Franck's lone symphony. Mr in his own composition. Mr. duced in this town by the Ru back as 1918 and has since slu

It is called a classic symphony because it is in four movements and constructed generally on the classic last. The composer has enlightened us but little, but the scholarly and illuminating Felix Borowski has informed us that the musician's idea was to treat us to the sort of music Mozart might write were he living at this time.

It is a most tantalizing thought. What indeed would Mozart write if he were now living? Alas, it seems more to the point to ask how could Mozart be possible in this delirious age? Mr. Prokofieff's little symphony may not be the answer, but it is a gleeful and cheering bit of musical sportiveness and it will probably not sleep so long after last evening's performance as it did after that of Mr. Altschuler's defunct organization. The themes are short and graphic and the rhythms sharply drawn. The harmonies are juicy, but not acid, and the whole work radiates tunefulness and good humor. The gavotte, which is very short, delighted the audience which tried hard to induce Mr. Koussevitzky to repeat it. But the stern Cato of the baton would have no such trifling. The finale seemed to this hearer to be the most ingenious of the four movements. But there is no attempt anywhere at profundity. The classic symphony is just a delicious musical humoresque.

Mr. Copland, a writer well and favorably known to those who keep watch and ward in the musical towers of this town, made a piano concerto at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky. He began it in January of last year, labored on it in a Basque village through the summer and finished it in this city in November. The work is performed without pause, but has two movements, one slow and lyric and the other fast and rhythmic.

Mr. Copland's concerto dwells in the land of the future. It is music of tomorrow. It should have been revealed at one of the exciting entertainments of the International Composers Guild. There were moments when some of last evening's listeners were shaken with ribald laughter. This would not be the case at a Guild affair, where music of this futurist type is understood. Yet why was there any failure last night to realize that the use of jazz style in clarinet parts was intentional and that the jazz rhythms did not occur accidentally? Mr. Copland was doubtless endeavoring to continue in the field of the concerto the business of illustrating the pure American spirit, begun so felicitously by Mr. Carpenter in "Skyscrapers."

This is not the time to give a profound analysis of this new work. One must hear it more than once. But will one? Is this characteristic creation of the native breed of futurist music to be set aside to permit more vain repetitions of Beethoven? Mr. Copland must have put much hard work into it. He is entitled to another hearing. Those who laughed last evening may find themselves blushing with shame the next time because they did not rightly value this composition at the first hearing. The writer hereof dares not go further lest he betray the lamentable fact that he did not discover what the young composer was trying to do. That is why he wishes to hear the piece again. But will he?

The Bach music offered no such problems to the mind, but we have all had so many opportunities to consider Bach and be wise. There was also Cesar Franck. Some sceptical people are beginning to say that the Franck symphony is not as great as we thought it was when we first heard it. Maybe that is true. And maybe the Copland concerto is much greater than we thought it. But one thing can be pronounced certain, namely, that time alone will tell. With which venerable bromide the story ends.

HENDERSON.

mphony Concer

land and Franck Wor

Co[illegible] Hall

estra gave its third concert las
he program consisted of Bach's
Serge Prokofieff's "Classic Symland's piano concerto and Cesa
Copland executed the solo par
Prokofieff's symphony was prossian Symphony Soci[illegible] as far

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 5 - 1927

Boston Symphony

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston that week.

All the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great Mass which is seldom performed, on account of extreme difficulties. Quarters will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists.

Tickets for the Hartford concert tomorrow in Capitol Theater may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street until 10 o'clock this evening. Phone to Capitol Theater Box Office 2-0375 after 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
FEB5 -1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rare Opportunity to Hear Famous Orchestra at Hartford.

A rare opportunity is offered t hear the famous Boston Symphon orchestra tomorrow afternoon unde the baton of one of the world's greatest conductors, Sergei Koussevitzky.

Lawrence Gilman in this week's New York Herald comments on the famous Eroica Symphony which will be performed at the concert in the Capitol theatre, Hartford.

Phone Capitol theatre box office, 2-0375. after 9 o'clock Sunday for reservations. Tickets may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street, until 9 o'clock this evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 5 - 1927

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE LAST CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its last concert of the season in the Albee theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the great Fifth Symphony in C-minor as the closing number. The soloist will be Miss Harriet Van Emden, soprano.

The rest of the program will include J. S. Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G-major, for string orchestra, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RECORD

Boston Symphony At Capitol Theater, Hartford, Sunday

A rare opportunity is offered to hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, Hartford, tomorrow afternoon under the baton of one of the world's greatest conductor's, Sergei Koussevitzky.

Lawrence Gilman in this week's New York Herald comments on the famous "Erocia" Symphony which will be performed at the concert in Capitol theater.

"Hearing the "Eroica" we wondered again over the mystery of the creative power in man — and thought what a mixed and heedless torrent it can be at times, offering us stones and dead limbs of trees, as well as clear, unsullied waters and measureless depths. The temporal extent of the "Eroica" is commensurate with its greatness of substance. The stream flows deeply, at times thunderously over its rock and precipices, terrible in its dark beauty and its violent grandeur; but it is never cluttered with dead matter nor does it flow shallowly through a dull and flattoned landscape. The "Eroica" is unfaded throughout its prodigious length, a thing to marvel at, with the detachment from period and manner that stamps the surpassing masterwork. Nothing in it sounds outworn. From the beginning to the end the music companions worthily the transcendent first movement. Listening to this titanic music, with its dark, unplumable depths and its sweeping exhilaration, we are reminded of Beethoven, a lonely soul, tender, heroic and great!"

Tickets may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street until 9 o'clock this evening. Phone to Capitol Theater box office 2-0375 after 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 5 - 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: [illegible]del, Concerto Grosso in D minor; Prokofieff, Classic Symphony, Op. 25; Ravel, "La Valse"; Franck, Symphony in D minor. At the Academy of Music last evening.

* * *

WE WONDER, having heard Serge Prokofieff's Classic Symphony at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, why this music has not been played since the Russian Symphony, under the perspicacious Mr. Altschuler, first brought it before a metropolitan audience in 1918 or thereabouts. Prokofieff we know—largely through the good offices of Mr. Koussewitsky—as a composer of harmless stage trifles, program music of one sort or another, vapid and timidly "modern" excursions, that most frequently fail to come off, that lack authentic humor and novelty. We have not greatly admired this favorite Prokofieff of Mr. Koussewitsky's. He is a tiresome spellbinder, speaking a language picked from his betters, a bright young man (at that, we fear, no longer so young) who would serve us Rimsky with a sauce piquant, a second, a seventh, a ninth or two to sharpen the edges of casual diatonicism.

* * *

THE Classic Symphony is another story. It is a delightful score, full of graceful, delicate touches that balance its burlesque of Mozart. One realizes that Prokofieff is thumbing his nose at sobriety, that he is having a mild joke at the expense of nobody in particular, but one does not care. The music is acceptable without apology. Its lack of seriousness saves it from the stigma of charlatanism that attaches to so many of the "neo-classic" products of the contemporary school. Prokofieff has written it in D major, with traditional invasions of related tonalities. He has striven to suggest the character of 18th Century music and to retain at the same time his harmonic advantage. Mozart would never have contrived themes such as suffice Prokofieff for his Larghetto and his Gavotte, yet despite the anachronistic character of the intervals employed the music evokes for us the age of periwigs and elegance. It is not without its sentiment, this score, not without its suggestions of loveliness. It is at once ironic and serious in its feeling; it implies the theater, the opera bouffa; it is delicate and witty. Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra gave of it a splendid performance.

* * *

LESS satisfactory was the playing of the Haendel Concerto. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Koussewitsky permits his string band to produce at times so offensive a tone. Perhaps his demands for force and precision create the necessity for this unlovely, metallic sharpness that mars occasionally the sonority of a string piece. In Ravel's "La Valse" both conductor and orchestra achieved the summit of virtuosity. The music itself has worn a bit since we first heard it some years ago. Its irony seems less impressive, its power appears to be a matter of mere orchestral facility. Of the Franck Symphony Mr. Koussewitsky gave a hard-boiled interpretation. He treated it much as he is given to treating Wagner—in a [illegible] manner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
FEB 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

M. Serge Koussevitsky served up a varied musical fare last night at the Academy of Music, in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this borough for the third time this eventful season. Chief interest naturally attached to the "Classical Symphony" of the conductor's countryman, Prokofieff, which was played last night for the first time in Brooklyn.

The "Classical Symphony" is described as an attempt by the composer to put into the music the spirit of Mozart as Mozart might compose [illegible] be better to forget this anachronism, and regard the symphony rather merely as a charming, dilletante, refreshing affair, for it was indeed a spindling Mozart that Prokofieff put into his composition, if he succeeded in putting him in it at all. Far more dignified, and startlingly different from most of Prowofieff's work, the "Classical Symphony" is bereft of clamor and dissonance, but instead blows a light fantastic bubble, cheerful in its clarity, and pleasantly amusing in its musicianly daintiness.

The symphony is in four short movements, elaborating in a careless, sportive way a simple harmonious melody in triplets, by which, no doubt, the composer sought to imitate the spirit of the gladsome Mozart. The third movement is a joyous gavotte, best expressive of the tuneful cheer with which the ingenious composer set about his work.

Ravel's deeply philosophic choregraphic poem, "The Waltz," followed. In it the composer strove to set to harmony the enigmatic course of human life, and to do it he chose a ballroom of the Second Empire, sketching the spirit of the dance, first clouded in filmy mist, then progressing to its climax, and ending in a transport of dissonance meant to exemplify the unsolvable enigma of destiny. The composition provided M. Koussevitsky with an opportunity to display his splendidly analytical touch and the magnificent story-telling qualities of his baton.

Cesar Franck's voluptuous Symphony in D Minor was played with a charming sincerity, the orchestra responding to M. Koussevitsky with exquisite nuances and reverent respect to the peculiar characteristics of the composer. The symphony, calling in great part upon the woodwinds and brass, showed the Boston Orchestra in all its magnificent, and ever-increasing, tonal opulence. The Bach Concerto Grosso in B Minor for strings, was played with the scholarly fidelity which has come to be expected of M. Koussevitsky and his organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
FEB 6 [illegible]

With the Boston Symphony, Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, will play for the first time in New York a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello dedicated to her by Manuel de Falla. The work was first performed on November 5 last in Barcelona with Mme. Landowska as soloist and Pablo Casals conducting. Of the concerto, Mme. Landowska writes:

"The story of De Falla's concerto is very interesting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend De Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his 'Retablo,' a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being, of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument. He became more and more interested and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto for [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 6 [illegible]

Beethoven Festival

Boston Will Commemorate the Centenary in March

Boston will hold an intensive commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death (March 26) with a centenary festival during that week, March 22 to 29, in Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play all nine of the symphonies, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose director is Dr. Archibald T. Davison, singing the chorus in the Ninth Symphony. The same orchestral and choral forces will perform the "Missa Solemnis" in D. The London and Lenox String Quartets will play Beethoven's quartets. Other artists taking part in the festival include Walter Gieseking, pianist; Florence Austral and Jeannette Vreeland, sopranos; Jeanne Gornton and Nevada Van der Veer, contraltos; Tudor Davies and Charles Stratton, tenors, and Arthur Middleton and Fred Patton, barytones.

Ernest Newman, the noted English critic and writer on musical subjects, who was guest critic of "The New York Evening Post" in 1924-'25, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony's trustees to come to America in order to pay a verbal tribute, as a part of the festival, to Beethoven's genius.

A large bronze statue of Beethoven was placed prominently before the organ in the Boston Symphony's original home, Music Hall, and the orchestra played all the Beethoven symphonies in its first season, 1881-'82. When Symphony Hall was built for the orchestra, in 1900, the name of Beethoven was inscribed on the cartouche surmounting the proscenium arch, and the hall was inaugurated with a performance of the "Missa Solemnis."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 4 - 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting; Aaron Copland, pianist, assisting artist. Program: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, in G; Prokofieff, Classic Symphony; Copland, Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Franck, D minor Symphony. At Carnegie Hall last evening.

* * *

MUSIC of substance, rude and vital in its expression, has Aaron Copland written into his new Piano Concerto, performed for the first time in New York at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In tumult the piece begins, with cries flung fiercely upward by trumpet and trombone and horn fluelly dissonant, yet urgent and aspiring and resolving at length for a radiant moment upon a great E major chord. A superb introduction as arresting as the apocryphal sunrise in the brazen first measures of Strauss' "Zarathustra." Mr. Copland has given us in the past no music of such intensity and conviction. All that he has written, it is true, has proven interesting: he has never fatigued or annoyed us; he has animated our ideas, opened for us fields of speculation and experiment, sometimes charmed, less often satisfied us, but never has he moved us. Now, with the Concerto, he becomes important in a new way, exhibiting a capacity for emotional utterance, occupying himself with the creation of drama in tone, heedless for a time of that tiresome cry, Music for Music's sake!

* * *

IN THIS Mr. Copland suddenly severs himself from other young musicians of the day and their established traditions, and he becomes, for us, the most important of young Americans concerned with the business of writing music. In the Concerto everything is old and everything is new. The evolutionary line once more taken up; gone are vacuous fiddlings with small orchestras, and all other contemporary niches. Mr. Copland adopts melody; what is more, he adopts it for its inherent expressiveness. He writes with warmth, with force, with the consciousness of his people and environment molding his thought, creating his pattern and his means. He is not afraid to give offense either to the old or the new idea in his desire to find his way eagerly and conscientiously to the satisfaction of his artistic need. Mr. Copland has, we believe, reason to be easy on the score of his Concerto.

* * *

IT DOES not matter severely that the momentous introduction is followed by a few footling measures that lack direction, or that the piano part is gracelessly imagined. The music recovers its impetus quickly, and in the second and faster section of the Concerto Mr. Copland treats us to a rhythmic and dynamic orgy of brutal and stunning force. If we must have symphonic jazz, then let Mr. Copland write it. There is biting irony and tragic eloquence in his treatment of our national music. Compare the Concerto with Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and you will see what the real thing is beside the ersatz article. Mr. Copland does not employ jazz to the end of achieving novelty or sensation, but to the end of vitalizing an emotional program not otherwise approachable. His symphonic jazz matters; you do not easily forget its bite and pressure.

* * *

MR. COPLAND played the piano part of his work with ample virtuosity, but with a hard and ugly quality of tone. The orchestral body, under Mr. Koussewitsky, performed its portion brilliantly. The program included a Brandenburg Concerto, of which Mr. Koussewitsky gave a vulgar interpretation; Prokofieff's Classic Symphony and the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Accomplish as Much as Anything

[Toledo Blade.]

Even if Congress can do nothing else for the farmer it might pass a resolution denouncing the corn borer in scathing phraseology.

mphony Concer

land and Franck Wor

Hall

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 4 1927

Third Boston Sy

Prokofieff, Bach, Cop Included in Progra

By W. J.

The Boston Symphony Orc evening in Carnegie Hall. T third Brandenburg concerto, phony," opus 25; Aaron Cop Franck's lone symphony. Mr in his own composition. Mr. duced in this town by the Ru back as 1918 and has since slu

It is called a classic symphony because it is in four movements and constructed generally on the classic last. The composer has enlightened us but little, but the scholarly and illuminating Felix Borowski has informed us that the musician's idea was to treat us to the sort of music Mozart might write were he living at this time.

It is a most tantalizing thought. What indeed would Mozart write if he were now living? Alas, it seems more to the point to ask how could Mozart be possible in this delirious age? Mr. Prokofieff's little symphony may not be the answer, but it is a gleeful and cheering bit of musical sportiveness and it will probably not sleep so long after last evening's performance as it did after that of Mr. Altschuler's defunct organization. The themes are short and graphic and the rhythms sharply drawn. The harmonies are juicy, but not acid, and the whole work radiates tunefulness and good humor. The gavotte, which is very short, delighted the audience which tried hard to induce Mr. Koussevitzky to repeat it. But the stern Cato of the baton would have no such trifling. The finale seemed to this hearer to be the most ingenious of the four movements. But there is no attempt anywhere at profundity. The classic symphony is just a delicious musical humoresque.

Mr. Copland, a writer well and favorably known to those who keep watch and ward in the musical towers of this town, made a piano concerto at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky. He began it in January of last year, labored on it in a Basque village through the summer and finished it in this city in November. The work is performed without pause, but has two movements, one slow and lyric and the other fast and rhythmic.

Mr. Copland's concerto dwells in the land of the future. It is music of tomorrow. It should have been revealed at one of the exciting entertainments of the International Composers Guild. There were moments when some of last evening's listeners were shaken with ribald laughter. This would not be the case at a Guild affair, where music of this futurist type is understood. Yet why was there any failure last night to realize that the use of jazz style in clarinet parts was intentional and that the jazz rhythms did not occur accidentally? Mr. Copland was doubtless endeavoring to continue in the field of the concerto the business of illustrating the pure American spirit, begun so felicitously by Mr. Carpenter in "Skyscrapers."

This is not the time to give a profound analysis of this new work. One must hear it more than once. But will one? Is this characteristic creation of the native breed of futurist music to be set aside to permit more vain repetitions of Beethoven? Mr. Copland must have put much hard work into it. He is entitled to another hearing. Those who laughed last evening may find themselves blushing with shame the next time because they did not rightly value this composition at the first hearing. The writer hereof dares not go further lest he betray the lamentable fact that he did not discover what the young composer was trying to do. That is why he wishes to hear the piece again. But will he?

The Bach music offered no such problems to the mind, but we have all had so many opportunities to consider Bach and be wise. There was also Cesar Franck. Some sceptical people are beginning to say that the Franck symphony is not as great as we thought it was when we first heard it. Maybe that is true. And maybe the Copland concerto is much greater than we thought it. But one thing can be pronounced certain, namely, that time alone will tell. With which venerable bromide the story ends.

HENDERSON.

estra gave its third concert las he program consisted of Bach's
Serge Prokofieff's "Classic Symland's piano concerto and Cesar
Copland executed the solo par
Prokofieff's symphony was pro-
ssian Symphony Soc as fa

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 5 - 1927

Boston Symphony

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston that week.

All the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sergei Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great Mass, which is seldom performed, on account of extreme difficulties. Quarters will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists.

Tickets for the Hartford concert tomorrow in Capitol Theater may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street until 10 o'clock this evening. Phone to Capitol Theater Box Office 2-0375 after 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
FEB 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rare Opportunity to Hear Famous Orchestra at Hartford.

A rare opportunity is offered to hear the famous Boston Symphon orchestra tomorrow afternoon unde the baton of one of the world's greatest conductors, Sergei Koussevitzky.

Lawrence Gilman in this week's New York Herald comments on the famous Eroica Symphony which will be performed at the concert in the Capitol theatre, Hartford.

Phone Capitol theatre box office, 2-0375, after 9 o'clock Sunday for reservations. Tickets may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street, until 9 o'clock this evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 5 - 1927

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO GIVE LAST CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its last concert of the season in the Alice theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the great Fifth Symphony in C-minor as the closing number. The soloist will be Miss Harriet Van Emden, soprano.

The rest of the program will include J. S. Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G-major, for string orchestra, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RECORD

Boston Symphony At Capitol Theater, Hartford, Sunday

A rare opportunity is offered to hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, Hartford, tomorrow afternoon under the baton of one of the world's greatest conductor's, Sergei Koussevitzky.

Lawrence Gilman in this week's New York Herald comments on the famous "Erocia" Symphony which will be performed at the concert in Capitol theater.

"Hearing the "Eroica" we wondered again over the mystery of the creative power in man — and thought what a mixed and heedless torrent it can be at times, offering us stones and dead limbs of trees, as well as clear, unsullied waters and measureless depths. The temporal extent of the "Eroica" is commensurate with its greatness of substance. The stream flows deeply, at times thunderously over its rock and precipices, terrible in its dark beauty and its violent grandeur; but it is never cluttered with dead matter nor does it flow shallowly through a dull and flattoned landscape. The "Eroica" is unfaded throughout its prodigious length, a thing to marvel at, with the detachment from period and manner that stamps the surpassing masterwork. Nothing in it sounds outworn. From the beginning to the end the music companions worthily the transcendent first movement. Listening to this titanic music, with its dark, unplumable depths and its meaning, exulted we are reminded of Beethoven a lonely soul, tender, heroic and great!"

Tickets may be procured at McCoy's, 89 Asylum street until 9 o'clock this evening. Phone to Capitol Theater box office 2-0375 after 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 5 - 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Handel, Concerto Grosso in D minor; Prokofieff, Classic Symphony, Op. 25; Ravel, "La Valse"; Franck, Symphony in D minor. At the Academy of Music last evening.

* * *

WE WONDER, having heard Serge Prokofieff's Classic Symphony at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, why this music has not been played since the Russian Symphony, under the perspicacious Mr. Altschuler, first brought it before a metropolitan audience in 1918 or thereabouts. Prokofieff we know—largely through the good offices of Mr. Koussewitsky—as a composer of harmless stage trifles, program music of one sort or another, vapid and timidly "modern" excursions, that most frequently fail to come off, that lack authentic humor and novelty. We have not greatly admired this favorite Prokofieff of Mr. Koussewitsky's. He is a tiresome spellbinder, speaking a language picked from his betters, a bright young man (at that, we fear, no longer so young) who would serve us Rimsky with a sauce piquant, a second, a seventh, a ninth or two to sharpen the edges of casual diatonicism.

* * *

THE Classic Symphony is another story. It is a delightful score, full of graceful, delicate touches that balance its burlesque of Mozart. One realizes that Prokofieff is thumbing his nose at sobriety, that he is having a mild joke at the expense of nobody in particular, but one does not care. The music is acceptable without apology. Its lack of seriousness saves it from the stigma of charlatanism that attaches to so many of the "neo-classic" products of the contemporary school. Prokofieff has written it in D major, with traditional invasions of related tonalities. He has striven to suggest the character of 18th Century music and to retain at the same time his harmonic advantage. Mozart would never have contrived themes such as suffice Prokofieff for his Larghetto and his Gavotte, yet despite the anachronistic character of the intervals employed the music evokes for us the age of periwigs and elegance. It is not without its sentiment, this score, not without its suggestions of loveliness. It is at once ironic and serious in its feeling; it implies the theater, the opera bouffa; it is delicate and witty. Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra gave of it a splendid performance.

* * *

LESS satisfactory was the playing of the Haendel Concerto. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Koussewitsky permits his string band to produce at times so offensive a tone. Perhaps his demands for force and precision create the necessity for this unlovely, metallic sharpness that mars occasionally the sonority of a string piece. In Ravel's "La Valse" both conductor and orchestra achieved the summit of virtuosity. The music itself has worn a bit since we first heard it some years ago. Its irony seems less impressive, its power appears to be a matter of mere orchestral facility. Of the Franck Symphony Mr. Koussewitsky gave a hard-boiled interpretation. He treated it much as he is given to treating Wagner—in a coarse and melodramatic manner. Koussewitsky is most at home

BRO
FEB 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

M. Serge Koussevitsky served up a varied musical fare last night at the Academy of Music, in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this borough for the third time this eventful season. Chief interest naturally attached to the "Classical Symphony" of the conductor's countryman, Prokofieff, which was played last night for the first time in Brooklyn.

The "Classical Symphony" is described as an attempt by the composer to put into the music the spirit of Mozart as Mozart might compose be better to forget this anachronism, and regard the symphony rather merely as a charming, dilletante, refreshing affair, for it was indeed a spindling Mozart that Prokofieff put into his composition, if he succeeded in putting him in it at all. Far more dignified, and startlingly different from most of Prowofieff's work, the "Classical Symphony" is bereft of clamor and dissonance, but instead blows a light fantastic bubble, cheerful in its clarity, and pleasantly amusing in its musicianly daintiness.

The symphony is in four short movements, elaborating in a careless, sportive way a simple harmonious melody in triplets, by which, no doubt, the composer sought to imitate the spirit of the gladsome Mozart. The third movement is a joyous gavotte, best expressive of the tuneful cheer with which the ingenious composer set about his work.

Ravel's deeply philosophic choregraphic poem, "The Waltz," followed. In it the composer strove to set to harmony the enigmatic course of human life, and to do it he chose a ballroom of the Second Empire, sketching the spirit of the dance, first clouded in filmy mist, then progressing to its climax, and ending in a transport of dissonance meant to exemplify the unsolvable enigma of destiny. The composition provided M. Koussevitsky with an opportunity to display his splendidly analytical touch and the magnificent story-telling qualities of his baton.

Cesar Franck's voluptuous Symphony in D Minor was played with a charming sincerity, the orchestra responding to M. Koussevitsky with exquisite nuances and reverent respect to the peculiar characteristics of the composer. The symphony, calling in great part upon the woodwinds and brass, showed the Boston Orchestra in all its magnificent, and ever-increasing, tonal opulence. The Bach Concerto Grosso in B Minor for strings, was played with the scholarly fidelity which has come to be expected of M. Koussevitsky and his organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
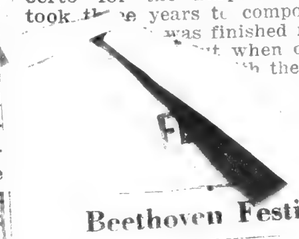
EXAMINER
FEB 6 1927

With the Boston Symphony, Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, will play for the first time in New York a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello dedicated to her by Manuel de Falla. The work was first performed on November 5 last in Barcelona with Mme. Landowska as soloist and Pablo Casals conducting. Of the concerto, Mme. Landowska writes:

"The story of De Falla's concerto is very interesting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend De Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his 'Retablo,' a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being, of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument. He became more and more interested and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto for the harpsichord. He took [illegible] years to compose this [illegible] was finished in Sep- [illegible]t when one be- [illegible]th the music, master [illegible]ch



Beethoven Festiva

Boston Will Commemorate the Centenary in March

Boston will hold an intensive commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death (March 26) with a centenary festival during that week, March 22 to 29, in Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play all nine of the symphonies, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose director is Dr. Archibald T. Davison, singing the chorus in the Ninth Symphony. The same orchestral and choral forces will perform the "Missa Solemnis" in D. The London and Lenox String Quartets will play Beethoven's quartets. Other artists taking part in the festival include Walter Gieseking, pianist; Florence Austral and Jeannette Vreeland, sopranos; Jeanne Gordon and Nevada Van der Veer, contraltos; Tudor Davies and Charles Stratton, tenors, and Arthur Middleton and Fred Patton, barytones.

Ernest Newman, the noted English critic and writer on musical subjects, who was guest critic of "The New York Evening Post" in 1924-'25, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony's trustees to come to America in order to pay a verbal tribute, as a part of the festival, to Beethoven's genius.

A large bronze statue of Beethoven was placed prominently before the organ in the Boston Symphony's original home, Music Hall, and the orchestra played all the Beethoven symphonies in its first season, 1881-'82. When Symphony Hall was built for the orchestra, in 1900, the name of Beethoven was inscribed on the cartouche surmounting the proscenium arch, and the hall was inaugurated with a performance of the "Missa Solemnis."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

More on Mr. Copland

By EDWARD CUSHING

MR. COPLAND disclosed his new Piano Concerto (of which a week ago these columns conveyed some rumors) to a New York audience in Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening. It was a strenuous and exciting occasion. Not all of Mr. Copland's auditors, the distinguished subscribers to Mr. Koussevitsky's local concerts, quite grasped the significance of what it was their privilege to be hearing. There was, we thought, an audible echo of the consternation caused by Mr. Copland's hysterical trumpets, a running counterpoint of aggravated and mirthful murmurs to Mr. Copland's zestful and courageous exposition of his favorite fad—polyrhythms. The irony of the music was thus intensified and its triumph redoubled at the hands of a sympathetic few. The Concerto won its way more easily, on the whole, with New York reviewers than with those who irrevocably damned it after its Boston premiere. Even the tolerant attitude of H. T. P., savant of the Transcript, hardly bears a comparison with, say, the enthusiasm admitted by Mr. Gilman, in the Herald Tribune—though we shall presently have cause to quote from Mr. Parker's printed afterthoughts. The Concerto was, all things considered, the most excellent of symphonic jazz expressions. Mr. Copland has quite outdone Mr. Gershwin and Mr. Carpenter, and the reasons for his success should not be difficult to trace.

* * *

IT WAS Mr. Gershwin, we believe, who first painted jazz into the symphony frame. With the success of Paul Whiteman and the celebrity of the Rhapsody in the background, the Symphony Society, through Mr. Damrosch, bespoke Mr. Gershwin to provide a Piano Concerto in his familiar style. Undismayed by the point of Ring Lardner's "Rhythm," Mr. Gershwin complied. His Concerto in F made its appearance during the season of 1925-26, achieved, as we recall, two performances, and lapsed until recently revived, "by request," at a matinee in Mecca Auditorium. Once more Mr. Gershwin played and Mr. Damrosch conducted. The Concerto succeeded, though a lone and vigorous protest mingled, from the right of the pit, with the applause that brought the composer forward for a half-dozen recalls. The Concerto succeeded because it was easy to swallow, which Mr. Copland's music is not. It was polite cabaret jazz, shallow and sentimental at its worst, clever and keen-edged at its best. As a musical joke, Mr. Gershwin's piece was admirable. It was not inherently pretentious; nothing about it except program notes and a surrounding program of Beethoven and Sibelius tended to lend it gravity. But the program notes, the Beethoven and the Sibelius were very nearly fatal. They betrayed the audience as badly as they betrayed Mr. Gershwin. The Concerto fitted into the scheme of the afternoon about as tightly as Elena Gerhardt or Eva Gauthier would fit into the scheme of Mr. White's Scandals. Mr. Gershwin was applauded and acclaimed not because his music was as good or better than that of Beethoven or Sibelius but simply because his music was popular in the most flagrant sense of the word and succeeded in breaking the crust of concert-hall pretensions. The Concerto won out not because it was a concerto but because it was jazz. It has been said of Mr. Gershwin that he was the first to write a serious symphonic work in the vocabulary of jazz. As a matter of fact he has done no such thing. His Concerto is less intrinsically symphonic than the Rhapsody. It is nothing more nor less than a medley of original "popular" tunes tricked out with elaborate orchestral dress. His intention in the Concerto is at no time revealed as seriously creative; his music indicates no effort toward the emotional seriousness of great art.

* * *

JOHN ALDEN CARPENTER'S ballet "Skyscrapers," first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House during the season of 1925-26, actually attempted to be in part all that Mr. Gershwin's music wasn't. But Mr. Carpenter, in the first place, was a composer of symphonic music. In his Concertino for Piano and Orchestra and in his "Krazy Kat" he had experimented with jazz, toward which his attitude was rather that of a child playing with an explosive toy. In the manipulation of jazz Mr. Carpenter was an amateur, Mr. Gershwin a professional. But "Skyscrapers," extending in 1925-26 the limited catalogue of his known works, put an end to mere experimentation. In this score Mr. Carpenter showed himself frankly interested in the wayward musical child of our commercial civilization. The music was saturated in the moods and colors of jazz—gentlemen's jazz, to be sure. Mr. Carpenter pictured a day in the life of an average citizen (or perhaps he was more broadly epitomizing the age of mechanism) in a succession of simple and complex syncopations. His score reveled in motifs redolent of saxophone and traps. His tunes met vulgarity on its own ground and occasionally won the day. "Skyscrapers" came off rather well. It had facility, variety in pattern and color, it sounded good. It lacked only distinction and a serious purpose. One listened to Mr. Carpenter's music and found it delightful and—trivial. It's charm was superficial and arose from its graciousness, its sentimentality, its complex and shimmering web of orchestral sound. There was no real vitality or conviction to the music, no true imaginative substance. It was entertainment simply, easily grasped and as easily dismissed.

* * *

NOW comes Mr. Copland with his Concerto. Mr. Copland—a very young man whose history entwines closely with that of modern music; Mr. Copland—composer of the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra and of the suite "Music for the Theater." Unlike Mr. Carpenter, music is Mr. Copland's vocation, not his avocation, neither a diversion nor a hobby, but a profession. Mr. Copland is not interested in jazz in its superficial aspects as a popular or piquant form of music but as the only musical expression of our nationalism. He does not aspire to exploit jazz symphonically for novel or sensational purposes. If his musical thought exhibits the characteristics of jazz it is because Mr. Copland is himself a product of the people and environment which gave birth to jazz. His intention is serious and creative; he aims to "make music for music's sake," and if that music bears the name of jazz—well, it must bear the stamp of jazz. Here we call upon Mr. Parker, who reflected in the Transcript that: "Mr. Copland is in his 27th year. He grew up bodily and mentally in America, in the New York which is the capital of our arts. Study and occasional residence overseas have not Europeanized him. Like every one else who can keep his head free from fantastic praise or equally fantastic blame, he has heard our one native and urban music, which is jazz. As a studious and ambitious musician, neither ashamed of his own soil nor over-imitative of foreign example, Mr. Copland has tried to derive from jazz, which was and is intrinsically a dance music, such ways and means as could be used to other ends. Jazz teems with rhythmic life, twisting and turning, crossing and recrossing, snapping short, flinging broad, wanton and wilful. Jazz also flares with instrumental color, as wayward and instant. Jazz, yet again, is often enough the gregarious racket which is the characteristic outpouring of the American spirit. Therein is the background and therein the implications of the quick division of Mr. Copland's Concerto. It is furiously rhythmed; it is harsh, vociferous, lurid, defiant of every musical re-

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
FEB 6 - 1927

Boston Orchestra Plans Tribute to Beethoven

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excell the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine Symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. The Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great Mass, which is seldom performed on account of extreme difficulties.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB 6 - 1927

At Carnegie Hall
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerto Grosso No. 12.....Handel
Norfolk Rhapsodie.....Vaughan William
Suite in F (new).....Rousse
Spring Symphony, No. 1.....Schuman

The Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday passed off without inclusion in the program of one piece labeled, "First Time in New York." The advance notice of the concert contained a "first-timer" in Roussel's suite in F major, but the Roussel was abandoned at the last moment for the "Classical Suite" of Prokofieff, which Mr. Koussevitzky had already given us last Thursday.

Dr. Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody in E minor is hardly inspired music, but it contains a hint to English composers to utilize their native tunes. The two tunes which the doctor has made the basis of his rhapsody do not seem the finest examples of English folk music, though the slow melody, played first on the viola, has character and feeling. The quick tune upon which the allegro is built is in no way distinguished. It sounds, in fact, rather silly and not worthy of serious development. A man of genius is, of course, able to construct wonders out of any kind of tune or even a haphazard succession of notes. But Dr. Williams is only an excellent musician to whom is given to point the road to others.

The only trouble with an acceptance of folk music as the groundwork of a national school is a tendency, exemplified in the Norfolk Rhapsody, to accept all indigenous tunes as good music. In our own country we have swallowed the Negro spiritual so completely that we forget to discriminate between the good spirituals and the bad. Dr. Williams would undoubtedly have written better music in the rhapsody if he had chosen more inspiring material. The fact is that the first section of it, which is based on the viola melody aforementioned, is far superior to the last half of the composition, built on the indifferent dance tune.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the Concerto Grosso in B minor of Handel and the Schumann Spring Symphony with due regard to the classic manner of the first and the romantic contents of the latter. The audience was numerous and appreciative.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 6 - 192

There has been some complaint, on notes, during the season thus for tha here has been too little of a "first class" musical nature in this cit during the months that have just past. How this season compares with others that have gone by as to the general quantity and quality of music given, one does not seek to say, but perusal of the press of other cities of the proportionate size and importance of this in the East, shows that this city stands up with any of them as far as the general music programs of the current season are concerned. This is apparently due in large part to the community spirit of the Young Men's Christian association, which brings here a large number of notable artists every season and has this year succeeding in ou doing itself. Already concerts by t Boston Symphony orchestra, Luc Chalfant and John Charles Thom have been among the highlights of musical year. Without this series, city would fall far below in ac number of concerts, many cities in size. There is no doubt of great lack in this city. That is opportunity to hear orchestral music in both the larger and smaller forms. The visit of the Boston Symphony or similar orchestra during a year seems scarce sufficient for a city which has a drawing population of 400,000 or more. Chamber music, were it not for the aggressiveness of the Musicians' club and such individuals as Miss Julia Rogers, whose chamber concert on March 15th promises to be a real event, would be absolutely nil here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1927

Florence Austral, soprano, and Jeanne Gordon, contralto, have been engaged for the Boston Beethoven festival, which will be held in that city from March 22 to 27. They will sing in Beethoven's "Missa Solennis" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The London String Quartet has also been engaged for the Boston festival and will appear March 24.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

As a stretcher-bearer and scrubber of floors [illegible]han Williams served in France and Salonica in the late whimsey that drew twenty millions of men of all nationalities into a disagreeable mud and bloodshed to back up great and, incidentally, a phrase called "The Honor and Preservation of the Peace of Man." The quotes are mine. Vaughan enlisted therefore in the R. A. M. C. in 1914 at the age of 42 and a few years afterward —at approximately the same age—I found myself on Governor's Island under Captain Clappe for the purpose of teaching bands how to toot, and I was glad of it.

Yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Vaughan Williams' "A Norfolk Rhapsody" was featured on Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra program, for Vaughan Williams—in addition to having scrubbed floors in France as a private—is really pastor emeritus of contemporary English composers. In passing, let it be known that Williams passed the examination for an artillery commission in 1917 and won special commendation for his place on the list. He was conductor of the Bach Choir in [illegible]

* * * *

When a composer of serious music goes out into a No-Man's Land and age when sometimes teeth begin to ache their toll, I claim that musician has got a coil below his stomach and I take my hat off to him. We are all thrown into the affray of Life in various ways but when a man who—like Williams—has passed a distinguished literary and artistic training at Charterhouse and at Trinity College, Cambridge; after going through the Royal College of Music at London and after taking his degree and showing that he knows what he is about—when such a high specialist mixes with modern gore and battle with very little chance of winning anything more than the grimy satisfaction of having done his bit—I'll say he has won gold-shod spurs far more important than plaudits of even such a fine audience as was gathered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Ha

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony Pleasing

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony in its third Saturday afternoon concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall, with a program that was conservative in some numbers by nature, in one, Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," by design. The Prokofieff work, which the Bostonians had played here Thursday, was substituted for the originally scheduled F major Suite of Albert Roussel, not yet heard here.

Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with Handel's twelfth Concerto Grosso, for strings, and, as before, proved an excellent conductor of Handel, leading a performance of full and clear sonority. An unfamiliar offering was the first Norfolk Rhapsody of Vaughan Williams, with themes based on old popular songs. This seemed an appealing work, with skillful use of the tuneful material, colorful and effective orchestration, and had a strong flavor of old English song of a ballad type. It is an early work of this composer, having been written in 1905, first performed in 1906 and revised eight years later.

Schumann's B flat major Symphony, the one he entitled "Spring," provided a happy contrast with a bleak February afternoon. Not, perhaps, a masterpiece of orchestration, it is warm-blooded, colorful and spirited music, and was played in an appropriate vein by the musicians under Mr. Koussevitzky, with ample color and zest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1927

9F

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Handel "Concerto grosso" in B minor, an admirable vehicle for the superb string choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened the program given by Mr. Koussevitsky and his men yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony," heard for the first time here last Thursday, was repeated, in place of a new work by Roussel previously announced. Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," not announced as "first time in New York," was new to a majority in the audience. The final item of the program was Schumann's "Spring symphony," a score in which it is easy for the modern minded to pick holes, but which remains in its essence an adorably youthful and poetic creation.

It is an excellent thing for conductors to repeat new scores which are unfamiliar to their audiences and to the reviewers whose printed reactions to these compositions are awaited with curiosity by interested parties. The repetition of Prokofieff's symphony made the piece appear poorer and thinner to the writer than the first. The music, avowedly a modern revival of the Mozart spirit, is nearer Wolf-Ferrari of the poorer pages, or even a composer like Drigo, than it is to Mozart—glib, facile, amusing as this paste imitation may be. 'Ware the composer who can so easily change his style! Suits ready made, alterations while you wait! The Prokofieff of the "Love of Three Oranges" and the ballet "Chout" is a far more convincing fellow than the Prokofieff of the pseudo-classic symphony.

The Norfolk rhapsody of Vaughan Williams, based on various folk-tunes, is not to be counted among the greater works of this musician. It dates from a relatively early period. It has sincerity of purpose, but the expression is somewhat sentimental and there is not the resource of workmanship and development which make Vaughan Williams today one of the leaders, if not the leader, of the English school. Of the first two movements of the Schumann symphony Mr. Koussevitsky gave a performance which met the composer half-way and which made the most of every opportunity for color provided by the orchestration.

W YORK AMERICAN
FEB 6 - 1927

CURCI SCORES IN 'RIGOLETTO'

Four Symphony Concerts Add to Days of Activity in the Music World.

By GRENA BENNETT.

The little busy bee had nothing on music critics yesterday with four symphony concerts: Amelite Galli-Curci's farewell in "Rigoletto"; a new Siegfried in "Goetterdaemmerung"; a recital at which Chopin compositions were played on what is reputed to be Chopin's piano, and a programme of Beethoven songs as part of the centenary observance.

Of the concerts, the principal event was Arturo Toscanini's appearance in Carnegie Hall last night with the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducting Beethoven's first and last (the ninth) symphonies, and assisted by the Schola Cantorum Chorus, Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Words are too weak to describe adequately the performance and its reception. The eager public response can be gathered from the fact that late ticket buyers willingly paid sidewalk speculators ten times the box office price of seats.

TWO CONCERTS IN DAY.

Toscanini took his position on the conductor's platform only a short time after Serg Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra entertained the hall's first capacity audience of the day. Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings; Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody; Prokofieff's classic symphony (repeated from Thursday evening's concert)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

More on Mr. Copland

By EDWARD CUSHING

MR. COPLAND disclosed his new Piano Concerto (of which a week ago these columns conveyed some rumors) to a New York audience in Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening. It was a strenuous and exciting occasion. Not all of Mr. Copland's auditors, the distinguished subscribers to Mr. Koussevitsky's local concerts, quite grasped the significance of what it was their privilege to be hearing. There was, we thought, an audible echo of the consternation caused by Mr. Copland's hysterical trumpets, a running counterpoint of aggravated and mirthful murmurs to Mr. Copland's zestful and courageous exposition of his favorite fad—polyrhythms. The irony of the music was thus intensified and its triumph redoubled at the hands of a sympathetic few. The Concerto won its way more easily, on the whole, with New York reviewers than with those who irrevocably damned it after its Boston premiere. Even the tolerant attitude of H. T. P., savant of the Transcript, hardly bears a comparison with, say, the enthusiasm admitted by Mr. Gilman, in the Herald Tribune—though we shall presently have cause to quote from Mr. Parker's printed afterthoughts. The Concerto was, all things considered, the most excellent of symphonic jazz expressions. Mr. Copland has quite outdone Mr. Gershwin and Mr. Carpenter, and the reasons for his success should not be difficult to trace.

* * *

IT WAS Mr. Gershwin, we believe, who first painted jazz into the symphony frame. With the success of Paul Whiteman and the celebrity of the Rhapsody in the background, the Symphony Society, through Mr. Damrosch, bespoke Mr. Gershwin to provide a Piano Concerto in his familiar style. Undismayed by the point of Ring Lardner's "Rhythm," Mr. Gershwin complied. His Concerto in F made its appearance during the season of 1925-26, achieved, as we recall, two performances, and lapsed until recently revived, "by request," at a matinee in Mecca Auditorium. Once more Mr. Gershwin played and Mr. Damrosch conducted. The Concerto succeeded, though a lone and vigorous protest mingled, from the right of the pit, with the applause that brought the composer forward for a half-dozen recalls. The Concerto succeeded because it was easy to swallow, which Mr. Copland's music is not. It was polite cabaret jazz, shallow and sentimental at its worst, clever and keen-edged at its best. As a musical joke, Mr. Gershwin's piece was admirable. It was not inherently pretentious; nothing about it except program notes and a surrounding program of Beethoven and Sibelius tended to lend it gravity. But the program notes, the Beethoven and the Sibelius were very nearly fatal. They betrayed the audience as badly as they betrayed Mr. Gershwin. The Concerto fitted into the scheme of the afternoon about as tightly as Elena Gerhardt or Eva Gauthier would fit into the scheme of Mr. White's Scandals. Mr. Gershwin was applauded and acclaimed not because his music was as good or better than that of Beethoven or Sibelius but simply because his music was popular in the most flagrant sense of the word and succeeded in breaking the crust of concert-hall pretensions. The Concerto won out not because it was a concerto but because it was jazz. It has been said of Mr. Gershwin that he was the first to write a serious symphonic work in the vocabulary of jazz. As a matter of fact he has done no such thing. His Concerto is less intrinsically symphonic than the Rhapsody. It is nothing more nor less than a medley of original "popular" tunes tricked out with elaborate orchestral dress. His intention in the Concerto is at no time revealed as seriously creative; his music indicates no effort toward the emotional seriousness of great art.

* * *

JOHN ALDEN CARPENTER'S ballet "Skyscrapers," first produced at the Metropolitan Opera House during the season of 1925-26, actually attempted to be in part all that Mr. Gershwin's music wasn't. But Mr. Carpenter, in the first place, was a composer of symphonic music. In his Concertino for Piano and Orchestra and in his "Krazy Kat" he had experimented with jazz, toward which his attitude was rather that of a child playing with an explosive toy. In the manipulation of jazz Mr. Carpenter was an amateur, Mr. Gershwin a professional. But "Skyscrapers," extending in 1925-26 the limited catalogue of his known works, put an end to mere experimentation. In this score Mr. Carpenter showed himself frankly interested in the wayward musical child of our commercial civilization. The music was saturated in the moods and colors of jazz—gentlemen's jazz, to be sure. Mr. Carpenter pictured a day in the life of an average citizen (or perhaps he was more broadly epitomizing the age of mechanism) in a succession of simple and complex syncopations. His score reveled in motifs redolent of saxophone and traps. His tunes met vulgarity on its own ground and occasionally won the day. "Skyscrapers" came off rather well. It had facility, variety in pattern and color, it sounded good. It lacked only distinction and a serious purpose. One listened to Mr. Carpenter's music and found it delightful and—trivial. It's charm was superficial and arose from its graciousness, its sentimentality, its complex and shimmering web of orchestral sound. There was no real vitality or conviction to the music, no true imaginative substance. It was entertainment simply, easily grasped and as easily dismissed.

* * *

NOW comes Mr. Copland with his Concerto. Mr. Copland—a very young man whose history entwines closely with that of modern music; Mr. Copland—composer of the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra and of the suite "Music for the Theater." Unlike Mr. Carpenter, music is Mr. Copland's vocation, not his avocation, neither a diversion nor a hobby, but a profession. Mr. Copland is not interested in jazz in its superficial aspects as a popular or piquant form of music but as the only musical expression of our nationalism. He does not aspire to exploit jazz symphonically for novel or sensational purposes. If his musical thought exhibits the characteristics of jazz it is because Mr. Copland is himself a product of the people and environment which gave birth to jazz. His intention is serious and creative; he aims to "make music for music's sake," and if that music bears the name of jazz—well, it must bear the stamp of jazz. Here we call upon Mr. Parker, who reflected in the Transcript that: "Mr. Copland is in his 27th year. He grew up bodily and mentally in America, in the New York which is the capital of our arts. Study and occasional residence overseas have not Europeanized him. Like every one else who can keep his head free from fantastic praise or equally fantastic blame, he has heard our one native and urban music, which is jazz. As a studious and ambitious musician, neither ashamed of his own soil nor over-imitative of foreign example, Mr. Copland has tried to derive from jazz, which was and is intrinsically a dance music, such ways and means as could be used to other ends. Jazz teems with rhythmic life, twisting and turning, crossing and recrossing, snapping short, flinging broad, wanton and wilful. Jazz also flares with instrumental color, as wayward and instant. Jazz, yet again, is often enough the gregarious racket which is the characteristic outpouring of the American spirit. Therein is the background and therein the implications of the quick division of Mr. Copland's Concerto. It is furiously rhythmed; it is harsh, vociferous, lurid, defiant of every musical re-

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
FEB 6 - 1927

Boston Orchestra Plans Tribute to Beethoven

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excell the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine Symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. The Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great Mass, which is seldom performed on account of extreme difficulties.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
FEB 6 - 1927

At Carnegie Hall
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerto Grosso No. 12.....Handel
Norfolk Rhapsodie.....Vaughan William
Suite in F (new).....Rousse
Spring Symphony, No. 1.....Schuman

The Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday passed off without inclusion in the program of one piece labeled, "First Time in New York." The advance notice of the concert contained a "first-timer" in Roussel's suite in F major, but the Roussel was abandoned at the last moment for the "Classical Suite" of Prokofieff, which Mr. Koussevitzky has already given us last Thursday.

Dr. Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody in E minor is hardly inspired music, but it contains a hint to English composers to utilize their native tunes. The two tunes which the doctor has made the basis of his rhapsody do not seem the finest examples of English folk music, though the slow melody, played first on the viola, has character and feeling. The quick tune upon which the allegro is built is in no way distinguished. It sounds, in fact, rather silly and not worthy of serious development. A man of genius is, of course, able to construct wonders out of any kind of tune or even a haphazard succession of notes. But Dr. Williams is only an excellent musician to whom is given to point the road to others.

The only trouble with an acceptance of folk music as the groundwork of a national school is a tendency, exemplified in the Norfolk Rhapsody, to accept all indigenous tunes as good music. In our own country we have swallowed the Negro spiritual so completely that we forget to discriminate between the good spirituals and the bad. Dr. Williams would undoubtedly have written better music in the rhapsody if he had chosen more inspiring material. The fact is that the first section of it, which is based on the viola melody aforementioned, is far superior to the last half of the composition, built on the indifferent dance tune.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the Concerto Grosso in B minor of Handel and the Schumann Spring Symphony with due regard to the classic manner of the first and the romantic contents of the latter. The audience was numerous and appreciative.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 6 - 192

There has been some complaint, on notes, during the season thus far that there has been too little of a "first class" musical nature in this city during the months that have just past. How this season compares with others that have gone by as to the general quantity and quality of music given, one does not seek to say, but perusal of the press of other cities of the proportionate size and importance of this in the East, shows that this city stands up with any in them as far as the general music programs of the current season are concerned. This is apparently due in large part to the community spirit of the Young Men's Christian association, which brings here a large number of notable artists every season and has this year succeeding in outdoing itself. Already concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Luc Chalfant and John Charles Thomas have been among the highlights of the musical year. Without this series, city would fall far below in act number of concerts, many cities in size. There is no doubt of great lack in this city. That is opportunity to hear orchestral music in both the larger and smaller forms. The visit of the Boston Symphony or similar orchestra during a year seems scarce sufficient for a city which has a drawing population of 400,000 or more. Chamber music, were it not for the aggressiveness of the Musicians' club and such individuals as Miss Julia Rogers, whose chamber concert on March 15th promises to be a real event, would be absolutely nil here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1927

Florence Austral, soprano, and Jeanne Gordon, contralto, have been engaged for the Boston Beethoven festival, which will be held in that city from March 22 to 27. They will sing in Beethoven's "Missa Solennis" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The don String Quartet has also been aged for the Boston festival and appear March 24.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

As a stretcher-bearer and scrubber floors [illegible]aughan Williams served France and Salonica in the late whimsey that drew twenty millions of men of all nationalities into a disagreeable mud and bloodshed to back up great and, incidentally, a phrase called "The Honor and Preservation of the Peace of Man." The quotes are mine. Vaughan enlisted therefore in the R. A. M. C. in 1914 at the age of 42 and a few years afterward—at approximately the same age—I found myself on Governor's Island under Captain Clappe for the purpose of teaching bands how to toot, and I was glad of it.

Yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Vaughan Williams' "A Norfolk Rhapsody" was featured on Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra program, for Vaughan Williams—in addition to having scrubbed floors in France as a private—is really pastor emeritus of contemporary English composers. In passing, let it be known that Williams passed the examination for an artillery commission in 1917 and won special [illegible] tion for his place on the list. He conductor of the Bach Choir in [illegible]

* * * *

When a composer of serious [illegible] goes out into a No-Man's Land age when sometimes teeth begin to [illegible] their toll, I claim that musician has got a coil below his stomach and I take my hat off to him. We are all thrown into the affray of Life in various ways but when a man who—like Williams—has passed a distinguished literary and artistic training at Charterhouse and at Trinity College, Cambridge; after going through the Royal College of Music in London and after taking his degree and showing that he knows what he is about—when such a high specialist mixes with modern gore and battle with very little chance of winning anything more than the grimy satisfaction of having done his bit—I'll say he has won gold-shod spurs far more important than plaudits of even such a fine audience as was gathered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony Pleasing

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony in its third Saturday afternoon concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall, with a program that was conservative in some numbers by nature, in one, Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," by design. The Prokofieff work, which the Bostonians had played here Thursday, was substituted for the originally scheduled F major Suite of Albert Roussel, not yet heard here.

Mr. Koussevitzky began his program with Handel's twelfth Concerto Grosso, for strings, and, as before, proved an excellent conductor of Handel, leading a performance of full and clear sonority. An unfamiliar offering was the first Norfolk Rhapsody of Vaughan Will[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1927

9F

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Handel "Concerto grosso" in B minor, an admirable vehicle for the superb string choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened the program given by Mr. Koussevitsky and his men yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony," heard for the first time here last Thursday, was repeated, in place of a new work by Roussel previously announced. Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," not announced as "first time in New York," was new to a majority in the audience. The final item of the program was Schumann's "Spring symphony," a score in which it is easy for the modern minded to pick holes, but which remains in its essence an adorably youthful and poetic creation.

It is an excellent thing for conductors to repeat new scores which are unfamiliar to their audiences and to the reviewers whose printed reactions to these compositions are awaited with curiosity by interested parties. The repetition of Prokofieff's symphony made the piece appear poorer and thinner to the writer than the first. The music, avowedly a modern revival of the Mozart spirit, is nearer Wolf-Ferrari of the poorer pages, or even a composer like Drigo, than it is to Mozart—glib, facile, amusing as this paste imitation may be. 'Ware the composer who can so easily change his style! Suits ready made, alterations while you wait! The Prokofieff of the "Love of Three Oranges" and the ballet "Chout" is a far more convincing fellow than the Prokofieff of the pseudo-classic symphony.

The Norfolk rhapsody of Vaughan Williams, based on various folk-tunes, is not to be counted among the greater works of this musician. It dates from a relatively early period. It has sincerity of purpose, but the expression is somewhat sentimental and there is not the resource of workmanship and development which make Vaughan Williams today one of the leaders, if not the leader, of the English school. Of the first two movements of the Schumann symphony Mr. Koussevitsky gave a performance which met the composer half-way and which made the most of every opportunity for color provided by the orchestration.

W YORK AMERICAN
FEB 6 - 1927

CURCI SCORES IN 'RIGOLETTO'

Four Symphony Concerts Add to Days of Activity in the Music World.

By GRENA BENNETT.

The little busy bee had nothing on music critics yesterday with four symphony concerts: Amelite Galli-Curci's farewell in "Rigoletto"; a new Siegfried in "Goetterdaemmerung"; a recital at which Chopin compositions were played on what is reputed to be Chopin's piano, and a programme of Beethoven songs as part of the centenary observance.

Of the concerts, the principal event was Arturo Toscanini's appearance in Carnegie Hall last night with the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducting Beethoven's first and last (the ninth) symphonies, and assisted by the Schola Cantorum Chorus, Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Words are too weak to describe adequately the performance and its reception. The eager public response can be gathered from the fact that late ticket buyers willingly paid sidewalk speculators ten times the box office price of seats.

TWO CONCERTS IN DAY.

Toscanini took his position on the conductor's platform only a short time after Serg Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra entertained the hall's first capacity audience of the day. Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings; Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody; Prokofieff's classic symphony (repeated from Thursday evening's concert), and Schumann's "Spring" symphony were interpreted by the Bostonians with customary scholarliness of artistic detail.

Two symphony [illegible] were [illegible] ...poser, ...per- ...years ... Symphony, ...pring," provided ...th a bleak Febru- ...t, perhaps, a master- ...estration, it is warm-blooded colorful and spirited music, and was played in an appropriate vein by the musicians under Mr. Koussevitzky, with ample color and zest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony Comes For Last Time

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last appearance in Providence, this season, is scheduled for Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, at the Albee Theatre. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct and the soloist will by Harriet Van Emden, soprano.

In keeping with general observation of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death, the orchestra will include the great composer's "Fifth Symphony" in its program. Other numbers will be J. S. Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto in G major," and the "Prelude" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The week of March 21 will see the Symphony carrying on a prominent part of the Boston Festival planned in honor of Beethoven. It will play all of his Symphonies, combining with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society for the presentation of the famous "Ninth Symphony." All concerts of the festival will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Besides the Symphony, concerts will be given by the London String Quartet, the Lenox String Quartet and several noted soloists. Ernest Newman of London, considered the foremost writer and authority on music of the day, will deliver an address on Beethoven. Mr. Newman comes from London at the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 7 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. An excellent concert, unfortunately overshadowed by the prodigies of the Philharmonic. Mr. Koussevitky's program consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, the Prokofieff "Classic Symphony" repeated. Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody" and Schumann's "Spring" symphony. Sudden interest in the last named may have arisen from the recent acquisition of the original score by the national library at Washington.

There was nothing in the material above listed that called for comment. The English composition is not often heard and that is for its own good, since it is of slight texture. The prokofieff repetition pleased the audience. The work is unimportant but will bear an [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra shall [illegible] of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
FEB 7 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Matinee

WHETHER or not one agrees with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations of music, and agreement is of little importance, the man is always interesting, alive and provocative. And he does know how to shape a program.

The Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra repeated the Prokofieff "Classic Symphony," played earlier in the week, and Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to take particular delight in emphasizing the jovial toying with archaic themes of the work. Perhaps it was to direct a final snicker at the reviewers who diligently read the program note, "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores," and proceeded forthwith to make earnest and serious comparisons.

The exquisite moment of Saturday's program was to many the beautiful Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, of Vaughn Williams. One who has never had an appreciation of the beauty of England, of its lyric countryside, its simple people and its restful calm could derive it all from a composition so poignant as this. This composer has drawn upon the folk song of England, but he has imbued it with such intense individualism, such vivid color and sensitive orchestration, that it emerges a creative [illegible]. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with an inspiring sympathy.

The large audience seemed to find much pleasure in the Schumann "Spring Song" Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major, though parts of this glorified welcome to the season seem a bit tired, spring-fevered and lugubrious. To offset any such pale discomfort, however, there was the virile Concerto Grosso of Handel, No. 12, in B minor, [illegible] orchestra lent much enthusi-

W. H. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
FEB 7 1927

TWO ORCHESTRAS HEARD IN CONCERT

Ralph Vaughn-Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, a clever, workmanlike and highly interesting piece of music built on folksong of the section, was Mr. Koussevitzky's most satisfying performance at the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. What he did with the Schumann B flat symphony was uneven in the extreme. The other numbers were the Handel concerto grosso in D minor and a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony.

Another orchestra concert of the week-end was that of the New York Symphony under Otto Vilemperer at the Mecca Temple yesterday. This was no sure-fire Wagner-Tchaikovsky combination, the latter representation being the "Pathetique" symphony. The audience ate it up, though it was done about as badly as might be.

[illegible]MENTS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 7 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY WORK INSPIRING

Koussevitzky, Dominant Figure, Furnishes Leadership of Never-Lagging Virility.

PROGRAM CHOICE MARKS BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL

Old Standards of Quality Maintained in Orchestra With New Elements of Interest.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in this city, attracted a large audience to the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, all seeing intent on paying tribute to Sergei Koussevitzky and his skilled musicians who have meant so much in the musical life of this city for so many years. The concert was under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who is to be congratulated on presenting one of the most inspirational and interesting musical events of the entire season.

These concerts have always been highly successful, and yesterday's proved no exception. Whether directed by Muck, Fiedler, Monteux, or any of their predecessors the Boston orchestra has always been one of the chief factors in the development of better music in this city, and it is to be regretted that only one concert can be given each season, instead of the three which at one time were scheduled. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an enthusiastic welcome.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of unusual interest. Out of respect to the Beethoven centenary, which is being generally observed this year by the entire musical world, the "Third Symphony" of that great composer, commonly known as the "Eroica" was played. There were also compositions by Prokofieff, Debussy, Wagner and Jean Sibelius. There was no soloist, thus affording more time for orchestral music than is usual on such a program.

Mr. Koussevitzky was the dominant and all interesting figure of the afternoon. While there may be a few who question his music judgment, none can dispute his authority and his mastery of the situation. Under his inspired leadership the Boston orchestra is always a colorful and dramatic organization. His leadership is of the virile sort, never lagging, and always having the idea uppermost of carrying out to the fullest extent the unusual and unique ideas for which he has invariably been noted wherever he has appeared. The Boston orchestra has always been one of the really great orchestras of the world. Under his leadership former standards have been successfully maintained, and there has entered a new element of interest which has added to the versatility and the dramatic possibilities of every program.

There are those who insist that the "Eroica" is not the greatest symphony written by Beethoven. There are many who prefer the "Fifth," while devotees of choral music are prone to admire the "Ninth" beyond all others. But there is much to venerate and respect in the "Eroica," which was given an altogether unique, yet satisfactory performance yesterday. The stirring opening "Allegro" was splendidly played, and it provided just the proper atmosphere for the beginning of a program which was to be of an exceptional character throughout. The lovely "Marcia Funebre" was beautifully and reverently done, and its rendition was in many ways one of the most effective of the afternoon. Effects in shading and in tone building were remarkable for their clarity, and each melody was distinctly outlined. The sparkling "Scherzo" was one of the most popular incidents. The "Finale" was also done with a brilliancy and a steadfast devotion to the traditions of Beethoven which left a pleasing impression.

Second Half.

Following the intermission Mr. Koussevitzky presented the unfamiliar "Suite" from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," by Prokofieff, one of the most capable of all modern Russian composers. Five movements from the suite were played, "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." The suite as played yesterday was edited by Albert Spaulding, famous American violinist. Its weird, unusual harmonies had adequate setting, and it was in every way a decided novelty.

Another number in a lovely atmosphere was the "Nocturne," by Claude Debussy, known as "Fetes." This, one of three "Nocturnes" written by this noted French composer. It was exquisitely played, and the impression left was altogether favorable, so effective was the interpretive genius of Koussevitzky displayed throughout.

Undoubtedly the most popular number with the audience was the familiar "Prelude" to the opera, "Lohengrin," by Wagner. This was splendidly played, and at its conclusion the conductor generously shared the prolonged applause with his men.

The program was brought to a conclusion with the rendition of the too frequently heard symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, most capable of all Finnish composers. Under the magic baton of a Koussevitzky the work became a thing of tense dramatic beauty, and it was in every way a rendition which did ample justice to the occasion, providing just the proper climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 7 - 1927

Koussevitzky Orchestra In Superb Form

Third Symphony of Beethoven Heads Magnificently Played Program by Boston Artists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played magnificently at the Capitol Theater yesterday and music lovers who failed to attend missed one of the greatest musical events; for the coming of a great orchestra is an outstanding event in the musical history of any city, and Hartford has all too few orchestral concerts.

The orchestra was in fine form and Mr. Koussevitzky again showed not only his grace and charm of direction but his splendid sense of values and his eloquent uses of contrasts in his readings. The audience was of large size and extraordinarily enthusiastic and at the conclusion of the concert the conductor was called again and again to the stage, the members of the orchestra rising to receive the applause with him.

Beethoven's glorious Third Symphony headed the program and from the very first delightful smoothness of tone in all of the orchestra's choir was in evidence. The reading brought forth each shadowy grace of melody in the allegro and the magnificent funeral march had dignity and stateliness of rendition wholly worthy of the great music that, though first played at the beginning of the nineteenth century, firmly holds its place as the work of a transcendent genius.

Some of the loveliest playing of the afternoon came in the second theme of the movement. The tremendous fugue that follows had clarity and strength and the scherzo and finale were brilliantly given. It does not matter greatly whether or not Beethoven finally wished his work understood as dedicated to the greatness of Napoleon. It stands dedicated as a part of an enduring monument to the genius who created its greatness of musical thought and expression, and the conductor who reads it and the orchestra that plays it as it was read and played yesterday nobly carry on the best traditions of the great composer.

The "novelty" of yesterday's program was Prokofieff's suite from the opera "The Love of the Three Oranges," and musical strangeness as marked as Beethoven's sanity rules in the work. Probably not a few in the audience had heard the suite as it came in by radio from Symphony Hall a while ago, and they doubtless felt after the rendition yesterday that seeing Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the strange music made a much greater impression than any mere hearing could make.

—

The first of the series of sketches making up the suite bears the title "Les Ridicules," but does not need the name to prove its downright humor. The "Marche" is angular, clever, diabolical, a hint of the devil of war himself, and the scherzo is delightful. In [illegible] lovely pastoral chords preceding a gracious viola passage over shivering strings; there are strange harmonies and complicated dissonances and there is an unresolved chord at last. And finally, in "La Fuite," there is an absolute hurricane of playing that carries its audience quite out of the realms of reality in music.

That Debussy should seem even a little downright in his orchestration after Prokofieff is a commentary on the work of the modern which progresses so rapidly if so strangely withal. The "Fetes" nocturne was played con amore by the orchestra with delightfully effective handling of the oncoming melody of trumpets and drums to its splendidly effective climax; and then came yet another phase of composition, as exemplified in Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, a dream from quite another world built fro mthe whiteness of the divided whisperings of the violins to the vividness of the heaven-rending power of the full orchestra. Here the reading was eloquent and beautiful, imbued with the spirit as well as form of the music. Again, as after the symphony, the players of the orchestra were called on to acknowledge their share of the applause.

The final number was the brave "Finlandia" of Sibelius, with its frequent calls on the fortissimo brasses and percussion and its exquisite melody for strings and woodwinds, and the playing brought out all the graces and delights of the work.

Mr. Sedgwick is to be thanked for bringing the Boston orchestra here for the concert. It is much to be regretted that every seat in the big theater was not taken when the first measures of the symphony were sounded and that even the late comers did not fill the house to capacity.

[illegible] a son, [illegible] School in Monroe, Mich.

Boston Globe
Jan 30

BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY CONCERT

Orchestra Plays Program of Russian Music

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave as the third of its Tuesday series a concert of Russian music instead of the English and Scandinavian program originally announced, which has been postponed until the fourth concert, to be given March 1.

Yesterday's program, with the exception of Musorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina"—a charmingly limpid and meditative mood-picture drawn with the fewest possible lines and tints—was composed of works aiming at various kinds of striking external effect, brilliant, grotesque, coloristic, dramatic, romantic.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's tone-picture "Sadko," op. 5, which has been described, so the program notes tell us, as the first Russian symphonic poem, was written in 1867, when the composer was a young man of 23. It is not surprising, therefore, that it should contain crudities and betray an immature taste. Rather it is astonishing to find in it already so many signs of the genius for orchestration for which he was to become famous.

Prokofieff's suite, op. 33 bis, from the opera "The Love For Three Oranges," from which three movements were played, shows the composer's command, not only of orchestral effect, but also of compact and well-balanced form. It is in parody and the grotesque that his talent is strongest and most original, as in the amusing "March" and the delightful "Scherzo." In the tender and sentimental "La Prince et la Princesse" he is more than a little reminiscent of Ravel.

Stravinsky was represented by three movements from his "Fire-Bird" suite, music extraordinary for its evocative power, its wealth of original and suggestive orchestral and harmonic effects; for its mysterious beauty.

The second half of the program was occupied by Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, in F minor, op. 36. Its first movement, which the composer thought the most important, sounds today little better than empty and noisy bombast, interspersed with moments of maudlin sentimentality.

The Andantino has a simple charm, however, the Scherzo, with its rushing pizzicato, for all the strings is novel and exhilarating, and the finale fiery and extremely brilliant.

To the whole program Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra brought a degree of enthusiasm and brilliant execution that carried the audience away and drew from it prolonged and ex[illegible] cited applause.

[illegible] audience to the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, all seeing intent on paying tribute to Sergei Koussevitzky and his skilled musicians who have meant so much in the musical life of this city for so many years. The concert was under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who is to be congratulated on presenting one of the most inspirational and interesting musical events of the entire season.

These concerts have always been highly successful, and yesterday's proved no exception. Whether directed by Muck, Fiedler, Monteux, or any of their predecessors the Boston orchestra has always been one of the chief factors in the development of better music in this city, and it is to be regretted that only one concert can be given each season, instead of the three which at one time were scheduled. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an enthusiastic welcome.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of unusual interest. Out of respect to the Beethoven centenary, which is being generally observed this year by the entire musical world, the "Third Symphony" of that great composer, commonly known as the "Eroica" was played. There were also compositions by Prokofieff, Debussy, Wagner and Jean Sibelius. There was no soloist, thus affording more time for orchestral music than is usual on such a program.

Mr. Koussevitzky was the dominant and all interesting figure of the afternoon. While there may be a few who question his music judgment, none can dispute his authority and his mastery of the situation. Under his inspired leadership the Boston orchestra is always a colorful and dramatic organization. His leadership is of the virile sort, never lagging, and always having the idea uppermost of carrying out to the fullest extent the unusual and unique ideas for which he has invariably been noted wherever he has appeared. The Boston orchestra has always been one of the really great orchestras of the world. Under his leadership former standards have been successfully maintained, and there has entered a new element of interest which has added to the versatility and the dramatic possibilities of every program.

There are those who insist that the "Eroica" is not the greatest symphony written by Beethoven. There are many who prefer the "Fifth," while devotees of choral music are prone to admire the "Ninth" beyond all others. But there is much to venerate and respect in the "Eroica," which was given an altogether unique, yet satisfactory performance yesterday. The stirring opening "Allegro" was splendidly played, and it provided just the proper atmosphere for the beginning of a program which was to be of an exceptional character throughout. The lovely "Marcia Funebre" was beautifully and [illegible] reverently done, and its rendition was in many ways one of the most effecti[illegible] of the afternoon. Effects in shad[illegible] and in tone building were remarkable for their clarity, and each melody was distinctly outlined. The sparkling "Scherzo" was one of the most popular incidents. The "Finale" was also [illegible] with a brilliancy and a steadfast devotion to the traditions of Beethoven which left a pleasing impression.

Second Half.

Following the intermission Mr. Koussevitzky presented the unfamiliar "Suite" from the opera, "The Love For Three Oranges," by Prokofieff, one of the most capable of all modern Russian composers. Five movements from the suite were played, "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." The suite as played yesterday was edited by Albert Spaulding, famous American violinist. Its weird, unusual harmonies had adequate setting, and it was in every way a decided novelty.

Another number in a lovely atmosphere was the "Nocturne," by Claude Debussy, known as "Fetes." This, one of three "Nocturnes" written by this noted French composer. It was exquisitely played, and the impression left was altogether favorable, so effective was the interpretive genius of Koussevitzky displayed throughout.

Undoubtedly the most popular number with the audience was the familiar "Prelude" to the opera, "Lohengrin," by Wagner. This was splendidly played, and at its conclusion the conductor generously shared the prolonged applause with his men.

The program was brought to a conclusion with the rendition of the too frequently heard symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, most capable of all Finnish composers. Under the magic baton of a Koussevitzky the work became a thing of tense dramatic beauty, and it was in every way a rendition which did ample justice to the occasion, providing just the proper climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
FEB 6 - 1927

NOTED ITALIAN TO LEAD POP CONCERTS

BOSTON, Feb. 6—(AP) Alfredo Cassella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop Concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. The Pop Concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra made up of members of the Symphony Orchestra plays programs made up of classic and lighter music.

Cassella appeared in Symphony Hall twice last month as guest con[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY WORK INSPIRING

HARTFORD-TIMES
FEB — 7

Koussevitzky, Dominant Figure, Furnishes Leadership of Never-Lagging Virility.

PROGRAM CHOICE MARKS BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL

Old Standards of Quality Maintained in Orchestra With New Elements of Interest.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in this city, attracted a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony Comes For Last Time

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last appearance in Providence, this season, is scheduled for Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, at the Albee Theatre. Sergei Koussevitsky will conduct and the soloist will by Harriet Van Emden, soprano.

In keeping with general observation of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death, the orchestra will include the great composer's "Fifth Symphony" in its program. Other numbers will be J. S. Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto in G major," and the "Prelude" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The week of March 21 will see the Symphony carrying on a prominent part of the Boston Festival planned in honor of Beethoven. It will play all of his Symphonies, combining with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society for the presentation of the famous "Ninth Symphony." All concerts of the festival will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Besides the Symphony, concerts will be given by the London String Quartet, the Lenox String Quartet and several noted soloists. Ernest Newman of London, considered the foremost writer and authority on music of the day, will deliver an address on Beethoven. Mr. Newman comes from London at the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPP[illegible] ... held its an-N. Y. EVENI[illegible]

FEB 7 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. An excellent concert, unfortunately overshadowed by the prodigies of the Philharmonic. Mr. Koussevitky's program consisted of Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, the Prokofieff "Classic Symphony" repeated. Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody" and Schumann's "Spring" symphony. Sudden interest in the last named may have arisen from the recent acquisition of the original score by the national library at Washington.

There was nothing in the material above listed that called for comment. The English composition is not often heard and that is for its own good, since it is of slight texture. The prokofieff repetition pleased the audience. The work is unimportant, but will bear an occasional appearance. The Bostonians performed well and returned to their lair laden with glory. We shall hear them again about the ides of March.

The Boston Symphony Matinee

WHETHER or not one agrees with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations of music, and agreement is of little importance, the man is always interesting, alive and provocative. And he does know how to shape a program.

The Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra repeated the Prokofieff "Classic Symphony," played earlier in the week, and Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to take particular delight in emphasizing the jovial toying with archaic themes of the work. Perhaps it was to direct a final snicker at the reviewers who diligently read the program note, "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores," and proceeded forthwith to make earnest and serious comparisons.

The exquisite moment of Saturday's program was to many the beautiful Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, of Vaughn Williams. One who has never had an appreciation of the beauty of England, of its lyric countryside, its simple people and its restful calm could derive it all from a composition so poignant as this. This composer has drawn upon the folk song of England, but he has imbued it with such intense individualism, such vivid color and sensitive orchestration, that it emerges a creative entity. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with an inspiring sympathy.

The large audience seemed to find much pleasure in the Schumann "Spring Song" Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major, though parts of this glorified welcome to the season seem a bit tired, spring-fevered and lugubrious. To offset any such pale discomfort, however, there was the virile Concerto Grosso [illegible] Handel, No. 12, in B minor, [illegible]rchestra lent much enthusi-

W. H. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
FEB 7 1927

TWO ORCHESTRAS HEARD IN CONCERT

Ralph Vaughn-Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody, a clever, workmanlike and highly interesting piece of music built on folksong of the section, was Mr. Koussevitzky's most satisfying performance at the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. What he did with the Schumann B flat symphony was uneven in the extreme. The other numbers were the Handel concerto grosso in D minor and a repetition of Serge Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony.

Another orchestra concert of the week-end was that of the New York Symphony under Otto Vilemperer at the Mecca Temple yesterday. This was no sure-fire Wagner-Tchaikovsky combination, the latter representation being the "Pathetique" symphony. The audience ate it up, though it was done about as badly as might be.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
[illegible]TFORD, CONN.
FEB 7 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY WORK INSPIRING

Koussevitzky, Dominant Figure, Furnishes Leadership of Never-Lagging Virility.

PROGRAM CHOICE MARKS BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL

Old Standards of Quality Maintained in Orchestra With New Elements of Interest.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in this city, attracted a large audience to the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, all seeing intent on paying tribute to Sergei Koussevitzky and his skilled musicians who have meant so much in the musical life of this city for so many years. The concert was under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who is to be congratulated on presenting one of the most inspirational and interesting musical events of the entire season.

These concerts have always been highly successful, and yesterday's proved no exception. Whether directed by Muck, Fiedler, Monteux, or any of their predecessors the Boston orchestra has always been one of the chief factors in the development of better music in this city, and it is to be regretted that only one concert can be given each season, instead of the three which at one time were scheduled. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an enthusiastic welcome.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of unusual interest. Out of respect to the Beethoven centenary, which is being generally observed this year by the entire musical world, the "Third Symphony" of that great composer, commonly known as the "Eroica" was played. There were also compositions by Prokofieff, Debussy, Wagner and Jean Sibelius. There was no soloist, thus affording more time for orchestral music than is usual on such a program.

Mr. Koussevitzky was the dominant and all interesting figure of the afternoon. While there may be a few who question his music judgment, none can dispute his authority and his mastery of the situation. Under his inspired leadership the Boston orchestra is always a colorful and dramatic organization. His leadership is of the virile sort, never lagging, and always having the idea uppermost of carrying out to the fullest extent the unusual and unique ideas for which he has invariably been noted wherever he has appeared. The Boston orchestra has always been one of the really great orchestras of the world. Under his leadership former standards have been successfully maintained, and there has entered a new element of interest which has added to the versatility and the dramatic possibilities of every program.

There are those who insist that the "Eroica" is not the greatest symphony written by Beethoven. There are many who prefer the "Fifth," while devotees of choral music are prone to admire the "Ninth" beyond all others. But there is much to venerate and respect in the "Eroica," which was given an altogether unique, yet satisfactory performance yesterday. The stirring opening "Allegro" was splendidly played, and it provided just the proper atmosphere for the beginning of a program which was to be of an exceptional character throughout. The lovely "Marcia Funebre" was beautifully and reverently done, and its rendition was in many ways one of the most effective of the afternoon. Effects in shading and in tone building were remarkable for their clarity, and each melody was distinctly outlined. The sparkling "Scherzo" was one of the most popular incidents. The "Finale" was also done with a brilliancy and a steadfast devotion to the traditions of Beethoven which left a pleasing impression.

Second Half.

Following the intermission Mr. Koussevitzky presented the unfamiliar "Suite" from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," by Prokofieff, one of the most capable of all modern Russian composers. Five movements from the suite were played, "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." The suite as played yesterday was edited by Albert Spaulding, famous American violinist. Its weird, unusual harmonies had adequate setting, and it was in every way a decided novelty.

Another number in a lovely atmosphere was the "Nocturne," by Claude Debussy, known as "Fetes." This, one of three "Nocturnes" written by this noted French composer. It was exquisitely played, and the impression left was altogether favorable, so effective was the interpretive genius of Koussevitzky displayed throughout.

Undoubtedly the most popular number with the audience was the familiar "Prelude" to the opera, "Lohengrin," by Wagner. This was splendidly played, and at its conclusion the conductor generously shared the prolonged applause with his men.

The program was brought to a conclusion with the rendition of the too frequently heard symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, most capable of all Finnish composers. Under the magic baton of a Koussevitzky the work became a thing of tense dramatic beauty, and it was in every way a rendition which did ample justice to the occasion, providing just the proper climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 7 - 1927

Koussevitzky Orchestra In Superb Form

Third Symphony of Beethoven Heads Magnificently Played Program by Boston Artists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played magnificently at the Capitol Theater yesterday and music lovers who failed to attend missed one of the greatest musical events; for the coming of a great orchestra is an outstanding event in the musical history of any city, and Hartford has all too few orchestral concerts.

The orchestra was in fine form and Mr. Koussevitzky again showed not only his grace and charm of direction but his splendid sense of values and his eloquent uses of contrasts in his readings. The audience was of large size and extraordinarily enthusiastic and at the conclusion of the concert the conductor was called again and again to the stage, the members of the orchestra rising to receive the applause with him.

Beethoven's glorious Third Symphony headed the program and from the very first delightful smoothness of tone in all of the orchestra's choirs was in evidence. The reading brought forth each shadowy grace of melody in the allegro and the magnificent funeral march had dignity and stateliness of rendition wholly worthy of the great music that, though first played at the beginning of the nineteenth century, firmly holds its place as the work of a transcendent genius.

Some of the loveliest playing of the afternoon came in the second theme of the movement. The tremendous fugue that follows had clarity and strength and the scherzo and finale were brilliantly given. It does not matter greatly whether or not Beethoven finally wished his work understood as dedicated to the greatness of Napoleon. It stands dedicated as a part of an enduring monument to the genius who created its greatness of musical thought and expression, and the conductor who reads it and the orchestra that plays it as it was read and played yesterday nobly carry on the best traditions of the great composer.

The "novelty" of yesterday's program was Prokofieff's suite from the opera "The Love of the Three Oranges," and musical strangeness as marked as Beethoven's sanity rules in the work. Probably not a few in the audience had heard the suite as it came in by radio from Symphony Hall a while ago, and they doubtless felt after the rendition yesterday that seeing Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the strange music made a much greater impression than any mere hearing could make.

—

The first of the series of sketches making up the suite bears the title "Les Ridicules," but does not need the name to prove its downright humor. The "Marche" is angular, clever, diabolical, a hint of the devil of war himself, and the scherzo is delightful. In the lovely pastoral chords preceding a gracious viola passage over shivering strings; there are strange harmonies and complicated dissonances and there is an unresolved chord at last. And finally, in "La Fuite," there is an absolute hurricane of playing that carries its audience quite out of the realms of reality in music.

That Debussy should seem even a little downright in his orchestration after Prokofieff is a commentary on the work of the modern which progresses so rapidly if so strangely withal. The "Fetes" nocturne was played con amore by the orchestra with delightfully effective handling of the oncoming melody of trumpets and drums to its splendidly effective climax; and then came yet another phase of composition, as exemplified in Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, a dream from quite another world built fro mthe whiteness of the divided whisperings of the violins to the vividness of the heaven-rending power of the full orchestra. Here the reading was eloquent and beautiful, imbued with the spirit as well as form of the music. Again, as after the symphony, the players of the orchestra were called on to acknowledge their share of the applause.

The final number was the brave "Finlandia" of Sibelius, with its frequent calls on the fortissimo brasses and percussion and its exquisite melody for strings and woodwinds, and the playing brought out all the graces and delights of the work.

Mr. Sedgwick is to be thanked for bringing the Boston orchestra here for the concert. It is much to be regretted that every seat in the big theater was not taken when the first measures of the symphony were sounded and that even the late comers did not fill the house to capacity.

[illegible] a son, [illegible] school in Monroe, Mich.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Globe
FEB 7 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY CONCERT

Orchestra Plays Program of Russian Music

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave as the third of its Tuesday series a concert of Russian music instead of the English and Scandinavian program originally announced, which has been postponed until the fourth concert, to be given March 1.

Yesterday's program, with the exception of Musorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina"—a charmingly limpid and meditative mood-picture drawn with the fewest possible lines and tints—was composed of works aiming at various kinds of striking external effect, brilliant, grotesque, coloristic, dramatic, romantic.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's tone-picture "Sadko," op. 5, which has been described, so the program notes tell us, as the first Russian symphonic poem, was written in 1867, when the composer was a young man of 23. It is not surprising, therefore, that it should contain crudities and betray an immature taste. Rather it is astonishing to find in it already so many signs of the genius for orchestration for which he was to become famous.

Prokofieff's suite, op. 33 bis, from the opera "The Love For Three Oranges," from which three movements were played, shows the composer's command, not only of orchestral effect, but also of compact and well-balanced form. It is in parody and the grotesque that his talent is strongest and most original, as in the amusing "March" and the delightful "Scherzo." In the tender and sentimental "La Prince et la Princesse" he is more than a little reminiscent of Ravel.

Stravinsky was represented by three movements from his "Fire-Bird" suite, music extraordinary for its evocative power, its wealth of original and suggestive orchestral and harmonic effects; for its mysterious beauty.

The second half of the program was occupied by Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, in F minor, op. 36. Its first movement, which the composer thought the most important, sounds today little better than empty and noisy bombast, interspersed with moments of maudlin sentimentality.

The Andantino has a simple charm, however, the Scherzo, with its rushing pizzicato, for all the strings is novel and exhilarating, and the finale fiery and extremely brilliant.

To the whole program Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra brought a degree of enthusiasm and brilliant execution that carried the audience away and drew from it prolonged and excited applause.

[illegible]rge audience to the Capitol theater yesterday afternoon, all seeing intent on paying tribute to Sergei Koussevitzky and his skilled musicians who have meant so much in the musical life of this city for so many years. The concert was under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, who is to be congratulated on presenting one of the most inspirational and interesting musical events of the entire season.

These concerts have always been highly successful, and yesterday's proved no exception. Whether directed by Muck, Fiedler, Monteux, or any of their predecessors the Boston orchestra has always been one of the chief factors in the development of better music in this city, and it is to be regretted that only one concert can be given each season, instead of the three which at one time were scheduled. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an enthusiastic welcome.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of unusual interest. Out of respect to the Beethoven centenary, which is being generally observed this year by the entire musical world, the "Third Symphony" of that great composer, commonly known as the "Eroica" was played. There were also compositions by Prokofieff, Debussy, Wagner and Jean Sibelius. There was no soloist, thus affording more time for orchestral music than is usual on such a program.

Mr. Koussevitzky was the dominant and all interesting figure of the afternoon. While there may be a few who question his music judgment, none can dispute his authority and his mastery of the situation. Under his inspired leadership the Boston orchestra is always a colorful and dramatic organization. His leadership is of the virile sort, never lagging, and always having the idea uppermost of carrying out to the fullest extent the unusual and unique ideas for which he has invariably been noted wherever he has appeared. The Boston orchestra has always been one of the really great orchestras of the world. Under his leadership former standards have been successfully maintained, and there has entered a new element of interest which has added to the versatility and the dramatic possibilities of every program.

There are those who insist that the "Eroica" is not the greatest symphony written by Beethoven. There are many who prefer the "Fifth," while devotees of choral music are prone to admire the "Ninth" beyond all others. But there is much to venerate and respect in the "Eroica," which was given an altogether unique, yet satisfactory performance yesterday. The stirring opening "Allegro" was splendidly played, and it provided just the proper atmosphere for the beginning of a program which was to be of an exceptional character throughout. The lovely "Marcia Funebre" was beautifully and reverently done, and its rendition was in many ways one of the most effective of the afternoon. Effects in shading and in tone building were remarkable for their clarity, and each melody was distinctly outlined. The sparkling "Scherzo" was one of the most popular incidents. The "Finale" was also done with a brilliancy and a steadfast devotion to the traditions of Beethoven which left a pleasing impression.

Second Half.

Following the intermission Mr. Koussevitzky presented the unfamiliar "Suite" from the opera, "The Love For Three Oranges," by Prokofieff, one of the most capable of all modern Russian composers. Five movements from the suite were played, "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." The suite as played yesterday was edited by Albert Spaulding, famous American violinist. Its weird, unusual harmonies had adequate setting, and it was in every way a decided novelty.

Another number in a lovely atmosphere was the "Nocturne," by Claude Debussy, known as "Fetes." This, one of three "Nocturnes" written by this noted French composer. It was exquisitely played, and the impression left was altogether favorable, so effective was the interpretive genius of Koussevitzky displayed throughout.

Undoubtedly the most popular number with the audience was the familiar "Prelude" to the opera, "Lohengrin," by Wagner. This was splendidly played, and at its conclusion the conductor generously shared the prolonged applause with his men.

The program was brought to a conclusion with the rendition of the too frequently heard symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius, most capable of all Finnish composers. Under the magic baton of a Koussevitzky the work became a thing of tense dramatic beauty, and it was in every way a rendition which did ample justice to the occasion, providing just the proper climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM [illegible]DGEPORT, CONN.
POST
FEB 5 - 1927

NOTED ITALIAN TO LEAD POP CONCERTS

BOSTON, Feb. 5—(AP) [illegible] Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop Concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. The Pop Concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra made up of members of the Symphony Orchestra plays programs made up of classic and lighter music. [illegible] Cassella appeared in [illegible] twice last month as [illegible]

HARTFORD-TIMES
FEB — 7

BOSTON SYMPHONY WORK INSPIRING

Koussevitzky, Dominant Figure, Furnishes Leadership of Never-Lagging Virility.

PROGRAM CHOICE MARKS BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL

Old Standards of Quality Maintained in Orchestra With New Elements of Interest.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in this city, attracted a

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
FEB 9 - 1927

MUSIC IN

JAZZ IN A CONCERT HALL

Special to The Mail and Empire.

New York, Feb. 8.—The week was distinctly an orchestral one and most of the interesting things were done at orchestral concerts.

The Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky at the helm, made two appearances, featuring at the first, the epitome of cacaphony in Aaron Copland's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with the composer playing the solo part. The work itself remains the most striking of all attempts so far to acclimatize jazz in the concert hall. It has real abandon, spirit of diablerie and don't-care-ness. It also possesses audacity, effrontery, vulgarity, and with all these peressential qualities, a definiteness that its predecessors have lacked, all of them being tentative and not sure of themselves like a debutante at a ball where she did not feel that she really belonged. Mr. Copland seems equally sure of himself and of his material in spite of the fact that there were passages that unavoidably suggested Carpenter's Skyscrapers though these were given a much sharper edge. The piece is in two sections and has no programmatic explanations which is a point in its favor.

With this, Mr. Koussevitzky gave Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony a work in which the composer is quoted as saying that he was writing in the spirit of Mozart. The joke of it all is that he really has done just this thing and the piece is full of pretty tunes. What a pity Mr. Prokofieff does not attempt more frequently to imitate Mozart!

The remainder of the program included Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto and Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, making all in all, a study in contrasts that could hardly be equalled.

Toscanini Well Again.

Arturo Toscanini finally came out of retirement to conduct three concerts, two of them consisting of First and Ninth Symphonies and the other of a program which included the Third and Fifth Symphonies. These somewhat heavy programs served the double purpose of paying tribute to the Centenary of Beethoven and also to give Mr. Toscanini a program that included little or no rehearsing. The playing of the "Eroica" was one to bring out all that the composer put into the work. Personally, your correspondent is not fond of this work. It seems over-long and not especially interesting in content, but there are many who really enjoy it. In the Fifth, Mr. Toscanini revelled in the little melodic bits and brought out hidden melodies in this instrument and that in the way that he is so fond of doing and for which he was so criticized in the days when he led Tristan and Meistersinger at the Metropolitan. Needless to say, he Siegfried Idyll seemed to go too fast now and then, its length is such that any conductor may be pardoned for trying to get to the end in a not unreasonable time. The Symphony was played without the mawkish sentimentality which many conductors seem to feel necessary for its proper interpretation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 9 - 1927

Casella Signs to Be "Pop" Conductor

Italian Will Lead Boston Orchestra for Season Opening in May.

BOSTON, Feb. 9—(AP) Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and instaling tables. At the Pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra of members of the Symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classic and lighter music.

Casella appeared in Symphony Hall twice last month as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. His ballet "La Giara" is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
FEB 9 - 1927

CASELLA TO LEAD POPS

BOSTON, Feb. 9. — (AP) — Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the pop concerts in Symphony hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra the floor of Symphony hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. At the pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra made up of members of the Symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classic and lighter mulc.

Casella appeared in Symphony hall twice last month as guest conductor of the Symphony orchestra. His ballet "La Giara" is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
FEB 9 - 1927

For the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday of this week Mr. Koussevitzky has set three pieces on the program. One of them is a set of variations on a theme by the Dutch composer Valerius written by Mr. Langendoe, a member of the orchestra. Doubtless these differ in style and in treatment from Elgar's "Enigma Variations" which are also listed for performance. In the Brahms Pianoforte Concerte in B-flat major Mr. Rosenthal will play the solo part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 9 - 1927

Casella Will Conduct Boston Pop Concerts

BOSTON, Feb. 9 (A. P.).—Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. At the Pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra made up of members of the was received with the wildest enthusiasm from a capacity audience.

NEW YORK

By John Alan Haughton.

In the two performances of the Ninth Symphony, Mr. Toscanini had the assistance of the Schola Cantorum together with Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass, for the solo parts. There was in the great Italian conductor's playing of this work which many consider the last word in symphonic music, an intermingling of thematic distinction and large, powerful values, which made the result something very grand, somewhat unusual and almost overwhelming.

A Vaughan Williams' Novelty.

Mr. Koussevitzky at his Saturday concert gave a fine performance of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony together with the Prokofieff, repeated from Thursday's concert, Handel's Concerto Grosso and one of Vaughan Williams' Norfolk Rhapsodies, which was a novelty though not advertised as such. Mr. Williams' piece, said to be built upon Norfolk Folk themes, is agreeable, harmless music, well scored and pleasant to listen to. The themes themselves are short and sound, for the most part like bird calls, but they have an individual charm for all that.

The New York Symphony came back to its home town after a fortnight on the road, and gave a concert in the Mecca Auditorium under Otto Klemperer. The program was almost a "popular" one, being made up of Wagner's Meistersinger Overture and Siegfried Idyll, and the Pathetic Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Mr. Klemperer gave a scholarly reading to each of these works. The Meistersinger was especially well played and if the symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classic and lighter music.

Casella appeared in Symphony Hall twice hall month as guest conductor of the symphony orchestra. His ballet "La Giara" is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 10 1927

POP CONCERTS GET CASELLA

Italian Composer to Be Conductor of Boston Series Opening May 2.

BOSTON, Feb. 9 (AP).—Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. At the Pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra composed of members of the symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classical and lighter music.

Casella appeared in Symphony Hall twice last month as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. His ballet "La Giara," is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 12 1927

SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT HERE TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of its season here next Tuesday evening, in the Albee theatre, at 8:15. As soloists at this concert, Harriet Van Emden, the noted soprano, will sing three arias of interest, Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Debussy's air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's air from "Snegourotchka."

The symphony of the program will be the second of Brahms in D-major, one of the most melodious, poetic and delightful of this master's scores which by a curious chance, has not been performed in Providence for a number of years. Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Sebastian Bach which is played by three string orchestras. The Russian conductor will also present the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's love drama, "Tristan and Isolde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 12 1927

Boston Symphony to Feature Music of Johannes Brahms

Moris Rosenthal Will Be Assisting Soloist in Program from WBZ This Evening.

Tonight's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations WBZ and KDKA through the courtesy of W. S. Quimby of Boston will assume the aspect of a Brahm Festival. The program is made up entirely of compositions of Johannes Brahms. Three of his works will be presented. The first is the "Tragic" Overture, opus 81, and the second is the Concerto in B flat major for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 83. The concluding composition is Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73.

In the concerto for pianoforte, the orchestra will be assisted by Moriz Rosenthal, internationally famous pianist, who appears as guest soloist for the occasion. Mr. Rosenthal has been heard throughout the country in concert appearances which have won for him a legion of admirers because of his flawless technique, a singing tone and faultless phrasing.

Just before the opening of the concert, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will address the radio audience in an informal talk, illustrating the various themes of the compositions to be played, with a view to assisting the radio audience to a greater enjoyment of each number. Prof. Marshall will also be heard during the intermission, at which time he will be assisted by Roland E. Partridge, who will sing two songs by Brahms, In addition he will be assisted in his musical illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete program for this evening follows:

Overture, "Tragic," Op. 81, Brahms
Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 83, Brahms

Allegro non troppo.
Allegro appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto grazioso.

Intermission.

Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 73, Brahms

Allegro non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
Allegro con spirito.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 12 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Moriz Rosenthal, Pianist, to Appear as Guest Soloist for Local Broadcast

Tonight's program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be broadcast by WBZ, will assume the aspect of a Brahms festival, since the program is made up in its entirety of compositions of the old master, Johannes Brahms. Three of his works will be presented. The first is the "Tragic" overture, opus 81, and the second is the Concerto in B flat major for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 83. The concluding composition is Brahms' Symphony No 2 in D major, opus 73.

In the concerto for pianofore, the orchestra will be assisted by Moriz Rosenthal, internationally famous pianist, who appears as guest soloist for the occasion. Mr Rosenthal has been heard throughout the country in concert appearances which have won for him a legion of admirers because of his flawless technique, a singing tone and faultless phrasing.

Just before the opening of the concert, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston university and Holy Cross college will again address the radio audience in an informal talk illustrating the various themes of the compositions to be played, with a view to assisting the radio audience to a greater enjoyment of each number. Prof Marshall will again be heard during the intermission at which time he will be assisted by Roland E. Partridge who will sing two songs by Brahms, a great song writer of the 19th century as well as a great orchestral composer. In addition, he will be assisted in his musical illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 12 1927

Boston Symphony to Feature Music of Johannes Brahms

Moris Rosenthal Will Be Assisting Soloist in Program from WBZ This Evening.

Tonight's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations WBZ and KDKA through the courtesy of W. S. Quimby of Boston will assume the aspect of a Brahm Festival. The program is made up entirely of compositions of Johannes Brahms. Three of his works will be presented. The first is the "Tragic" Overture, opus 81, and the second is the Concerto in B flat major for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 83. The concluding composition is Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73.

In the concerto for pianoforte, the orchestra will be assisted by Moriz Rosenthal, internationally famous pianist, who appears as guest soloist for the occasion. Mr. Rosenthal has been heard throughout the country in concert appearances which have won for him a legion of admirers because of his flawless technique, a singing tone and faultless phrasing.

Just before the opening of the concert, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will address the radio audience in an informal talk, illustrating the various themes of the compositions to be played, with a view to assisting the radio audience to a greater enjoyment of each number. Prof. Marshall will also be heard during the intermission, at which time he will be assisted by Roland E. Partridge, who will sing two songs by Brahms. In addition he will be assisted in his musical illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete program for this evening follows:

Overture, "Tragic," Op. 81, Brahms
Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 83, Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 13 1927

Allegro non troppo.
Allegro appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto grazioso.

Intermission.

Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 73, Brahms

Allegro non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
Allegro con spirito.

Ottorino [illegible] will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's pair of concerts in its home town. The Italian composer will play his piano concerto "in the Mixolydian mode" as an opening number, for which his place at the baton will be taken by a colleague and fellow-countryman, Alfredo Casella.

Respighi will conduct his second suite of "Old Airs and Dances for the Lute"; his overture, "Belfagor," and his "Il Tramonto" after Shelley's poem, with soprano solo by Mme. Elsa Respighi.

96

PING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1927

Boston Symphony Play Second

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH

Abandoning his original intention of playing the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted for that familiar work a symphony unplayed in Providence since 1914, namely the Second of Brahms. A mere trick of circumstance, surely, that has been responsible for such oversight, since this particular symphony is in general alike favored of conductors and beloved of audiences.

Long awaited, much heralded and received with both astonishment and acclaim, the first of Brahms's four symphonies, that in C-minor, a work truly monumental, was first performed in November, 1876. By the next summer Brahms was at work on its successor, although that fact was unknown even to his intimates, and by December of that year (1877) the symphony was introduced to the Viennese public, under the direction of Hans Richter.

The disappointment experienced by most of Brahms's admirers when confronted with his newest symphonic creation is today an old story. After the epic, heaven-storming C minor Symphony, this Second in D major seemed to them so unimpressive and so unpretentious as to betoken a lessening of the composer's powers. Only Edouard Hanslick, implacable foe of Wagner but warm supporter of Brahms, discerned the symphony's true quality. And today the whole world sustains his judgment.

If the First Symphony is heroic in mood and utterance, the Second is predominantly lyric, poetic, fanciful. A gentle suavity almost Mendelssohnian pervades the first movement. There are, to be sure, moments of robustness and of vigor, but they serve chiefly to emphasize the idyllic character of the rest.

To many the second movement has proved a stumbling-block. Even the doughtful Hanslick found the ideas in the Adagio less interesting than the composer's treatment of them. But there is nevertheless beauty here; the grave, sober beauty that Brahms made so peculiarly his own.

Orchestra Will of Brahms

That eminent and caustic critic John F. Runciman did not care greatly for the music of Brahms. Yet even he could not dislike the lovely Allegretto grazioso that in this Second Symphony replaces the traditional Scherzo and which he compared to a wild rose. In this third movement the Brahms of the symphonies came as near as ever he did to writing in a popular vein. The chief theme, announced by the oboe, has the character of a folk-song and between the recurrences of this section come fairy-like prestos.

The most virile division of the symphony, the finale, begins in calm serenity but soon gains in force and vigor and it ends assertively, triumphantly.

Played in Providence by the Bostonians only last season under the direction of Eugene Goossens, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" needs no extended comment here. "The "Love Death" has been called the supreme page in music and not many would dissent greatly from such verdict. In this music Mr. Koussevitzky has more than once proved himself uncommonly eloquent.

Eloquent, too, are both conductor and orchestra in the piece that stands first on Tuesday's program and that, with two arias to be sung by Harriet Van Emden, completes that list, the third of the six so-called "Brandenburg" Concertos of Johann Sebastian Bach. Of it Sir Hubert Parry, than whom there is no higher authority, has written that it is "much the most remarkable of the group" in its reliance upon the effects obtained from three groups of three instruments—three violins, three violas and three 'cellos. "The grouping of three instruments is maintained almost invariably throughout with astonishing effects, so that the chord-passages of one group are constantly pitted against the chord-passages of another group, except where for variety and sonorous enforcement of some characteristic idea, the three like instruments are massed in unison. This artistic conception is superb and superbly carried out.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
FEB 9 - 1927

MUSIC IN

JAZZ IN A CONCERT HALL.

Special to The Mail and Empire.

New York, Feb. 8.—The week was distinctly an orchestral one and most of the interesting things were done at orchestral concerts.

The Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky at the helm, made two appearances, featuring at the first, the epitome of cacaphony in Aaron Copland's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with the composer playing the solo part. The work itself remains the most striking of all attempts so far to acclimatize jazz in the concert hall. It has real abandon, spirit of diablerie and don't-care-ness. It also possesses audacity, effrontery, vulgarity, and with all these peressential qualities, a definiteness that its predecessors have lacked, all of them being tentative and not sure of themselves like a debutante at a ball where she did not feel that she really belonged. Mr. Copland seems equally sure of himself and of his material in spite of the fact that there were passages that unavoidably suggested Carpenter's Skyscrapers though these were given a much sharper edge. The piece is in two sections and has no programmatic explanations which is a point in its favor. With this, Mr. Koussevitzky gave Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony a work in which the composer is quoted as saying that he was writing in the spirit of Mozart. The joke of it all is that he really has done just this thing and the piece is full of pretty tunes. What a pity Mr. Prokofieff does not attempt more frequently to imitate Mozart!

The remainder of the program included Bach's third Brantenburg Concerto and Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, making all in all, a study in contrasts that could hardly be equalled.

Toscanini Well Again.

Arturo Toscanini finally came out of retirement to conduct three concerts, two of them consisting of First and Ninth Symphonies and the other of a program which included the Third and Fifth Symphonies. These somewhat heavy programs served the double purpose of paying tribute to the Centenary of Beethoven and also to give Mr. Toscanini a program that included little or no rehearsing. The playing of the "Eroica" was one to bring out all that the composer put into the work. Personally, your correspondent is not fond of this work. It seems over-long and not especially interesting in content, but there are many who really enjoy it. In the Fifth, Mr. Toscanini revelled in the little melodic bits and brought out hidden melodies in this instrument and that in the way that he is so fond of doing and for which he was so criticized in the days when he led Tristan and Meistersinger at the Metropolitan. Needless to say, he

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 9 - 1927

Siegfried Idyll seemed to go too fast now and then, its length is such that any conductor may be pardoned for trying to get to the end in a not unreasonable time. The Symphony was played without the mawkish sentimentality which many conductors seem to feel necessary for its proper interpretation.

Casella Signs to Be "Pop" Conductor

Italian Will Lead Boston Orchestra for Season Opening in May.

BOSTON, Feb. 9—(AP) Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and instaling tables. At the Pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra of members of the Symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classic and lighter music.

Casella appeared in Symphony Hall twice last month as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. His ballet "La Giara" is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
FEB 9 - 1927

CASELLA TO LEAD POPS

BOSTON, Feb. 9. — (AP) — Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the pop concerts in Symphony hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The pop conderts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra the floor of Symphony hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. At the pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra made up of members of the Symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classic and lighter muic.

Casella appeared in Symphony hall twice last month as guest conductor of the Symphony orchestra. His ballet "La Giara" is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
FEB 9 1927

For the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday of this week Mr. Koussevitzky has set three pieces on the program. One of them is a set of variations on a theme by the Dutch composer Valerius written by Mr. Langendoe, a member of the orchestra. Doubtless these differ in style and in treatment from Elgar's "Enigma Variations" which are also listed for performance. In the Brahms Pianoforte Concerto in B-flat major Mr. Rosenthal will play the solo part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 9 - 1927

Casella Will Conduct Boston Pop Concerts

BOSTON, Feb. 9 (A. P.).—Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the close of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. At the Pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra made up of members of the was received with the wildest enthusiasm from a capacity audience.

NEW YORK

By John Alan Haughton.

In the two performances of the Ninth Symphony, Mr. Toscanini had the assistance of the Schola Cantorum together with Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass, for the solo parts. There was in the great Italian conductor's playing of this work which many consider the last word in symphonic music, an intermingling of thematic distinction and large, powerful values, which made the result something very grand, somewhat unusual and almost overwhelming.

A Vaughan Williams' Novelty.

Mr. Koussevitzky at his Saturday concert gave a fine performance of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony together with the Prokofieff, repeated from Thursday's concert, Handel's Concerto Grosso and one of Vaughan Williams' Norfolk Rhapsodies, which was a novelty though not advertised as such. Mr. Williams' piece, said to be built upon Norfolk Folk themes, is agreeable, harmless music, well scored and pleasant to listen to. The themes themselves are short and sound, for the most part like bird calls, but they have an individual charm for all that.

The New York Symphony came back to its home town after a fortnight on the road, and gave a concert in the Mecca Auditorium under Otto Klemperer. The program was almost a "popular" one, being made up of Wagner's Meistersinger Overture and Siegfried Idyll, and the Pathetic Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Mr. Klemperer gave a scholarly reading to each of these works. The Meistersinger was especially well played and if the Symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classic and lighter music.

Casella appeared in Symphony Hall twice hall month as guest conductor of the symphony orchestra. His ballet "La Giara" is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 10 1927

POP CONCERTS GET CASELLA

Italian Composer to Be Conductor of Boston Series Opening May 2.

BOSTON, Feb. 9 (AP).—Alfred Casella, noted Italian conductor and composer, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The season of these concerts will open May 2.

The Pop concerts are an institution in Boston. After the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season the floor of Symphony Hall is transformed by removing the regular seats and installing tables. At the Pop concerts refreshments are served and an orchestra composed of members of the symphony organization plays programs made up of a mixture of classical and lighter music.

Casella appeared in Symphony Hall twice last month as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. His ballet "La Giara," is about to be presented at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 12 1927

SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT HERE TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of its season here next Tuesday evening in the Albee theatre, at 8:15. As soloists at this concert, Harriet Van Emden, the noted soprano, will sing three arias of interest, Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Debussy's air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's air from "Snegourotchka."

The symphony of the program will be the second of Brahms in D-major, one of the most melodious, poetic and delightful of this master's scores which by a curious chance, has not been performed in Providence for a number of years. Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with the Third Brandenburg Concerto of Sebastian Bach which is played by three string orchestras. The Russian conductor will also present the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's love drama, "Tristan and Isolde."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 12 1927

Boston Symphony to Feature Music of Johannes Brahms

Moris Rosenthal Will Be Assisting Soloist in Program from WBZ This Evening.

Tonight's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations WBZ and KDKA through the courtesy of W. S. Quimby of Boston will assume the aspect of a Brahm Festival. The program is made up entirely of compositions of Johannes Brahms. Three of his works will be presented. The first is the "Tragic" Overture, opus 81, and the second is the Concerto in B flat major for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 83. The concluding composition is Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73.

In the concerto for pianoforte, the orchestra will be assisted by Moriz Rosenthal, internationally famous pianist, who appears as guest soloist for the occasion. Mr. Rosenthal has been heard throughout the country in concert appearances which have won for him a legion of admirers because of his flawless technique, a singing tone and faultless phrasing.

Just before the opening of the concert, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will address the radio audience in an informal talk, illustrating the various themes of the compositions to be played, with a view to assisting the radio audience to a greater enjoyment of each number. Prof. Marshall will also be heard during the intermission, at which time he will be assisted by Roland E. Partridge, who will sing two songs by Brahms. In addition he will be assisted in his musical illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete program for this evening follows:

Overture, "Tragic," Op. 81, Brahms
Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 83, Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Allegro appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto grazioso.
Intermission.
Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 73, Brahms
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
Allegro con spirito.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 12 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Moriz Rosenthal, Pianist, to Appear as Guest Soloist for Local Broadcast

Tonight's program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be broadcast by WBZ, will assume the aspect of a Brahms festival, since the program is made up in its entirety of compositions of the old master, Johannes Brahms. Three of his works will be presented. The first is the "Tragic" overture, opus 81, and the second is the Concerto in B flat major for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 83. The concluding composition is Brahms' Symphony No 2 in D major, opus 73.

In the concerto for pianofore, the orchestra will be assisted by Moriz Rosenthal, internationally famous pianist, who appears as guest soloist for the occasion. Mr Rosenthal has been heard throughout the country in concert appearances which have won for him a legion of admirers because of his flawless technique, a singing tone and faultless phrasing.

Just before the opening of the concert, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston university and Holy Cross college will again address the radio audience in an informal talk illustrating the various themes of the compositions to be played, with a view to assisting the radio audience to a greater enjoyment of each number. Prof Marshall will again be heard during the intermission at which time he will be assisted by Roland E. Partridge who will sing two songs by Brahms, a great song writer of the 19th century as well as great orchestral composer. In addition, he will be assisted in his musical illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 12 1927

Boston Symphony to Feature Music of Johannes Brahms

Moris Rosenthal Will Be Assisting Soloist in Program from WBZ This Evening.

Tonight's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations WBZ and KDKA through the courtesy of W. S. Quimby of Boston will assume the aspect of a Brahm Festival. The program is made up entirely of compositions of Johannes Brahms. Three of his works will be presented. The first is the "Tragic" Overture, opus 81, and the second is the Concerto in B flat major for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 83. The concluding composition is Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73.

In the concerto for pianoforte, the orchestra will be assisted by Moriz Rosenthal, internationally famous pianist, who appears as guest soloist for the occasion. Mr. Rosenthal has been heard throughout the country in concert appearances which have won for him a legion of admirers because of his flawless technique, a singing tone and faultless phrasing.

Just before the opening of the concert, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will address the radio audience in an informal talk, illustrating the various themes of the compositions to be played, with a view to assisting the radio audience to a greater enjoyment of each number. Prof. Marshall will also be heard during the intermission, at which time he will be assisted by Roland E. Partridge, who will sing two songs by Brahms. In addition he will be assisted in his musical illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete program for this evening follows:

Overture, "Tragic," Op. 81, Brahms
Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 83, Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 13 1927

Ottorino Respighi will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's pair of concerts in its home town. The Italian composer will play his piano concerto "in the Mixolydian mode" as an opening number, for which his place at the baton will be taken by a colleague and fellow-countryman, Alfredo Casella.

Respighi will conduct his second suite of "Old Airs and Dances for the Lute"; his overture, "Belfagor," and his "Il Tramonto" after Shelley's poem, with soprano solo by Mme. Elsa Respighi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1927

Boston Symphony Play Second

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH

Abandoning his original intention of playing the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky has substituted for that familiar work a symphony unplayed in Providence since 1914, namely the Second of Brahms. A mere trick of circumstance, surely, that has been responsible for such oversight, since this particular symphony is in general alike favored of conductors and beloved of audiences.

Long awaited, much heralded and received with both astonishment and acclaim, the first of Brahms's four symphonies, that in C-minor, a work truly monumental, was first performed in November, 1876. By the next summer Brahms was at work on its successor, although that fact was unknown even to his intimates, and by December of that year (1877) the symphony was introduced to the Viennese public, under the direction of Hans Richter.

The disappointment experienced by most of Brahms's admirers when confronted with his newest symphonic creation is today an old story. After the epic, heaven-storming C minor Symphony, this Second in D major seemed to them so unimpressive and so unpretentious as to betoken a lessening of the composer's powers. Only Edouard Hanslick, implacable foe of Wagner but warm supporter of Brahms, discerned the symphony's true quality. And today the whole world sustains his judgment.

If the First Symphony is heroic in mood and utterance, the Second is predominantly lyric, poetic, fanciful. A gentle suavity almost Mendelssohnian pervades the first movement. There are, to be sure, moments of robustness and of vigor, but they serve chiefly to emphasize the idyllic character of the rest.

To many the second movement has proved a stumbling-block. Even the doubtful Hanslick found the ideas in the Adagio less interesting than the composer's treatment of them. But there is nevertheless beauty here; the grave, sober beauty that Brahms made so peculiarly his own.

Orchestra Will of Brahms

That eminent and caustic critic John F. Runciman did not care greatly for the music of Brahms. Yet even he could not dislike the lovely Allegretto grazioso that in this Second Symphony replaces the traditional Scherzo and which he compared to a wild rose. In this third movement the Brahms of the symphonies came as near as ever he did to writing in a popular vein. The chief theme, announced by the oboe, has the character of a folk-song and between the recurrences of this section come fairy-like prestos.

The most virile division of the symphony, the finale, begins in calm serenity but soon gains in force and vigor and it ends assertively, triumphantly.

Played in Providence by the Bostonians only last season under the direction of Eugene Goossens, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" needs no extended comment here. "The "Love Death" has been called the supreme page in music and not many would dissent greatly from such verdict. In this music Mr. Koussevitzky has more than once proved himself uncommonly eloquent.

Eloquent, too, are both conductor and orchestra in the piece that stands first on Tuesday's program and that, with two arias to be sung by Harriet Van Emden, completes that list, the third of the six so-called "Brandenburg" Concertos of Johann Sebastian Bach. Of it Sir Hubert Parry, than whom there is no higher authority, has written that it is "much the most remarkable of the group" in its reliance upon the effects obtained from three groups of three instruments—three violins, three violas and three 'cellos. "The grouping of three instruments is maintained almost invariably throughout with astonishing effects, so that the chord-passages of one group are constantly pitted against the chord-passages of another group, except where for variety and sonorous enforcement of some characteristic idea, the three like instruments are massed in unison. This artistic conception is superb and superbly carried out.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 13 1927

MUSICAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of its season here next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. As soloist at this concert, Harriet Van Emden, the noted soprano, will sing three arias of interest. Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Debussy's air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's air from "Snegourotchka."

The symphony of this program will be the second of Brahms in D-major, one of the most melodious, poetic and delightful of this master's scores, which, by a curious chance, has not been performed in Providence for a number of years. Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with the Third

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of Boston Symphon Orchestra.

Brandenburg Concerto of Sebastia Bach, which is played by three-strin orchestras. The Russian conductor wi also present the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's love dram "Tristan and Isolde."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mrs. Caesar Misch, president of th State Federation of Musical Clubs, wi introduce the Melophonic Club when i gives its first public concert at Elks Auditorium Thursday evening, Sept. 1 presenting the opera "La Traviata," b Verdi.

MENTION

The soloists for the occasion are: An nie Mason Francis and Hazey Hi Hyde as Violetto; Ethel Griffin as Flora Helen Kavanaugh as Annina; John Val iquette as Alfredo; Joseph Smith as Ger mont; George Wahusky, Gaston; Ed ward Haxton, Baron Wouphol; Walte Fredericks as Marquis D'Obigny.

The Schubert Club will meet Monday morning at 10 o'clock at 613 Jackson uilding, and Mrs. Florence A. Goodrich will give a paper on "Harmony."

BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL.

A special Beethoven concert will be given in the hall of Commercial high school on the evening of Thursday, March 24, in commemoration of the death of Beethoven, and to celebrate he Beethoven Centennial.

Mrs. Caesar Misch, as President of the Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs, is sponsoring it for this large musical group which includes nearly all of the important musical s of the State.

Mr. Walter H. Butterfield, director of music in the Providence public schools, is planning four concerts during the week of March 20 for the high school students.

Mr. Gene Ware promises a Beethoven concert in Sayles' Hall, Brown University during that week.

THE MELOPHONIC CLUB

Mrs. Caesar Misch, president of the State Federation of Musical Clubs, will introduce the Melophonic Club when it gives its first public concert Thursday evening at the Elks Auditorium, presenting "La Traviata" by Verdi, in concert form with Arthur Hyde as conductor.

The soloists for the occasion are: Annie Mason Francis and Hazel Hix Hyde as Violetta; Ethel Griffin as Sylvia; Helen Kavanaugh as Annina; Jean Valiquette as Alfred, Joseph Smith as Germeut; George Walmsley as Gaston; Edward Haxton as Baron Duphol; Walter Fredericks. With a chorus of 70 voices an orchestra of 20 pieces. Mrs. Francis Sargent and Francis Mason are accompanists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ALBEE TUESDAY

Brilliant, Significant Program Promised for Final Concert of Season.

BRAHMS TO BE FEATURED

Harriet Van Emden to Be Soloist for Occasion.—Prelude to Tristan and Isolde, Famous Love Poem, to Be Rendered

The program for the final concert of the season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday night, promises to be brilliant and significant, although at present it is probably a probability, rather than a certainty. Throughout the entire season Mr. Koussevitsky seems to have found it difficult to settle betimes on a definite program for the Providence concerts, sending us one after another to go ringing down the grooves of change. Qua, Optime, peccavimus?

* * *

The piece de resistance of the evening, at present proposed, is the Brahms Symphony No. 2, D-major, Opus 73.

Brahms wrote the greater part of the Second Symphony during the summer of 1877. He speaks of it quite jocosely in November of that year: "The new symphony is merely a Sinfonie, and I shall not need to play it to you beforehand. You have only to sit down to the piano, put your small feet on the two pedals in turn, and strike the chord of F minor several times in succession, first in the treble, then in the bass (ff and pp) and you will gradually gain a vivid impression of my 'latest.'" He wrote again from Vienna the day before the first production: "The orchestra here play my new symphony with crepe bands on their sleeves because of its dirge-like effect. It is to be printed with a black edge, too." It was brought out Dec. 30, 1877, Hans Richter conducting, and met with unqualified success. Hanslick, one of the critics of the day, said of it: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to mediative seriousness. The first movement begins immediately with a mellow and dusky horn theme. It has something of the character of the serenade, and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale.

"The first movement, Allegro moderato in 3-4, immerses us in a clear wave of melody, upon which we rest, swayed refreshed, undisturbed by two slight Mendelssohnian reminiscences which emerge before us. The last 50 measures of this movement expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing Adagio in B major follows, which, as it appears to me, is more conspicuous for the skilful development of the themes than for the worth of the themes themselves. For this reason, undoubtedly, it makes a less profound impression upon the public than do den the other movements. The Scherzo is delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto in 2-4 which flashes, sparklike, for a moment. The Finale, in D 4-4, more vivacious, but always agreeable in its golden serenity, is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartian blood flows in its veins. * * * It is true that the second symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the first. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and its sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the first, and one that is not to be underestimated."

The soloist for the occasion is Harriet Van Emden, who will sing Mozart's Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for soprano, with violin obligato, Debussy's Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Air from Snegourotchka, "Aller au Bois."

The six concertos known as the "Brandenburg" were written for the Margrave Christian Ludwig, son of the great Electoral Prince, who was a great lover of music. Making Bach's acquaintance in 1719, and becoming enchanted with his playing, he asked him to compose some music for the orchestra that he maintained. Two years later Bach sent him these six concertos which experts have called the purest products of Bach's polyphonic style.

Taking as his ground-idea the old concerto, which develops the work by alternating a large volume of tone with a smaller, Bach attained a freedom of form and of voice-grouping that was never found in organ or clavier. The third concerto—the one on the programme—there is no wind ensemble because here Bach aims at no contrast of timbres. He makes use of three string trios, constructed in the same way.

* * *

In preparation for the Beethoven Centenary Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, March 22-29: Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Professor Archibald T. Davison, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, consider a difficult score. The two choirs are uniting with the Orchestra in performances of the Ninth Symphony and the Missa Solennis.

THE HERALD FEB 12

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Herald
FEB 16 1927

Deserved Au Revoir Given the Symphony

Fifth and Last Concert of t Boston Orchestra Here Last Evening

The fifth and last concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Pro dence was held last night in the E Albee Theatre, and M. Serge Kous vitsky, conductor, was given a fi tering and deserved au revoir.

There was some disappointment t a changed program prevented presentation of Beethoven's Fi Symphony. Brahm's Second Symph was substituted. For his centen Beethoven has been slighted in Pro dence. The Boston Symphony played only two of his works, overture to Goethe's Egmont and Third, or Eroica, Symphony. Ma when M. Koussevitsky returns n season, if the fund to carry the c certs through is raised, as it should he will allow us the pleasure of he ing the great German as he so a interprets him.

The program included Bach's Br denburg Concerto for the strings melodious, lilting and lovely bit wh needs no further words concerning essential loveliness. Harriet Van E den, soprano, sang Mozart's aria "No temer, amato bene," which was dis tinguished by the magnificent obligato of Concert-Master Burgin; Debussy's air of Lia from L'Enfant Prodiue, and the air "Aller au bois" from Rimsky-Korsakov's Snowmaiden.

What Miss Van Emden lacks in force she makes up in beauty of voice It has not much color to recommend it but it has sweetness. The number selected kept her within the possibili

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 16 1927

NEEDS $6000 GUARANTEE

Condition for Another Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony

If Providence music lovers will provide a guarantee fund of $6000 as they did a year ago to support the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the event of financial loss, concerts will be enjoyed for another year at the Albee Theatre, it was announced by the voluntary symphony concert committee last night. The announcement was made through the medium of printed slips in the programs for the last concert of the season.

Pledge cards were distributed, and already one pledge of $1000 has been made by Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield. A message of thanks from the orchestra trustees to E. F. Albee for the voluntary use of his theatre was contained in the program last night.

This money is needed to support the orchestra in event of financial loss Mr. Albee has again placed his thea tre at the disposal of the committe for a series of five concerts for nex year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZI
FEB 16 1927

To the regular concerts of th Boston Symphony orchestra Friday and Saturday this week will come as guest-conductor, composer of all the works on the program and as piano soloist in his Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra one of the foremost Italian musicians of the day, Ottorino Respighi. Last season and this his "Pines of Rome" has been featured by Mr. Koussevitzky in his programs in Boston and elsewhere. As closing piece on the program this week will be his "Fountains of Rome," given in Boston some years ago. New to Boston will be the Concerto in which he will play the piano solo, while the orchestra will be conducted by Alfredo Casella, who by the way has recently signed a contract to conduct the Pop concerts in Boston this season. For the first time in Boston also will be heard his free arrangement of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, a suite of four numbers for orchestra. Novelty also will be his "Il Tramonto" for soprano and orchestra, after Shelly's poem, in which Elsa Respighi will be soloist. The Overture to the Opera "Belfagor" will round out the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony Express Thanks To Local Theatre

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and prominent citizens of Providence, interested in that musical organization, have expressed their appreciation and thanks to E. F. Albee for placing his theatre in this city at the disposal of the orchestra for a series of concerts during the last season and for renewing the offer for next season.

It was announced at last night's concert, the final one of the year, that a guarantee fund of $6000 would be necessary before the orchestra could be brought to Providence next year.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1927

When Koussevitzk the Doul

Serge Koussevitzy has appeared, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in other cities than Boston and Providence, but in Providence alone has he ever appeared as soloist on his chosen instrument, the base viol, or double bass, as it is sometimes called, to its confusion if not humiliation.

For about a year ago, when Brown University, more awake, and more aware than her sisters of the doings of explorers in the far fields of the humanities, in recognition of M. Koussevitzky's contribution to musical interpretation, conferred on him the Doctor's degree, M. Koussevitzky, who might have made a bow or a five minutes speech or an hour's lecture, offered to play for the audience on the double bass, and thus express, in the universal language of music, an appreciation that he felt he could not so well express in English on account of his inexperience in the use of that Hyperborean tongue.

* * *

The press announced the coming event, but in so much as it explained that the double bass was that huge horn that one sometimes sees in the back row of symphony orchestras, no one was particularly interested, or touched with a thrill of anticipation. For where in a Tuba could romance ever hide?

Well, M. Koussevitzky became that afternoon by adoption a son of Brown, and having received his sheepskin, divested him[illegible] academic, and took unto himself a beautiful brown Italian viola di basso, which a very careful attendant brought from the anteroom, and proceeded at once to play a Sarabanda from one of Handel's violin sonatas. One measure was sufficient to give the audience a hint that something very unusual was astir, and two more proved that the something was of exceptional quality. No one present had ever heard such a tone. It was deep and resonant and rich and smooth—as fine as the tone of a 'cello G string—and as vocal as the voice of Edouard de Reszke, in his palmiest days.

...y Played ...ble Bass at Brown

* * *

M. Koussevitzky played the piece through with all the repeats, and added an Adagio from one of his own concertos for bass. This was a virtuoso affair. Starting on a note to which the 'cello player would not descend, it climbed, somehow, with the help of harmonics, higher than a violin has any right to go. And the deep tones, in spite of the thick, squashy strings, thrilled like an electric current. There was nothing muddy nor batrachian nor bull-fiddleish; but rather "Sweet articulate words "Sweetly divided apart."

The chapel at Brown University has heard much song and much speech during the century or more that it has stood upon its hill; but never a song so fluent, so sure of its path, and in its very restraint so confident as that M. Koussevitzky sang on his big fiddle that afternoon.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening saw the close of the ...ifth and last of the series of concerts ...iven at the Albee Theatre by the Bos...on Symphony Orchestra. Under the ...baton of Serge Koussevitzky the orchestra played on the whole with its usual brilliancy, although at times it seemed utterly weary. The program, somewhat more varied than usual, offered a soloist for added interest.

The program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra ..... Bach
Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for soprano, with violin obligato ..... Mozart
Prelude and Love-Death, "Trisian and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue" ..... Debussy
Air from "Snegourotchka" ("Snow-maiden"), "Aller au bois" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The most unusual number was the first, the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major, for string orchestra The music was brisk and vivid and serene, full of movement and a strong sense of direction. The marvel of the thing is how a man could take such a little theme and by sheer mental power make so much of it. What might he have done with the thematic material available today! The music, though easy to follow, was difficult to play. The entire string orchestra seemed to have all that it could do. Once in the first ...ord the first violins pushed the ...me

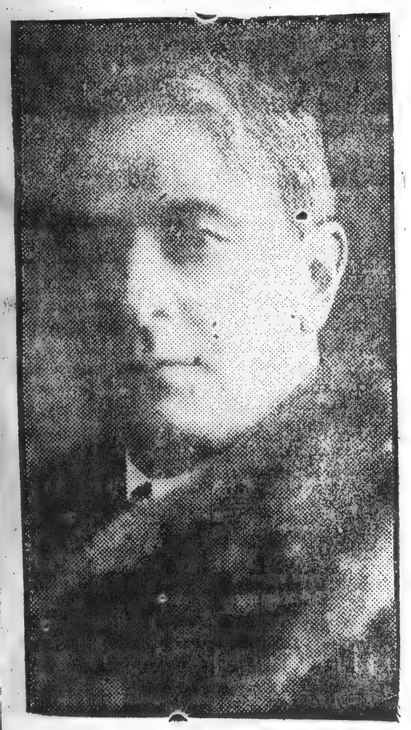
THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 13 1927

MUSICAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of its season here next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. As soloist at this concert, Harriet Van Emden, the noted soprano, will sing three arias of interest, Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Debussy's air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's air from "Snegourotchka."

The symphony of this program will be the second of Brahms in D-major, one of the most melodious, poetic and delightful of this master's scores which, by a curious chance, has not been performed in Providence for a number of years. Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with the Third

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY



Conductor of Boston Symphon Orchestra.

Brandenburg Concerto of Sebastia Bach, which is played by three-strin orchestras. The Russian conductor wi also present the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's love drama "Tristan and Isolde."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mrs. Caesar Misch, president of th State Federation of Musical Clubs, wi introduce the Melophonic Club when i gives its first public concert at Elks Auditorium Thursday evening, Sept. 1

MENTION

presenting the opera "La Traviata," b Verdi.

The soloists for the occasion are: An nie Mason, Francis and Hazey Hi: Hyde as Violetto; Ethel Griffin as Flora Helen Kavanaugh as Annina; John Val iquette as Alfredo; Joseph Smith as Ger mont; George Wahusky, Gaston; Ed ward Haxton, Baron Wouphol; Walte Fredericks as Marquis D'Obigny.

The Schubert Club will meet Monday norning at 10 o'clock at 613 Jackson uilding, and Mrs. Florence A. Goodrich will give a paper on "Harmony."

BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL.

A special Beethoven concert will be given in the hall of Commercial high school on the evening of Thursday, March 24, in commemoration of the death of Beethoven, and to celebrate he Beethoven Centennial.

Mrs. Caesar Misch, as President of the Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs, is sponsoring it for this large musical group which includes nearly all of the important musical as of the State.

Mr. Walter H. Butterfield, director of usic in the Providence public schools, s planning four concerts during the week of March 20 for the high school students.

Mr. Gene Ware promises a Beethoven concert in Sayles' Hall, Brown University during that week.

THE MELOPHONIC CLUB

Mrs. Caesar Misch, president of the State Federation of Musical Clubs, will introduce the Melophonic Club when it gives its first public concert Thursday evening at the Elks Auditorium, presenting "La Traviata" by Verdi, in concert form with Arthur Hyde as conductor.

The soloists for the occasion are: Annie Mason Francis and Hazel Hix Hyde as Violetta; Ethel Griffin as Sylvia; Helen Kavanaugh as Annina; Jean Valiquette as Alfred, Joseph Smith as Germeut; George Walmsley as Gaston; Edward Haxton as Baron Duphol; Walter Fredericks. With a chorus of 70 voices an orchestra of 20 pieces. Mrs. Francis Sargent and Francis Mason are accompanists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ALBEE TUESDAY

Brilliant, Significant Program Promised for Final Concert of Season.

BRAHMS TO BE FEATURED

Harriet Van Emden to Be Soloist for Occasion.—Prelude to Tristan and Isolde, Famous Love Poem, to Be Rendered

The program for the final concert of the season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday night, promises to be brilliant and significant, although at present it is probably a probability, rather than a certainty. Throughout the entire season Mr. Koussevitsky seems to have found it difficult to settle betimes on a definite program for the Providence concerts, sending us one after another to go ringing down the grooves of change. Qua, Optime, peccavimus?

* * *

The piece de resistance of the evening, at present proposed, is the Brahms Symphony No. 2, D-major, Opus 73.

Brahms wrote the greater part of the Second Symphony during the summer of 1877. He speaks of it quite jocosely in November of that year: "The new symphony is merely a Sinfonie, and I shall not need to play it to you beforehand. You have only to sit down to the piano, put your small feet on the two pedals in turn, and strike the chord of F minor several times in succession, first in the treble, then in the bass (ff and pp) and you will gradually gain a vivid impression of my 'latest.'" He wrote again from Vienna the day before the first production: "The orchestra here play my new symphony with crepe bands on their sleeves because of its dirge-like effect. It is to be printed with a black edge, too." It was brought out Dec. 30, 1877, Hans Richter conducting, and met with unqualified success. Hanslick, one of the critics of the day, said of it: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to mediative seriousness. The first movement begins immediately with a mellow and dusky horn theme. It has something of the character of the serenade, and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale.

"The first movement, Allegro moderato in 3-4, immerses us in a clear wave of melody, upon which we rest, swayed refreshed, undisturbed by two slight Mendelssohnian reminiscences which emerge before us. The last 50 measures of this movement expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing Adagio in B major follows, which, as it appears to me, is more conspicuous for the skillful development of the themes than for the worth of the themes themselves. For this reason, undoubtedly, it makes a less profound impression upon the public than do the other movements. The Scherzo is delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto in 2-4 which flashes, sparklike, for a moment. The Finale, in D 4-4, more vivacious, but always agreeable in its golden serenity, is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartian blood flows in its veins. * * * It is true that the second symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the first. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and its sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the first, and one that is not to be underestimated."

The soloist for the occasion is Harriet Van Emden, who will sing Mozart's Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for soprano, with violin obligato, Debussy's Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Air from Snegourotchka, "Aller au Bois."

The six concertos known as the "Brandenburg" were written for the Margrave Christian Ludwig, son of the great Electoral Prince, who was a great lover of music. Making Bach's acquaintance in 1719, and becoming enchanted with his playing, he asked him to compose some music for the orchestra that he maintained. Two years later Bach sent him these six concertos which experts have called the purest products of Bach's polyphonic style.

Taking as his ground-idea the old concerto, which develops the work by alternating a large volume of tone with a smaller, Bach attained a freedom of form and of voice-grouping that is never found in organ or clavier. In the third concerto—the one on this programme—there is no wind ensemble because here Bach aims at no contrast of timbres. He makes use of three string trios, constructed in the same way.

* * *

In preparation for the Beethoven Centenary Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, March 22-29: Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Professor Archibald T. Davison, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, consider a difficult score. The two choirs are uniting with the Orchestra in performances of the Ninth Symphony and the Missa Solennis.

THE HERALD FEB 14

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Deserved Au Revoir Given the Symphony

FEB 16 1927

Fifth and Last Concert of t Boston Orchestra Here Last Evening

The fifth and last concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Pro dence was held last night in the E. Albee Theatre, and M. Serge Kous vitsky, conductor, was given a fl tering and deserved au revoir.

There was some disappointment t a changed program prevented presentation of Beethoven's Fi Symphony. Brahm's Second Symph was substituted. For his centen Beethoven has been slighted in Pro dence. The Boston Symphony played only two of his works, overture to Goethe's Egmont and Third, or Eroica, Symphony. Ma when M. Koussevitsky returns season, if the fund to carry the c certs through is raised, as it should he will allow us the pleasure of he ing the great German as he so a interprets him.

The program included Bach's Br denburg Concerto for the strings melodious, lilting and lovely bit wh needs no further words concerning essential loveliness. Harriet Van E den, soprano, sang Mozart's aria "N temer, amato bene," which was dis tinguished by the magnificent obligato of Concert-Master Burgin; Debussy's air of Lia from L'Enfant Prodiue, and the air "Aller au bois" from Rimsky-Korsakov's Snowmaiden.

What Miss Van Emden lacks in force she makes up in beauty of voice It has not much color to recommend it but it has sweetness. The number selected kept her within the possibili-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 16 1927

NEEDS $6000 GUARANTEE

Condition for Another Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony

If Providence music lovers will provide a guarantee fund of $6000 as they did a year ago to support the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the event of financial loss, concerts will be enjoyed for another year at the Albee Theatre, it was announced by the voluntary symphony concert committee last night. The announcement was made through the medium of printed slips in the programs for the last concert of the season.

Pledge cards were distributed, and already one pledge of $1000 has been made by Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield. A message of thanks from the orchestra trustees to E. F. Albee for the voluntary use of his theatre was contained in the program last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZI

FEB 16 1927

To the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday and Saturday this week will come as guest-conductor, composer of all the works on the program and as piano soloist in his Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra one of the foremost Italian musicians of the day, Ottorino Respighi. Last season and this his "Pines of Rome" has been featured by Mr. Koussevitzky in his programs in Boston and elsewhere. As closing piece on the program this week will be his "Fountains of Rome," given in Boston some years ago. New to Boston will be the Concerto in which he will play the piano solo, while the orchestra will be conducted by Alfredo Casella, who by the way has recently signed a contract to conduct the Pop concerts in Boston this season. For the first time in Boston also will be heard his free arrangement of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, a suite of four numbers for orchestra. Novelty also will be his "Il Tramonto" for soprano and orchestra, after Shelly's poem, in which Elsa Respighi will be soloist. The Overture to the Opera "Belfagor" will round out the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony Express Thanks To Local Theatre

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and prominent citizens of Providence, interested in that musical organization, have expressed their appreciation and thanks to E. F. Albee for placing his theatre in this city at the disposal of the orchestra for a series of concerts during the past season and for renewing the offer for next season.

It was announced at last night's concert, the final one of the year, that a guarantee fund of $6000 would be necessary before the orchestra could be brought to Providence next year.

This money is needed to support the orchestra in event of financial loss Mr. Albee has again placed his theatre at the disposal of the committee for a series of five concerts for next year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1927

When Koussevitzk the Doul

Serge Koussevitzy has appeared, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in other cities than Boston and Providence, but in Providence alone has he ever appeared as soloist on his chosen instrument, the base viol, or double bass, as it is sometimes called, to its confusion if not humiliation.

For about a year ago, when Brown University, more awake, and more aware than her sisters of the doings of explorers in the far fields of the humanities, in recognition of M. Koussevitzky's contribution to musical interpretation, conferred on him the Doctor's degree, M. Koussevitzky, who might have made a bow or a five minutes speech or an hour's lecture, offered to play for the audience on the double bass, and thus express, in the universal language of music, an appreciation that he felt he could not so well express in English on account of his inexperience in the use of that Hyperborean tongue.

* * *

The press announced the coming event, but in so much as it explained that the double bass was that huge horn that one sometimes sees in the back row of symphony orchestras, no one was particularly interested, or touched with a thrill of anticipation. For where in a Tuba could romance ever hide?

Well, M. Koussevitzky became that afternoon by adoption a son of Brown, and having received his sheepskin, divested him[illegible] academic, and took unto himself a beautiful brown Italian viola di basso, which a very careful attendant brought from the anteroom, and proceeded at once to play a Sarabanda from one of Handel's violin sonatas. One measure was sufficient to give the audience a hint that something very unusual was astir, and two more proved that the something was of exceptional quality. No one present had ever heard such a tone. It was deep and resonant and rich and smooth—as fine as the tone of a 'cello G string—and as vocal as the voice of Edouard de Reszke, in his palmiest days.

y Played ble Bass at Brown

M. Koussevitzky played the piece through with all the repeats, and added an Adagio from one of his own concertos for bass. This was a virtuoso affair. Starting on a note to which the 'cello player would not descend, it climbed, somehow, with the help of harmonics, higher than a violin has any right to go. And the deep tones, in spite of the thick, squashy strings, thrilled like an electric current. There was nothing muddy nor batrachian nor bull-fiddleish; but rather "Sweet articulate words 'Sweetly divided apart.'"

The chapel at Brown University has heard much song and much speech during the century or more that it has stood upon its hill; but never a song so fluent, so sure of its path, and in its very restraint so confident as that M. Koussevitzky sang on his big fiddle that afternoon.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening saw the close of the fifth and last of the series of concerts given at the Albee Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky the orchestra played on the whole with its usual brilliancy, although at times it seemed utterly weary. The program somewhat more varied than usual, offered a soloist for added interest.

The program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra ..... Bach
Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for Soprano, with violin obligato ..... Mozart
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue" ..... Debussy
Air from "Snegourotchka," "Snow-maiden"), "Aller au bois" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The most unusual number was the first, the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major, for string orchestra. The music was brisk and vivid and serene, full of movement and a strong sense of direction. The marvel of the thing is how a man could take such a little theme and by sheer mental power make so much of it. What might he have done with the thematic material available today! The music, though easy to follow, was difficult to play. The entire string orchestra seemed to have all that it could do. Once in the first [illegible] the first violins pushed the [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 13 1927

MUSICAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of its season here next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15. As soloist at this concert, Harriet Van Emden, the noted soprano, will sing three arias of interest. Mozart's aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Debussy's air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's air from "Snegourotchka."

The symphony of this program will be the second of Brahms in D-major, one of the most melodious, poetic and delightful of this master's scores, which, by a curious chance, has not been performed in Providence for a number of years. Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with the Third

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Conductor of Boston Symphon Orchestra.

Brandenburg Concerto of Sebastia Bach, which is played by three-strin orchestras. The Russian conductor wi also present the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's love drama "Tristan and Isolde."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mrs. Caesar Misch, president of th State Federation of Musical Clubs, wi introduce the Melophonic Club when i gives its first public concert at Elks Auditorium Thursday evening, Sept. 1

MENTION

presenting the opera "La Traviata," b Verdi.

The soloists for the occasion are: An nie Mason, Francis and Hazey Hi Hyde as Violetto; Ethel Griffin as Flora Helen Kavanaugh as Annina; John Val iquette as Alfredo; Joseph Smith as Ger mont; George Wahusky, Gaston; Ed ward Haxton, Baron Wouphol; Walte Fredericks as Marquis D'Obigny.

The Schubert Club will meet Monday norning at 10 o'clock at 613 Jackson uilding, and Mrs. Florence A. Goodrich will give a paper on "Harmony."

BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL.

A special Beethoven concert will be given in the hall of Commercial high school on the evening of Thursday, March 24, in commemoration of the death of Beethoven, and to celebrate he Beethoven Centennial.

Mrs. Caesar Missch, as President of the Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs, is sponsoring it for this large musical group which includes nearly all of the important musical s of the State.

Mr. Walter H. Butterfield, director of usic in the Providence public schools, s planning four concerts during the week of March 20 for the high school students.

Mr. Gene Ware promises a Beethoven concert in Sayles Hall, Brown University during that week.

THE MELOPHONIC CLUB

Mrs. Caesar Misch, president of the State Federation of Musical Clubs, will introduce the Melophonic Club when it gives its first public concert Thursday evening at the Elks Auditorium, presenting "La Traviata" by Verdi, in concert form with Arthur Hyde as conductor.

The soloists for the occasion are: Annie Mason Francis and Hazel Hix Hyde as Violetta; Ethel Griffin as Sylvia; Helen Kavanaugh as Annina; Jean Valiquette as Alfred, Joseph Smith as Germaut; George Walmsley as Gaston; Edward Haxton as Baron Duphol; Walter Fredericks. With a chorus of 70 oices an orchestra of 20 pieces. Mrs. ancis Sargent and Francis Mason are accompanists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ALBEE TUESDAY

Brilliant, Significant Program Promised for Final Concert of Season.

BRAHMS TO BE FEATURED

Harriet Van Emden to Be Soloist for Occasion.—Prelude to Tristan and Isolde, Famous Love Poem, to Be Rendered

The program for the final concert of the season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday night, promises to be brilliant and significant, although at present it is probably a probability, rather than a certainty. Throughout the entire season Mr. Koussevitsky seems to have found it difficult to settle betimes on a definite program for the Providence concerts, sending us one after another to go ringing down the grooves of change. Qua, Optime, peccavimus?

* * *

The piece de resistance of the evening, at present proposed, is the Brahms Symphony No. 2, D-major, Opus 73.

Brahms wrote the greater part of the Second Symphony during the summer of 1877. He speaks of it quite jocosely in November of that year: "The new symphony is merely a Sinfonie, and I shall not need to play it to you beforehand. You have only to sit down to the piano, put your small feet on the two pedals in turn, and strike the chord of F minor several times in succession, first in the treble, then in the bass (ff and pp) and you will gradually gain a vivid impression of my 'latest.'" He wrote again from Vienna the day before the first production: "The orchestra here play my new symphony with crepe bands on their sleeves because of its dirge-like effect. It is to be printed with a black edge, too." It was brought out Dec. 30, 1877, Hans Richter conducting, and met with unqualified success. Hanslick, one of the critics of the day, said of it: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to mediative seriousness. The first movement begins immediately with a mellow and dusky horn theme. It has something of the character of the serenade, and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale.

"The first movement, Allegro moderato in 3-4, immerses us in a clear wave of melody, upon which we rest, swayed refreshed, undisturbed by two slight Mendelssohnian reminiscences which emerge before us. The last 50 measures of this movement expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing Adagio in B major follows, which, as it appears to me, is more conspicuous for the skillful development of the themes than for the worth of the themes themselves. For this reason, undoubtedly, it makes a less profound impression upon the public than do den the other movements. The Scherzo is delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto in 2-4 which flashes, spark-like, for a moment. The Finale, in D 4-4, more vivacious, but always agreeable in its golden serenity, is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartian blood flows in its veins. * * * It is true that the second symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the first. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and its sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the first and one that is not to be underestimated."

The soloist for the occasion is Harriet Van Emden, who will sing Mozart's Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for soprano, with violin obligato, Debussy's Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Air from Snegourotchka, "Aller au Bois."

The six concertos known as the "Brandenburg" were written for the Margrave Christian Ludwig, son of the great Electoral Prince, who was a great lover of music. Making Bach's acquaintance in 1719, and becoming enchanted with his playing, he asked him to compose some music for the orchestra that he maintained. Two years later Bach sent him these six concertos, which experts have called the purest products of Bach's polyphonic style.

Taking as his ground-idea the old concerto, which develops the work by alternating a large volume of tone with a smaller, Bach attained a freedom of form and of voice-grouping that he never found in organ or clavier. In the third concerto—the one on this programme—there is no wind ensemble, because here Bach aims at no contrast of timbres. He makes use of three string trios, constructed in the same way.

* * *

In preparation for the Beethoven Centenary Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, March 22-29: Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Professor Archibald T. Davison, leader of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, consider a difficult score. The two choirs are uniting with the Orchestra in performances of the Ninth Symphony and the Missa Solennis.

THE HARD FEB 14

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Deserved Au Revoir Given the Symphony

Fifth and Last Concert of the Boston Orchestra Here Last Evening

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence was held last night in the E. F. Albee Theatre, and M. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was given a flattering and deserved au revoir.

There was some disappointment that a changed program prevented the presentation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Brahm's Second Symphony was substituted. For his centenary Beethoven has been slighted in Providence. The Boston Symphony has played only two of his works, the overture to Goethe's Egmont and the Third, or Eroica, Symphony. Maybe when M. Koussevitsky returns next season, if the fund to carry the concerts through is raised, as it should be, he will allow us the pleasure of hearing the great German as he so ably interprets him.

The program included Bach's Brandenburg Concerto for the strings, a melodious, lilting and lovely bit which needs no further words concerning its essential loveliness. Harriet Van Emden, soprano, sang Mozart's aria "Non temer, amato bene," which was distinguished by the magnificent obligato of Concert-Master Burgin; Debussy's air of Lia from L'Enfant Prodiue, and the air "Aller au bois" from Rimsky-Korsakov's Snowmaiden.

What Miss Van Emden lacks in force she makes up in beauty of voice It has not much color to recommend it but it has sweetness. The number selected kept her within the possibilities of her voice.

Wagner's familiar Prelude and Love-Death from Tristan and Isolde completed the program.

ion for Another Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony rovidence music lovers will provide rantee fund of $6000 as they did a go to support the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the event of financial concerts will be enjoyed for an- year at the Albee Theatre, it was ced by the voluntary symphony committee last night. The an- ement was made through the m of printed slips in the programs he last concert of the season. ge cards were distributed, and al- one pledge of $1000 has been made rs. George St. J. Sheffield. A mes- of thanks from the orchestra trus- to E. F. Albee for the voluntary use s theatre was contained in the pro- last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZI
FEB 16 1927

the regular concerts of th Symphony orchestra Friday aturday this week will come as conductor, composer of all the on the program and as piano t in his Concerto for Pianoforte rchestra one of the foremost musicians of the day, Otto- Respighi. Last season and this Pines of Rome" has been feat- by Mr. Koussevitzky in his ams in Boston and elsewhere. osing piece on the program this will be his "Fountains of Rome," in Boston some years ago. New ston will be the Concerto in he will play the piano solo, the orchestra will be conduct- Alfredo Casella, who by the has recently signed a contract nduct the Pop concerts in Bos- his season. For the first time in n also will be heard his free ar- ment of Old Dances and Airs he Lute, a suite of four num- for orchestra. Novelty also will "Il Tramonto" for soprano and stra, after Shelly's poem, in Elsa Respighi will be soloist. Overture to the Opera "Belfagor" round out the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony Express Thanks To Local Theatre

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and prominent citizens of Providence, interested in that musical organization, have expressed their appreciation and thanks to E. F. Albee for placing his theatre in this city at the disposal of the orchestra for a series of concerts during the past season and for renewing the offer for next season.

It was announced at last night's concert, the final one of the year, that a guarantee fund of $6000 would be necessary before the orchestra could be brought to Providence next year.

This money is needed to support the orchestra in event of financial loss Mr. Albee has again placed his thea tre at the disposal of the committee for a series of five concerts for nex year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1927

When Koussevitzk the Doul

Serge Koussevitzy has appeared, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in other cities than Boston and Providence, but in Providence alone has he ever appeared as soloist on his chosen instrument, the base viol, or double bass, as it is sometimes called, to its confusion if not humiliation.

For about a year ago, when Brown University, more awake, and more aware than her sisters of the doings of explorers in the far fields of the humanities, in recognition of M. Koussevitzky's contribution to musical interpretation, conferred on him the Doctor's degree, M. Koussevitzky, who might have made a bow or a five minutes speech or an hour's lecture, offered to play for the audience on the double bass, and thus express, in the universal language of music, an appreciation that he felt he could not so well express in English on account of his inexperience in the use of that Hyperborean tongue.

* * *

The press announced the coming event, but in so much as it explained that the double bass was that huge horn that one sometimes sees in the back row of symphony orchestras, no one was particularly interested, or touched with a thrill of anticipation. For where in a Tuba could romance ever hide?

Well, M. Koussevitzky became that afternoon by adoption a son of Brown, and having received his sheepskin, divested him[illegible] academic, and took unto himself a beautiful brown Italian viola di basso, which a very careful attendant brought from the anteroom, and proceeded at once to play a Sarabanda from one of Handel's violin sonatas. One measure was sufficient to give the audience a hint that something very unusual was astir, and two more proved that the something was of exceptional quality. No one present had ever heard such a tone. It was deep and resonant and rich and smooth—as fine as the tone of a 'cello G string—and as vocal as the voice of Edouard de Reszke, in his palmiest days.

y Played ble Bass at Brown

M. Koussevitzky played the piece through with all the repeats, and added an Adagio from one of his own concertos for bass. This was a virtuoso affair. Starting on a note to which the 'cello player would not descend, it climbed, somehow, with the help of harmonics, higher than a violin has any right to go. And the deep tones, in spite of the thick, squashy strings, thrilled like an electric current. There was nothing muddy nor batrachian nor bull-fiddleish; but rather "Sweet articulate words "Sweetly divided apart."

The chapel at Brown University has heard much song and much speech during the century or more that it has stood upon its hill; but never a song so fluent, so sure of its path, and in its very restraint so confident as that M. Koussevitzky sang on his big fiddle that afternoon.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening saw the close of the fifth and last of the series of concerts given at the Albee Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky the orchestra played on the whole with its usual brilliancy, although at times it seemed utterly weary. The program somewhat more varied than usual, offered a soloist for added interest.

The program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra ..... Bach
Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for soprano, with violin obligato ..... Mozart
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue" ..... Debussy
Air from "Snegourotchka," ("Snow-maiden"), "Aller au bois" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The most unusual number was the first, the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major, for string orchestra The music was brisk and vivid and serene, full of movement and a strong sense of direction. The marvel of the thing is how a man could take such a little theme and by sheer mental power make so much of it. What might he have done with the thematic material available today! The music, though easy to follow, was difficult to play. The entire string orchestra seemed to have all that it could do. Once in the first [illegible] the first violins pushed the [illegible]

...soon adjusted themselves.

Harriet van Emden sang the Mozart Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," with violin obligato played by Mr. Burgin. Her voice was true but rather cold, and because of the ceaseless repetition of a few notes in the aria, became towards the end somewhat rough. Perhaps it is unfair to put a voice in such close competition with a Stradivari violin, for the violin is invariably more vocal, and never suffers from continued exertion. She sang the Debussy aria from L'Enfant Prodigue and the air from Rimsky-Korsakov's Snowmaiden with the finish that they demanded. Unfortunately she used notes, which ought to be the unpardonable sin of all singers. To start a tone and then look on the paper to see if the proper syllable is forthcoming has a tendency to shake the confidence of any listener or observer.

In the Prelude and Love-Death the orchestra was quite unequal in its efforts. Throughout the Prelude the 'cellos, where they needed the most gorgeous tone, displayed the deadest. One might have suspected, had he not known the facts, that the instruments were of a very poor quality. Not till the second movement of the Symphony did they display any of the beauty of tone that one expects from a large group of 'cellos; then they became alive and resonant and kept their beauty to the close of the concert.

The orchestra played the Brahms Symphony with great brilliancy, and to make it wholly ungermanic was the desideratum, this was attained to a generous magnitude. The first movement, Allegro no troppo, gave the 'cellos repeated opportunities to distinguish themselves, but they displayed little ambition. Their introduction, the broad singing theme that followed, and the further presentation of the formed theme elicited no fine tone that one expects in those passages. But in the second movement the spirit changed and a new life awoke throughout the orchestra. The third movement was played with great spirit, the work of the oboe, clarinets and bassoons, with the pizzicato accompaniment in the 'cellos being particularly effective.

The last movement, for all its brilliancy, is marred by a coda that seems much too long.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 16 1927

-:- MUSIC -:-

A Season Ends

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its last concert of the season at the Albee Theatre last night. It was a capricious concert which began well and ended well, but was dull—even at times irritating—in between.

Particularly irritating, to our mind, was the soloist whom M. Koussevitzky chose for the occasion, the only soloist of the season. It was not that Harriet Van Emden sang badly in any technical sense; indeed her technique was excellent. The trouble was that Miss Emden was at such pains to be correct that she sang without the least evidence of either intellectual or emotional interest in what she was singing. A pleasing, very limited voice she has, to be sure, and the audience applauded her generously. But we expect more than that from anyone who appears under the aegis of the brilliant M. Koussevitzky.

M. Koussevitzky himself was extremely brilliant last night in the Bach concerto with which he began and in the Brahms Symphony—the second—with which he concluded. But in between came the Prelude and Liebestod, "Tristan and Isolde," and what shall we say of the way M. Koussevitzky directed? Merely this; that if M. Koussevitzky's reading last night is right, every other important reading we have heard from Hans Richter's to Furtwaengler's has been wrong. It was not until near the end of the Liebestod that Koussevitzky made up his mind to give us the dramatic value of the music. Up to then he played as if the incomparable tragedy he had to express was a tempest in a sentimental teapot to be quieted by a liberal solution of sugar.

Perhaps it is because we think the Tristan drama the greatest achievement musical genius has ever reached and because we think there is no conductor living to whom we more readily grant genius than to M. Koussevitzky, that we left the Albee Theatre last night a little sick at heart. The memory of Bach's cold, intellectuality or of Brahms's warm, melodious subtleties could not wipe out that impossible essay at rewriting Wagner.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 16 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening saw the close of the fifth and last of the series of concerts given at the Albee Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky the orchestra played on the whole with its usual brilliancy, although at times it seemed utterly weary. The program somewhat more varied than usual, offered a soloist for added interest.

The program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra ..... Bach
Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," for soprano, with violin obligato ..... Mozart
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Air of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue" ..... Debussy
Air from "Snegourotchka" ("Snow-maiden"), "Aller au bois" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The most unusual number was the first, the Bach Brandenburg concerto No. 3, in G major, for string orchestra. The music was brisk and vivid and serene, full of movement and a strong sense of direction. The marvel of the thing is how a man could take such a little theme and by sheer mental power make so much of it. What might he have done with the thematic material available today! The music, though easy to follow, was difficult to play. The entire string orchestra seemed to have all that it could do. Once in the first part the first violins pushed the time to the discomfort of the violas, but they soon adjusted themselves.

Harriet van Emden sang the Mozart Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," with violin obligato played by Mr. Burgin. Her voice was true but rather cold, and because of the ceaseless repetition of a few notes in the aria, became towards the end somewhat rough. Perhaps it is unfair to put a voice in such close competition with a Stradivari violin, for the violin is invariably more vocal, and never suffers from continued exertion. She sang the Debussy aria from L'Enfant Prodigue and the air from Rimsky-Korsakov's Snowmaiden with the finish that they demanded. Unfortunately she used notes, which ought to be the unpardonable sin of all singers. To start a tone and then look on the paper to see if the proper syllable is forthcoming has a tendency to shake the confidence of any listener or observer.

In the Prelude and Love-Death the orchestra was quite unequal in its efforts. Throughout the Prelude the 'cellos, where they needed the most gorgeous tone, displayed the deadest. One might have suspected, had he not known the facts, that the instruments were of a very poor quality. Not till the second movement of the Symphony did they display any of the beauty of tone that one expects from a large group of 'cellos; then they became alive and resonant and kept their beauty to the close of the concert.

The orchestra played the Brahms Symphony with great brilliancy, and to make it wholly ungermanic was the desideratum, this was attained to a generous magnitude. The first movement, Allegro no troppo, gave the 'cellos repeated opportunities to distinguish themselves, but they displayed little ambition. Their introduction, the broad singing theme that followed, and the further presentation of the formed theme elicited no fine tone that one expects in those passages. But in the second movement the spirit changed and a new life awoke throughout the orchestra. The third movement was played with great spirit, the work of the oboe, clarinets and bassoons, with the pizzicato accompaniment in the 'cellos being particularly effective.

The last movement, for all its brilliancy, is marred by a coda that seems much too long.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 16 1927

$6000 TO ASSURE SYMPHONIES ASKED

Five Concerts to Be Given at Albee Theatre Next Season if Guarantee is Pledged.

GIFT OF $1000 PROMISED

Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield Starts Fund.—Providence Journal Company to Accept Subscriptions, Payable Sept. 15

Prividence for another year will enjoy the concerts of the Boston Sympany Orchestra at the Albee Theatre, provided that the citizens of Providence pledge $6000, as they did a year ago, as a guarantee fund to support the orchestra in event of financial loss.

This announcement was made by the voluntary Symphony Concert committee last night through printed slips in the programs for the last concert of the season. The committee further announced that $1000 toward this fund has already been promised by Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield.

Pledge cards distributed last night should be filled out and sent to the Treasurer of the Providence Journal, who, at the request of the committee, has consented to act as recipient. Since the pledges are not payable until Sept. 15, no checks or cash should be sent at this time.

Former plans to hold the concerts in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple were cancelled when it was learned that the new hall will not be ready until 1928. From the season of 1928-1929 on it is expected that the concerts will be given there.

Incorporated in last night's program was a message of thanks from the orchestra trustees to E. F. Albee for the use of his theatre, to the voluntary committee comprising Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary chairman, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Albert Fenner, Mrs. William Gammel, Jr., Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield and William L. Sweet "who raised a fund to 'buy out' five performances at this theatre," and to the Providence citizens "who generously responded to their appeal."

"The unprecedented interest in the concerts of the season now closing has amply justified their efforts," the message states.

"Mr. Albee has again offered his theatre, and the same committee is endeavoring to secure the necessary guarantee fund. If the five Tuesday evenings for next season are thus arranged, detailed announcements with an invitation for renewal will be mailed immediately to each subscriber."

Expressing pleasure at the success of the concerts this year and the developing musical taste and appreciation of Providence, Dr. Faunce pointed out, in a statement yesterday that "it is clear that concerts of such quality cannot be wholly self-supporting."

"The present season," he said, "has been made possible only by the generous gifts of certain individuals. A group of Masons contributed $3000 toward the expense of the concerts this winter—a gift which cannot be repeated. Others have given sums ranging from $10 to $1000. It is to be hoped that the response to our new plea will be just as enthusiastic."

Dr. Faunce was deeply appreciative of Mr. Albee's renewed offer to place his theatre at the disposal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the citizens of Providence for five Tuesday evenings next winter and declared it "especially gratifying this season that so large a number of seats has been available for music students at moderate prices—an arrangement that we hope may continue next year."

"The financial proceeds of the current season," he concluded, "will enable the committee to return to the guarantors possibly one-third of the sum guaranteed."

PROGRAMS FOR BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

TRAV FEB 19

Orchestral Programs to Begin March 23rd for One Week

The programs are announced for the Beethoven centenary festival to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, in Symphony hall from March 22 to 29.

The festival will open with the master's Missa Solennis, in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the following quartet of soloists: Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton.

On Wednesday, March 23, there will be an orchestral program consisting of the first three symphonies.

On Thursday, March 24, there will be a program of chamber music by the London string quartet and Carl Friedberg, the famous pianist. They will play a piano trio, a pianoforte sonata and a string quartet.

For the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 25 and 26 (which are regular subscription concerts), the fourth and fifth symphonies and the sixth and seventh symphonies, respectively, will be played.

On Monday, March 28, special tributes to the genius of Beethoven will be paid. One of the speakers will be Ernest Newman, the renowned authority and writer on musical subjects, who is coming from London for the occasion by special invitation. These exercises will be concluded by a performance of Beethoven's Final quartet, by the Lenox string quartet.

The festival will close of Tuesday, March 29, with the eight and ninth symphonies. In the choral finale of the ninth symphony the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

Subscriptions for the five extra concerts in this festival are still available.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give its 17th regular pair of concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 25 and 26.

The program will be as follows: Rimsky Korsakov's "Sadko"; Edward Elgar's "Enigma" variations; Sibelius's tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela," with English horn solo, and a tone poem of Respighi, "Stained Glass Windows." This score is the composer's latest. It was written for this orchestra and will be performed from the manuscript.

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

FEB

CASELLA CRAVES PUBLICITY

98

Alfredo Casella is an Italian musician, a composer and a conductor of unquestioned ability. His prestige is deserved and his selection as the regular conductor of the "Pops" during the coming season is a deserved tribute to his musical knowledge. MASS. GAZETTE

Casella would impress the people of Boston with his ability because he has it and because the people would recognize in him an Italian worthy of rank among the leading Italian composers and conductors of the present day.

But Casella has come to Boston, apparently with a craving for publicity. He has been here before. He is familiar with Boston and his selection as the conductor of the popular "Pops" is indicative of the estimate which the sponsors of these concerts place upon his ability.

There was no necessity for Casella uttering, in a recent interview, any expression of regret that he was unable to learn, during his last visit, just how beautiful Boston girls were. Neither did any necessity require him to discuss American jazz, American girls, music and Mussolini.

There is no relationship between jazz, women and Mussolini and Casella is intelligent enough to realize it. He undoubtedly knows that American artists of national prominence, particularly movie queens, must be embroiled in several disgusting marital scandals, before they are considered to have "arrived". FEB 19

But Casella is in Boston to display his talent as a musician and not to pass judgment upon the beauty of Boston girls, the popularity of American jazz or any kindred subjects.

It seems to be the rage nowadays for persons who have achieved some measure of fame to discuss the beauty of American girls within a few minutes ofter their arrival from foreign countries.

Casella is no exception. He has followed the popular trent. It is regrettable. He is a musician and an expert judge of feminine beauty.

...1927

Respighi Conducts Orchestra in Performance of His Own Works

FAMOUS COMPOSER WARMLY GREETED

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Ottorino Respighi, as guest, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its 16th concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was made up of compositions by him. His piano concerto in the mixolydian mode, which he played while Mr. Casella conducted, was performed here for the first time, as were his arrangement of Old Dances and Airs for the flute, Suite No. 2, and the overture to his opera, "Belfagor." Mme. Respighi, his wife, sang "Il Tramonto" (after Shelley's poem). The familiar "Fountains of Rome" ended the concert.

The celebrated composer was warmly greeted when he came upon the platform, and it may here be said that the great audience was enthusiastic throughout the concert. As pianist and conductor he is without airs and ... playing without outward manifestation of his importance; conducting in a ... manner, but knowing what ... wished from the orchestra, which ... lowed his directions with what ... be called an affectionate regard ... during his sojourn in Boston and ... hearsals Mr. Respighi has not only ... the respect of the players—and members of an orchestra are not easily ... ceived about the proficiency and ... character of a composer and conductor ... —but by his charm of manner, his honesty, his good fellowship he has won their warm personal regard.

The concerto, which he wrote in the summer of 1925 for his first appearance at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York, the last day of December in that year, is more or less based on plain-song. Thus the first theme is taken from a Gregorian chant, which is developed ingenuously, at times with a noble solemnity. More than once in this concerto is the suggestion of the basilica, yet here and there there are measures of Italian sensuousness, not incongruous, not disturbing the prevailing spirit of the concerto; which would be still more effective if several cadenza-like passages for the piano were shortened. The embroidery for the piano when the chief theme is developed by the orchestra is rich and in place; but the measures referred to give one the suggestion of diffuseness. Nor does the final movement in passacaglia form constantly conform in its variations to the mood of what has gone before. There is a wealth of material in the concerto, beautiful, also impressive pages, but there are superfluous measures especially for the piano, and more than once the hearer loses the thread of the discourse.

The second suite of airs and dances of the 16th and 17th century is delightful, not only on account of the old melodies themselves, but by reason of the musicianship and imagination shown by Mr. Respighi in his transcription. He has skilfully avoided two pitfalls; he neither tried to be archaic, for audiences in 1927 cannot hear as did the cavaliers, noble dames and country folk of bygone centuries; nor has he endeavored to arrange the airs as the old composers for the lute would "if they were living today." The old musical flesh is now well dressed but not in costumes of its period, not in gaudy raiment of later years. The lively stirring dances are interrupted by a movement in which the middle section is an air of serious, not austere beauty; music for a solemn feast or festival occasion; music that might serve as a prelude to a reading of Miltonic verse.

The overture to "Belfagor" is a picturesque presentation of the two leading subjects of the opera, which was brought out at La Scala, early in 1923. Music to picture the purpose and arrival of the demon who wishes by personal experience to learn if married men are necessarily unhappy, and thus disturbs for a time the joy of a loving pair, and the portrayal in tones of the pure and faithful maiden and the discomfiture of the demoniacal Belfagor. It is brilliant music well suited to go before the raising of the curtain in an opera house; not so theatrical as to be out of place in the concert hall.

Mr. Respighi's music for Shelley's singular poem "Sunset" has been sung here at least twice with a string quartet. It is a poetically musical composition, without vain attempt to express in a pseudo-realistic manner the incidents and tragic suggestion of the story told in verse. It is rather an improvisation on a reading of the poem; the expression of the composer's thoughts about the story and the conclusion drawn from it. The music itself is a poem, a rhetorical eloquent transcription of lines that are at the end an example of Shelley, philosophizing, not inspired to sing a lofty song. Mme. Respighi showed fine appreciation of text and music. To her the vocal portion of the composition was an integral part, not a vainglorious solo, but for symphonic treatment. Her charming simplicity of manner was an agreeable feature of the performance.

Mr. Respighi gave an eloquent interpretation of the familiar "Fountains of Rome," as was to be expected.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko"; Elzar, "Enigma Variations"; Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela"; Respighi, four preludes, "Stained Glass Windows" (first performance).

RESPIGHI CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Italian Composer Leads Program of His Works

Ottorino Respighi, the noted Italian composer whose tone poems "Pines of Rome" and "Fountains of Rome" have been very popular with Boston Symphony audiences in the past few seasons, appeared yesterday as guest conductor and piano soloist with the orchestra. Mme Respighi sang her husband's setting of Shelley's "Sunset."

The entire program was filled with music composed or arranged by Respighi. Alfredo Casella, lately appointed conductor of the Pops, conducted the piano concerto. Mr Koussevitzky from a seat in the first balcony was an interested and applausive auditor.

Mr Respighi chose a representative assortment of his works. His piano concerto, "In the Mixolydian Mode," his second suite of old dances and airs for lute, and his "Belfagor" overture were performed yesterday for the first time in Boston. "Il Tramonto," for voice and strings, and "The Fountains of Rome" had been heard here before.

The "Mixolydian Mode" is merely the scale of G major with the F natural instead of sharped. Mr Respighi chose it for his piano concerto because, as he said, he wished to utilize its "very beautiful harmonic quality." The main theme of the first movement is a Gregorian chant.

Recalls Liszt

These facts give a somewhat misleading impression of the piece, which in its use of the pianoforte recalls Liszt, or perhaps Brahms, rather than more modern composers. The work is long, and, although there are eloquent passages, lacking in sustained musical interest. The orchestral accompaniment is without the brilliance of scoring which distinguishes the composer's more familiar works.

Mr Respighi's performance of the piano part was authoritative.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

but lacking in warmth of tone. He played from notes, contrary to the usual custom of piano soloists.

The suite of old airs and dances, like the one previously heard here, is ingratiating, a skillful recreation for modern ears of music from forgotten composers of centuries past. It proved once more that Mr Respighi is a musician of keen sensibility and cultivated taste. The applause after it was particularly cordial.

The "Belfagor" overture is a re working of materials used in an oper of that title, produced at La Scala Milan, in 1923. Belfagor, according t the omniscient program book, is "th demon of discoveries and ingenious in ventions," with a habit of coming t earth and interfering ludicrously in the matrimonial plans of mortals.

Mme Respighi Sings

The music recalled Respighi's "Ballad of the Gnomides," played here in 1923. It lacks the ghostly, diabolic qualities of Berlioz' "Witches Sabbat." Some of Boito's "Mefistofele" far surpasses this "Belfagor" overture. The sights and sounds of Rome inspire Respighi far more successfully than do old legends, it would seem.

Mme Respighi sang her husband's setting of Shelley's verses admirably, with beautiful tone and profound imaginative sympathy. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of fine quality. Yet "Il Tramonto" seemed more quietly lyric than the tragic tale told in the poem.

The "Fountains of Rome" flowed yesterday with less dazzling brilliance than they did when Toscanini conducted the piece in Boston some years ago. Mr Respighi has here composed music with a strong popular appeal, scored with remarkable effectiveness, songful at moments in almost the Puccini manner, music not in this re-viewer's opinion likely to hold a permanent place in the repertory.

Of Respighi's talent and artistic integrity as a composer there can be no question. But sincerity and an occasional happy invention, such as the familiar song "Nebbie," or the two-tone poems on Roman subjects, do not rank a composer as a genius.

The final verdict on Respighi rests, of course, with posterity. At any rate, it was interesting to hear one of the most-talked-of composers of the day conduct a program of his own music.

P. R.

the overture to "Belfagon," an opera produced at Milan in 1923.

As instrumental composer Respighi wears a double face. There is the Respighi whose imagination is aroused by pictorial suggestion and who has written in "The Fountains of Rome," in the later and now immensely popular "Pines of Rome," in the "Ballad of the Gnomides," in the overture aforementioned and presumably in the "Stained Glass Windows," impending next week, music of distinctively, though by no means crassly or obviously graphic quality. And there is also the contemplative Respighi, enamoured of the Gregorian scales and assiduous in his effort to apply these once archaic modes to modern composition.

A Trifle Monotonous

From him came the Gregorian Concerto played here two seasons ago by Albert Spalding, the Doric String Quartet and the Concerto of yesterday. To base an entire concerto on a single mode is, perforce, to court monotony, and it must be admitted that in this Mixolydian Concerto that difficulty has not been avoided. In it are impressive pages; there is a pervading mood of exaltation. But, to speak tersely, less of it would have made more effect. In so far as could be judged, Mr. Respighi played his music to excellent advantage and Mr. Casella conducted con amore.

Not so distinctive as the earlier set, the Ancient Dances played yesterday have a similar charm and grace, a like Old World flavor, and the audience the legend of Satan experimenting with mortal marriage, one did not wonder at the failure of the opera despite its admittedly high musical worth. This is symphonic rather than dramatic music, and as such it scarcely seems one of Mr. Respighi's more noteworthy efforts.

Mme. Respighi Sings

A poetic piece, "Il Tramonte," gains by the transfer of its accompaniment to string orchestra. In it Mme. Respighi yesterday displayed a voice of warmth and color if not of great power. Her quiet dignity and Latin comeliness also pleased.

Of the "Fountains of Rome" it is not necessary to speak at length at this date. A singularly ingratiating, imaginative and technically brilliant achievement, it received yesterday a performance that bore convincing and cumulative testimony to Mr. Respighi's abilities as conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ZITS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 19 1927

RESPIGHI DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Post Feb 19

Composer Plays and Conducts Own Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Ottorini Respighi responsible for every number upon the programme and conductor in them all save his new Concerto, in which, the conducting of Alfredo Casella, he assumed the role of pianist, and with Elsa Respighi as singer in her husband's "Il Tramonto," the Symphony Concert of yesterday may fitly be described as an Italian occasion.

WELCOMED AS FRIEND

Not before had this distinguished musician visited Boston, but since his music is both well known and well liked at the Symphony Concerts the audience could welcome him not merely as a celebrity but also as a friend. And that the warmth of his reception both on his initial appearance and throughout the afternoon touched him not a little was plainly written on his countenance.

Close on the heels of Mr. Respighi as he first came upon the platform yesterday followed his colleague and compatriot, Mr. Casella, now known to all and sundry as the new leader of the Pop Concerts, and it might then be seen that a contrast as strong as that which marks their music marks the men themselves. Tall and spare is Mr. Casella, and his alertness and nervous energy together with his sleek and close-cropped hair might betoke the successful man of affairs quite as much as the artist. Mr. Respighi, on the contrary, is short and thick-set. His hair, far from short, easily becomes unruly; his whole exterior definitely suggests the artist. Indeed the external resemblance noted by some to the current likenesses of Beethoven was by no means far-fetched.

One Familiar Number

In the main the all-Respighi programme of yesterday was made of music unknown to Boston. Only the closing number, "The Fountains of Rome," had been heard at the Symphony Concerts, although "Il Tramonto" has twice been sung in Jordan Hall with accompaniment of string quartet. New altogether was the Concerto for piano and orchestra, written steadfastly in the Mixolydian mode: that is to say, the scale of G major with F-natural. New, too, the

Beethoven Honored by Big Boston Festival

Boston will hold an intensive commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death (March 26) with a centenary festival during that week, March 22 to 29, in Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play all nine of the symphonies, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society singing the chorus in the Ninth Symphony.

Other artists taking part in the festival include Walter Gieseking, pianist; Florence Austral and Jeanette Vreeland, sopranos; Jeanne Gordon and Nevada Van der Veer, contraltos; Tudor Davies and Charles Stratton, tenors, and Arthur Middleton and Fred Patton, baritones.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STANDARD
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
FEB 19 1927

Saturday, February 19.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, will be picked up by WJZ and KDKA, in addition to being broadcast by WBZ, at 8:10 Saturday night. The concluding lecture recital of Wagner's opera "The Meistersinger" will be given by Walter Damrosch through WEAF and the Red Network. As usual, spoken comments will be interspersed and illustrated with piano selection from the opera itself. Sport enthusiasts will have two hockey games and one basketball encounter to tune in. Harvard and Yale puck chasers will compete at Boston and this game will be broadcast by WNAC at 8:30. Quebec and New Haven will play through WTIC at 8:15. Chicago University and Northwestern have scheduled a basketball game through WLS at 9:00. A grand opera program will be a distinct feature from KFI at 11:00.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 19 1927

Ottorine Re Boston Symp In His Own

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the sixteenth of the season, will bring to the radio audience a program entirely of compositions of Ottorino Respighi, who will appear as guest conductor of the orchestra. The entire program will be broadcast by the Westinghouse Station WBZ, Springfield and Boston; KDKA in East Pittsburgh and WJZ in New York City.

Ottorino Respighi was born in Bologna, Italy, in 1879. He graduated from the Biceo Musicale in Bologna in 1901. After that time he lived for awhile in Russia, where he studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin, where he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 19 1927

RESPIGHI CONCERT ON RADIO TONIGHT

Composer Guest Conductor With Boston Symphony — Also Soloist for First Number

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the 16th of the season, will bring to the hearing of the radio audience a program entirely composed of compositions of Ottorino Respighi, who will appear as guest conductor of the orchestra. The entire program will be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations WBZ, Springfield and Boston, and KDKA at East Pittsburg, Pa; also station WJZ at New York city.

Ottorino Respighi was born at Bologna, Italy, in 1879. He graduated from the Liceo Musicale at Bologna in 1901. After that time he lived for a while in Russia where he studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin where he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal Academy of St Cecelia at Rome.

In the first number of the program a concerto for piano and orchestra the composed will play the solo pa and the orchestra will be conducte by Alfredo Casella. In the aria "Tramonto" the composer's wife, Mr Elsa Respighi, soprano, will be hea as soloist.

Prof John Patton Marshall, head the music departments of Boston un versity and Holy Cross college, will heard in illustrative talks before t concert, between the numbers and du ing the intermission, pointing out fe tures of the works to be played, an giving the radio audience some of the composer's own ideas regarding this music. The complete symphony program follows:—

Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in the Mixolydian Mode.....Respighi
Moderato
Lento
Allegro energico
Old dance and airs for the lute (second suite) ..... Respighi
Laura Soave, Balletto con Gagliarda
Saltarello e Canario (Fabrizio Carosio)
Danza rustica (Giovanni Battista Besardo)
Campanae Parisienses (author unknown)
Aria (Marin Mersenne)
Bergamasca (Bernardo Gianoncelli)
"Fontane di Roma" ("Fountains of Rome") ..... Respighi
The Fountains of Valle Giulia at Dawn
The Triton Fountain at Morn
The Fountain at Trevi at midday
The Viila Medici Fountains at Sunset
"Il Tramonto," for soprano and orchestra (after Shelley's poem).....Respighi
Elsa Respighi, soloist
Overture to the opera "Belfagor"..Respighi

Other programs from other stations follow:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 19 1927

Respighi Will Conduct Boston Symphony Tonigh

Program to Be Broadcast Through WBZ Will Consist of Director's Compositions.

Tonight's concert of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, the 16th of t season, will bring to the radio aud ence a program entirely composed compositions of Ottorino Respigh who will appear as guest conductor o the orchestra. The entire program wi be broadcast by the Westinghouse sta tions WBZ and KDKA and also WJ through the courtesy of W. S. Quimby

Mr. Respighi was born at Bologna Italy, in 1879. He graduated from th Liceo Musicale in Bologna in 1901 After that time he lived for a while in Russia, where he studied wit Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal Academy of St Cecelia in Rome.

In the first number of the program a concerto for piano and orchestra, the composer will play the solo part, and the orchestra will be conducted by Alto" the composer's wife, Mme. Elsa Respighi, soprano, will be heard as soloist.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will be heard in illustrative talks before the concert, between the numbers and during the intermission, pointing oua features of the works to be played, and giving the radio audience some of the composer's own ideas regarding this music.

The complete symphony program follows:

Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in the Mixolydian Mode.
Respighi
Moderato.
Lento.
Allegro energico.
Old Dance and Airs for the Lute (Second Suite), Respighi
Laura Soave, Balletto con Gagliarda, Saltarello e Canario (Fabrizio Carosio).
Danza Rustica (Giovanni Battista Besardo).
Campanae Parisienses (author unknown).
Aria (Marin Mersenne).
Bergamasca (Bernardo Gianconcelli).
Intermission.
"Fontane di Roma" (Fountains of Rome), Respighi
The Fountains of Valle Giulia at Dawn.
The Triton Fountain at Morn.
The Fountain at Trevi at Midday.
The Villa Medici Fountains at Sunset.
"Il Tramonto," for soprano and orchestra (after Shelley's poem).
Respighi
Elsa Resoighi, soloist.
Overture to the opera "Belfagor,"
Respighi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 19 1927

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEDGES NOW $1425

Guarantee of $6000 Needed To Bring Boston Orchestra Here Next Season

Pledges totalling $1425 were received up to last night toward the guarantee fund to assure the reappearance in this city next year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unless $6000 is promised, the orchestra will probably go elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it has been expected to play at the Albee Theatre.

Seven individuals have pledged a total of $425 since the fund was started with a promise of $1000 by Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield.

Pledges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. Since they are not payable until Sept. 15, no cash or checks should be mailed at this time.

The contributors, in addition to Mrs. Sheffield, are Harry Parsons Cross, Dr. and Mrs. H. W. Whitmarsh, Theodore Francis Green, W. M. Dempster, R. Clinton Fuller and Mrs. Caesar Misch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 19 1927

Respighi Concert by Boston Symphony

TO-NIGHT'S concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the sixteenth of the season, will bring to the radio audience a program entirely composed of compositions of Ottorino Respighi, who will appear as guest conductor of the orchestra. The entire program will be broadcast by WBZ, KDKA and WJZ in New York city.

Ottorino Respighi was born at Bologna, Italy, in 1879. He graduated from the Liceo Musicale in Bologna in 1901. After that time he lived for a while in Russia, where he studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin, where he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. In the first number of the program a concerto for piano and orchestra, the composer will play the solo part, and the orchestra will be conducted by Alfredo Casella. In the aria "Il Tramonto" the composer's wife, Mme. Elsa Respighi, soprano, will be heard as soloist.

Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will be heard in illustrative talks before the concert, between the numbers and during the intermission, pointing out features of the works to be played and giving the radio audience some of the composer's own ideas regarding this music.

BEETHOVEN FETE OPENS MARCH 22

NEXT month's Beethoven centennial festival, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open March 22 with the "Missa Solennis," in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and, as soloists, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davis, and Arthur Middleton.

On Wednesday, March 23, there will be an orchestral program consisting of the first three symphonies.

On Thursday, March 24, there will be a program of chamber music by the London String Quartet and Carl Friedberg, the famous pianist.

For the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 25 and 26, which are regular subscription Symphony concerts, the fourth and fifth symphonies, and the sixth and seventh symphonies, respectively, will be played.

On Monday, March 28, special tributes to Beethoven will be paid. One of the speakers will be Enrest Newman. These exercises will be concluded by a performance of Beethoven's final quartet, by the Lenor String Quartet.

The festival will close on Tuesday, March 29, with the 8th and 9th symphonies. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
FEB 20 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SYMPHONY COMING HERE

One of the season's premier musical events will take place in Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 9 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, world famous musical organization will give a concert. As the fourth event of the Greater Woolsey Hall Concert Series for 1926-27 this offering comes to New Haven.

Of equal importance with the musical name of the Boston Symphony and its roster of 108 of the country's finest musicians is the name of Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the organization. It was in 1924 that the famous conductor came to America to head the Boston Symphony, and since that time the concerts under his direction have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. It is safe to say that Koussevitzky has placed one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world at the very apex of a notable career, and local music lovers this season will hear it at the heighth of its glory.

When the Boston Symphony begins to play, there is evidence in every bar of the exacting and persuasive hand of the born commander. The hundred-odd musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gseture.

Tickets for the forthcoming concert are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 20 1927

FOR MORE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

In order to secure a full continuation of the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence next fall and winter, the sum of six thousand dollars must be pledged.

It would be deplorable if because of the failure of music lovers in Providence to contribute this comparatively small sum of money the proposed five-concert series should be omitted or curtailed.

The 1926-27 season came to an end last week with a concert that embraced many delightful features. The audience in attendance filled the great theatre in which it was given. Now we have an opportunity to repeat in 1927-28 the number and quality of the concerts we have just enjoyed. It is an opportunity that should not be neglected.

Providence has responded to many such calls in the past and is confidently expected to be equal to this latest musical emergency. Pledges should be sent to the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

but lacking in warmth of tone. He played from notes, contrary to the usual custom of piano soloists.

The suite of old airs and dances, like the one previously heard here, is ingratiating, a skillful recreation for modern ears of music from forgotten composers of centuries past. It proved once more that Mr Respighi is a musician of keen sensibility and cultivated taste. The applause after it was particularly cordial.

The "Belfagor" overture is a re working of materials used in an opera of that title, produced at La Scala Milan, in 1923. Belfagor, according to the omniscient program book, is "th demon of discoveries and ingenious in ventions," with a habit of coming t earth and interfering ludicrously in the matrimonial plans of mortals.

Mme Respighi Sings

The music recalled Respighi's "Ballad of the Gnomides," played here in 1923. It lacks the ghostly, diabolic qualities of Berlioz' "Witches Sabbat." Some of Boito's "Mefistofele" far surpasses this "Belfagor" overture. The sights and sounds of Rome inspire Respighi far more successfully than do old legends, it would seem.

Mme Respighi sang her husband's setting of Shelley's verses admirably, with beautiful tone and profound imaginative sympathy. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of fine quality. Yet "Il Tramonto" seemed more quietly lyric than the tragic tale told in the poem.

The "Fountains of Rome" flowed yesterday with less dazzling brilliance than they did when Toscanini conducted the piece in Boston some years ago. Mr Respighi has here composed music with a strong popular appeal, scored with remarkable effectiveness, songful at moments in almost the Puccini manner, music not in this reviewer's opinion likely to hold a permanent place in the repertory.

Of Respighi's talent and artistic integrity as a composer there can be no question. But sincerity and an occasional happy invention, such as the familiar song "Nebbie," or the two-tone poems on Roman subjects, do not rank a composer as a genius.

The final verdict on Respighi rests, of course, with posterity. At any rate, it was interesting to hear one of the most-talked-of composers of the day conduct a program of his own music.

P. R.

the overture to "Belfagon," an opera produced at Milan in 1923.

As instrumental composer Respighi wears a double face. There is the Respighi whose imagination is aroused by pictorial suggestion and who has written in "The Fountains of Rome," in the later and now immensely popular "Pines of Rome," in the "Ballad of the Gnomides," in the overture aforementioned and presumably in the "Stained Glass Windows," impending next week, music of distinctively, though by no means crassly or obviously graphic quality. And there is also the contemplative Respighi, enamoured of the Gregorian scales and assiduous in his effort to apply these once archaic modes to modern composition.

A Trifle Monotonous

From him came the Gregorian Concerto played here two seasons ago by Albert Spalding, the Doric String Quartet and the Concerto of yesterday. To base an entire concerto on a single mode is, perforce, to court monotony, and it must be admitted that in this Mixolydian Concerto that difficulty has not been avoided. In it are impressive pages; there is a pervading mood of exaltation. But, to speak tersely, less of it would have made more effect. In so far as could be judged, Mr. Respighi played his music to excellent advantage and Mr. Casella conducted con amore.

Not so distinctive as the earlier set, the Ancient Dances played yesterday have a similar charm and grace, a like Old World flavor, and the audience the legend of Satan experimenting with mortal marriage, one did not wonder at the failure of the opera despite its admittedly high musical worth. This is symphonic rather than dramatic music, and as such it scarcely seems one of Mr. Respighi's more noteworthy efforts.

Mme. Respighi Sings

A poetic piece, "Il Tramonte," gains by the transfer of its accompaniment to string orchestra. In it Mme. Respighi yesterday displayed a voice of warmth and color if not of great power. Her quiet dignity and Latin comeliness also pleased.

Of the "Fountains of Rome" it is not necessary to speak at length at this date. A singularly ingratiating, imaginative and technically brilliant achievement, it received yesterday a performance that bore convincing and cumulative testimony to Mr. Respighi's abilities as conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 19 1927

RESPIGHI CONCERT ON RADIO TONIGHT

Composer Guest Conductor With Boston Symphony — Also Soloist for First Number

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the 16th of the season, will bring to the hearing of the radio audience a program entirely composed of compositions of Ottorino Respighi, who will appear as guest conductor of the orchestra. The entire program will be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations WBZ, Springfield and Boston, and KDKA at East Pittsburg, Pa; also station WJZ at New York city.

Ottorino Respighi was born at Bologna, Italy, in 1879. He graduated from the Liceo Musicale at Bologna in 1901. After that time he lived for a while in Russia where he studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin, where he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal Academy of St Cecelia at Rome.

In the first number of the program a concerto for piano and orchestra the composed will play the solo pa and the orchestra will be conducte by Alfredo Casella. In the aria "Tramonto" the composer's wife, Mr Elsa Respighi, soprano, will be hea as soloist.

Prof John Patton Marshall, head the music departments of Boston un versity and Holy Cross college, will heard in illustrative talks before t concert, between the numbers and du ing the intermission, pointing out fe tures of the works to be played, an giving the radio audience some of the composer's own ideas regarding this music. The complete symphony program follows:—

Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in the Mixolydian Mode.....Respighi
Moderato
Lento
Allegro energico
(The composer will play the piano solo in his concerto; Alfred Casella will conduct)
Old dance and airs for the lute (second suite) ..... Respighi
Laura Soave, Balletto con Gagliarda Saltarello e Canario (Fabrizio Carosio)
Danza rustica (Giovanni Battista Besardo)
Campanae Parisienses (author unknown)
Aria (Marin Mersenne)
Bergamasca (Bernardo Gianoncelli)
"Fontane di Roma" ("Fountains of Rome") ..... Respighi
The Fountains of Valle Giulia at Dawn
The Triton Fountain at Morn
The Fountain at Trevi at midday
The Villa Medici Fountains at Sunset
"Il Tramonto," for soprano and orchestra (after Shelley's poem).....Respighi
Elsa Respighi, soloist
Overture to the opera "Belfagor"..Respighi

Other programs from other stations follow:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 19 1927

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEDGES NOW $1425

Guarantee of $6000 Needed To Bring Boston Orchestra Here Next Season

Pledges totalling $1425 were received up to last night toward the guarantee fund to assure the reappearance in this city next year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unless $6000 is promised, the orchestra will probably go elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it has been expected to play at the Albee Theatre.

Seven individuals have pledged a total of $425 since the fund was started with a promise of $1000 by Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield.

Pledges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. Since they are not payable until Sept. 15, no cash or checks should be mailed at this time.

The contributors, in addition to Mrs Sheffield, are Harry Parsons Cross, Dr. and Mrs. H. W. Whitmarsh, Theodore Francis Green, W. M. Dempster, R. Clinton Fuller and Mrs. Caesar Misch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
FEB 20 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SYMPHONY COMING HERE

One of the season's premier musical events will take place in Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 9 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, world famous musical organization will give a concert. As the fourth event of the Greater Woolsey Hall Concert Series for 1926-27 this offering comes to New Haven.

Of equal importance with the musical name of the Boston Symphony and its roster of 108 of the country's finest musicians is the name of Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian leader of the organization. It was in 1924 that the famous conductor came to America to head the Boston Symphony, and since that time the concerts under his direction have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. It is safe to say that Koussevitzky has placed one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world at the very apex of a notable career, and local music lovers this season will hear it at the height of its glory.

When the Boston Symphony begins to play, there is evidence in every bar of the exacting and persuasive hand of the born commander. The hundred-odd musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture.

Tickets for the forthcoming concert are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church Street.

RESPIGHI DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Post Feb 19

Composer Plays and Conducts Own Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Ottorini Respighi responsible for every number upon the programme and conductor, in them all save his new Concerto, in which, to the conducting of Alfredo Casella, he assumed the role of pianist, and with Elsa Respighi as singer in her husband's "Il Tramonto," the Symphony Concert of yesterday may fitly be described as an Italian occasion.

WELCOMED AS FRIEND

Not before had this distinguished musician visited Boston, but since his music is both well known and well liked at the Symphony Concerts the audience could welcome him not merely as a celebrity but also as a friend. And that the warmth of his reception both on his initial appearance and throughout the afternoon touched him not a little was plainly written on his countenance.

Close on the heels of Mr. Respighi as he first came upon the platform yesterday followed his colleague and compatriot, Mr. Casella, now known to all and sundry as the new leader of the Pop Concerts, and it might then be seen that a contrast as strong as that which marks their music marks the men themselves. Tall and spare is Mr. Casella, and his alertness and nervous energy together with his sleek and close-cropped hair might betoke the successful man of affairs quite as much as the artist. Mr. Respighi, on the contrary, is short and thick-set. His hair, far from short, easily becomes unruly; his whole exterior definitely suggests the artist. Indeed the external resemblance noted by some to the current likenesses of Beethoven was by no means far-fetched.

One Familiar Number

In the main the all-Respighi programme of yesterday was made of music unknown to Boston. Only the closing number, "The Fountains of Rome," had been heard at the Symphony Concerts, although "Il Tramonto" has twice been sung in Jordan Hall with accompaniment of string quartet. New altogether was the Concerto for piano and orchestra, written steadfastly in the Mixolydian mode: that is to say, the scale of G major with F-natural. New, too, the second set of orchestral transcriptions

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ZITS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 19 1927

Beethoven Honored by Big Boston Festival

Boston will hold an intensive commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death (March 26) with a centenary festival during that week, March 22 to 29, in Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will play all nine of the symphonies, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society singing the chorus in the Ninth Symphony.

Other artists taking part in the festival include Walter Gieseking, pianist; Florence Austral and Jeanette Vreeland, sopranos; Jeanne Gordon and Nevada Van der Veer, contraltos; Tudor Davies and Charles Stratton, tenors, and Arthur Middleton and Fred Patton, baritones.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STANDARD
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
FEB 19 1927

Saturday, February 19.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, will be picked up by WJZ and KDKA, in addition to being broadcast by WBZ, at 8:10 Saturday night. The concluding lecture recital of Wagner's opera "The Meistersinger" will be given by Walter Damrosch through WEAF and the Red Network. As usual, spoken comments will be interspersed and illustrated with piano selection from the opera itself. Sport enthusiasts will have two hockey games and one basketball encounter to tune in. Harvard and Yale puck chasers will compete at Boston and this game will be broadcast by WNAC at 8:30. Quebec and New Haven will play through WTIC at 8:15. Chicago University and Northwestern have scheduled a basketball game through WLS at 9:00. A grand opera program will be a distant feature from KFI at 11:00.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 19 1927

Ottorine Res Boston Symp In His Own

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the sixteenth of the season, will bring to the radio audience a program entirely of compositions of Ottorino Respighi, who

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 19 1927

Respighi Will Conduct Boston Symphony Tonigh

Program to Be Broadcas Through WBZ Will Consist of Director's Compositions.

Tonight's concert of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, the 16th of th season, will bring to the radio aud ence a program entirely composed o compositions of Ottorino Respigh who will appear as guest conductor o the orchestra. The entire program wi be broadcast by the Westinghouse sta tions WBZ and KDKA and also WJ through the courtesy of W. S. Quimby

Mr. Respighi was born at Bologna Italy, in 1879. He graduated from th Liceo Musicale in Bologna in 1901 After that time he lived for a while in Russia, where he studied wit Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal Academy of St Cecelia in Rome.

In the first number of the program a concerto for piano and orchestra, the composer will play the solo part, and the orchestra will be conducted by Al-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 19 1927

Respighi Concert by Boston Symphony

TO-NIGHT'S concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the sixteenth of the season, will bring to the radio audience a program entirely composed of compositions of Ottorino Respighi, who will appear as guest conductor of the orchestra. The entire program will be broadcast by WBZ, KDKA and WJZ in New York city.

Ottorino Respighi was born at Bologna, Italy, in 1879. He graduated from the Liceo Musicale in Bologna in 1901. After that time he lived for a while in Russia, where he studied with Rimsky-Korsakoff, and in Berlin, where he continued his study with Max Bruch. Since 1913 he has taught composition in the Royal Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. In the first number of the program a concerto for piano and orchestra, the composer will play the solo part, and the orchestra will be conducted by Alfredo Casella. In the aria "Il Tramonto" the composer's wife, Mme. Elsa Respighi, soprano, will be heard as soloist.

Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will be heard in illustrative talks before the concert, between the numbers and during the intermission, pointing out features of the works to be played and giving the radio audience some of the composer's own ideas regarding this music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 19 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 20 1927

FOR MORE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

In order to secure a full continuation of the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence next fall and winter, the sum of six thousand dollars must be pledged.

It would be deplorable if because of the failure of music lovers in Providence to contribute this comparatively small sum of money the proposed five-concert series should be omitted or curtailed.

The 1926-27 season came to an end last week with a concert that embraced many delightful features. The audience in attendance filled the great theatre in which it was given. Now we have an opportunity to repeat in 1927-28 the number and quality of the concerts we have just enjoyed. It is an opportunity that should not be neglected.

Providence has responded to many such calls in the past and is confidently expected to be equal to this latest musical emergency. Pledges should be sent to the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company.

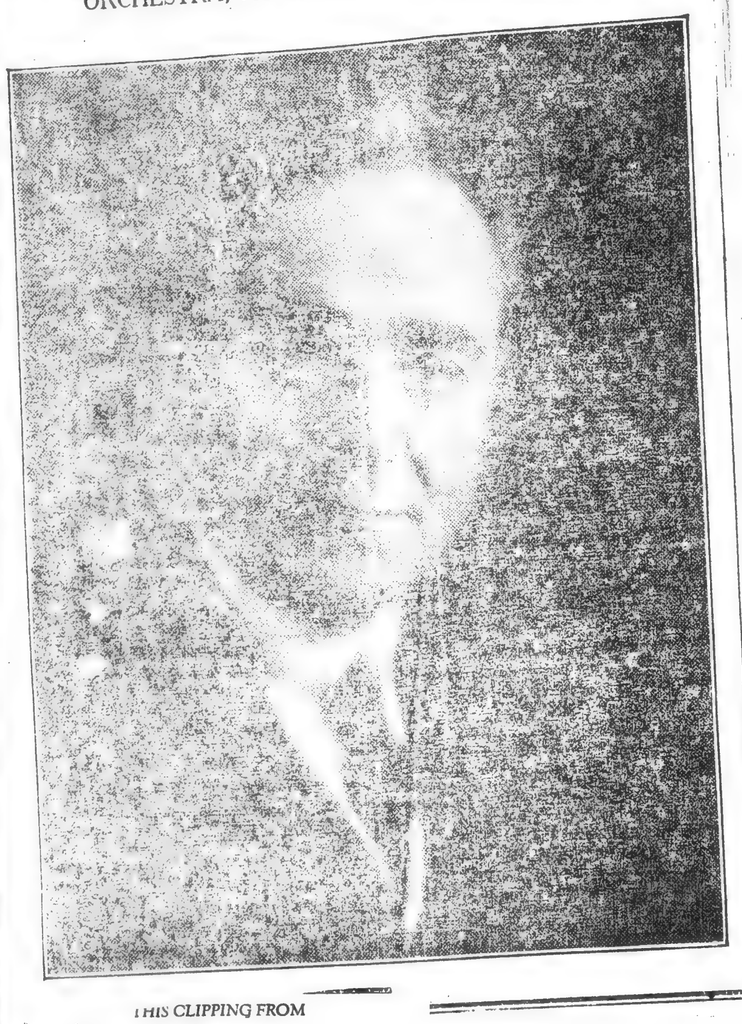
BEETHOVEN FETE OPENS MARCH 22

AGER FEB 20

NEXT month's Beethoven centennial festival, to be given

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
FEB 19 1927

SERGE KOUSSNITZKY, LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT WOOLSEY HALL, MARCH 9



THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 19 1927

To-night's Boston Symphony Concert

TO-NIGHT'S concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the sixteenth of the season, will bring to the hearing of the radio audience a program entirely composed of compositions of Ottorine Respighi, who will appear as guest conductor of the orchestra. The entire program will be broadcast by WBZ, KDKA and WJZ.

In the first number of the program, a concerto for piano and orchestra, the composer will play the solo part, and the orchestra will be conducted by Alfredo Casella. In the aria "Il Tramento" the composer's wife, Mme. Elsa Respighi, soprano, will be heard as soloist.

The complete symphony program follows:

Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in the Mixolydian Mode .....Respighi

I. Moderato
II. Lento
III. Allegro energico

(The composer will play the piano solo in his concerto; Alfredo Casella will conduct.)

Old Dance and Airs for the Lute (Second Suite) Respighi

"Fontane di Roma" (Fountains of Rome) ...Respighi

"Il Tramonto" for soprano and Orchestra (after Shelley's poem) .....Respighi
Elsa Respighi, Soloist.

Overture to the Opera "Belfagor" .....Respighi

(These notes taken from Boston Symphony Orchestra)

OTTERINO RESPIGHI, born at Bologna, Italy, studied music at first with his father. Later he entered the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, and studied violin playing with Federico Sarti; composition with Giuseppe Martucci. Graduated in 1901, he journeyed in foreign countries. Living in Russia for a time, he took lessons of Rimsky-Korsakov in Leningrad, with Max Bruch in Berlin. In 1913 he was appointed professor of composition in the Liceo Musicale, Bologna. He resigned this position in 1923 to become the director of the Santa Cecilia Conservatory in Rome. This position he gave up in 1926.

Respighi arrived in the United States for the first time on December 21, 1925, and made his first appearance in that city at a concert of the Philharmonic Society on December 31, 1925, when he played his piano concerto. On his arrival he talked with a representative of Musical America:

"Atonality? Thank heaven, that's done for! The future course of music? Who can say? I believe that every composer should first of all be individual. As for dissonance, it has its place as a medium of tone-color. It is the same with polytonality. For its own sake it is abhorrent to me, but as a means to expression it has important uses.

"When I say that atonality is'done for,' I mean it is, so far as modern Italian musicians are concerned. In some sense all the contemporary schools—Pizzetti, Alfano, DeSabata, Tommassini, Casella, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Malipiero and others—had their beginning in impressionism. We stem from this school, but for some years we have not been of it. The Italian genius is for melody and clarity. To-day there is noticeable a return to the less sophisticated music of our past—in harmony to the church modes, and in form to the suite of dances and other charming forms. This is no doubt good, provided we all cling to our own individualities and really express them."

Concerto in the Mixolydian Mode for Pianoforte and Orchestra .....Otterino Respighi

RESPIGHI said of his concerto, referring especially to his use of the Mixolydian mode:

"Throughout, as in my other works in this style, it is my intention not to recreate the exact accents of plain-chant, but to utilize the very beautiful harmonic quality of some of these modes, which possess a richness incomparably greater than the more common modern scales."

He contributed this note to the Programme Book of the Philharmonic Society of New York:

"The theme of the first movement is taken from a Gregorian chant. The words of this chant, Omnes gentes plaudite manibus, appear in the score as epigraph of the concerto."

The Mixolydian mode is the seventh (4th "Authentic") of the scale systems on which music of the church, and the greater part of secular music was based until the end of the sixteenth century.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
FEB 20 1927

100

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTR AT WOOLSEY HALL, MARCH 9TH

These modes, eight in number, were originally taken over from the ancient Greeks. The Mixolydian is like our modern scale of G major, except that F-natural was used instead of the F-sharp to which we are accustomed. Old theorists characterized it as the "Modus Angelicus." The mode has been employed by modern composers, Debussy and Vaughan Williams among them.

Second Suite of Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (16th and 17th Centuries), Freely Transcribed for Orchestra by Otterino Respighi

THE Second Suite, composed in 1923, was published in 1924. The score states that Respighi "has respected all the harmonic characteristics appropriate to the period and character of this music, in which many things regarded by the grammarians as errors were done deliberately."

I. Laura Soave, Balletto, con Gagliarda, Saltarello e, Canario (Fabrizio Caroso).

Marco Fabricio Caroso was born at Sermoneta towards the middle of the sixteenth century. Little is known about his life. He was the author of a once famous treatise on the dance: "Il Ballerino, diviso in due trattati con intavolatura di liuto, e il soprano della musica nella sonata di ciascun ballo." This quarto volume, published at Venice in 1581, contains sixteenth-century airs for the dance.

This ballet, transcribed by Respighi, was composed by Caroso in honor of Madama Christena Lorena de Medici, Grand Duchess of Tuscany. The original ballet, "Laura Soave," is in the second book of the "Nobilitta di Dame." It was the custom of Caroso's period to join together two dances: the first division was named after the dance itself; the second was called "Nachtanz," or "Proportio," sometimes Saltarello.

"The Fountains of Rome," Symphonic Poem by Otterino Respighi

"FONTANE DI ROMA," composed in 1916, was performed for the first time on February 10, 1918, at one of a series of concerts given in Rome under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, for the benefit of artists disabled in the Great War. The programme of this concert included also Glinka's "Kamarinskaya," d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre," the overture to "Saul" by Bazzini, Mozart's D major symphony, and the overture to Smetana's "The Sold Bride." After the performance of Respighi's symphonic poem, Toscanini was thrice recalled.

In this symphonic poem the composer has endeavored to give expression to the sentiments and visions suggested to him by four of Rome's fountains, contemplated at the hour in which their character is most in harmony with the surrounding landscape, or in which their beauty appears most impressive to the observer.

The first part of the poem, inspired by the Fountain of Valle Giullia, depicts a pastoral landscape: droves of cattle pass and disappear in the fresh, damp mists of a Roman dawn.

A sudden loud and insistent blast of horns above the trills of the whole orchestra introduces the second part, "The Triton Fountain." It is like a joyous call, summoning troops of naiads and tritons, who come running up, pursuing each other and mingling in a frenzied dance between the jets of water.

Next there appears a solemn theme, borne on the undulations of the orchestra. It is the Fountain of Trevi at mid-day. The solemn theme, passing from the wood to the brass instruments, assumes a triumphal character. Trumpets peal; across the radiant surface of the water there passes Neptune's chariot, drawn by seahorses and followed by a train of sirens and tritons. The procession then vanishes, while faint trumpet blasts resound in the distance.

The fourth part, the "Villa Medici Fountain," is announced by a sad theme, which rises above a subdued warbling. It is the nostalgic hour of sunset. The air is full of the sound of tolling bells, birds twittering, leaves rustling. Then all dies peacefully into the silence of the night.

Lyric Poem, "Il Tramonto" ("The Sunset"), After a Poem by Shelley: For Mezzo-Soprano and Strings. Otterino Respighi

THIS poem was first performed at a concert of "The Friends of Music" at the Milan Conservatory in April, 1917. The singer was Mme. Fino-Savio to whom the composition is dedicated.

This lyric poem was first written for soprano and string quartet. In this form it was sung in Boston by Eva Gauthier at a concert of the Boston Musical Association, Georges Longy, conductor, on May 23, 1921. The quartet was then composed of Miss Durrell, Mr. Beale, Miss Golden, and Mr. Miquelle.

Amy Ward Durfee, contralto, sang the poem at her recital in Boston on November 16, 1925. She was accompanied by Messrs. Thillois, Werner, Fiedler, and Barth.

In Mr. Respighi's concerts at Cincinnati, January 28, 29, 1927, and at Cleveland, February 3, 4, 1927, Mme. Respighi was accompanied by string orchestra with the addition of double-basses.

Shelly wrote "The Sunset" in 1816.

Overture to "Belfagor," a Lyric Comedy ... Otterino Respighi

THE opera "Belfagor" was produced at Milan on April 27, 1923, under the direction of Antonio Guarnieri. It was performed at the Hamburg City Theater early in 1926, when Werner Wolff conducted.

The story of the opera is a free adaptation by Gastalla of an old legend which had been previously used by dramatists in several countries. This legend tells of the Devil coming to earth to make an experiment with matrimony, and being cheated by even the simplest persons. In "Belfagor," two lovers, betrothed, are disturbed in their happiness by a grotesque adventure.

"Belphegor; or the Marriage of the Devil," a tragic-comedy by John Wilson, was acted in 1690 at Dorset-Garden, London, and published in 1691. Wilson professed to have taken his plot from a story of Machavelli, who says, "It having been observed in hell that the souls of such as came there generally complained that their wives sent them, the Devils agreed that one of them should assume a human shape, be subject to all the conditions of humanity—marry a wife, and live with her (if possible) ten years, and then return, and make a true report." Belphegor, a principal Devil, appears in the play as Roderigo. He weds Imperia. At first passionately fond of her, but at last hen-pecked, he tires of her. Her extravagance ruins him. He runs away to avoid arrest. In a sub-plot Fleschi and Imperia had been intimate. They quarrel. Her maid is bribed to admit him into her chamber. He does not go, but sends the hangman.) In the last scene Belphegor sinks on the stage. The play was unsuccessful, perhaps because the plot was out of the common run.

Beethoven Festival Programs

The programs are announced for the Beethoven Centenary Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Symphony Hall, March 22 to 29.

GLOBE

The festival will open with the "Missa Solennis," March 22, in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the following quartet of soloists: Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton.

Wednesday, March 23, there will be an orchestral program consisting of the first three symphonies.

Thursday, March 24, a program of chamber music by the London String Quartet and Carl Friedberg, the famous pianist. They will play a piano trio, a pianoforte sonata and a string quartet.

FEB 23 27

For the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 25 and 26 (which are regular subscription concerts), the fourth and fifth symphonies and the sixth and seventh symphonies, respectively, will be played.

On Monday, March 28, special tributes to the genius of Beethoven will be paid. One of the speakers will be Ernest Newman, the renowned authority and writer on musical subjects, who is coming from London for the occasion by special invitation. These exercises will be concluded by a performance of Beethoven's Final Quartet, by the Lenox String Quartet.

The festival will close on Tuesday, March 29, with the eighth and ninth symphonies. In the choral finale of the ninth symphony the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and the following quartet of soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

Season tickets for the five extra concerts in this festival are still available, although the demand for seats at all [illegible] is very great.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
FEB 20 1927

The 100th anniversary [illegible] death of Ludwig von Beethoven continuing from March 22 through March 29 will be the occasion for concerts and Beethoven programs all over the world.

The important orchestras have already arranged their programs, and compositions not familiar will be heard as well as those with which patrons of symphony concerts are especially fond.

The Boston Symphony orchestra for instance has arranged for the playing of Beethoven's nine symphonies and various overtures; Ernest Newman, English music critic, coming from London to Boston to give an address on Beethoven.

The Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral Club will combine in presenting the "Missa Solemnis"—these merely in and near Boston, while the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, the Cleveland, the Minneapolis, the New York Philharmonic, the New York Symphony, and many others east and west, will arrange or already have arranged, programs and lectures giving prominence to Beethoven.

It is quite safe to say that this great symphonist will be far better known and loved than ever before; appreciation being verbally given by imporant lectures as well as sweet sounds by musical organizations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 20 1927

HEARD HERE AND AFIELD

Boston's Beethoven Festi-

—Notes of Orchestras in the West

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29. They will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, the London String Quartet, the Lenox String Quartet, Walter Giesecking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. Ernest Newman will lecture on Beethoven. The programs will include the nine symphonies, the Missa Solennis, chamber music works and commemorative addresses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 20 1927

ARE THE CLASSICS TOO HIGH BROW FOR RADIO?

Boston Symphony Experiment Proves There is Real Demand for the Classics — Public, Not the Music, on Trial

By ALWYN E. BACH,
Senior Announcer of WBZ

"Is radio fostering a greater appreciation of the classics?" "Does the American public want symphony?" "What is the reaction of your radio audience to the present broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra?" With these and other questions too numerous to mention, we are approached almost daily by newspapermen, music critics, magazine writers and others whose business it is to know what the public desires and why.

In the earlier days of radio broadcasting station WBZ departed from the general trend toward the more popular type of musical presentation, and arranged classical programs which the staff felt were desired by a large proportion of the radio audience. The decision was arrived at as a result of many hundreds of letters asking for more of the classics, both vocal and instrumental. For the past four years WBZ has maintained this policy in program arrangement, and it is interesting to note the comment which has been received since that time.

Opera Interest Dwindled

We find such lines as the following: "It is such a relief to tune to WBZ and hear something other than the popular tunes played by most of the stations we tuned in last night." "Your program of last evening was very enjoyable, and provided a real treat after so much of popular music." With such comments it soon became apparent that there was a large audience to whom the programs of dance orchestras and popular song artists had become commonplace, and who wished more of the selections which have stood the test of time and criticism.

In the season of 1921-22, another Westinghouse station, KYW in Chicago, broadcast an entire season of operatic performances by the Chicago Civic Opera company. These were met with great favor by the radio fans in the early part of the season, but toward the end of the season it was noted that the response was dropping off considerably, indicating that the interest was rapidly falling off. That was five years ago, however, and five years are sufficient to allow comparisons.

George H. Jaspert, now director of Westinghouse station WBZ, was director of KYW during the time these opera broadcasts were presented in Chicago. He is, therefore, in a position to lend authority in his statements concerning the trend in broadcasting.

The Symphony Experiment

Mr Jaspert cites as an example for comparison in tendencies and desires of the radio audience, the instance in which the Chicago opera was broadcast, and then goes on to say: "Today, however, the radio audience seems more and more to want the best possible in music.

Who is on Trial?

weekly programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 13 weeks now, and strangely enough, perhaps, there is a greater and more responsive audience listening to these weekly programs today than at the beginning of the season. Instead of dwindling as the season progresses, as was the case in 1922, the musical presentations of a higher class and plane are this year receiving an increasing volume of favorable comment. Not only has the radio audience very definitely shown that the concerts of organizations such as Boston's Symphony orchestra, are desired, but they have so definitely made their wants known that a number of other broadcasters have approached us regarding arrangements for transmitting through their respective stations, and as a result the Boston Symphony orchestra has been heard through eight of the largest radio stations in the East. Our Westinghouse station KDKA at East Pittsburg, Pa., recently joined the chain of stations for this symphony broadcast, thus making the programs of one of the world's leading musical organizations available to a maximum of listeners throughout the entire United States."

There is, of course, a reason for this seeming increase in the popularity of an organization formerly held to be too high-brow for the majority of people. What is the answer? Is the orchestra playing numbers more easily understood by the layman? No! If you glance through a program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, you will find listed the heaviest of the classics of old, as well as some of the more dissonant works of the modern schools of composition, which, by the way, must not be confused with the so-called popular music, now also undergoing rapid change. These compositions of the modern composers such as Webern, Krass, Roussel, Scriabin and others are an earnest endeavor on the party of these men to create a style of music, classical to be sure, but in keeping with the age in which we are living. The fact is that a great many people who have not seen fit to attend a concert of a symphony orchestra have heard a few of their friends, possibly, saying "Symphony is too high-brow for my musical understanding." Just what is meant by that, then? Music is but the expression of the composer's emotions.

The answer to this problem seems to be that a great many people in the vast radio audience are realizing that there is music other than that which they have heard, which strikes a sympathetic chord of understanding, and having studiously avoided symphony, they were not in a position to know what the performance had to offer.

A distinct feature of these symphony broadcasts and one which has done a great deal to interest the masses in the concerts, are the informal illustrative remarks between the numbers of the program made by Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston universit yand Holy Cross college. Prof Marshall was for 10 years organist of the Boston Symphony, which together with many years of study and lecturing on music in all its phases, has marked his an authority on the subject of symphonic presentations particularly. His remarks are always of a nature most easily understood by the average listener, and there have been received many hundreds of letters of commendation from people who heretofore would not listen to a program of symphony music. These invariably state that his remarks have made the programs of interest to them, whereas without them, their appreciation of symphony would be slight.

In one of his lectures during the course of a concert in which one of which one of the real ultra-modern composition was included, Prof Marshall brought out a point of particular interest, one which I believe may prove of interest also to the reader, in view of the fact that a great number of listeners are in doubt as to the value of a number of these works of modern composers. Prof Marshall told of a visitor to the Louvre in Paris, who, upon looking at one of the massive paintings, said: "Huh! I can't see anything beautiful about that piece of work." The painting in question was one of the masterpieces of art, and the attendant turned to the visitor and remarked: "Sir, that painting is no longer on trial. It has stood the test of time and the criticisms of the world's greatest artists. It is yourself who is on trial." Prof Marshall stated that this might easily be applied to the musical art. "For," he says, "the music of the masters, Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, and others, is no longer on trial; it is we who listen who are on trial. In the case of the modern works, these may still be said to be on trial and time will then tell whether they are worthy of consideration. Mr Koussevitzky includes these works that we may know what the present-day composers are writing. Some will, perhaps, stand the test; others will die out and be forgotten."

ORCHESTRA GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Bach Concerto Is Event of Balanced Program

Globe Feb 22

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzsky conducting, gave the fourth concert in the current Monday series last evening in Symphony Hall before its usual Monday audience. The program consisted of Bach's 3rd Brandenburg Concerto, Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Ravel's "La Valse" and Brahms 2nd Symphony. All of these compositions have been previously played this season in the long series.

One may search far in the Bach literature before he may find a lustier piece of music, one more suggestive of roast beef and ale than the G major concerto for three-string orchestras. In particular the first movement, the thematic material of which may be found in quite different and generally less substantial form in the cantata "Ich liebe den Hochsten von ganzem Gemuethe," is highly suggestive of seafaring skippers and piratical lays. Those who greatly admire Walton's "Portsmouth Point" may find a pleasure in this far earlier and less studied work.

It is quite customary to accuse these Brandenburg Concertos of being suggestive of hack work, written as they were on requisition and for a specific occasion. Some of them seem to lie open to the criticism but surely not this hearty and vigorous music which was given a dramatic performance, undoubtedly considerably enlarged over that intended by the composer. For the once it was hard to imagine a loss in the expansion.

While he chooses a somewhat slow tempo for the Lohengrin "Prelude," none the less Mr Koussevitzsky's version of it is all silver sheen and goes far to portray the mood Wagner wished to create, that of the descending grail and the resultant jubilant celebration on earth. With memory of Wagnerian operatic performances so fresh in mind one was prone again to reflect how much better the equipment and the custom of the orchestra hall befit the Wagnerian preludes which here alone may be heard free from all distractions of late comers, fan rustlers, and conversationalists.

As to Ravel's spirited steed which remains remarkably lively and which was of course given a befittingly virtuosic performance, one could only regret the tradition which holds that Monday audiences will have none of too modern composition. Perhaps it would not like Copland or Webern, on which any audience remains divided, but would not Milhaud's jolly carnival or Roussel's jazzy work, both of whom are of fresh memory in the regular series, prove entertaining and a warrantable excursion? Neither is any longer than "La Valse." At least they do not seem so.

The most melodic of the Brahms symphonies gained over the regular performance in its association. At the close of the "evening of Brahms" one felt sated with the composer and desired only not to hear more of him for some time to come. Yet as soon as last evening this weariness was gone and the symphony came fresh and full of charm. Perhaps the last movement was a bit over-driven and lacking in clarity. At any rate it formed a highly dramatic close to a concert that was much better than the program had promised when viewed on paper.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $3975

Little More Than Third of Sum Needed to Assure Concerts is Raised.

OTHER CITIES SEEK DATES

Loss of Orchestra's Appearance Next Year Would Probably Become Permanent Because of Demand.—$6000 is Goal

Little more than a third of the $6000 guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year has been pledged since the drive was announced at the last concert of this season a week ago tonight. Seven new subscribers have increased the total from $1425 to $2025 in the last three days.

The local Symphony Concert committee, in charge of the drive that is hoped to result in the reappearance of the orchestra in this city, points out that unless the $6000 is pledged the orchestra will probably play elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it is now scheduled to appear at the Albee Theatre here. There is also possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean permanent loss of the orchestra, for many other communities are seeking to engage it on the five evenings yearly that it has formerly devoted to the Providence public.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

Peldges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form:

"I hereby pledge —— dollars ($——) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT

Koussevitzky in Fine Fettle With the Symphony

Post Feb 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The fourth of the current series of Monday Symphony concerts, which befell last evening, offered an hour and three-quarters of remarkable orchestral playing, and—if a slight error in judgment as to the proper pace for the "Lohengrin" Prelude be overlooked—of remarkable conducting as well.

A MASTER AT RHYTHM

Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky has never seemed more the dazzling virtuoso of the baton than he seemed last evening as he led the orchestra through the mazes of Ravel's "The Waltz." Never before in the conducting of this brilliant, seductive music has he in such degree preserved intact, throughout all its convolutions and complexities, vagaries and subtleties, the underlying, all-pervading waltz-rhythm. Beside such a feat the much-touted achievements of some of our jazz-conductors are but an elementary exercise in time-beating.

Rhythm, in fact, appeared to be Mr. Koussevitzky's watchword last evening—again excepting Wagner's Prelude, played so slowly that its dominating theme all but lost its melodic coherence and continuity. There was rhythm of the most invigorating sort in the two movements of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, with which the concert began; and in the Second Symphony of Brahms, which brought it to an uplifting close, the conductor was ever watchful and alert to capture each pulse and accent, however elusive

Of the 'soggy," stodgy Brahms Mr. Koussevitzky will have nought. In part he rescues that composer from the fate to which so many conductors have endeavored, consciously or otherwise, to consign him by seizing upon every melodic phrase, whether obviously apparent or lurking unsuspected in the inner recesses of the score.

But in large measure his antidote to the ponderousness and lethargy into which the music of Brahms will so readily relapse is an over-vitalizing rhythm. How beguiling last evening were the syncopations at the end of the first movement; how delicately, yet how tellingly emphasized the accents of the third; how compelling the rhythmic energies of the finale, with Mr. Ritter of the kettldrums valiantly bearing his portion in the deed.

Small wonder that last evening's audience responded so warmly to music and performance, applauding until Mr. Koussevitzky had summoned the players to their feet. Ere he knows it Mr.

Little More Than Third of Sum Needed to Assure Concerts is Raised.

OTHER CITIES SEEK DATES

Loss of Orchestra's Appearance Next Year Would Probably Become Permanent Because of Demand.—$6000 is Goal

Little more than a third of the $6000 guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year has been pledged since the drive was announced at the last concert of this season a week ago tonight. Seven new subscribers have increased the total from $1425 to $2025 in the last three days.

The local Symphony Concert committee, in charge of the drive that is hoped to result in the reappearance of the orchestra in this city, points out that unless the $6000 is pledged the orchestra will probably play elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it is now scheduled to appear at the Albee Theatre here. There is also possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean permanent loss of the orchestra, for many other communities are seeking to engage it on the five evenings yearly that it has formerly devoted to the Providence public.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

Peldges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form:

"I hereby pledge —— dollars ($——) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald Feb 22

For the fourth concert of the Monday evening series of Symphony concerts, given at Symphony hall last night, Mr. Koussevitzky arranged the following program:

Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, for string orchestra; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ravel, choregraphic poem, "La Valse"; Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Of the "three great B's," Bach and Brahms would seem to have landed on unsteady ground in the heaven of geniuses, since around each of these names there has developed a clique who find it necessary continuously to burn incense and candles for the safety of their places, while yet declaring that each "sitteth on the right hand" of the ruler of all things. Both of these groups were given a chance for fervent worship last evening. Mr. Koussevitsky opened the concert with a work by the one and closed it with a work by the other. Each was beautifully played and in the "amen" expressed by the hands in the audience there was nothing perfunctory.

For added enjoyment there was the choregraphic poem by the modern, Ravel, a piece heard in Boston at least half a dozen times and which gains in effect with each hearing.

The Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" would have gained measurably had Mr. Koussevitzky given it a slightly faster pace. It dragged a bit last night.

There was the usual large audience.

H. L.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 22 1927

$2025 SUBSCRIBED FOR SYMPHONY FUND

Seven new subscribers have increased the total guarantee fund to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year from $1425 to $2025, making slightly more than one third of the $6000 to be pledged.

The committee in charge of the drive points out that unless the full amount is raised the orchestra will not come here next season. There is also a possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean a permanent loss of the orchestra, the committee says.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $3975

al—Notes of Orchestras In the West

ERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29. They will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, the London String Quartet, the Lenox String Quartet, Walter Giesecking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. Ernest Newman will lecture on Beethoven. The programs will include the nine symphonies, the Missa Solennis, chamber music works and commemorative addresses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 20 1927

ARE THE CLASSICS TOO HIGH BROW FOR RADIO?

Boston Symphony Experiment Proves There is Real Demand for the Classics — Public, Not the Music, on Trial

By ALWYN E. BACH,
Senior Announcer of WBZ

"Is radio fostering a greater appreciation of the classics?" "Does the American public want symphony?" "What is the reaction of your radio audience to the present broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra?" With these and other questions too numerous to mention, we are approached almost daily by newspapermen, music critics, magazine writers and others whose business it is to know what the public desires and why.

In the earlier days of radio broadcasting station WBZ departed from the general trend toward the more popular type of musical presentation, and arranged classical programs which the staff felt were desired by a large proportion of the radio audience. The decision was arrived at as a result of many hundreds of letters asking for more of the classics, both vocal and instrumental. For the past four years WBZ has maintained this policy in program arrangement, and it is interesting to note the comment which has been received since that time.

Opera Interest Dwindled

We find such lines as the following: "It is such a relief to tune to WBZ and hear something other than the popular tunes played by most of the stations we tuned in last night." "Your program of last evening was very enjoyable, and provided a real treat after so much of popular music." With such comments it soon became apparent that there was a large audience to whom the programs of dance orchestras and popular song artists had become commonplace, and who wished more of the selections which have stood the test of time and criticism.

In the season of 1921-22, another Westinghouse station KYW in Chicago, broadcast an entire season of operatic performances by the Chicago Civic Opera company. These were met with great favor by the radio fans in the early part of the season, but toward the end of the season it was noted that the response was dropping off considerably, indicating that the interest was rapidly falling off. That was five years ago, however, and five years are sufficient to allow comparisons.

George H. Jaspert, now director of Westinghouse station WBZ, was director of KYW during the time these opera broadcasts were presented in Chicago. He is, therefore, in a position to lend authority in his statements concerning the trend in broadcasting.

The Symphony Experiment

Mr Jaspert cites as an example of comparison in tendencies and desires of the radio audience, the instance in which the Chicago opera was broadcast, and then goes on to say: "Today, however, the radio audience seems more and more to demand the best possible in music. The weekly programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 13 weeks now, and strangely enough, perhaps, there is a greater and more responsive audience listening to these weekly programs today than at the beginning of the season. Instead of dwindling as the season progresses, as was the case in 1922, the musical presentations of a higher class and plane are this year receiving an increasing volume of favorable comment. Not only has the radio audience very definitely shown that the concerts of organizations such as Boston's Symphony orchestra, are desired, but they have so definitely made their wants known that a number of other broadcasters have approached us regarding arrangements for transmitting through their respective stations, and as a result the Boston Symphony orchestra has been heard through eight of the largest radio stations in the East. Our Westinghouse station KDKA at East Pittsburg, Pa., recently joined the chain of stations for this symphony broadcast, thus making the programs of one of the world's leading musical organizations available to a maximum of listeners throughout the entire United States."

There is, of course, a reason for this seeming increase in the popularity of an organization formerly held to be too high-brow for the majority of people. What is the answer? Is the orchestra playing numbers more easily understood by the layman? No! If you glance through a program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, you will find listed the heaviest of the classics of old, as well as some of the more dissonant works of the modern schools of composition, which, by the way, must not be confused with the so-called popular music, now also undergoing rapid change. These compositions of the modern composers such as Webern, Krass, Roussel, Scriabin and others are an earnest endeavor on the party of these men to create a style of music, classical to be sure, but in keeping with the age in which we are living. The fact is that a great many people who have not seen fit to attend a concert of a symphony orchestra have heard a few of their friends, possibly, saying "Symphony is too high-brow for my musical understanding." Just what is meant by that, then? Music is but the expression of the composer's emotions.

The answer to this problem seems to be that a great many people in the vast radio audience are realizing that there is music other than that which they have heard, which strikes a sympathetic chord of understanding, and having studiously avoided symphony, they were not in a position to know what the performance had to offer.

A distinct feature of these symphony broadcasts and one which has done a great deal to interest the masses in the concerts, are the informal illustrative remarks between the numbers of the program made by Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston universit yand Holy Cross college. Prof Marshall was for 10 years organist of the Boston Symphony, which together with many years of study and lecturing on music in all its phases, has marked his an authority on the subject of symphonic presentations particularly. His remarks are always of a nature most easily understood by the average listener, and there have been received many hundreds of letters of commendation from people who heretofore would not listen to a program of symphony music. These invariably state that his remarks have made the programs of interest to them, whereas without them, their appreciation of symphony would be slight.

Who is on Trial?

In one of his lectures during the course of a concert in which one of whirh one of the real ultra-modern composition was included, Prof Marshall brought out a point of particular interest, one which I believe may prove of interest also to the reader, in view of the fact that a great number of listeners are in doubt as to the value of a number of these works of modern composers. Prof Marshall told of a visitor to the Louvre in Paris, who, upon looking at one of the massive paintings, said: "Huh! I can't see anything beautiful about that piece of work." The painting in question was one of the masterpieces of art, and the attendant turned to the visitor and remarked: "Sir, that painting is no longer on trial. It has stood the test of time and the criticisms of the world's greatest artists. It is yourself who is on trial." Prof Marshall stated that this might easily be applied to the musical art. "For," he says, "the music of the masters, Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, and others, is no longer on trial; it is we who listen who are on trial. In the case of the modern works, these may still be said to be on trial and time will then tell whether they are worthy of consideration. Mr Koussevitzky includes these works that we may know what the present-day composers are writing. Some will, perhaps, stand the test; others will die out and be forgotten."

ORCHESTRA GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Bach Concerto Is Event of Balanced Program

Globe Febr 22

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzsky conducting, gave the fourth concert in the current Monday series last evening in Symphony Hall before its usual Monday audience. The program consisted of Bach's 3rd Brandenburg Concerto, Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Ravel's "La Valse" and Brahms 2nd Symphony. All of these compositions have been previously played this season in the long series.

One may search far in the Bach literature before he may find a lustier piece of music, one more suggestive of roast beef and ale than the G major concerto for three-string orchestras. In particular the first movement, the thematic material of which may be found in quite different and generally less substantial form in the cantata "Ich liebe den Hochsten von ganzem Gemuethe," is highly suggestive of seafaring skippers and piratical lays. Those who greatly admire Walton's "Portsmouth Point" may find a pleasure in this far earlier and less studied work.

It is quite customary to accuse these Brandenburg Concertos of being suggestive of hack work, written as they were on requisition and for a specific occasion. Some of them seem to lie open to the criticism but surely not this hearty and vigorous music which was given a dramatic performance, undoubtedly considerably enlarged over that intended by the composer. For the once it was hard to imagine a loss in the expansion.

While he chooses a somewhat slow tempo for the Lohengrin "Prelude," none the less Mr Koussevitzsky's version of it is all silver sheen and goes far to portray the mood Wagner wished to create, that of the descending grail and the resultant jubilant celebration on earth. With memory of Wagnerian operatic performances so fresh in mind one was prone again to reflect how much better the equipment and the custom of the orchestra hall befit the Wagnerian preludes which here alone may be heard free from all distractions of late comers, fan rustlers, and conversationalists.

As to Ravel's spirited steed which remains remarkably lively and which was of course given a befittingly virtuosic performance, one could only regret the tradition which holds that Monday audiences will have none of too modern composition. Perhaps it would not like Copland or Webern, on which any audience remains divided, but would not Milhaud's jolly carnival or Roussel's jazzy work, both of whom are of fresh memory in the regular series, prove entertaining and a warrantable excursion? Neither is any longer than "La Valse." At least they do not seem so.

The most melodic of the Brahms symphonies gained over the regular performance in its association. At the close of the "evening of Brahms" one felt sated with the composer and desired only not to hear more of him for some time to come. Yet as soon as last evening this weariness was gone and the symphony came fresh and full of charm. Perhaps the last movement was a bit over-driven and lacking in clarity. At any rate it formed a highly dramatic close to a concert that was much better than the program had promised when viewed on paper.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $3975

Little More Than Third of Sum Needed to Assure Concerts is Raised.

OTHER CITIES SEEK DATES

Loss of Orchestra's Appearance Next Year Would Probably Become Permanent Because of Demand.—$6000 is Goal

Little more than a third of the $6000 guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year has been pledged since the drive was announced at the last concert of this season a week ago tonight. Seven new subscribers have increased the total from $1425 to $2025 in the last three days.

The local Symphony Concert committee, in charge of the drive that is hoped to result in the reappearance of the orchestra in this city, points out that unless the $6000 is pledged the orchestra will probably play elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it is now scheduled to appear at the Albee Theatre here. There is also possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean permanent loss of the orchestra, for many other communities are seeking to engage it on the five evenings yearly that it has formerly devoted to the Providence public.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

Peldges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form:

"I hereby pledge ——— dollars ($———) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT

Koussevitzky in Fine Fettle With the Symphony

Post Febr 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The fourth of the current series of Monday Symphony concerts, which befell last evening, offered an hour and three-quarters of remarkable orchestral playing, and—if a slight error in judgment as to the proper pace for the "Lohengrin" Prelude be overlooked—of remarkable conducting as well.

A MASTER AT RHYTHM

Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky has never seemed more the dazzling virtuoso of the baton than he seemed last evening as he led the orchestra through the mazes of Ravel's "The Waltz." Never before in the conducting of this brilliant, seductive music has he in such degree preserved intact, throughout all its convolutions and complexities, vagaries and subtleties, the underlying, all-pervading waltz-rhythm. Beside such a feat the much-touted achievements of some of our jazz-conductors are but an elementary exercise in time-beating.

Rhythm, in fact, appeared to be Mr. Koussevitzky's watchword last evening—again excepting Wagner's Prelude, played so slowly that its dominating theme all but lost its melodic coherence and continuity. There was rhythm of the most invigorating sort in the two movements of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, with which the concert began; and in the Second Symphony of Brahms, which brought it to an uplifting close, the conductor was ever watchful and alert to capture each pulse and accent, however elusive

Of the 'soggy,' stodgy Brahms Mr. Koussevitzky will have nought. In part he rescues that composer from the fate to which so many conductors have endeavored, consciously or otherwise, to consign him by seizing upon every melodic phrase, whether obviously apparent or lurking unsuspected in the inner recesses of the score.

But in large measure his antidote to the ponderousness and lethargy into which the music of Brahms will so readily relapse is an over-vitalizing rhythm. How beguiling last evening were the syncopations at the end of the first movement; how delicately, yet how tellingly emphasized the accents of the third; how compelling the rhythmic energies of the finale, with Mr. Ritter of the kettldrums valiantly bearing his portion in the deed.

Small wonder that last evening's audience responded so warmly to music and performance, applauding until Mr. Koussevitzky had summoned the players to their feet. Ere he knows it Mr.

Prov. Journal

Little More Than Third of Sum Needed to Assure Concerts is Raised.

FEB 22

OTHER CITIES SEEK DATES

Loss of Orchestra's Appearance Next Year Would Probably Become Permanent Because of Demand.—$6000 is Goal

Little more than a third of the $6000 guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year has been pledged since the drive was announced at the last concert of this season a week ago tonight. Seven new subscribers have increased the total from $1425 to $2025 in the last three days.

The local Symphony Concert committee, in charge of the drive that is hoped to result in the reappearance of the orchestra in this city, points out that unless the $6000 is pledged the orchestra will probably play elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it is now scheduled to appear at the Albee Theatre here. There is also possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean permanent loss of the orchestra, for many other communities are seeking to engage it on the five evenings yearly that it has formerly devoted to the Providence public.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

Peldges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form:

"I hereby pledge ——— dollars ($———) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 22 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $3975

Little More Than Third of Sum Needed to Assure Concerts is Raised.

OTHER CITIES SEEK DATES

Loss of Orchestra's Appearance Next Year Would Probably Become Permanent Because of Demand.—$6000 is Goal

Little more than a third of the $6000 guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year has been pledged since the drive was announced at the last concert of this season a week ago tonight. Seven new subscribers have increased the total from $1425 to $2025 in the last three days.

The local Symphony Concert committee, in charge of the drive that is hoped to result in the reappearance of the orchestra in this city, points out that unless the $6000 is pledged the orchestra will probably play elsewhere on the five Tuesday evenings when it is now scheduled to appear at the Albee Theatre here. There is also possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean permanent loss of the orchestra, for many other communities are seeking to engage it on the five evenings yearly that it has formerly devoted to the Providence public.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

Peldges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form:

"I hereby pledge ——— dollars ($———) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

FOURTH MONDAY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald Febr 22

For the fourth concert of the Monday evening series of Symphony concerts, given at Symphony hall last night, Mr Koussevitzky arranged the following program:

Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, for string orchestra; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ravel, choregraphic poem, "La Valse"; Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Of the "three great B's," Bach and Brahms would seem to have landed on unsteady ground in the heaven of geniuses, since around each of these names there has developed a clique who find it necessary continuously to burn incense and candles for the safety of their places, while yet declaring that each "sittetl on the right hand" of the ruler of all things. Both of these groups were given a chance for fervent worship last evening. Mr. Koussevitsky opened the concert with a work by the one and closed it with a work by the other. Each was beautifully played and in the "amen" expressed by the hands in the audience there was nothing perfunctory.

For added enjoyment there was the choregraphic poem by the modern, Ravel, a piece heard in Boston at least half a dozen times and which gains in effect with each hearing.

The Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" would have gained measurably had Mr Koussevitzky given it a slightly faster pace. It dragged a bit last night.

There was the usual large audience.

H. L.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 22 1927

$2025 SUBSCRIBED FOR SYMPHONY FUND

Seven new subscribers have increased the total guarantee fund to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next year from $1425 to $2025, making slightly more than one third of the $6000 to be pledged.

The committee in charge of the drive points out that unless the full amount is raised the orchestra will not come here next season. There is also a possibility that a year's interruption in the Providence series will mean a permanent loss of the orchestra, the committee says.

The latest subscribers are the following: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Herbert W. Rice, Albert Fenner, Frank L. Hinckley, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Coolidge R. Billings and Francis B. Keeney.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 23 1927

Complete the Fund

Less than half the $6000 necessary t guarantee the appearance here nex year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been raised in the week that has elapsed since the appeal was made.

Failure of the fund would mean that the five concerts scheduled for this city would be given elsewhere. Nor is this all. Since several other communities are eager to obtain the services of the organization, it is declared that if Providence permits the orchestra to slip away for one year it will be exceedingly difficult to induce it to return later.

The necessity, then, for completing the $6000 fund is apparent; subscriptions for the balance required should be promptly forthcoming.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 23 1927

SAVE THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Pledges for the guarantee fund required to assure the continuance of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence next season are coming in so slowly that the loss of this incomparable feature of the city's musical year is threatened. The amount required, six thousand dollars, is so small that it seems ridiculous that so serious a deprivation may result from the lack of local interest.

More than a season's loss of the concerts is imminent. Other communities are eager to secure the orchestra, and if Providence were omitted from the schedule one year it might mean a permanent loss. At present less than half the guarantee fund has been subscribed. The enthusiasm that has been evoked by these concerts, not only during the season just closed but through past years, should assure a hearty financial support for the future.

A year ago the city faced a discontinuance of the orchestra's visits because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. That emergency was met by the generous interest of Mr. E. F. Albee in the offer of his theatre for temporary use pending the completion of the new Masonic Temple. The present difficulty should be less serious, depending, as it does, merely upon the raising of a slight guarantee fund.

The problem is directly up to the music-lovers of Providence. They should lose no time in providing the necessary financial support if they wish to continue their enjoyment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts Only pledges are necessary at this time; payment is not to be made until September 15. The treasurer of the Providence Journal Company is acting as recipient for the fund and pledges should be sent to this office. It is time for prompt action if the city is to preserve its place on the orchestra's annual engagement list.

ELGAR MUSIC PLEASES AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The listener at the Symphony concerts of this week discovers that the surest way of killing a composer is by overplaying his music. Last week's an all-Respighi program was successful partly because of the presence of the composer as conductor and pianist, and of his wife as singer in her husband's music. AMER

But whatever the intrinsic virtues of Respighi's music, one afternoon devoted solely to his compositions should have sufficed for a while at least. Consequently the playing, at yesterday's concert, of a new piece by the Italian master, "Church Windows," did not come off too well. Serge Koussevitzky, returned to the conductor's stand, worked his hardest to attain a favorable reception for a work being given its first performance in the world, but to little dience was sated with Respighi's music, the new composition did not seem to have the vitality of several works heard here last week. There is a tremendously sonorous second movement in Respighi's grandest manner, and little else of interest.

The remainder of the program sounded as advance expectation indicated it would. "The Swan of Tuonela," Sibelius' legend, made an apt prelude to a concert that never became exciting. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko" is not heavyweight musical fare despite passages of beauty.

Only the "Enigma" variations of Elgar, which closed the concert, were thoroughly gratifying to hear. It is fifteen years since any of the Englishman's music has been heard at a regular symphony concert, though one of his transcriptions was played two years ago, and the "Cockagine" overture was given on a Tuesday afternoon concert last year.

These variations are scored not in the modern manner, but they are thoroughly musical and exhibit ingenuity in contrapuntal development. Some of them would make ideal "Pops" selections.

ELGAR RESTORED; SIBELIUS AFRESH; RESPIGHI RETURNS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL-FREIGHTED

TRANS—FEB 26

Manifold Matter and Multifold Pleasure—The "Enigma Variations" After Fifteen Years—"The Swan of Tuonela" as Masterpiece—"Sadko" More Familiarly—"Church-Windows" for Curious Experiment to Various Issue

IT IS not the least of Mr. Koussevitzky's merits as conductor that he shapes programs with a free will and an open mind. Two weeks ago he assembled three canonized pieces from a single composer—Brahms; arranged them in the most conventional of patterns—overture, concerto, symphony. Yesterday four composers stood upon his list, and three of them are living and productive. From none did he draw overture, concerto or symphony. In fact the first and longer division of the program comprised three tone-poems: Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko"; Respighi's "Church Windows," as the learned doctors of Symphony Hall now re-christen his newest piece. To this music of impression and suggestion, the conductor appended Elgar's "Enigma Variations," which, to all but Sir Edward and his intimates, are symphonic pages.

For next week again, no symphony is announced. Instead, the program will range from a set of variations and an operatic suite through five choral pieces as various as are Wolf and Delius, Prokofiev and Brahms. So doing, Mr. Koussevitzky keeps a long series of concerts in perpetual flux and diversity; plays skilfully upon the sense of the unexpected in hearers; avoids routine, which is the peril of institutions; sustains interest, which is the secret of life. Twenty times it has been said that, agree or disagree with Mr. Koussevitzky's version of a given piece, yet is he never dull. Throughout the season, he has been as lively and individual in the assorting of programs. Out of seventeen pairs of Symphony Concerts since last October, only one has been tedious—and that was entrusted to Mr. Ottorino Respighi, exhibiting far too many of his own numbers.

In particular, it was good to find El gar's name upon the schedule of the day For it is actually a fact—unless the ven erable compiler of the program-book ha slipped—that between 1911 and 1925, full fourteen years, no piece by him wa played at the Symphony Concerts. Dr Muck thought poorly of Sir Edward; l bonhomme Rabaud was probably una ware of his existence; Mr. Monteux's acquaintance with British composers began with Holst, Vaughan Williams and the succeeding generation. Through these years, moreover, first the Germanophiles and subsequently the Francophiles, expressly disdained English music. The one faction laid upon us neutral listeners the burden, say, of tone-poems from the Freiherr van Reznicek; while the other exposed us wantonly to the parlor bijouterie of the late Monsieur Saint-Saëns.

By all odds Elgar has faults; probably he has written rather more than his share of tedious pages. He cherishes mannerisms, like certain sequences, that are weariness to listening ears. In his time he has manufactured not a little music with hardly a trace of inner and spiritual compulsion; while he can be as smug as though he had been "born and raised" in Los Angeles. None the less he is a musician of wide learning, large resource and ready skill; a composer of invention, imagination and individual temperament. Not only does he receive impressions; he also sees visions, while into tones he can transmute both. We applaud Wagner, Debussy, Musorgsky, because each of them, writing music, is both universal and of his own race. Likewise with Elgar; he speaks clear to Berlin or Rome or Boston; yet only an Englishman could have written much of his music. Mr. Koussevitzky did well when he restored Sir Edward, two years ago, to the Symphony Concerts; when he recalled him again yesterday. Oftener than biennially, he might deservedly appear there. Waiving his symphonies, there are overtures and the tone-poem, unwarrantably neglected, of "Falstaff."

Internationally, these "Enigma Variations" are the conductors' favorite choice them in Boston. German conductors pick them up now and again; in England and in America they approximate a repertory piece. After nearly thirty years, the "Enigma," about which of old speculation played plentifully, may be left for "programists" and other pedants to discover. Possibly Sir Edward has somewhere set down the solution for posterity. Certainly, it has, and can have, little to do with the vitality or the interest of his music. Outside the diminishing Elgarian circle—he is now in his seventieth year—the initials attached to each variation are also of small moment. Few are translatable outside that close company; none, seemingly, denotes a public personage. Rather, they were diversion and stimulation to Sir Edward as he wrote. More fortunately, these labels stirred him to graphic and lasting music of characterization. "Ysobel" and "Dorabella," for example, give birth to a music of feminine charm and grace, illuding to the listening fancy. The texture of these variations is musically lovely; while each was played yesterday with light and crystalline virtuosity. In turn, "Troyte," who must have been rather noisy about the house, and the soliloquizing "Nimrod" are plainly temperaments, invigorated in their measures. It is easy to suspect "G. R. S." as tonal "kidding;" while in contrast "X. X. X." is a little tone-poem of visioning affection.

To individualize the variations is the pastime of repeated hearings and ingrained liking for all fourteen. Rather, the casual listener is pleased by the diversity and animation of the musical speech; the skill and warmth with which it flows; the manifold rhythm and color playing through and over it; the masculine humor, affection, vigor, coursing and characterizing the measures. The "Enigma Variations," in spite of a too astute and piquing title, are a frank and honest music. To mix figures, they smell sweet in the ear. Rather oftener than not, variations are a labor of scholarship cudgelled or cajoled. At Elgar's call, they come spontaneously, lead a humanized musical life.

Deserved revival, likewise, was Sibelius's tone-poem, "The Swan of Tuonela," led into the repertory by Dr. Muck, vanishing from it with his departure; favorite piece, besides, with Mr. Toscanini. For the while, Mr. Koussevitzky has perfect himself in it. No doubt he will succeed better this evening than he did yesterday afternoon; while at the third performance, next Tuesday, he may have exactly and imaginatively gauged it. At first hearing, the conductor's pace seemed sometimes to constrict the melodic line, while not always was the tonal color duly distributed. For the tone-poem is a wondrous music of silence and solitude; second, a wondrous music of t colors, black and white. Out of the spar frame, the bare progressions, the hush voice of Sibelius rises this solitude of fabulous and northern nowhere. T melody unfolds—and upon the imag ation it is the voice of deep-set silence.

Little by little out of Sibelius's fi spun harmonies and thin-edged timbr the measures take color—upon the bla pool below the dark forest, swims t swan of legend, unearthly white. T waters scarcely stir as it parts the there is no sound when they close aga At length comes the moment of clima pent and relatively low-voiced as M Koussevitzky discerningly took it. The speaks the emotion in which the hear or rather the watcher, stands spell-bou . . . Out of human ken, back into legend, quivers the vision. An evocati achieved, of the rarest quality by t most concentrated of means; a visi stamped upon the imagination by subtle simplicity of tones; sound—a it is silence and solitude; sound—and white swan cleaves the blackest of wat Where in the whole of music, over few and stripped pages, is there such tone-poem? In the sifting of time, may be Sibelius's monument.

With Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," t listener knew what to expect, thou memories of the last preceding perfor ance, in 1921, might be slight, and rec lection of the ballet, danced in 1917 the Dyaghilev Troupe, the merest ha Whatever the particular folk-lore th stirs Rimsky, the practised hearer ma infer the treatment: a velvet-voiced c chestra throbbing sensuously; rhythms, harmonies, timbres that are an imagery in themselves; little musical substance in the graver sense, but thick-spun atmosphere through which pierces transparent suggestion. This time the legend is a sea-piece. Overboard goes Sadko the minstrel; into the caves of the sea-folk he descends; the Lord of the Waters bids him play upon the gusli—two harps make it super-human; the folk and the very billows dance to the tune; Sadko snaps his strings; calm and darkling falls the sea. Any instructor in any conservatory could riddle Rimsky's music by pedantic analysis. It has no "inner life"; it does not exist by or for itself. Around old legend, by the composer's conjuring with these three—rhythms, harmonies, timbres—it winds atmosphere and distills illusion, sensuous, sea-green, of the waters under the earth. To hearing Russians, the legend was tale absorbed in childhood; to us others, the program-book was glimpse.

Ed ancora il Signore Respighi—tumultuously received when he came upon the stage at the end of the first performance—anywhere—of his new tone-poem. What clapping in the auditorium and from an orchestra on its feet; what clasping of hands, patting of backs, alternate retreats and advances between composer and conductor, what uplifted Respighian arms outpouring thanks upon all and sundry! Si, si, signore e signori, the Symphony Concerts can still yield incidents. In degree, "Church Windows" deserved these libations of praise. Anyhow, these tone-picturings are more interesting than either the overture, "Belphagor," or the "Mixolydian Concerto," both of departing memory. Three impulses seem to have prompted Mr. Respighi to composition: a sincerely devout spirit; an inclination to further experiment with Gregorian scales; a will to transfuse in tones the sensations of stained-gla upon those that med-

Beneath, light calls into glorified be ing figures of pious chronicle or sanctified legend.

Mr. Respighi is a truly religious man, believing and practising within the Roman fold. Writing "Church Windows," he did not strike a pose for purposes of musical composition. He is also studious and sensitive to Gregorian scales and harmonies; in them, as he believes, he explores a storehouse of musical treasure. Imagining a window upon which Joseph and Mary and Jesus flee beneath the starry night, he would release in tones the mood and the impression "Out of Egypt have I called My Son." Imagining a window upon which Michael Archangel smites and disperses the rebels from God, he is like-minded. Within him Miltonic impulse stirs. Imagining glass yet again, he beholds Saint Clare, the companion of Saint Francis—upon the slopes of Assisi still grows her garden—borne as by miracle, since strength of body failed her, to share in holy rites. Faithful daughter, she, of the Franciscan soul. Looking once more, the composer sees Saint Gregory the Great, Pope and lord of men, clothed with power and dominion, pavilioned in splendor and girdled with praise. The colors of churchly glass transmuted into the colors of music: the imagery of the one become the impression of the other.

Being mortal man and somewhat less than genius in music-making, Mr. Respighi has inevitably fallen short of this "great argument." Writing the four tone-poems assembled in "Church Windows," he has achieved variously. Twice and twice only, to make report from a single cursory hearing, has he gained in the texture and the color of his measures, the depth and glow and throb of stained glass when through it upon imagination floods light or crosses shadow. There are darkling moments toward the end of "The Flight Into Egypt"—and the eye, stirred by the ear, looks across the great church at Chartres on a dusky afternoon. Sonorous splendors proclaim Saint Gregory, pontiff and prince; for instants they pulse and flame upon the ear, as to the eye stirs the deep-hued glass, when full summer sunshine bathes the chapel of Jesus College in the English Cambridge. Once and once only, furthermore, has Mr. Respighi gained the clear pallor filtering from stained glass, across some hillside chapel, upon the low mass of dawn—in the introductory theme of the music for Saint Clare. Elsewhere the quest of a new tonal illusion fails. . . . From Gregorian scales and harmonies, Mr. Respighi again diffuses the austere brightness, the thin, transparent, glow emanating at moments from his piano-concerto. There, they were an effect won by composing scholarship for the gratification of listening curiosity. In "Church Windows," they compass atmosphere and convey illusion—notably in the quieter picturing of the matins of Saint Clare and the wayside night of the Holy Family.

With other deeds of musical imagination Mr. Respighi sometimes gropes; sometimes falters; again achieves. "The Flight Into Egypt" begins in stilled rapture, weaving veils, parting them with suggestion; then falls away into mere music-spinning; recovers in the colorings and pulse of the end. The poem of Michael Archangel drives furiously and clangorously. Scattered before Mr. Respighi's thrusting chromatics and plunging rhythms are the Satanic hosts. Faint and far sounds a wan melody for trumpet, and the listener puzzles his dull head to discover its place in the imaginative scheme. The timbres of the celesta, sweet and tingling; the voices of other instruments, thinned to a singular transparency, clothe Saint Clare in a sublimated tonal air. The bell-filled "symphony" that preludes the apparition of the pontifical Gregory is adept and imaginative play with rarefied or intensified musical sound. Yet when he emerges in full glory of principalities and powers, the encompassing sonorities are not so far from those of the seagods in "The Fountains" or the Roman soldiery in "The Pines." Possibly thoughts of the concert-hall occasionally threaded Mr. Respighi's pious meditations. For us sinful men, there is no evading Sathanas.

H. T. P.

—One suspects that Mr. Borah lost faith in Santa Claus at the age of two. [San Francisco Chronicle

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Monday will be the last day in which subscriptions may be made for the Beethoven Festival to be given in Symphony Hall in the week which will mark the 100th anniversary of the composer's death. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be assisted in the two choral programmes by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and two quartets of soloists. The programmes will be as follows:

Tuesday, March 22—Missa Solennis.

Wednesday, March 23—First Three Symphonies.

Thursday, March 24—Chamber music by the Lenox String Quartet and Carl Friedberg, pianist.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 25 and 26—4th and 5th, and 6th and 7th symphonies, respectively (these concerts do not fall in the special subscriptions).

Monday, March 28—Commemorative exercises with an address by Ernest Newman of London, and the performance of the Last String Quartet by the Lenox String Quartet.

Tuesday, March 29—The 8th and 9th symphonies. TRAV

PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

The People's Symphony [illegible], Stuart Mason, conductor, will give its 13th concert of the season tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 in Jordan Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be assisting artist. The program is as follows:

Cherubini, overture to "Anacreon"; Shumann, concerto for piano and orchestra; Puccini, crescentami (first time in Boston); Liszt, "Les Preludes," symphonic poem after La[illegible]

FEB 5

FOURTH TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Music from England and Scandinavia will comprise the fourth concert of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given next Tuesday, March 1st [illegible]

at 3:15.

The English composers represented will be Edward Purcell in a voluntary arranged by Sir Henry Wood; Vaughan Williams's First Norfolk Rhapsody, and Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variaitons.

The latter part of the program will be divided between music from Norway and Finland.

CHORAL SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Cecilia Society, of which Malcolm Lang is conductor, will assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five short choral numbers at the next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 4 and 5. They will be the "Song of Destiny," by Brahms; "The Fire-Rider," by Hugo Wolf; "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius; the barbaric incantation, "They Are Seven," by Prokofieff, in which Charles Stratton will sing the tenor solo, and the Finale from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Czar."

Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce the program with variations on a theme of the old Dutch composer, Adrianus Valerius, written for strings by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other orchestral number will be a suite of tone pictures from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Invisible City of Kitej."

MORE RESPIGHI AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb 26

New Tone Poem Given First Performance

Boston Globe

Last week's Boston Symphony program was filled by the music of the Italian composer, Respighi, who conducted as guest, and played his own piano concerto. Yesterday a new tone poem by Respighi entitled "Vetrate di Chiesa" was played for the first time in public at the Symphony concert.

Mr Koussevitzky conducted. The composer was in the audience, and came to the stage to receive the applause at the end of his piece.

The other numbers were Elgar's "Enigma Variations," Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela," and Rimsky Korsakov's "Sadko."

Respighi's new tone poem seems likely to secure at least a measure of popular favor. It is soon to be published, and no doubt will go the rounds of orchestral concerts the world over.

The title means "Church Windows." There are four "impressions," suggested by stained glass in various Italian churches, "The Flight Into Egypt," "The Archangel Michael," "The Matin of Saint Clare" and "St Gregory the Great."

The work is scored for a large orchestra, including four tam tams, a bell in C, and organ as well as more usual instruments.

Although there are effective pages, as, for example, the first measures depicting Michael, flaming sword in hand, driving the rebel angels from heaven; the first passage for organ alone representing Pope Gregory blessing the multitude; music representing the rapture of Saint Clare at her miraculous trip to the Portiuncula; and so Respighi tends to weaken the effect of his ideas by undue amplification and repetition.

Nearly the whole appeal of all his music depends upon his talent for striking effects, which at a first hearing are impressive. In his "Pines of Rome," these effects come off more securely than they did yesterday in "Church Windows."

The performance yesterday, however, was disappointing in some respects. Mr Koussevitzky had seemingly not had sufficient time for preparation to permit him to get below the surface of the highly intricate score, and to dramatize the music with his customary imaginative intensity.

There were some obvious errors of detail, and a general sense of effort on the part of players and conductor, rather than the expected virtuosity. But Mr Respighi has set in this tone poem a very difficult task for orchestra and leader. One wondered why the composer did not himself conduct his work.

It is indicative of the present status of American orchestras in the musical world that a prominent European composer should entrust the first public performance of an important new work to the Boston Symphony, and that he should be here to listen to it.

Before the war nothing of the sort was likely to happen, though what the press agents call "world premieres" of works by Dvorak and Skriabin had occurred in New York.

Mr Koussevitzky went his own way with Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela," emphasizing its mournful monotony, hushing the swelling climax. Mr Speyer played the solo for English horn beautifully, and was singled out by the conductor to bow to the applause. This piece has distinction and originality, though it is not in modernist vein.

The same can be said of Elgar's "Enigma" variations. The younger generation is too prone to remember against Elgar his "Pomp and Circumstance" and "Salut d'armour," and to forget his "Dream of Gerontius," but who among younger English composers, with the single exception of Holst in "The Planets," has written music as admirable as this set of variations? The performance had admirable clarity and energy.

Rimsky Korsakov's "Sadko" because it is inferior to his "Scheherazade," should not be underrated. Played as it was yesterday this tone poem is still agreeable to the ear and stimulating to the imagination.

Throughout the concert, Mr Koussevitzky seemed bent for once showing that he can make [illegible] without resorting to triple fortissimo. The volume of tone was [illegible] though without gaining

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 23 1927

Complete the Fund

Less than half the $6000 necessary t guarantee the appearance here nex year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been raised in the week that has elapsed since the appeal was made.

Failure of the fund would mean that the five concerts scheduled for this city would be given elsewhere. Nor is this all. Since several other communities are eager to obtain the services of the organization, it is declared that if Providence permits the orchestra to slip away for one year it will be exceedingly difficult to induce it to return later.

The necessity, then, for completing the $6000 fund is apparent; subscriptions for the balance required should be promptly forthcoming.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 23 1927

SAVE THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Pledges for the guarantee fund required to assure the continuance of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence next season are coming in so slowly that the loss of this incomparable feature of the city's musical year is threatened. The amount required, six thousand dollars, is so small that it seems ridiculous that so serious a deprivation may result from the lack of local interest.

More than a season's loss of the concerts is imminent. Other communities are eager to secure the orchestra, and if Providence were omitted from the schedule one year it might mean a permanent loss. At present less than half the guarantee fund has been subscribed. The enthusiasm that has been evoked by these concerts, not only during the season just closed but through past years, should assure a hearty financial support for the future.

A year ago the city faced a discontinuance of the orchestra's visits because of the lack of a suitable auditorium. That emergency was met by the generous interest of Mr. E. F. Albee in the offer of his theatre for temporary use pending the completion of the new Masonic Temple. The present difficulty should be less serious, depending, as it does, merely upon the raising of a slight guarantee fund.

The problem is directly up to the music-lovers of Providence. They should lose no time in providing the necessary financial support if they wish to continue their enjoyment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts Only pledges are necessary at this time; payment is not to be made until September 15. The treasurer of the Providence Journal Company is acting as recipient for the fund and pledges should be sent to this office. It is time for prompt action if the city is to preserve its place on the orchestra's annual engagement list.

ELGAR MUSIC PLEASES AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The listener at the Symphony concerts of this week discovers that the surest way of killing a composer is by overplaying his music. Last week an all-Respighi program was successful partly because of the presence of the composer as conductor and pianist, and of his wife as singer in her husband's music. AMER

But whatever the intrinsic virtues of Respighi's music, one afternoon devoted solely to his compositions should have sufficed for a while at least. Consequently the playing, at yesterday's concert, of a new piece by the Italian master, "Church Windows," did not come off too well. Serge Koussevitzky, returned to the conductor's stand, worked his hardest to attain a favorable reception for a work being given its first performance in the world, but to little dience was sated with Respighi's music, the new composition did not seem to have the vitality of several works heard here last week. There is a tremendously sonorous second movement in Respighi's grandest manner, and little else of interest.

The remainder of the program sounded as advance expectation indicated it would. "The Swan of Tuonela," Sibelius' legend, made an apt prelude to a concert that never became exciting. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko" is not heavyweight musical fare despite passages of beauty.

Only the "Enigma" variations of Elgar, which closed the concert, were thoroughly gratifying to hear. It is fifteen years since any of the Englishman's music has been heard at a regular symphony concert, though one of his transcriptions was played two years ago, and the "Cockaigne" overture was given at a Tuesday afternoon concert last year.

These variations are scored not in the modern manner, but they are thoroughly musical and exhibit ingenuity in contrapuntal development. Some of them would make ideal "Pops" selections.

ELGAR RESTORED; SIBELIUS AFRESH; RESPIGHI RETURNS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL-FREIGHTED

TRANS—FEB 26

Manifold Matter and Multifold Pleasure—The "Enigma Variations" After Fifteen Years—"The Swan of Tuonela" as Masterpiece—"Sadko" More Familiarly—"Church-Windows" for Curious Experiment to Various Issue

IT IS not the least of Mr. Koussevitzky's merits as conductor that he shapes programs with a free will and an open mind. Two weeks ago he assembled three canonized pieces from a single composer—Brahms; arranged them in the most conventional of patterns—overture, concerto, symphony. Yesterday four composers stood upon his list, and three of them are living and productive. From none did he draw overture, concerto or symphony. In fact the first and longer division of the program comprised three tone-poems: Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko"; Respighi's "Church Windows," as the learned doctors of Symphony Hall now re-christen his newest piece. To this music of impression and suggestion, the conductor appended Elgar's "Enigma Variations," which, to all but Sir Edward and his intimates, are symphonic pages.

For next week again, no symphony is announced. Instead, the program will range from a set of variations and an operatic suite through five choral pieces as various as are Wolf and Dellius, Prokofiev and Brahms. So doing, Mr. Koussevitzky keeps a long series of concerts in perpetual flux and diversity; plays skilfully upon the sense of the unexpected in hearers; avoids routine, which is the peril of institutions; sustains interest, which is the secret of life. Twenty times it has been said that, agree or disagree with Mr. Koussevitzky's version of a given piece, yet is he never dull. Throughout the season, he has been as lively and individual in the assorting of programs. Out of seventeen pairs of Symphony Concerts since last October, only one has been tedious—and that was entrusted to Mr. Ottorino Respighi, exhibiting far too many of his own numbers.

In particular, it was good to find Elgar's name upon the schedule of the day For it is actually a fact—unless the venerable compiler of the program-book has slipped—that between 1911 and 1925, a full fourteen years, no piece by him was played at the Symphony Concerts. Dr Muck thought poorly of Sir Edward; le bonhomme Rabaud was probably unaware of his existence; Mr. Monteux's acquaintance with British composers began with Holst, Vaughan Williams and the succeeding generation. Through these years, moreover, first the Germanophiles and subsequently the Francophiles, expressly disdained English music. The one faction laid upon us neutral listeners the burden, say, of tone-poems from the Freiherr van Reznicek; while the other exposed us wantonly to the parlor bijouterie of the late Monsieur Saint-Saëns.

By all odds Elgar has faults; probably he has written rather more than his share of tedious pages. He cherishes mannerisms, like certain sequences, that are weariness to listening ears. In his time he has manufactured not a little music with hardly a trace of inner and spiritual compulsion; while he can be as smug as though he had been "born and raised" in Los Angeles. None the less he is a musician of wide learning, large resource and ready skill; a composer of invention, imagination and individual temperament. Not only does he receive impressions; he also sees visions; while into tones he can transmute both. We applaud Wagner, Debussy, Musorgsky, because each of them, writing music, is both universal and of his own race. Likewise with Elgar; he speaks clear to Berlin or Rome or Boston; yet only an Englishman could have written much of his music. Mr. Koussevitzky did well when he restored Sir Edward, two years ago, to the Symphony Concerts; when he recalled him again yesterday. Oftener than biennially, he might deservedly appear there. Waiving his symphonies, there are overtures and the tone-poem, unwarrantably neglected, of "Falstaff."

Internationally, these "Enigma Variations" are the conductors' favorite choice them in Boston. German conductors pick them up now and again; in England and in America they approximate a repertory piece. After nearly thirty years, the "Enigma," about which of old speculation played plentifully, may be left for "programists" and other pedants to discover. Possibly Sir Edward has somewhere set down the solution for posterity Certainly, it has, and can have, little to do with the vitality or the interest of his music. Outside the diminishing Elgarian circle—he is now in his seventieth year—the initials attached to each variation are also of small moment. Few are translatable outside that close company; none, seemingly, denotes a public personage. Rather, they were diversion and stimulation to Sir Edward as he wrote. More fortunately, these labels stirred him to graphic and lasting music of characterization. "Ysobel" and "Dorabella," for example, give birth to a music of feminine charm and grace, illuding to the listening fancy. The texture of these variations is musically lovely; while each was played yesterday with light and crystalline virtuosity. In turn, "Troyte," who must have been rather noisy about the house, and the soliloquizing "Nimrod" are plainly temperaments, invigorated in their measures. It is easy to suspect "G. R. S." as tonal "kidding;" while in contrast "X. X. X." is a little tone-poem of visioning affection.

To individualize the variations is the pastime of repeated hearings and ingrained liking for all fourteen. Rather, the casual listener is pleased by the diversity and animation of the musical speech; the skill and warmth with which it flows; the manifold rhythm and color playing through and over it; the masculine humor, affection, vigor, coursing and characterizing the measures. The "Enigma Variations," in spite of a too astute and piquing title, are a frank and honest music. To mix figures, they smell sweet in the ear. Rather oftener than not, variations are a labor of scholarship cudgelled or cajoled. At Elgar's call, they come spontaneously, lead a humanized musical life.

Deserved revival, likewise, was Sibelius's tone-poem, "The Swan of Tuonela," led into the repertory by Dr. Muck, vanishing from it with his departure; favorite piece, besides, with Mr. Toscanini For the while, Mr. Koussevitzky has perfect himself in it. No doubt he will succeed better this evening than he did yesterday afternoon; while at the third performance, next Tuesday, he may have exactly and imaginatively gauged it. At first hearing, the conductor's pace seemed sometimes to constrict the melodic line, while not always was the tonal color truly distributed. For the tone-poem is a wondrous music of silence and solitude; second, a wondrous music of the colors, black and white. Out of the spare frame, the bare progressions, the hushed voice of Sibelius rises this solitude of fabulous and northern nowhere. The melody unfolds—and upon the imagination it is the voice of deep-set silence.

Little by little out of Sibelius's fine spun harmonies and thin-edged timbres the measures take color—upon the black pool below the dark forest, swims the swan of legend, unearthly white. The waters scarcely stir as it parts them; there is no sound when they close again. At length comes the moment of climax, pent and relatively low-voiced as Mr. Koussevitzky discerningly took it. The one speaks the emotion in which the hearer, or rather the watcher, stands spell-bound. . . . Out of human ken, back into the legend, quivers the vision. An evocation achieved, of the rarest quality by the most concentrated of means; a vision stamped upon the imagination by the subtle simplicity of tones; sound—and it is silence and solitude; sound—and the white swan cleaves the blackest of waters. Where in the whole of music, over so few and stripped pages, is there such a tone-poem? In the sifting of time, it may be Sibelius's monument.

With Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," the listener knew what to expect, though memories of the last preceding performance, in 1921, might be slight, and recollection of the ballet, danced in 1917 by the Dyaghilev Troupe, the merest haze. Whatever the particular folk-lore that stirs Rimsky, the practised hearer may infer the treatment: a velvet-voiced orchestra throbbing sensuously; rhythms, harmonies, timbres that are an imagery in themselves; little musical substance in the graver sense, but thick-spun atmosphere through which pierces transparent suggestion. This time the legend is a sea-piece. Overboard goes Sadko the minstrel; into the caves of the sea-folk he descends; the Lord of the Waters bids him play upon the gusli—two harps make it super-human; the folk and the very billows dance to the tune; Sadko snaps his strings; calm and darkling falls the sea. Any instructor in any conservatory could riddle Rimsky's music by pedantic analysis. It has no "inner life"; it does not exist by or for itself. Around old legend, by the composer's conjuring with these three—rhythms, harmonies, timbres—it winds atmosphere and distills illusion, sensuous, sea-green, of the waters under the earth. To hearing Russians, the legend was tale absorbed in childhood; to us others, the program-book was glimpse.

Ed ancora il Signore Respighi—tumultuously received when he came upon the stage at the end of the first performance—anywhere—of his new tone-poem. What clapping in the auditorium and from an orchestra on its feet; what clasping of hands, patting of backs, alternate retreats and advances between composer and conductor, what uplifted Respighian arms outpouring thanks upon all and sundry! Si, si, signore e signori, the Symphony Concerts can still yield incidents. In degree, "Church Windows" deserved these libations of praise. Anyhow, these tone-picturings are more interesting than either the overture, "Belphagor," or the "Mixolydian Concerto," both of departing memory. Three impulses seem to have prompted Mr. Respighi to composition: a sincerely devout spirit; an inclination to further experiment with Gregorian scales; a will to transfuse in[illegible] tones the sensations of [illegible] upon those that med-beneath, light calls into glorified being figures of pious chronicle or sanctified legend.

Mr. Respighi is a truly religious man, believing and practising within the Roman fold. Writing "Church Windows," he did not strike a pose for purposes of musical composition. He is also studious and sensitive to Gregorian scales and harmonies; in them, as he believes, he explores a storehouse of musical treasure. Imagining a window upon which Joseph and Mary and Jesus flee beneath the starry night, he would release in tones the mood and the impression "Out of Egypt have I called My Son." Imagining a window upon which Michael Archangel smites and disperses the rebels from God, he is like-minded. Within him Miltonic impulse stirs. Imagining glass yet again, he beholds Saint Clare, the companion of Saint Francis—upon the slopes of Assisi still grows her garden—borne as by miracle, since strength of body failed her, to share in holy rites. Faithful daughter, she, of the Franciscan soul. Looking once more, the composer sees Saint Gregory the Great, Pope and lord of men, clothed with power and dominion, pavilioned in splendor and girdled with praise. The colors of churchly glass transmuted into the colors of music: the imagery of the one become the impression of the other.

Being mortal man and somewhat less than genius in music-making, Mr. Respighi has inevitably fallen short of this "great argument." Writing the four tone-poems assembled in "Church Windows," he has achieved variously. Twice and twice only, to make report from a single cursory hearing, has he gained in the texture and the color of his measures, the depth and glow and throb of stained glass when through it upon imagination floods light or crosses shadow. There are darkling moments toward the end of "The Flight Into Egypt"—and the eye, stirred by the ear, looks across the great church at Chartres on a dusky afternoon. Sonorous splendors proclaim Saint Gregory, pontiff and prince; for instants they pulse and flame upon the ear, as to the eye stirs the deep-hued glass, when full summer sunshine bathes the chapel of Jesus College in the English Cambridge. Once and once only, furthermore, has Mr. Respighi gained the clear pallor filtering from stained glass, across some hillside chapel, upon the low mass of dawn—in the introductory theme of the music for Saint Clare. Elsewhere the quest of a new tonal illusion fails. . . . From Gregorian scales and harmonies, Mr. Respighi again diffuses the austere brightness, the thin, transparent, glow emanating at moments from his piano-concerto. There, they were an effect won by composing scholarship for the gratification of listening curiosity. In "Church Windows," they compass atmosphere and convey illusion—notably in the quieter picturing of the matins of Saint Clare and the wayside night of the Holy Family.

With other deeds of musical imagination Mr. Respighi sometimes gropes; sometimes falters; again achieves. "The Flight Into Egypt" begins in stilled rapture, weaving veils, parting them with suggestion; then falls away into mere music-spinning; recovers in the colorings and pulse of the end. The poem of Michael Archangel drives furiously and clangorously. Scattered before Mr. Respighi's thrusting chromatics and plunging rhythms are the Satanic hosts. Faint and far sounds a wan melody for trumpet, and the listener puzzles his dull head to discover its place in the imaginative scheme. The timbres of the celesta, sweet and tingling; the voices of other instruments, thinned to a singular transparency, clothe Saint Clare in a sublimated tonal air. The bell-filled "symphony" that preludes the apparition of the pontifical Gregory is adept and imaginative play with rarefied or intensified musical sound. Yet when he emerges in full glory of principalities and powers, the encompassing sonorities are not so far from those of the seagods in "The Fountains" or the Roman soldiery in "The Pines." Possibly thoughts of the concert-hall occasionally threaded Mr. Respighi's pious meditations. For us sinful men, there is no evading Sathanas.

H. T. P.

—One suspects that Mr. Borah lost faith in Santa Claus at the age of two. [San Francisco Chronicle

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Monday will be the last day in which subscriptions may be made for the Beethoven Festival to be given in Symphony Hall in the week which will mark the 100th anniversary of the composer's death. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be assisted in the two choral programmes by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and two quartets of soloists. The programmes will be as follows:

Tuesday, March 22—Missa Solennis.

Wednesday, March 23—First Three Symphonies.

Thursday, March 24—Chamber music by the Lenox String Quartet and Carl Friedberg, pianist.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 25 and 26—4th and 5th, and 6th and 7th symphonies, respectively (these concerts do not fall in the special subscriptions).

Monday, March 28—Commemorative exercises with an address by Ernest Newman of London, and the performance of the Last String Quartet by the Lenox String Quartet.

Tuesday, March 29—The 8th and 9th symphonies. TRAV

PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

The People's Symphony Orchestra, Stuart Mason, conductor, will give its 13th concert of the season tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 in Jordan Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, will be assisting artist. The program is as follows: Cherubini, overture to "Anacreon;" Shumann, concerto for piano and orchestra; Puccini, crescentami (first time in Boston); Liszt, "Les Preludes," symphonic poem after Lam[illegible]

FOURTH TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Music from England and Scandinavia will comprise the fourth concert of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given next Tuesday, March 1st [illegible]

at 3:15.

The English composers represented will be Edward Purcell in a voluntary arranged by Sir Henry Wood; Vaughan Williams's First Norfolk Rhapsody, and Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variaitons.

The latter part of the program will be divided between music from Norway and Finland.

CHORAL SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Cecilia Society, of which Malcolm Lang is conductor, will assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five short choral numbers at the next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 4 and 5. They will be the "Song of Destiny," by Brahms; "The Fire-Rider," by Hugo Wolf; "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius; the barbaric incantation, "They Are Seven," by Prokofieff, in which Charles Stratton will sing the tenor solo, and the Finale from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Czar."

Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce the program with variations on a theme of the old Dutch composer, Adrianus Valerius, written for strings by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other orchestral number will be a suite of tone pictures from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Invisible City of Kitej."

MORE RESPIGHI AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb 26

New Tone Poem Given First Performance

Post-Globe

Last week's Boston Symphony program was filled by the music of the Italian composer, Respighi, who conducted as guest, and played his own piano concerto. Yesterday a new tone poem by Respighi entitled "Vetrate di Chiesa" was played for the first time in public at the Symphony concert.

Mr Koussevitzky conducted. The composer was in the audience, and came to the stage to receive the applause at the end of his piece.

The other numbers were Elgar's "Enigma Variations," Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela," and Rimsky Korsakov's "Sadko."

Respighi's new tone poem seems likely to secure at least a measure of popular favor. It is soon to be published, and no doubt will go the rounds of orchestral concerts the world over.

The title means "Church Windows." There are four "impressions," suggested by stained glass in various Italian churches, "The Flight Into Egypt," "The Archangel Michael," "The Matin of Saint Clare" and "St Gregory the Great."

The work is scored for a large orchestra, including four tam tams, a bell in C, and organ as well as more usual instruments.

Although there are effective pages, as, for example, the first measures depicting Michael, flaming sword in hand, driving the rebel angels from heaven; the first passage for organ alone representing Pope Gregory blessing the multitude; music representing the rapture of Saint Clare at her miraculous trip to the Portiuncula; and so Respighi tends to weaken the effect of his ideas by undue amplification and repetition.

Nearly the whole appeal of all his music depends upon his talent for striking effects, which at a first hearing are impressive. In his "Pines of Rome," these effects come off more securely than they did yesterday in "Church Windows."

The performance yesterday, however, was disappointing in some respects. Mr Koussevitzky had seemingly not had sufficient time for preparation to permit him to get below the surface of the highly intricate score, and to dramatize the music with his customary imaginative intensity.

There were some obvious errors of detail, and a general sense of effort on the part of players and conductor, rather than the expected virtuosity. But Mr Respighi has set in this tone poem a very difficult task for orchestra and leader. One wondered why the composer did not himself conduct his work.

It is indicative of the present status of American orchestras in the musical world that a prominent European composer should entrust the first public performance of an important new work to the Boston Symphony, and that he should be here to listen to it.

Before the war nothing of the sort was likely to happen, though what the press agents call "world premieres" of works by Dvorak and Skriabin had occurred in New York.

Mr Koussevitzky went his own way with Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela," emphasizing its mournful monotony, hushing the swelling climax. Mr Speyer played the solo for English horn beautifully, and was singled out by the conductor to bow to the applause. This piece has distinction and originality, though it is not in modernist veln.

The same can be said of Elgar's "Enigma" variations. The younger generation is too prone to remember against Elgar his "Pomp and Circumstance" and "Salut d'armour," and to forget his "Dream of Gerontius." but who among younger English composers, with the single exception of Holst in "The Planets," has written music as admirable as this set of variations? The performance had admirable clarity and energy.

Rimsky Korsakov's "Sadko" because it is inferior to his "Scheherazade," should not be underrated. Played as it was yesterday this poem is still agreeable to the ear and stimulating to the imagination.

Throughout the concert, Mr Koussevitzky seemed bent for once showing that he can make without resorting to triple fortes. The volume of tone was widuced, though without gainin[illegible] that one craves in vain from this co

ductor.

Next week the Cecilia Society wi
assist in choral works by Brahm
Wolf, Glinka, Delius and Brokofieff.
suite from Rimsky Korsakov's ope

"Kitej" and a new set of "Variations
on a Dutch Theme by Adrianus Valerius," composed by Mr Langendoen, a cellist in the Boston Symphony, are he orchestral numbers. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS COSMOPOLITAN

Tonight's Broadcast Offers Music of Four Nations With Elgar's "Enigma" as Finale

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston ymphony orchestra from station
WBZ to which Serge Koussevitzky eturns, after brief respite, assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the adio audience.

The musical tendencies of Russia re exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsakov, called "Sadko" and ased on an old legend of Novgorod.
adko, a famous gusli player, was hrown overboard from a becalmed hip as an offering to the Sea King, who receives him in his domain under he waves. Sadko is compelled to play is gusli, and all dance to his wild music. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is also ased on a legend from the Finnish olk-epic "Kalevala" and concerning hich the composer wrote on his core: "Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death the Hades of Finnish mytholgy, is surrounded by a broad river of lack water and swift current, on hich the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and sings."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who ap-eared as guest conductor last week, lustrates a series of impressions sug-ested by four beautiful Roman hurches, just as last week's "Founains of Rome" by the same composer resented tone pictures of several oman fountains. The concert of toight will close with the work of Edward Elgar, the eminent English com-oser, called "Enigma," a series of ariations based on an original theme.

Prior to the opening number Prof ohn Patten Marshall, head of the usic departments of the Boston uni-ersity and Holy Cross college, will gain be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be resented, and will again speak durng the intermission, relating some nteresting phases of English comosition and high lights in the life of dward Elgar. The complete symhony program follows:—

Sibelius ..... "The Swan of Tuonela"
Legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic,
"Kalevala"
Rimsky-Korsakov,
"Sadko," a tone picture, Op. 5
Respighi,
"Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows)
Four impressions for orchestra
La fuga in Egitto
San Michele Arcangelo
Il mattutino di Santa Chiara
San Gregorio Magno
"Enigma" Variations on an Original
Elgar, Theme, Op. 36.

Other programs for tonight are:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
FEB 26 1927

Boston Symphony in Broadcast at WBZ This Evening

Composers of Several Countries Will Be Represented in Program; Koussevitsky to Conduct.

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston
Symphony Orchestra from Stations
WBZ, KDKA and WJZ assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby.

The musical tendencies of Russia
are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsokoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod.
Sadko, a famous gusli player, was thrown overboard from a becalmed ship as an offering to the Sea King,
who receives him in his domain under the waves. Sadko is compelled to play his gusli, and all dance to his wild music. The selection, "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is based on a legend from the Finnish
Folk-epic "Kalevala" and concerning which the composer wrote on his score: "Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death, the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river of black water and swift current, on which the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and sings."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week,
illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches, just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elgar, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Prior to the opening number of the program, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross
College, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission, relating some interesting phases of English composition and high lights in the life of Edward Elgar.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

"The Swan of Tuonela," legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic, "Kalevala," Sibelius
"Sadko," a tone picture, Op. 5,
Rimsky-Korsakov
"Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows),
Four impressions for orchestra,
Respighi
La fuga in Egitto.
San Michele Arcangelo.
Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
San Gregorio Magno.
INTERMISSION.
"Enigma," Variations on an Original
Theme. Op. 36, Elgar
Theme: Andante. Variations.
"C. A. E.," "L'Istesso tempo.
"H. D. S.—P.," Allegro.
"R. B. T.," Allegretto.
"W. M. B.," Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A.," Moderato.
"Ysobel," Andantino.
"Troyte," Presto.
"W. N.," Allegretto.
"Nimrod," Moderato.
"Dorabella," Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S.," Allegro di molto.
"B. G. N.," Andante.
"XXX—Romanza," Moderato.
"E. D. V.," Finale.

RESPIGHI'S NEWEST BY SYMPHONY

His 'Church Windows' Heard for First Time

POST FEB 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not yet has Ottorino Respighi, that eminent Italian who last Friday and Saturday monopolized the Symphony Concerts as conductor or performer of his own music, vanished from Boston's ken. Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall he was one of the audience which heard the first performance anywhere of his new suite, "Vetrate di Chiesa," (Church Windows.)

COMPOSER WELL RECEIVED

Though outwardly effective in many pages, these "Impressions for Orchestra," as the composer terms them, on a single hearing appeared scarcely worthy of a place among Mr. Respighi's more important works. Certainly they would seem to fall below the "Fountains of Rome" and the "Pines of Rome" both in musical invention and in poetic suggestiveness. But whether or not such reactions to the music were shared by the audience as a whole, the display of enthusiasm when Mr. Respighi appeared on the stage following the performance could scarcely have been greater.

Stained glass windows in various Italian churches suggested to Mr. Respighi the four pieces of yesterday, of which the individual titles are: "The Flight into Egypt," "The Archangel Michael," "The Matin of St. Chiara" and "St. Gregory the Great." In the second picture there was no missing the figure of Michael driving out of heaven the rebellious angels, and in the fourth the musical representation of pontifical panoply was sufficiently clear, but so far as this reviewer could discern the titles of number one and number three might have been transposed and the listener have been none the wiser.

For the concert of next Tuesday afternoon, the fourth of the current "national" series, Mr. Koussevitzky has planned an English-Scandinavian-Finnish programme, and the performances yesterday and this evening of Sibelius' tone poem, "The Swan Tuonela," and of Elgar's "Enigma," Variations might be taken as preparation for that concert.

SYMPHONY IN 17TH CONCERT

Works by Sibelius, Elgar, Rimsky-Korsakov and Respighi on Program

HER FEB 26

PERFORMANCE TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 17th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, "Th eSwan of Tuonela," Rimsky-Korsakov, 'Sadko." Respighi, "Church Windows"; Four Impressions for Orchestra (first performance). Elgar, Variations on an Original Theme.

It was a great pleasure to hear again after ten years the poetic legend of Sibelius with the English horn solo played beautifully by Mr. Speyer. Here is no swan, singing before death, a fable that suggested to Villiers de l'Isle-Adam one of his cruelest tales, and served Anna Pavlova for an entrancing, memorable dance-pantomime to Saint-Saens's familiar music. This is the swan that glides and sings on the river of black water around Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death. Sibelius, to whom the Finnish epic "Kalevala" furnished subjects for several of his earlier compositions, which, alas, have not been performed in Boston, by economic means, by an unerring choice of his instruments, portrays the scene and gives the song—after the hearer is acquainted with the explanatory note in the score. Suppose that the hearer had no knowledge of the legend, had never read of Lemminkainen's adventures; how to win the maid Pohjola he set out to accomplish certain tasks, among them to shoot a swan on this River of Death. How would the hearer then be impressed? Surely he would be moved by the strangeness of the music, by the mysterious first measures, by the unearthly melancholy of the song, by the quiet intensity of it all. He would find in the music a tragic mood, simply but unmistakably expressed. To us this legend of Sibelius, for itself, and by the manner of the performance was the commanding feature of the concert.

Rimsky-Korsakov, like Jonah, was thrown from a ship, not because he was regarded as a hoodoo, but as a propitiatory offering. One is reminded of the old song:

"Down went McGinty to the bottom of the say,
Dress'd in his best suit of clothes."

What McGinty found there remains unknown, for he never came back. Sadko was more fortunate. He was a guest at the wedding of the Sea King's daughter; and while he played on his gusli, which he had thoughtfully taken with him, they all danced until he broke the strings. Here we have deliberately pictorial music, entertaining enough, but not Rimsky at his very best. Boston has seen the ballet with this music, but has never heard the opera, which was composed 30 years after this "tone-picture." In the opera is the story of Sadko's adventures after he is on dry land, and wearied of it, sets out again upon the deep, refusing the companionship of Lioubava, his wife. Early this month, the opera was performed in Paris by Russians in concert form, as "Aida," "Faust" and "Martha" have been heard here in concert halls, sung by ladies and gentlemen in conventional and more or less pleasing evening dress.

Mr. Rispighi's "Church Windows" are windows that might be in any Italian church, but the music was not suggested by any windows now to be seen by native worshipers or Cook's tourists. The four subjects, allowing of strong contrasts in musical expression, are "The Flight into Egypt," ("The caravan bearing the Treasure of The World";) "Michael the Archangel" (driving with his sword the rebellious angels from high heaven); "The Matin of Saint-Claire" (how angels bore her desperately to attend the matin service); "Saint Gregory The Great" (in pontifical vestments, blessing the throng). To us the finest, most individual pages in these four "Impressions" are to be found in "The Flight" and in "The Matin of Saint-Claire". In the former there is the pleasing monotony of repetition that one associates with Oriental music; a coloring that at times reminds one of Borodin's "Steppes of Central Asia." In "The Matin," as in the fourth Impression, one hears the solemn chanting and sees the clouds of incense; in the former there are truly spiritual measures; the latter seemed diffuse, at times labored, and the climax which should have been over powering was anticipated. "Michael the Archangel" is stormy battle music with the relieving episode of a trumpet solo (off stage) played effectively by Mr. Mager. As a whole, this suite is not to be classed for invention and eloquent expression with either "Fountains" or "Pines of Rome." Mr. Respighi called to the platform was loudly applauded.

Elgar's "Variations" were once regarded as a brilliant show piece for an orchestra. There was a time when Elgar was held to be a "great" composer. Time, the Old Man with a Scythe, has a disconcerting way of handling it. While the performance yesterday was brilliant, the music, with a very few exceptions, seemed at the best respectable in a middle class manner; the sort of music that gives the composer the degree of Mus Doc, from an English university. In Elgar's case his music won him knighthood, and to this day there are "Elgar Festivals" in England. Was Cecil Gray too severe when he wrote of Elgar: "He never gets entirely away from the atmosphere of pale, cultured idealism and the unconsciously hypocritical, self-righteous, complacent, Pharisaical gentlemanless which is so characteristic of British art in the last century."

The concert will be repeated tonight. At the concerts of next week the orchestra will be assisted by the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang Langendoen, Variations on a Dutch theme of Adrianus Valerius. Rimsky-Korsakov, tone picture from the opera "Kitej." Brahms, Song of Destiny. Wolf, The Fire Rider. Delius, The Song of the High Hills. Prokofieff, "They are Seven." Glinka, Finale of "A Life for the Tsar." Charles Stratton will sing the tenor solo in "They a[illegible]"

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEAMONT, TEX.

FEB 26 1927

The famous New York Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, will entertain the radio audience at 8 o'clock tonight in a program to be broadcast from station WEAF, New York city. This musical organization possesses the distinction of having been directed by two generations of one family. The present director, who succeeded his father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, has served 42 years.

A concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast from station WJZ, New York city, this evening at 8:10 o'clock. It will also be broadcast from stations WBZ, Springfield, Mass., and KDKA, Pittsburg, Pa. Preceding the opening of the program, Prof John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston university, will explain the works to be offered, and relate the lives of the composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
FEB 26 1927

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard on WJZ To-night

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast by WJZ and associated stations will be heard this evening at 8:10 o'clock, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. Preceding the concert Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, will explain the selections to be rendered and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Prof. Marshall will again be heard in further explanation of the works that have been rendered, as well as those to be given in the second half of the concert. He will be assisted in his explanation by two instrumental soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
FEB 26 1927

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Woolsey Hall, March 9th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STANDARD
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
FEB 26 1927

Saturday, February 26.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the first musical feature listed for Saturday night. WBZ, WJZ and KDKA will broadcast it at 8:10. The orchestra, as usual, will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky. The famous New York Symphony Orchestra will be heard at 9:00 through WEAF and the Red Network. This organization possesses the unique distinction of having been directed by two generations of one family for many years as its present conductor, Walter Damrosch, who succeeds his father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, has served forty-two years. Prominent financiers will address bankers at a banquet through WNYC at 9:00. Hockey games will be broadcast by WTIC at 8:15; by WNAC at 8:25, and by WLS at 10:00.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
FEB 26 1927

Prof. John Marshal

The next concert of the Boston Sym-

tion WJZ at 8:10 o'clock tonight. This concert will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

One of the features of this program will be the explanation and notes on the selections to be rendered, to be given by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the opening of the concert he will explain the selections to be rendered before the intermission and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Professo Marshall will again be heard in a furthe explanation of the works that have al ready been rendered and in a similar ex planation of the selections to be give in the second half of the broadcasting Professor Marshall is well qualified fo this task, having served for many years as organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and during the war was in charge of camp music for the United States Army. He will be assisted by two instrumental soloists to illustrate his explanations.

l in Lecture Recital

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
FEB 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM TONIGHT

Unusual Broadcast Will Be Transmitted by Four Radio Stations

BOSTON, Feb. 26. — Tonight's broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra from Westinghouse stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also station WJZ in New York city, assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience.

The musical tendencies of Russia are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsokoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod. Sadko, a famous gusli player, was thrown overboard from a becalmed ship as an offering to the Sea King, who receives him in his domain under the waves. Sadko is compelled to play his gusli, and all dance to his wild music. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala" and concerning which the composer wrote on his score: "Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death, the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river of black water and swift current, on which the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and songs."

Tone Pictures.

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches, just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elga, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Just prior to the opening number of the program, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston university and Holy Cross college, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission, relating some interesting phases of English composition and high lights in the life of Edward Elgar.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala."
Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko" a tone picture, Op. 5.
Respighi, "Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows). Four impressions for orchestra.
I, La fuga in Egitto.
II. San Michele Arcangelo.
III. Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
IV. San Gregoria Magno.
Elgar, "Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36.
Theme: Andante. Variations.
"C. A. E." L'Itesso tempo.
"H. D. S.—P" Allegro.
"R. B. T." Allegretto.
"W. M. B." Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A." Moderato.
"Ysobel" Andantino.
"Troyte" Presto.
"W. N." Allegretto.
"Nimrod" Moderato.
"Dorabella" Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S." Allegro di molto.
"G. G. N." Andante.
"XXX—Romanza" Moderato.
"E. D. V."—Finale.

that one craves in vain from this co
ductor.

Next week the Cecilia Society wi
assist in choral works by Brahm
Wolf, Glinka, Delius and Brokofieff.
suite from Rimsky Korsakov's oper

"Kitej" and a new set of "Variations
on a Dutch Theme by Adrianus Valerius," composed by Mr Langendoen, a cellist in the Boston Symphony, are he orchestral numbers. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

FEB 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS COSMOPOLITAN

Tonight's Broadcast Offers Music of Four Nations With Elgar's "Enigma" as Finale

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston
Symphony orchestra from station
WBZ to which Serge Koussevitzky returns, after brief respite, assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience.

The musical tendencies of Russia
are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsakov, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod.
Sadko, a famous gusli player, was thrown overboard from a becalmed
ship as an offering to the Sea King,
who receives him in his domain under the waves. Sadko is compelled to play his gusli, and all dance to his wild music. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish
folk-epic "Kalevala" and concerning which the composer wrote on his score: "Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river of black water and swift current, on which the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and sings."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week,
illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches, just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elgar, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Prior to the opening number Prof
John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission, relating some interesting phases of English composition and high lights in the life of Edward Elgar. The complete symphony program follows:—

Sibelius ....."The Swan of Tuonela"
Legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic,
"Kalevala"
Rimsky-Korsakov,
"Sadko," a tone picture, Op. 5
Respighi,
"Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows)
Four impressions for orchestra
La fuga in Egitto
San Michele Arcangelo
Il mattutino di Santa Chiara
San Gregorio Magno
"Enigma" Variations on an Original
Elgar,
Theme, Op. 36.

Other programs for tonight are:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

FEB 26 1927

Boston Symphony in Broadcast at WBZ This Evening

Composers of Several Countries Will Be Represented in Program; Koussevitsky to Conduct.

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston
Symphony Orchestra from Stations
WBZ, KDKA and WJZ assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience through the courtesy
of W. S. Quinby.

The musical tendencies of Russia
are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsokoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod.
Sadko, a famous gusli player, was thrown overboard from a becalmed
ship as an offering to the Sea King,
who receives him in his domain under the waves. Sadko is compelled to play his gusli, and all dance to his wild music. The selection, "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is based on a legend from the Finnish
folk-epic "Kalevala" and concerning which the composer wrote on his score: "Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death, the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river
of black water and swift current, on which the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and sings."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week,
illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches, just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elgar, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Prior to the opening number of the program, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission, relating some interesting phases of English composition and high lights in the life of Edward Elgar.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala."
Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko" a tone picture, Op. 5.
Respighi. "Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows). Four impressions for orchestra.
I, La fuga in Egitto.
II. San Michele Arcangelo.
III. Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
IV. San Gregoria Magno.
Elgar, "Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36.
Theme: Andante. Variations.
"C. A. E." L'Itesso tempo.
"H. D. S.—P" Allegro.
"R. B. T." Allegretto.
"W. M. B." Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A." Moderato.
"Ysobel" Andantino.
"Troyte" Presto.
"W. N." Allegretto.
"Nimrod" Moderato.
"Dorabella" Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S." Allegro di molto.
"G. G. N." Andante.
"XXX—Romanza" Moderato.
"E. D. V."—Finale.

of black water and swift current, on which the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and sings."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week
illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches, just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert will close with the work of Edward Elgar, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Just prior to the opening number of the program, Prof. John Patten
Marshall will be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission, relating some interesting phases of English composition and high lights in the life of Edward Elgar.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

"The Swan of Tuonela," legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic, "Kalevala," Sibelius
"Sadko," a tone picture, Op. 5,
Rimsky-Korsakov
"Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows), Four impressions for orchestra,
Respighi
La fuga in Egitto.
San Michele Arcangelo.
Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
San Gregorio Magno.
INTERMISSION.
"Enigma," Variations on an Original Theme. Op. 36, Elgar
Theme: Andante. Variations.
"C. A. E.," "L'Istesso tempo.
"H. D. S.—P.," Allegro.
"R. B. T.," Allegretto.
"W. M. B.," Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A.," Moderato.
"Ysobel," Andantino.
"Troyte," Presto.
"W. N.," Allegretto.
"Nimrod," Moderato.
"Dorabella," Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S.," Allegro di molto.
"B. G. N.," Andante.
"XXX—Romanza," Moderato.
"E. D. V.," Finale.

RESPIGHI'S NEWEST BY SYMPHONY

His 'Church Windows' Heard for First Time

POST FEB 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not yet has Ottorino Respighi, that eminent Italian who last Friday and Saturday monopolized the Symphony Concerts as conductor or performer of his own music, vanished from Boston's ken. Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall he was one of the audience which heard the first performance anywhere of his new suite, "Vetrate di Chiesa," (Church Windows.)

COMPOSER WELL RECEIVED

Though outwardly effective in many pages, these "Impressions for Orchestra," as the composer terms them, on a single hearing appeared scarcely worthy of a place among Mr. Respighi's more important works. Certainly they would seem to fall below the "Fountains of Rome" and the "Pines of Rome" both in musical invention and in poetic suggestiveness. But whether or not such reactions to the music were shared by the audience as a whole, the display of enthusiasm when Mr. Respighi appeared on the stage following the performance could scarcely have been greater.

Stained glass windows in various Italian churches suggested to Mr. Respighi the four pieces of yesterday, of which the individual titles are: "The Flight into Egypt," "The Archangel Michael," "The Matin of St. Chiara" and "St. Gregory the Great." In the second picture there was no missing the figure of Michael driving out of heaven the rebellious angels, and in the fourth the musical representation of pontifical panoply was sufficiently clear, but so far as this reviewer could discern the titles of number one and number three might have been transposed and the listener have been none the wiser.

For the concert of next Tuesday afternoon, the fourth of the current "national" series, Mr. Koussevitzky has planned an English-Scandinavian-Finnish programme, and the performances yesterday and this evening of Sibelius' tone poem, "The Swan Tuonela," and of Elgar's "Enigma," Variations might be taken as preparation for that concert.

SYMPHONY IN 17TH CONCERT

Works by Sibelius, Elgar, Rimsky-Korsakov and Respighi on Program

HER —— FEB 26

PERFORMANCE TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 17th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, "Th eSwan of Tuonela," Rimsky-Korsakov, 'Sadko." Respighi, "Church Windows"; Four Impressions for Orchestra (first performance). Elgar, Variations on an Original Theme.

It was a great pleasure to hear again after ten years the poetic legend of Sibelius with the English horn solo played beautifully by Mr. Speyer. Here is no swan, singing before death, a fable that suggested to Villiers de l'Isle-Adam one of his cruelest tales, and served Anna Pavlova for an entrancing, memorable dance-pantomime to Saint-Saens's familiar music. This is the swan that glides and sings on the river of black water around Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death. Sibelius, to whom the Finnish epic "Kalevala" furnished subjects for several of his earlier compositions, which, alas, have not been performed in Boston, by economic means, by an unerring choice of his instruments, portrays the scene and gives the song—after the hearer is acquainted with the explanatory note in the score. Suppose that the hearer had no knowledge of the legend, had never read of Lemminkainen's adventures; how to win the maid Pohjola he set out to accomplish certain tasks, among them to shoot a swan on this River of Death. How would the hearer then be impressed? Surely he would be moved by the strangeness of the music, by the mysterious first measures, by the unearthly melancholy of the song, by the quiet intensity of it all. He would find in the music a tragic mood, simply but unmistakably expressed. To us this legend of Sibelius, for itself, and by the manner of the performance was the commanding feature of the concert.

Rimsky-Korsakov, like Jonah, was thrown from a ship, not because he was regarded as a hoodoo, but as a propitiatory offering. One is reminded of the old song:

"Down went McGinty to the bottom of the say,
Dress'd in his best suit of clothes."

What McGinty found there remains unknown, for he never came back. Sadko was more fortunate. He was a guest at the wedding of the Sea King's daughter; and while he played on his gusli, which he had thoughtfully taken with him, they all danced until he broke the strings. Here we have deliberately pictorial music, entertaining enough, but not Rimsky at his very best. Boston has seen the ballet with this music, but has never heard the opera, which was composed 30 years after this "tone-picture." In the opera is the story of Sadko's adventures after he is on dry land, and wearied of it, sets out again upon the deep, refusing the companionship of Lioubava, his wife. Early this month, the opera was performed in Paris by Russians in concert form, as "Aida," "Faust" and —— "Martha" have been heard here in concert halls, sung by ladies and gentlemen in conventional and more or less pleasing evening dress.

Mr. Rispighi's "Church Windows" are windows that might be in any Italian church, but the music was not suggested by any windows now to be seen by native worshipers or Cook's tourists. The four subjects, allowing of strong contrasts in musical expression, are "The Flight into Egypt," ("The caravan bearing the Treasure of The World":) "Michael the Archangel" (driving with his sword the rebellious angels from high heaven); "The Matin of Saint-Claire" (how angels bore her desperately to attend the matin service); "Saint Gregory The Great" (in pontifical vestments, blessing the throng). To us the finest, most individual pages in these four "Impressions" are to be found in "The Flight" and in "The Matin of Saint-Claire". In the former there is the pleasing monotony of repetition that one associates with Oriental music; a coloring that at times reminds one of Borodin's "Steppes of Central Asia." In "The Matin," as in the fourth Impression, one hears the solemn chanting and sees the clouds of incense; in the former there are truly spiritual measures; the latter seemed diffuse, at times labored, and the climax which should have been over powering was anticipated. "Michael the Archangel" is stormy battle music with the relieving episode of a trumpet solo (off stage) played effectively by Mr. Mager. As a whole, this suite is not to be classed for invention and eloquent expression with either "Fountains" or "Pines of Rome." Mr. Respighi called to the platform was loudly applauded.

Elgar's "Variations" were once regarded as a brilliant show piece for an orchestra. There was a time when Elgar was held to be a "great" composer. Time, the Old Man with a Scythe, has a disconcerting way of handling it. While the performance yesterday was brilliant, the music, with a very few exceptions, seemed at the best respectable in a middle class manner; the sort of music that gives the composer the degree of Mus Doc, from an English university. In Elgar's case his music won him knighthood, and to this day there are "Elgar Festivals" in England. Was Cecil Gray too severe when he wrote of Elgar: "He never gets entirely away from the atmosphere of pale, cultured idealism and the unconsciously hypocritical, self-righteous, complacent, Pharisaical gentlemanless which is so characteristic of British art in the last century."

The concert will be repeated tonight. At the concerts of next week the orchestra will be assisted by the Cecilia Society, trained by Malcolm Lang Langendoen, Variations on a Dutch theme of Adrianus Valerius. Rimsky-Korsakov, tone picture from the opera "Kitej." Brahms, Song of Destiny. Wolf, The Fire Rider. Delius, The Song of the High Hills, Prokofieff, "They are Seven." Glinka, Finale of "A Life for the Tsar." Charles Stratton will sing the tenor solo in "They a[illegible]"

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEAMONT, TEX.

FEB 26 1927

The famous New York Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, will entertain the radio audience at 8 o'clock tonight in a program to be broadcast from station WEAF, New York city. This musical organization possesses the distinction of having been directed by two generations of one family. The present director, who succeeded his father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, has served 42 years.

A concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast from station WJZ, New York city, this evening at 8:10 o'clock. It will also be broadcast from stations WBZ, Springfield, Mass., and KDKA, Pittsburg, Pa. Preceeding the opening of the program, Prof John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston university, will explain the works to be offered, and relate the lives of the composers.

A carnival [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN

FEB 26 1927

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard on WJZ To-night

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast by WJZ and associated stations will be heard this evening at 8:10 o'clock, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. Preceding the concert Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, will explain the selections to be rendered and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Prof. Marshall will again be heard in further explanation of the works that have been rendered, as well as those to be given in the second half of the concert. He will be assisted in his exp[illegible]nation by two instrumental soloi[illegible]s.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier

FEB 26 1927

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Woolsey Hall, March 9th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STANDARD
WATERTOWN, N. Y.

FEB 26 1927

Saturday, February 26.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the first musical feature listed for Saturday night WBZ, WJZ and KDKA will broadcast it at 8:10. The orchestra, as usual will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky. The famous New York Symphony Orchestra will be heard at 9:00 through WEAF and the Red Network. This organization possesses the unique distinction of having been directed by two generations of one family for many years as its present conductor, Walter Damrosch, who succeeds his father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, has served forty-two years. Prominent financiers will address bankers at a banquet through WNYC at 9:00. Hockey games will be broadcast by WTIC at 8:15; by WNAC at 8:25, and by WLS at 10:00.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram

FEB 26 1927

Prof. John Marshal

The next concert of the Boston Sym-

tion WJZ at 8:10 o'clock tonight. This concert will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

One of the features of this program will be the explanation and notes on the selections to be rendered, to be given by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the opening of the concert he will explain the selections to be rendered before the intermission and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Professor Marshall will again be heard in a further explanation of the works that have already been rendered and in a similar explanation of the selections to be given in the second half of the broadcasting. Professor Marshall is well qualified for this task, having served for many years as organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and during the war was in charge of camp music for the United States Army. He will be assisted by two instrumental soloists to illustrate his explanations.

l in Lecture Recital

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.

FEB 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM TONIGHT

Unusual Broadcast Will Be Transmitted by Four Radio Stations

BOSTON, Feb. 26. — Tonight's broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra from Westinghouse stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also station WJZ in New York city, assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience.

The musical tendencies of Russia are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsokoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod. Sadko, a famous gusli player, was thrown overboard from a becalmed ship as an offering to the Sea King, who receives him in his domain under the waves. Sadko is compelled to play his gusli, and all dance to his wild music. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala" and concerning which the composer wrote on his score: "Tuonela, the Kingdom of Death, the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river of black water and swift current, on which the Swan of Tuonela moves in majestic course and songs."

Tone Pictures.

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches, just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elga, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Just prior to the opening number of the program, Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston university and Holy Cross college, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission, relating some interesting phases of English composition and high lights in the life of Edward Elgar.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala."
Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko" a tone picture, Op. 5.
Respighi. "Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows). Four impressions for orchestra.
I, La fuga in Egitto.
II. San Michele Arcangelo.
III. Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
IV. San Gregoria Magno.
Elgar, "Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36.
Theme: Andante. Variations.
"C. A. E." L'Itesso tempo.
"H. D. S.—P" Allegro.
"R. B. T." Allegretto.
"W. M. B." Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A." Moderato.
"Ysobel" Andantino.
"Troyte" Presto.
"W. N." Allegretto.
"Nimrod" Moderato.
"Dorabella" Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S." Allegro di molto.
"G. G. N." Andante.
"XXX—Romanza" Moderato.
"E. D. V."—Finale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 26 1927

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL CONDUCT THIS EVENING

Wields Baton Over Boston Symphony For Concert Over Blue Hook-Up

THE next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast by Stations WBZ, WJZ and KDKA at 8.10 o'clock tonight. This concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky and will play in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Serge Koussevitsky.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation and notes on the selections to be rendered by the orchestra to be given by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the opening of the concert he will explain the selections to be rendered before the intermission and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Professor Marshall will again be heard in a further explanation of the works that have already been rendered and in a similar explanation of the selections to be given in the second half of the broadcasting. Professor Marshall is well qualified for this task, having served for many years as organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the war was in charge of camp music for the United States Army. He will be assisted by two instrumental soloists to illustrate his explanations.

"Kalevala" ..... Sibelius
"Sadko" a Tone Picture, Op. 5 ..... Rimsky-Kossakov
"Vetrate di Chiesa", "Church Windows," ..... Respighi
Four Impressions for Orchestra.
La fuga in Egitto
San Michele Arcangelo
Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
San Gregorio Magno
"Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36 ..... Elgar
Theme: Andante Variations,
"C. A. E." L'Istesso tempo.
"H. D. S. P". Allegro.
"R. B. T." Allegretto.
"W. M. B." Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A." Moderato.
"Ysobol" Andantino.
"Troyte," Presto.
"W. N." Allegretto.
"Nimrod" Moderato.
"Dorabella" Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S." Allegro di molto.
"B. G. N." Andante.
"XXX—Romanza" Moderato.
"E. D. V. Finale".

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 26 1927

Symphony Orchestra Will Play Folk-lore Songs of North Europe

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra from Station WBZ assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby.

The musical tendencies of Russia are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsakoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish folk-epic "Kalevala."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week, illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elga, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
FEB 26 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MARCH 9

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a great conductor, about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe, was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. When the great opera begins to play there is evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. Two hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performances.

Such an instrument, subject to his will, liberates the evocative and delineative powers of Koussevitzky, the imaginative artist, as probably never before—not even in his far-famed concerts in Moscow, Paris or London.

These extraordinary powers of Koussevitzky are considered in Europe and America as quite beyond analysis or compare. They are felt in manifold episodes of a symphony concert—in the balance and delicacy of the myriad voiced orchestra, the impassioned songfulness of the string choirs, the heaven-scaling brilliance of the climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $1715

The $6000 fund necessary to insure the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next winter still lacks $1715 of the total.

Sponsors of the fund are working diligently for its success and are confident of a response that will guarantee the expenses of its appearance in the Albee Theatre on five Tuesday evenings next winter. After the coming season the new Masonic Temple will be ready for its use.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
FEB 26 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast at 7.10 o'clock tonight over WBZ, WJZ and KDKA. This concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky and will be played in Spmphony hall, Boston.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation and notes on the selections to be rendered by the orchestra to be given by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston university and Holy Cross college. For five minutes preceding the opening of the concert he will explain the selections to be rendered before the intermission and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Prof. Marshall will again be heard in a further explanation of the works that have already been rendered nd in a similar explanation of the selection to be given in teh second half of the broadcasting. Prof. Mershall is well qualified for this task, having served for many years as organist with the Boston Symphony orchestra and during the war was in charge of camp music for the United States Army. He will be asisted by two instrumental soloists to illustrate his explanations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 26 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $1715

Subscriptions of $2260 by 20 Persons Since Tuesday Makes Total $4285.

CITY MAY LOSE ORCHESTRA

Orchestra to Go Elsewhere Unless City Raises $6000 to Assure Five Appearances at Albee Theatre Next Year

Subscriptions amounting to $260, pledged by 20 different individuals since Tuesday, have brought the guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city next year to a total of $4285. The fund must reach $6000 to make the reappearance a certainty.

If this amount is raised the orchestra will play at the Albee Theatre five Tuesday evenings next winter. If not it will probably go elsewhere, with the possibility of never playing in Providence again.

After next year it is planned to hold the concerts in the new Masonic Temple now under construction.

Pledges may be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form:

"I hereby pledge —— dollars ($——) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time, since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

The latest subscribers are the following: Stephen O. Metcalf, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, J. C. K., Mrs. Walter Callender, James C. Collins, Hannah T. Carpenter, Mrs. John W. Knowles, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, A. P. S., Helen E. Talcott, Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon, Eleanor B. Green, Francis H. Chafee, Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, George H. Schwedersky, Carrie Lee Smith Mary Carver Smith and Miss D. F. Coulters.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday afternoon, at the fourth concert of that series, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra will present that combination of English and Scandinavian music originally announced for an earlier occasion. The first half of the programme falls to the English, represented by the Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, as arranged by Sir Henry Wood, and the "Enigma Variation" of Edward Elgar. Scandinavia for these purposes embraces Finland: the music to be heard is the Norwegian Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, in which Irene Scharrer will be the soloist, and "The Swan of Tuonela," by the Finnish Sibelius.

With the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, as the "soloist" of the day, five choral numbers stand on the programme of the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Brahms' "Song of Destiny," Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider," "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, Prokofieff's thrilling "Seven They Are Seven!" in which, as previous performances, Charles Stratton will sing the tenor solo, and the Finale from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Tsar." To begin the concert will come the first performance of a work by Jacobus Langendoen, cellist of the orchestra; Variations, for strings, on a theme by the ancient Dutch composer Adrianus Valerius. A suite of tone-pictures from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Invisible City of Kitej," will be the other orchestral

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 27 1927

Boston's veteran chorus of the Cecilia Society, conducted by Malcolm Lang, will take part in Mr. Koussevitzky's home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 4 and 5, singing in Brahms's "Song of Fate," Hugo Wolf's "Der Feuerreiter," Delius's "Song of the High Hills," Serge Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept," described as an incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, and the choral finale of Glinka's opera "A Life for the Czar." The tenor in Prokofieff's work, the composer's Opus 30, will be Charles Stratton.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Music from England and Scandinavia will be played at the fourth concert of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 1, in Symphony hall, at 3:15. The English composers represented will be Edward Purcell in a voluntary arranged by Wood; Vaughan Williams's First Norfolk Rhapsody; and Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

The latter part of the program will be divided between music from Norway and Finland, as follows: Grieg's Piano Concerto (Irene Scharrer, pianist); Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela" for orchestra, with English horn solo, and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 27 1927

Musical Celebrities

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays in Woolsey Hall on March 9.

New Haven music lovers are to have an opportunity to hear two rare musical events in the near future. The first is a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, which will be given in Woolsey Hall on the evening of March 9. On the 14th, Fritz Kreisler, considered by many the world's greatest violinist, will give a recital at the Shubert.

Two eminent names joined for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to American and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a great conductor about

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solennis" and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman of The London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
FEB 27 1927

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

usic of English and Scandinav posers will divide the fourth p n of the Tuesday afternoon ser he Boston Symphony Orchestra, ssevitzky, conductor, to be given phony hall on Tuesday, March 1 Irene Scharrer, pianist, will p g's Concerto. Sibelius will be rep ed by his "Swan of Tuonela," ndsen, the Norwegian composer, "Carnival in Paris." The Eng ic will include a trumpet volunt Purcell, arranged by Wood; E folk Rhapsody of Vaughan Willia Elgar's "Enigma" variations.

FEB 28

SYMPHONY PROGRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will giv its 17th pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko;" Elgar's "Enigma Variations," Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela," with English horn solo, and a tone poem of Respighi, "Stained Glass Windows." This score is the composer's latest, and was written for this orchestra. It will be performed from manuscript.

HER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 26 1927

Program mphony On hain Tonight

by Rimsky-Korsakoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela," by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week, illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elga the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Prior to the opening number, Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

"The Swan of Tuonela", Legend

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 26 1927

Cosmopolitan By Boston Sy Radio C

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Westinghouse Stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also station WJZ in New York City, assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience.

The musical tendencies of Russia are exemplified in the Tone Picture

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST
FEB 27

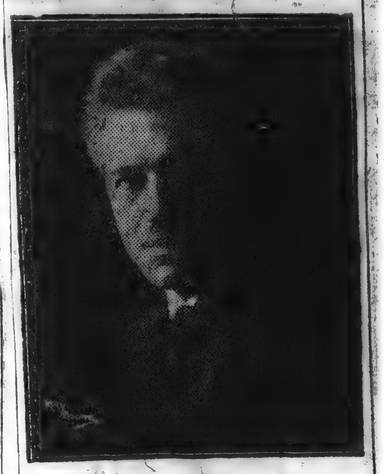
SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday afternoon, at the fourth concert of that series, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra will present that combination of English and Scandinavian music originally announced for an earlier occasion. The first half of the programme falls to the English, represented by the Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, as arranged by Sir Henry Wood, and the "Enigma Variation" of Edward Elgar. Scandinavia for these purposes embraces Finland: the music to be heard is the Norwegian Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, in which Irene Scharrer will be the soloist, and "The Swan of Tuonela," by the Finnish Sibelius.

With the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, as the "soloist" of the day, five choral numbers stand on the programme of the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Brahms' "Song of Destiny," Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider," "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, Prokofieff's thrilling "Seven They Are Seven!" in which, as previous performances, Charles

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 27 1927

Coming to City



FRITZ KREISLER.
Violinist who will give recital at Shubert on March 14.

evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. The 108 musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture.

These extraordinary powers of Koussevitzky are considered in Europe and America as quite beyond analysis or compare. They are felt in manifold episodes of a symphony concert—in the balance and delicacy of the myriad voiced orchestra, the impassioned songfulness of the string choirs, the heaven-scaling brilliance of the climax.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists for each series in Boston, New York and elsewhere. The Boston Symphony concert to be given at Woolsey Hall on March 9th offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the Orchestra's own city.

FEB 27

WEEK-END MUSIC: LAST OF RESPIGHI, JERITZA IN SONG

"CHURCH WINDOWS" WITHOUT THE COMPOSER

RHS FEB 27

Recondite Means and Deepened Imagination—The Singer in Fresh and Live Impression—Her Different Courses Theater and Concert-Hall — Opera Numbers for Their Musical Values—Cecilia to New York—A Bass Recital

IN the absence of the composer—a therefore, of the warm-hear demonstrations on Friday afternoon —Mr. Respighi's fourfold tone-poem "Church Windows," was repeated at Symphony Concert on Saturday evening Heard a second time, it amplified, rather than altered, first impressions. The workmanship, of course, stood clearer: the mingled invention and learning, imagination and contrivance, of the harmonic instrumental means, as in the measured of bells and incense heralding St. Gregory as Sovereign Pontiff; the rhythmical fertility and mastery, as in the tossing tumult of the Archangel's battle; the ingenuities and aptitudes of construction, as in the repetitions of the melody that attends the Flight into Egypt or in the close of Saint Clare's music melting upon the ecstatic air. In neither "The Fountains" nor "The Pines" is Respighi so recondite in procedure, so subtle in implication. By his own "Church Windows" is bound to fall short of the immediate effect—and applause that rewarded the composition—on-piece. On the other hand, the composer finds himself in the dilemma of those who would stimulate, re-stimulate and stimulate again, a particular sense. He begins to pile up sonorities in the pages

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 261927

KOUSSEVITSKY WILL CONDUCT THIS EVENING

Wields Baton Over Boston Symphony For Concert Over Blue Hook-Up

THE next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast by Stations WBZ, WJZ and KDKA at 8.10 o'clock tonight. This concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky and will play in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Serge Koussevitsky.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation and notes on the selections to be rendered by the orchestra to be given by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the opening of the concert he will explain the selections to be rendered before the intermission and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Professor Marshall will again be heard in a further explanation of the works that have already been rendered and in a similar explanation of the selections to be given in the second half of the broadcasting. Professor Marshall is well qualified for this task, having served for many years as organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the war was in charge of camp music for the United States Army. He will be assisted by two instrumental soloists to illustrate his explanations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
FEB 261927

Cosmopolitan By Boston Sy Radio C

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Westinghouse Stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also station WJZ in New York City, assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience.

The musical tendencies of Russia are exemplified in the Tone Picture

Program mphony On hain Tonight

by Rimsky-Korsakoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela," by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish Folk-Epic "Kalevala."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week, illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches just as last week's "Fountains of Rome" by the same composer presented tone pictures of several Roman fountains. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elga the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

Prior to the opening number, Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will again be heard in brief illustrative remarks concerning the numbers to be presented, and will again speak during the intermission.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

"The Swan of Tuonela", Legend
from the [illegible] Epic,
"Kalevala" ..... Sibelius
"Sadko" a Tone Picture. Op. 5
..... Rimsky-Kossakov
"Vetrate di Chiesa", "Church Windows," ..... Respighi
Four Impressions for Orchestra.
La fuga in Egitto
San Michele Arcangelo
Il mattutino di Santa Chiara.
San Gregorio Magno
'Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36.....Elgar
Theme: Andante Variations,
"C. A. E." L'Istesso tempo.
"H. D. S. P". Allegro.
"R. B. T." Allegretto.
"W. M. B." Allegro di molto.
"R. P. A." Moderato.
"Ysobol" Andantino.
"Troyte," Presto.
"W. N." Allegretto.
"Nimrod" Moderato.
"Dorabella" Intermezzo Allegro.
"G. R. S." Allegro di molto.
"B. G. N." Andante.
"XXX—Romanza" Moderato.
"E. D. V. Finale".

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 261927

Symphony Orchestra Will Play Folk-lore Songs of North Europe

Tonight's broadcast of the Boston Symphony orchestra from Station WBZ assumes a cosmopolitan aspect when music by Russian, English, Italian and Finnish composers will be presented for the radio audience through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby.

The musical tendencies of Russia are exemplified in the tone picture by Rimsky-Korsakoff, called "Sadko" and based on an old legend of Novgorod. The selection "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius is also based on a legend from the Finnish folk-epic "Kalevala."

The suite "Church Windows" of the Italian composer, Respighi, who appeared as guest conductor last week, illustrates a series of impressions suggested by four beautiful Roman churches. The concert of tonight will close with the work of Edward Elga, the eminent English composer, called "Enigma," a series of variations based on an original theme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
FEB 261927

KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MARCH 9

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a great conductor, about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe, was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. When the great opera begins to play there is evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. Two hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performances.

Such an instrument, subject to his will, liberates the evocative and delineative powers of Koussevitzky, the imaginative artist, as probably never before—not even in his far-famed concerts in Moscow, Paris or London.

These extraordinary powers of Koussevitzky are considered in Europe and America as quite beyond analysis or compare. They are felt in manifold episodes of a symphony concert—in the balance and delicacy of the myriad voiced orchestra, the impassioned songfulness of the string choirs, the heaven-scaling brilliance of the climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 261927

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $1715

The $6000 fund necessary to insure the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next winter still lacks $1715 of the total.

Sponsors of the fund are working diligently for its success and are confident of a response that will guarantee the expenses of its appearance in the Albee Theatre on five Tuesday evenings next winter. After the coming season the new Masonic Temple will be ready for its use.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
FEB 261927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast at 7:10 o'clock tonight over WBZ, WJZ and KDKA. This concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky and will be played in Spmphony hall, Boston.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation and notes on the selections to be rendered by the orchestra to be given by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston university and Holy Cross college. For five minutes preceding the opening of the concert he will explain the selections to be rendered before the intermission and also give a brief outline of the lives and works of the composers. During the intermission Prof. Marshall will again be heard in a further explanation of the works that have already been rendered nd in a similar explanation of the selection to be given in teh second half of the broadcasting. Prof. Mershall is well qualified for this task, having served for many years as organist with the Boston Symphony orchestra and during the war was in charge of camp music for the United States Army. He will be asissted by two instrumental soloists to illustrate his explanations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 261927

BOSTON SYMPHONY FUND LACKS $1715

Subscriptions of $2260 by 20 Persons Since Tuesday Makes Total $4285.

CITY MAY LOSE ORCHESTRA

Orchestra to Go Elsewhere Unless City Raises $6000 to Assure Five Appearances at Albee Theatre Next Year

Subscriptions amounting to $260, pledged by 20 different individuals since Tuesday, have brought the guarantee fund to assure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city next year to a total of $4285. The fund must reach $6000 to make the reappearance a certainty.

If this amount is raised the orchestra will play at the Albee Theatre five Tuesday evenings next winter. If not it will probably go elsewhere, with the possibility of never playing in Providence again.

After next year it is planned to hold the concerts in the new Masonic Temple now under construction.

Pledges may be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal, which is acting as recipient for the fund, in the following or similar form.

"I hereby pledge —— dollars ($——) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be mailed at this time, since pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

The latest subscribers are the following: Stephen O. Metcalf, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, J. C. K., Mrs. Walter Callender, James C. Collins, Hannah T. Carpenter, Mrs. John W. Knowles, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, A. P. S., Helen E. Talcott, Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon, Eleanor B. Green, Francis H. Chafee, Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, George H. Schwedersky, Carrie Lee Smith Mary Carver Smith and Miss D. F. Coulters.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday afternoon, at the fourth concert of that series, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra will present that combination of English and Scandinavian music originally announced for an earlier occasion. The first half of the programme falls to the English represented by the Trumpet Voluntary of Purcell, as arranged by Sir Henry Wood, and the "Enigma Variation" of Edward Elgar. Scandinavia for these purposes embraces Finland: the music to be heard is the Norwegian Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, in which Irene Scharrer will be the soloist, and "The Swan of Tuonela," by the Finnish Sibelius.

With the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, as the "soloist" of the day, five choral numbers stand on the programme of the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Brahms' "Song of Destiny," Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider," "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, Prokofieff's thrilling "Seven They Are Seven!" in which, as previous performances, Charles Stratton will sing the tenor solo, and the Finale from Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Tsar." To begin the concert will come the first performance of a work by Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist of the orchestra; Variations, for strings, on a theme by the ancient Dutch composer Adrianus Valerius. A suite of tone-pictures from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Invisible City of Kitej," will be the other orchestral number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 271927

Boston's veteran chorus of the Cecilia Society, conducted by Malcolm Lang, will take part in Mr. Koussevitzky's home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 4 and 5, singing in Brahms's "Song of Fate," Hugo Wolf's "Der Feuerreiter," Delius's "Song of the High Hills," Serge Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept," described as an incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, and the choral finale of Glinka's opera "A Life for the Czar." The tenor in Prokofieff's work, the composer's Opus 30, will be Charles Stratton.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Music from England and Scandinavia will be played at the fourth concert of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given next Tuesday afternoon, March 1, in Symphony hall, at 3:15. The English composers represented will be Edward Purcell in a voluntary arranged by Wood; Vaughan Williams's First Norfolk Rhapsody; and Edward Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

The latter part of the program will be divided between music from Norway and Finland, as follows: Grieg's Piano Concerto (Irene Scharrer, pianist); Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela" for orchestra, with English horn solo, and Svensen's "Carnival in Paris."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
FEB 271927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solennis" and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman of The London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
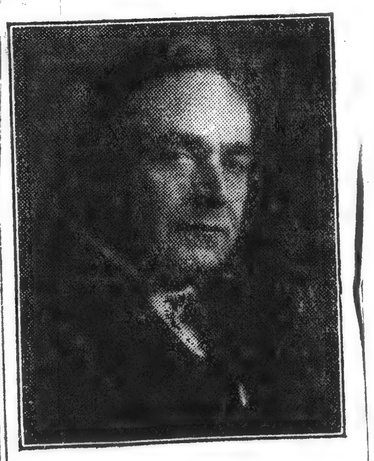
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
FEB 271927

Musical Celebrities



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays in Woolsey Hall on March 9.

New Haven music lovers are to have an opportunity to hear two rare musical events in the near future. The first is a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, which will be given in Woolsey Hall on the evening of March 9. On the 14th, Fritz Kreisler, considered by many the world's greatest violinist, will give a recital at the Shubert.

Two eminent names joined for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to American and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a great conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, interested the public.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is

s Coming to City

FRITZ KREISLER.

Violinist who will give recital at Shubert on March 14.

evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. The 108 musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture.

These extraordinary powers of Koussevitzky are considered in Europe and America as quite beyond analysis or compare. They are felt in manifold episodes of a symphony concert—in the balance and delicacy of the myriad voiced orchestra, the impassioned songfulness of the string choirs, the heaven-scaling brilliance of the climax.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists for each series in Boston, New York and elsewhere. The Boston Symphony concert to be given at Woolsey Hall on March 9th offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the Orchestra's own city.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Music of English and Scandinav[ian] composers will divide the fourth p[rogram] on of the Tuesday afternoon ser[ies] he Boston Symphony Orchestra, [Koussevitzky, conductor, to be given] phony hall on Tuesday, March 1. Irene Scharrer, pianist, will p[lay] g's Concerto. Sibelius will be rep[resented] ed by his "Swan of Tuonela," a[nd] ndsen, the Norwegian composer, "Carnival in Paris." The Engl[ish] ic will include a trumpet volunt[ary] Purcell, arranged by Wood; F[our] folk Rhapsody of Vaughan Willi[ams,] Elgar's "Enigma" variations.

SYMPHONY PROGRA[M]

The Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will giv[e] its 17th pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko;" Elgar's "Enigma Variations," Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela," with English horn solo, and a tone poem of Respighi, "Stained Glass Windows." This score is the composer's latest, and was written for this orchestra. It will be performed from manuscript.

WEEK-END MUSIC: LAST OF RESPIGHI, JERITZA IN SONG

"CHURCH WINDOWS" WITHOUT THE COMPOSER

Recondite Means and Deepened Imagination—The Singer in Fresh and Live[ly] Impression—Her Different Courses Theater and Concert-Hall — Opera Numbers for Their Musical Values—T[o] Cecilia to New York—A Bass Recita[l]

IN the absence of the composer—a[nd] therefore, of the warm-hearted demonstrations on Friday afternoon —Mr. Respighi's fourfold tone-poe[m] "Church Windows," was repeated at [the] Symphony Concert on Saturday evening. Heard a second time, it amplified, rather than altered, first impressions. The workmanship, of course, stood clearer: the mingled invention and learning, imagination and contrivance, of the harmonic and instrumental means, as in the measured of bells and incense heralding [the] Gregory as Sovereign Pontiff; the rhythmical fertility and mastery, as in the tossing tumult of the Archangel's battle; the ingenuities and aptitudes of construction, as in the repetitions of the melody that attends the Flight into Egypt or in the close of Saint Clare's music melting upon the ecstatic air. [In neither] "The Fountains" nor "The Pines" is Mr. Respighi so recondite in procedure or subtle in implication. By its choice "Church Windows" is bound to fall [short] of the immediate effect—and applause that rewarded the composition-piece. On the other hand, the composer finds himself in the dilemma of those who would stimulate, re-stimulate and stimulate again, a particular sense. He [regulates] pile up sonorities in [the] pages [begat] tinued the process, and added blow... rhythm, in the march of the legiona... through "The Pines." Now, with ... sonorities and rhythms, he must ... himself yet harder in the Archang... battle and in the papal triumph. O... and again, the outcome is an over-blo... over-driven music.

How far Mr. Respighi has succeed... with his design to transfuse into anoth... medium the colors, imagery and em... tional suggestion of stained glass depen... upon the susceptibility of the listener. Only in a few measures will perceptive hearers think to themselves: "It is here or it is there." Yet, beyond question, the composer has often chosen finer-grained and more evasive matter for music-mak... ing than prompted either "The Foun... tains" or "The Pines." He is far from children at play or nightingales a-twitter... when he would suffuse his pages with the mystical miracle of Saint Clare. A nocturne of the Villa Medici at sunset i... a commonplace beside a vision of the Holy Family in flight across the shelter... ing night. The Archangel's embattled host may not keep step with Roman le... gions pressing forward to Cæsar.

Two hearings of "Church Windows" still leave doubts as to Mr. Respighi's ability to sustain these loftier themes. He does, however, treat them with deepene... imagination. The complexities of "Th... Flight" leave, finally, a haunting impres... sion of simplicity; the distant trumpet wailing down the wind across the rifts... battle, pierces keener and lingers longe... than a well-timed effect; the coloring o... the music of Saint Clare is as limpid a... a "primitive" Italian canvas or as th... glass of the composer's vision. Eve... when he hurls himself upon the por... tifical sonorities, the bells have sounde... through the incense-laden air. Rims... Korsakov's "Russian Easter," a ... nowned piece in the kind, keeps but poo... company with Mr. Respighi's ... poems.

Incidents and Prospects

The choir of The Cecilia will a... pany the Symphony Orchestra on its next journey to New York—to sing with at the concerts of March 10 and 12 in Manhattan and of March 11 in Brooklyn. The present choice of numbers is Prokofiev's "They Are Seven" from the choral program of next Friday and Saturday; the Saraband of Ducasse and the Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" from the similar program two seasons ago.

It is amusingly related that the agents of the apartment house in New York, where Mr. Aaron Copland has rooms, lately asked him to give up his quarters. The neighboring tenants, it appeared, ... belled at the sound of his music, as h... tested it upon the piano. No, it was n... noisy, they said. "It was only so ... tle." And they are not subscribers to ... Symphony Concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 1 - 1927

ONLY $725 NEEDED IN SYMPHONY DRIVE

Committee Announces Campaign for $6000 Guarantee Fund Will End This Week

URGES SMALL DONATIONS

Wants Subscriptions from All Music Lovers Willing to Make Sacrifice for Cause of Music in This City

With announcement last night that only $725 more is needed to complete the $6000 guarantee fund for buying out the Albee Theatre on five Tuesday evenings next winter and thus assuring the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another year, the voluntary symphony concert committee also announced that the drive will be concluded this week.

"We are particularly desirous of getting small subscriptions from music lovers who are willing to make the sacrifice purely for the cause of music in this city," said the committee. "Pledges from a dollar up are welcome."

The committee also pointed out that the raising of money by subscriptions is an emergency measure necessary for the coming year only, while the concerts are given in the Albee Theatre. The cost of buying out the Albee is $1500 a night. Of the total $7500 required for five evenings, the orchestra itself is paying $1500 out of its receipts for the season. In future years, the concerts will be given in the new Masonic Temple, where, it is expected, the symphony will be able to pay all its expenses without outside assistance.

In contrast with the small sum sought here only during the temporary lack of a regular home for the orchestra, Boston residents underwrite $100,000 every year in support of the organization, according to the Providence committee.

A total of $990 has been subscribed during the last three days by the following: Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Dorothy Sturges, Mrs. George Hall, Annette M. Ham, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, Mrs. Fred L. Smith, Helen C. Robertson, Helen G. Chase, William Ely, Mrs. Henry B. Gardner, "in memory of William T. Crandell." Pledges amcunting to $4285 have been previously acknowledged.

Pledges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal in the following form:

"I hereby pledge.....dollars ($....) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be sent at this time as pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 2 - 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY AS A DOUBLE-BASS VIRTUOSO

Many a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Strokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, for example, and Stock, the Chicago conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks, while Pierre Monteux's instrument, as a student, was the viola.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Woolsey hall March 9 has the sole distinction of having been a virtoso of the double bass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When, as a boy of 14, he entered the Moscow conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the double bass. Koussecitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first ten years of his professional career toured Europe, east and west, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a concerta for it which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwiedly double bass of the modern orchestra which of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone." He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian, and contemporary of Stradivarius, in the 17th century.

These earlier Italian basses were really chamber instruments, somewhat smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and of course more adaptable for solo purposes. Koussevitzky's double bass can be likened to an enlarged and deepened 'cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

Kouissevitzky's fame as a virtuoso was high indeed, and there is every indication that his mastery of the instrument was a thing to wonder at. A particular musical treat must have been the joint recitals which he gave in Paris with Cassadesus, the leader of the renowned society of Ancient Instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 1 - 1927
105

SYMPHONY FUND NEEDS ONLY $725 TO GO OVER TO

Committee Announces Campaign of $6000 Guarante... Money Will End This Week Urges Subscriptions from A... Music Lovers of City.

With announcement last night that only $725 more is needed to complet... the $6000 guarantee fund for buyin... out the Albee Theatre on five Tuesda... evenings next winter and thus assurin... the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another year, the voluntary symphony concert committee also announced that the drive will be concluded this week.

"We are particularly desirous of getting small subscriptions from music lovers who are willing to make the sacrifice purely for the cause of music in this city," said the committee. "Pledges from a dollar up are welcome."

The committee also pointed out that the raising of money by subscriptions is an emergency measure necessary for the coming year only, while the concerts are given in the Albee Theatre. The cost of buying out the Albee is $1500 a night. Of the total $7500 required for five evenings, the orchestra itself is paying $1500 out of its receipts for the season. In future years, the concerts will be given in the new Masonic Temple, where, it is expected, the symphony will be able to pay all its expenses without outside assistance.

In contrast with the small sum sought here only during the temporary lack of a regular home for the orchestra, Boston residents underwrite $100,000 every year in support of the organization, according to the Providence committee.

A total of $990 has been subscribed during the last three days by the following: Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Dorothy Sturges, Mrs. George Hall, Annette M. Ham, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, Mrs. Fred L. Smith, Helen C. Robertson, Helen G. Chase, William Ely, Mrs. Henry B. Gardner, "in memory of William T. Crandell." Pledges amcunting to $4285 have been previously acknowledged.

Pledges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal in the following form:

"I hereby pledge.....dollars ($....) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be sent at this time as pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

SCHARRER HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

English Pianist Excels in Grieg Concerto

Irene Scharrer, noted English pianist previously heard more than once in recital, played the Grieg concerto at the fourth Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

Mr Koussevitzky, carrying out his scheme of a series of national programs, chose numbers by English and Scandinavian composers for this concert. An audience which did not quite fill the hall applauded Miss Scharrer with especial warmth.

Yesterday's was the best performance of Grieg's concerto heard here in many years. Miss Scharrer played poetically and imaginatively, with marked beauty of tone except in fortissimo passages. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra accompanied her with unusual sympathy. As a result the music sounded much better than usual, and increased one listener's rather canty respect for the genius of Grieg.

English Numbers

The English numbers were a "Volantary" for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ, arranged by Sir Henry Wood and played here at the regular concerts last season; Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody" and Elgar's "Enigma" variations. The latter numbers have been heard in the other series this season. This time the Purcell went better than it did last year, though one still wondered how much was Purcell and how much was Wood.

The Elgar again seemed music of permanent value, especially the ninth, 12th and 13th variations. It was a pity to represent the younger British composers only by an early and not notable work of Vaughan Williams. One is inclined to think his orchestral music of less significance than that of Nolst, or even Bliss. After all, the greatest English composers are really Mandel and Mendelssohn, since those Germans dominated musical England for two centuries.

The Scandinavians were, besides Grieg, the Finnish Sibelius, represented by his "Swan of Tuonela," played at last week's regular concerts, but better done yesterday, and Svendsen, another Norwegian, whose "Carnival at Paris" has not been heard from the Boston Symphony for many seasons past, though the People's Symphony audiences seem to relish it.

One wondered why there was no symphony on the program. There are seven by Sibelius, several by Elgar and three by Vaughan Williams and one of which might be chosen. Nor was Sweden represented. Alfven, whose music Dr Muck introduced here, is not a colossal figure in recent musical history, but his work is quite valuable and interesting as Svendsen's noisy and futile "Carnival."

Coming Program

The net result of listening for an afternoon to such third-rate pieces as filled yesterday's program is a distrust of the value of grouping music according to the accident of the composer's birthplace. Svendsen's piece was actually and symbolically written at Baireuth, nearer the domicile of Liszt than that of Wagner, one surmises, but definitely under German influences. And Elgar, without the great 19th-century Germans, is inconceivable.

The next program in this series, to be given April 26, will be devoted to the work of Americans and Italians. May we hope to hear some of the brilliantly provocative and intensely interesting music of Aaron Copland, and Griffes' "Khubla Khan," among the American numbers? P. R.

The Cecilia Society will join the Boston Symphony orchestra in the concerts of the latter on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Several unfamiliar works will be produced. The purely orchestral will be Langendoen's Variations on a Dutch theme of Valerius and "Tone Pictures" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitesch." The Variations are for strings and were played as a solo quintet at a concert of the Boston Flute Players' Club three seasons ago. Mr. Langendoen, a violoncellist, is a member of the orchestra. One of the movements in the Russian Suite, "The Battle of Kerjenetz," has already been played here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction.

There are five choral pieces with orchestra, but in the "Song of the High Hills," by Delius, the chorus is directed to sit and sing only a vowel. Percy Grainger was the first to bring out this work in the United States. Bridgeport, Ct., was the scene of the memorable occasion.

When Ludwig Wuellner gave recitals in Boston nearly 20 years ago, that remarkable interpreter with an ungrateful voice and a faulty vocal method sang with dramatic intensity a song by Hugo Wolf called the "Fire-rider." The poem by the German Moerike was suggested by an old folk legend. Wolf arranged his song for chorus and orchestra.

The "Song of Destiny," by Brahms, is familiar. It was even performed at a concert of this orchestra during the last year of Arthur Nikisch's reign, for there was then a band of singers known as the Boston Symphony chorus which took part that season in Beethoven's 9th symphony, Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" and Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn."

Again we are to hear Prokofieff's wildly barbaric, splendidly savage "Seven, They Are Seven." These "Seven," it will be remembered, were terrible fellows, who ground men as men grind grain, were deaf to entreaties and caused earth and sky to shrink. "O Telai! O Alai! O Guiguimm!" not to mention "O Maskimm!" Charles Stratton will be the tenor to proclaim loudly the horrible malevolence of the Seven.

The number at the end will be the last scene in the Epilogue of Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar." The overture of this opera, dear for many years to the Russian peoples, was performed at one of the Chickering production concerts conducted by B. J. Lang. Is the opera still performed in Russia, and, if so, has a new libretto been fitted to the music?

Those Bostonians who are perturbed by ultra-modern music should ponder the werds of J. G. Frazer: "Everything new is apt to excite the awe and dread of the savage."

CHORUS WITH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH.

The program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contains interest aplenty for those who are attracted by novelties, for no less than five of the long list of seven compositions were performed yesterday afternoon for the first time at the Symphony concerts.

In actual performance these pieces made a pleasing ensemble, but not so pleasing as was hoped when the program was first announced. Since five of the numbers contained choral parts, the Cecelia Society assisted the orchestra. And the excellent tenor voice of Charles Stratton was added as solo to the other performers in Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept," the piece which set Boston on its ears when first performed here last year.

The Russian's music continued to impress on rehearing. Perhaps it is not music in the accepted sense, perhaps it is not music at all, but whatever it is, the piece strikes deeply. Just as vivid impression, of quite a different character, was made on this listener by the first hearing of Delius' "Song of the Hills" for orchestra and voices. A composer of genius this man Delius surely is, from the evidence of such a score, and it is a pity that his work does not come to performance here more often.

The variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius, written by Jakobus Langendoen, a 'cellist in the Symphony Orchestra, and scored for full string choir, displayed commendable mastery of form, and unusual felicity in handling detail. The chief objection was the over-persistent use of the upper register of the violins, resulting in harsh and forced tones. Perhaps the fault was Mr. Koussevitzky's in driving his men too hard.

Wolf's "Fire-Rider," Brahms' "Song of Destiny" and the finale of Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Czar," offered further oportunity for display of the abilities of the massed chorus and orchestra. And the instruments alone were heard in a beautiful redition of a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Legend of the Invisible City of Katesch."

Mr. Langendoen, of the 'cello section of the orchestra, is a modest gentleman about his piece. This performance is not only the first performance of the variations anywhere, it is also the first performance anywhere of a purely orchestral piece by Mr. Langendoen. Valerius, from whom he takes his theme, was a Dutch composer who lived at the time of the wars between the Netherlands and Spain. The title of the theme is "Bergen-op-Zoom," which is the name of an old Dutch town defended successfully against the Spaniards through a memorable siege. There are seven variations, treated in modern symphonic style—that is, as continuous music without break or pause between any two of the seven. The style is thoroughly modern, but not "ultra." Mr. Langendoen received his early training in South Africa. He has also studied and played in various orchestras—in some as first 'cellist—at The Hague, Berlin, Amsterdam, Scheveningen and elsewhere. Josef Malkin was among his teachers.

Middle Ages

Mrs. Newmarch, in her book, "The Russian Opera," has these paragraphs on Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Tale of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Maiden Fevronia": The opera "was in Rimsky-Korsakov's mind for nearly ten years before he actually composed it between 1903-1905. The first performance in Leningrad took place at the Maryinsky Theater early in the spring of 1907, and Moscow heard the opera in the following season. The opera starts with an orchestral introduction based upon a folk-melody. There is great charm in the opening scene laid in the forests surrounding Little Kitej, where Fevronia is discovered sitting among the tall grasses and singing a song in praise of all living creatures. There she is joined by a bear, a crane, and other birds, all of which she welcomes as friends. There the young Prince Vsievolod sees her and loses his heart to the beautiful child of nature. Their love-scene is interrupted by the sound of horns, introducing a company of archers in search of the Prince. Fevronia then discovers her lover's identity.

"The next act shows the market-place in Little Kitej crowded with all manner of archaic Russian types: a showman leading a bear, a minstrel singing and playing the guzli, old men and women, young men and girls—one of those animated canvases which recall certain pages in Musorgsky's operas and are the precursors of similar scenes in Stravinsky's 'Petrushka.' Some 'superior people' are grumbling at the marriage of the Prince to the unknown and homeless Fevronia. Soon the bride appears accompanied by the wedding procession. She receives the congratulations of the populace, but the 'superior people' show some disdain. Suddenly a fresh group rush on in terror, followed by Tartars who break up the crowd and seize Fevronia. Under threats of torture they compel the crazy drunkard Kouterma to guide them to Kitej the Great. Fevronia puts up a prayer for the city as the Tartars carry her off on one of their rough carts.

"The scene changes to Kitej the Great, where the old Prince and his son, the bridegroom, are listening to the account given by the fugitives of the destruction of Little Kitej by the Tartars. All are horrified to hear that Fevronia has fallen into their ruthless hands. The Prince assembles his soldiers and goes out to meet the enemy. While the women are singing a chorus of lamentation, the church bell begins to ring of its own accord. The old Prince declares it is a miraculous sign that the town will be saved. The curtain rises next on the Tartar encampment on the shores of the Shining Lake. Fevronia, in despair, is still sitting in the Tartar's cart. The half-crazy Kouterma has been bound hand and foot because the Tartars suspected him. Their two leaders have fought; one is left dead on the ground; the others have fallen asleep. Fevronia takes a knife from the dead Tartar chief and cuts Kouterma's bonds. He is about to escape when the sound of a bell arrests him. He rushes to the lake with the intention of drowning himself, but at that moment a ray of sunlight falls on the water on which he sees reflected the city of Kitej the Invisible. Now he really makes his escape, taking Fevronia with him. The Tartars are awakened, and, running to the edge of the lake, they too see the miraculous reflection and exclaim in terror: 'Awful is the God of the Russians.'

"Fevronia passes some terrible hours alone in the gloom of the enchanted for-

A LAVISH PROGRAM FROM MANY HANDS IN DIVERS VOICES

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY LAYS ON AND SPARES NOT

Five Novel Numbers in a Pair of Concerts, Two Orchestral, Three Choral—Variations from Holland—Tone-Pictures from Russia—Delius, Wolf, Glinka for Choir and Orchestra

NOT less than five novelties stand upon Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the week-end—probably a record. For many programs do not bear as many as five numbers. These five are Mr. Langendoen's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Valerius, a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Maiden Fevronia"; for chorus and orchestra Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider," Delius's "Song of the High Hills," the closing chorus from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Czar."

tinued the process, and added blows of rhythm, in the march of the legions through "The Pines." Now, with both sonorities and rhythms, he must steel himself yet harder in the Archangel's battle and in the papal triumph. Once and again, the outcome is an over-blown, over-driven music.

How far Mr. Respighi has succeeded with his design to transfuse into another medium the colors, imagery and emotional suggestion of stained glass depends upon the susceptibility of the listener. Only in a few measures will perceptive hearers think to themselves: "It is here or it is there." Yet, beyond question, the composer has often chosen finer-grained and more evasive matter for music-making than prompted either "The Fountains" or "The Pines." He is far from children at play or nightingales a-twitter, when he would suffuse his pages with the mystical miracle of Saint Clare. A nocturne of the Villa Medici at sunset is a commonplace beside a vision of the Holy Family in flight across the shelter-ing night. The Archangel's embattled host may not keep step with Roman legions pressing forward to Cæsar.

Two hearings of "Church Windows" still leave doubts as to Mr. Respighi's ability to sustain these loftier themes. He does, however, treat them with deepened imagination. The complexities of "The Flight" leave, finally, a haunting impression of simplicity; the distant trumpet wailing down the wind across the rifts of battle, pierces keener and lingers longer than a well-timed effect; the coloring of the music of Saint Clare is as limpid as a "primitive" Italian canvas or as the glass of the composer's vision. Even when he hurls himself upon the pon-derous sonorities, the bells have sounded through the incense-laden air. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," a well-nowned piece in the kind, keeps but poor company with Mr. Respighi's r[illegible] poems.

Incidents and Prospects

The choir of The Cecilia will accompany the Symphony Orchestra on its next journey to New York—to sing with it at the concerts of March 10 and 12 in Manhattan and of March 11 in Brooklyn. The present choice of numbers is Prokofiev's "They Are Seven" from the choral program of next Friday and Saturday; the Saraband of Ducasse and the Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" from the similar program two seasons ago.

It is amusingly related that the agents of the apartment house in New York, where Mr. Aaron Copland has rooms, lately asked him to give up his quarters. The neighboring tenants, it appeared, had rebelled at the sound of his music, as he tested it upon the piano. No, it was not noisy, they said. "It was only so rotten." And they are not subscribers to the Symphony Concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 1 - 1927

ONLY $725 NEEDED IN SYMPHONY DRIVE

Committee Announces Campaign for $6000 Guarantee Fund Will End This Week

URGES SMALL DONATIONS

Wants Subscriptions from All Music Lovers Willing to Make Sacrifice for Cause of Music in This City

With announcement last night that only $725 more is needed to complete the $6000 guarantee fund for buying out the Albee Theatre on five Tuesday evenings next winter and thus assuring the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another year, the voluntary symphony concert committee also announced that the drive will be concluded this week.

"We are particularly desirous of getting small subscriptions from music lovers who are willing to make the sacrifice purely for the cause of music in this city," said the committee. "Pledges from a dollar up are welcome."

The committee also pointed out that the raising of money by subscriptions is an emergency measure necessary for the coming year only, while the concerts are given in the Albee Theatre. The cost of buying out the Albee is $1500 a night. Of the total $7500 required for five evenings, the orchestra itself is paying $1500 out of its receipts for the season. In future years, the concerts will be given in the new Masonic Temple, where, it is expected, the symphony will be able to pay all its expenses without outside assistance.

In contrast with the small sum sought here only during the temporary lack of a regular home for the orchestra, Boston residents underwrite $100,000 every year in support of the organization, according to the Providence committee.

A total of $990 has been subscribed during the last three days by the following: Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Dorothy Sturges, Mrs. George Hall, Annette M. Ham, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, Mrs. Fred L. Smith, Helen C. Robertson, Helen G. Chase, William Ely, Mrs. Henry B. Gardner, "in memory of William T. Crandell." Pledges amounting to $4285 have been previously acknowledged.

Pledges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal in the following form:

"I hereby pledge.....dollars ($....) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be sent at this time as pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 1 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND NEEDS ONLY $725 TO GO OVER TO

Committee Announces Campaign of $6000 Guarante[e] Money Will End This Week Urges Subscriptions from A[ll] Music Lovers of City.

With announcement last night that only $725 more is needed to complete the $6000 guarantee fund for buying out the Albee Theatre on five Tuesday evenings next winter and thus assuring the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another year, the voluntary symphony concert committee also announced that the drive will be concluded this week.

"We are particularly desirous of getting small subscriptions from music lovers who are willing to make the sacrifice purely for the cause of music in this city," said the committee. "Pledges from a dollar up are welcome."

The committee also pointed out that the raising of money by subscriptions is an emergency measure necessary for the coming year only, while the concerts are given in the Albee Theatre. The cost of buying out the Albee is $1500 a night. Of the total $7500 required for five evenings, the orchestra itself is paying $1500 out of its receipts for the season. In future years, the concerts will be given in the new Masonic Temple, where, it is expected, the symphony will be able to pay all its expenses without outside assistance.

In contrast with the small sum sought here only during the temporary lack of a regular home for the orchestra, Boston residents underwrite $100,000 every year in support of the organization, according to the Providence committee.

A total of $990 has been subscribed during the last three days by the following: Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Dorothy Sturges, Mrs. George Hall, Annette M. Ham, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, Mrs. Fred L. Smith, Helen C. Robertson, Helen G. Chase, William Ely, Mrs. Henry B. Gardner, "in memory of William T. Crandell." Pledges amounting to $4285 have been previously acknowledged.

Pledges should be sent to the treasurer of the Providence Journal in the following form:

"I hereby pledge.....dollars ($....) toward the guarantee fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for the season of 1927-1928."

Both the name and address should be signed. No cash or checks should be sent at this time as pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 2 - 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY AS A DOUBLE-BASS VIRTUOSO

Many a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Strokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, for example, and Stock, the Chicago conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks, while Pierre Monteux's instrument, as a student, was the viola.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Woolsey hall March 9 has the sole distinction of having been a virtoso of the double bass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When, as a boy of 14, he entered the Moscow conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for the orchestral class, either a brass instrument or the double bass. Koussecitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency and for the first ten years of his professional career toured Europe, east and west, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a concerta for it which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

[illegible] supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy double bass of the modern orchestra which, of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone." He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian, and contemporary of Stradivarius, in the 17th century.

These earlier Italian basses were really chamber instruments, somewhat smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and of course more adaptable for solo purposes. Koussevitzky's double bass can be likened to an enlarged and deepened 'cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

Kouissevitzky's fame as a virtuoso was high indeed, and there is every indication that his mastery of the instrument was a thing to wonder at. A particular musical treat must have been the joint recitals which he gave in Paris with Cassadesus, the leader of the renowned society of Ancient Instruments.

SCHARRER HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

English Pianist Excels in Grieg Concerto

Irene Scharrer, noted English pianist previously heard more than once in recital, played the Grieg concerto at the fourth Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

Mr Koussevitzky, carrying out his scheme of a series of national programs, chose numbers by English and Scandinavian composers for this concert. An audience which did not quite fill the hall applauded Miss Scharrer with especial warmth.

Yesterday's was the best performance of Grieg's concerto heard here in many years. Miss Scharrer played poetically and imaginatively, with marked beauty of tone except in fortissimo passages. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra accompanied her with unusual sympathy. As a result the music sounded much better than usual, and increased one listener's rather canty respect for the genius of Grieg.

English Numbers

The English numbers were a "Voluntary" for trumpets, trombones, drums and organ, arranged by Sir Henry Wood and played here at the regular concerts last season; Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody" and Elgar's "Enigma" variations. The latter numbers have been heard in the other series this season. This time the Purcell went better than it did last year, though one still wondered how much was Purcell and how much was Wood.

The Elgar again seemed music of permanent value, especially the ninth, 12th and 13th variations. It was a pity to represent the younger British composers only by an early and not notable work of Vaughan Williams. One is inclined to think his orchestral music of less significance than that of Nolst, or even Bliss. After all, the greatest English composers are really Mandel and Mendelssohn, since those Germans dominated musical England for two centuries.

The Scandinavians were, besides Grieg, the Finnish Sibelius, represented by his "Swan of Tuonela," played at last week's regular concerts, but better done yesterday, and Svendsen, another Norwegian, whose "Carnival at Paris" has not been heard from the Boston Symphony for many seasons past, though the People's Symphony audiences seem to relish it.

One wondered why there was no symphony on the program. There are seven by Sibelius, several by Elgar and three by Vaughan Williams and one of which might be chosen. Nor was Sweden represented. Alfven, whose music Dr Muck introduced here, is not a colossal figure in recent musical history, but his work is quite valuable and interesting as Svendsen's noisy and futile "Carnival."

Coming Program

The net result of listening for an afternoon to such third-rate pieces as filled yesterday's program is a distrust of the value of grouping music according to the accident of the composer's birthplace. Svendsen's piece was actually and symbolically written at Baireuth, nearer the domicile of Liszt than that of Wagner, one surmises, but definitely under German influences. And Elgar, without the great 19th-century Germans, is inconceivable.

The next program in this series, to be given April 26, will be devoted to the work of Americans and Italians. May we hope to hear some of the brilliantly provocative and intensely interesting music of Aaron Copland, and Griffes' "Khubla Khan," among the American numbers? P. R.

The Cecilia Society will join the Boston Symphony orchestra in the concerts of the latter on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Several unfamiliar works will be produced. The purely orchestral will be Langendoen's Variations on a Dutch theme of Valerius and "Tone Pictures" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitesch." The Variations are for strings and were played as a solo quintet at a concert of the Boston Flute Players' Club three seasons ago. Mr. Langendoen, a violoncellist, is a member of the orchestra. One of the movements in the Russian Suite, "The Battle of Kerjenetz," has already been played here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction.

There are five choral pieces with orchestra, but in the "Song of the High Hills," by Delius, the chorus is directed to sit and sing only a vowel. Percy Grainger was the first to bring out this work in the United States. Bridgeport, Ct., was the scene of the memorable occasion.

When Ludwig Wuellner gave recitals in Boston nearly 20 years ago, that remarkable interpreter with an ungrateful voice and a faulty vocal method sang with dramatic intensity a song by Hugo Wolf called the "Fire-rider." The poem by the German Moerike was suggested by an old folk legend. Wolf arranged his song for chorus and orchestra.

The "Song of Destiny," by Brahms, is familiar. It was even performed at a concert of this orchestra during the last year of Arthur Nikisch's reign, for there was then a band of singers known as the Boston Symphony chorus which took part that season in Beethoven's 9th symphony, Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" and Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn."

Again we are to hear Prokofieff's wildly barbaric, splendidly savage "Seven, They Are Seven." These "Seven," it will be remembered, were terrible fellows, who ground men as men grind grain, were deaf to entreaties and caused earth and sky to shrink. "O Telai! O Alai! O Guiguimm!" not to mention "O Maskimm!" Charles Stratton will be the tenor to proclaim loudly the horrible malevolence of the Seven.

The number at the end will be the last scene in the Epilogue of Glinka's "A Life for the Tsar." The overture of this opera, dear for many years to the Russian peoples, was performed at one of the Chickering production concerts conducted by B. J. Lang. Is the opera still performed in Russia, and, if so, has a new libretto been fitted to the music?

Those Bostonians who are perturbed by ultra-modern music should ponder the words of J. G. Frazer: "Everything new is apt to excite the awe and dread of the savage."

CHORUS WITH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH.

The program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contains interest aplenty for those who are attracted by novelties, for no less than five of the long list of seven compositions were performed yesterday afternoon for the first time at the Symphony concerts.

In actual performance these pieces made a pleasing ensemble, but not so pleasing as was hoped when the program was first announced. Since five of the numbers contained choral parts, the Cecelia Society assisted the orchestra. And the excellent tenor voice of Charles Stratton was added as solo to the other performers in Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept," the piece which set Boston on its ears when first performed here last year.

The Russian's music continued to impress on rehearing. Perhaps it is not music in the accepted sense, perhaps it is not music at all, but whatever it is, the piece strikes deeply. Just as vivid impression, of quite a different character, was made on this listener by the first hearing of Delius' "Song of the Hills" for orchestra and voices. A composer of genius this man Delius surely is, from the evidence of such a score, and it is a pity that his work does not come to performance here more often.

The variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius, written by Jakobus Langendoen, a 'cellist in the Symphony Orchestra, and scored for full string choir, displayed commendable mastery of form, and unusual felicity in handling detail. The chief objection was the over-persistent use of the upper register of the violins, resulting in harsh and forced tones. Perhaps the fault was Mr. Koussevitzky's in driving his men too hard.

Wolf's "Fire-Rider," Brahms' "Song of Destiny" and the finale of Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Czar," offered further oportunity for display of the abilities of the massed chorus and orchestra. And the instruments alone were heard in a beautiful redition of a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Legend of the Invisible City of Katesch."

Mr. Langendoen, of the 'cello section of the orchestra, is a modest gentleman about his piece. This performance is not only the first performance of the variations anywhere, it is also the first performance anywhere of a purely orchestral piece by Mr. Langendoen. Valerius, from whom he takes his theme, was a Dutch composer who lived at the time of the wars between the Netherlands and Spain. The title of the theme is "Bergen-op-Zoom," which is the name of an old Dutch town defended successfully against the Spaniards through a memorable siege. There are seven variations, treated in modern symphonic style—that is, as continuous music without break or pause between any two of the seven. The style is thoroughly modern, but not "ultra." Mr. Langendoen received his early training in South Africa. He has also studied and played in various orchestras—in some as first 'cellist—at The Hague, Berlin, Amsterdam, Scheveningen and elsewhere. Josef Malkin was among his teachers.

Middle Ages

Mrs. Newmarch, in her book, "The Russian Opera," has these paragraphs on Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Tale of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Maiden Fevronia": The opera "was in Rimsky-Korsakov's mind for nearly ten years before he actually composed it between 1903-1905. The first performance in Leningrad took place at the Maryinsky Theater early in the spring of 1907, and Moscow heard the opera in the following season. The opera starts with an orchestral introduction based upon a folk-melody. There is great charm in the opening scene laid in the forests surrounding Little Kitej, where Fevronia is discovered sitting among the tall grasses and singing a song in praise of all living creatures. There she is joined by a bear, a crane, and other birds, all of which she welcomes as friends. There the young Prince Vsievolod sees her and loses his heart to the beautiful child of nature. Their love-scene is interrupted by the sound of horns, introducing a company of archers in search of the Prince. Fevronia then discovers her lover's identity.

"The next act shows the market-place in Little Kitej crowded with all manner of archaic Russian types: a showman leading a bear, a minstrel singing and playing the guzli, old men and women, young men and girls—one of those animated canvases which recall certain pages in Musorgsky's operas and are the precursors of similar scenes in Stravinsky's 'Petrushka.' Some 'superior people' are grumbling at the marriage of the Prince to the unknown and homeless Fevronia. Soon the bride appears accompanied by the wedding procession. She receives the congratulations of the populace, but the 'superior people' show some disdain. Suddenly a fresh group rush on in terror, followed by Tartars who break up the crowd and seize Fevronia. Under threats of torture they compel the crazy drunkard Kouterma to guide them to Kitej the Great. Fevronia puts up a prayer for the city as the Tartars carry her off on one of their rough carts.

"The scene changes to Kitej the Great, where the old Prince and his son, the bridegroom, are listening to the account given by the fugitives of the destruction of Little Kitej by the Tartars. All are horrified to hear that Fevronia has fallen into their ruthless hands. The Prince assembles his soldiers and goes out to meet the enemy. While the women are singing a chorus of lamentation, the church bell begins to ring of its own accord. The old Prince declares it is a miraculous sign that the town will be saved. The curtain rises next on the Tartar encampment on the shores of the Shining Lake. Fevronia, in despair, is still sitting in the Tartar's cart. The half-crazy Kouterma has been bound hand and foot because the Tartars suspected him. Their two leaders have fought; one is left dead on the ground; the others have fallen asleep. Fevronia takes a knife from the dead Tartar chief and cuts Kouterma's bonds. He is about to escape when the sound of a bell arrests him. He rushes to the lake with the intention of drowning himself, but at that moment a ray of sunlight falls on the water on which he sees reflected the city of Kitej the Invisible. Now he really makes his escape, taking Fevronia with him. The Tartars are awakened, and, running to the edge of the lake, they too see the miraculous reflection and exclaim in terror: 'Awful is the God of the Russians.'

"Fevronia passes some terrible hours alone in the gloom of the enchanted for-

A LAVISH PROGRAM FROM MANY HANDS IN DIVERS VOICES

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY LAYS ON AND SPARES NOT

Five Novel Numbers in a Pair of Concerts, Two Orchestral, Three Choral—Variations from Holland—Tone-Pictures from Russia—Delius, Wolf, Glinka for Choir and Orchestra

NOT less than five novelties stand upon Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the week-end—probably a record. For many programs do not bear as many as five numbers. These five are Mr. Langendoen's Variations for String Orchestra on a Theme by Valerius, a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Maiden Fevronia"; for chorus and orchestra Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider," Delius's "Song of the High Hills," the closing chorus from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Czar."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A LAVISH PROGRAM FROM MANY LANDS IN DIVERS VOICES

TRANS MAR 3

Continued from Page Nine

s, fire-feelers, fire-riders. Their craft s illicita—forbidden knowledge. But e aware of a fire they are driven by demoniac force, without rest until they fly to the fire. But magic forbade the fire-riders to put out the fire that they have discovered. Möricke's fire-rider is not playing the game when he exorcises fires with a crucifix. Therefore, according to the rights and custom of magic, he pays for his misdeed with his life, which he forfeits in the ruins of the burning mill.'" Wolf's own words, "The first principle in art with me is strict, inexorable truth, truth even as far as gruesomeness," apply with especial force to "The Fire-Rider."

Chorally from Delius

Of "The Song of the High Hills," Mr. Philip Heseltine in his book about Delius writes: "In 'Appalachia' and 'A Song of the High Hills' the chorus is used sparingly, with the effect that its entries are thrilling in their unexpectedness, and its climaxes a crowning glory of sound. . . . The structure of 'A Song of the High Hills' is like the rugged outline of a great range of mountains whose heights are hidden from the eyes of the crowd. The music is full of a sense of spacious solitudes and far horizons. The elation of the ascent is succeeded by a mood of ecstatic contemplation, and the soul rises through the pure still air to the very heights of rapture, losing all consciousness of itself as the mountain-tops are lost from the ken of man, among the wandering mists and the eternal snows. Certain commentators on the work have thought fit to see, in the relation between the choruses and the orchestra in this work, some such opposed relation as is supposed to exist between the mountaineer and the peak which baffles his attempts to scale it. But the relation is more spiritual than that. It is only a false materialistic duality that can regard Man and Nature as separate entities pitted against each other; for the aspects of Nature are only the manifestations in terms of matter of the diverse aspects of the soul of Man that ebbs with autumn and flows with the tide of spring, aspires to heaven with the mountains, sings in the winds and runs with the rivers along the waters of time." Delius wrote the piece in 1911-12 it was first performed in February, 1920 at a Philharmonic Concert in London under Albert Coates.

Holy Russia

There is no reason at this late day to recall in detail Glinka's epoch-making opera (in Russia) "A Life for the Tsar." The Musical World in 1880 analyzed the last chorus to be heard on Friday and Saturday. "For the final chorus Glinka was fortunate enough to hit upon a simple and grand motive, with a broad rhythm. With this motive are skillfully blended the voices of the principal personages. First given by the chorus who are accompanied by a military band on the stage, the motive, always varied with great art, reappears several times. The orchestra has here more than one surprise for the auditor, it sometimes diminishes to a simple pizzicato, and sometimes collects all its force to modulate in the most unexpected and stirring manner. At length the chorus are silent and the instruments stop; the grand voice of the bells is heard rising heavenward. And immediately afterward, as though in an unrestrainable fit of enthusiasm, the voice of the crowd sustained by a flourish on the brass and by all the instruments in the orchestra, resume the hymn in concert and with triumphal power. The movement is quickened as though the enthusiasm would increase even more, and the curtain falls on this grandiose outburst, this burning act of religious and patriotic faith, this manifestation of the love which her children bear to great and holy Russia."

Mrs. Newmarch thus describes the end of the opera: "Then the scene changes to the Red Square under the walls of the Kremlin, and all individual sentiment is merged in a flood of loftier emotion. The close of the act is the apotheosis of the Tsar and of the spirit of loyalty. . . . Once again the great crowd takes up the 'Slavsia' or 'Glory' motive, and amid the pealing of bells. e opera ends with a triumphant chorus m up the whole char- sia' people. 'Every beauty,' says M. pressed into service heir ruler and God Not one degree in rchy is lacking; not deal, not one ray from of the fatherland.'"

A. H. M.

est with K... but she prays, and presently he lea... er. Then little lamps appear in the t... and gold and silver flowers spring u... the grass; while the Paradise Birds, ...onost and Sirin, sing to comfort he... klonost tells her he is the messeng... ath. She replies that she has no fe... leath, and weaves herself a ga... 'resently the spirit of the youn... appears to her. He tells her that h... has been killed, 'but now,' he sa... nk God, I am alive.' He gives her ... some bread, bidding her eat before ... starts on her long journey: 'who ... tes our bread knows eternal happiness.' Fevronia eats and throws some of the crumbs to the birds; then with a prayer, 'Christ receive me into the habitations of the just,' she disappears with the spirit of the Prince.

"After an orchestral interlude, the curtain rises upon the apotheosis of the City of Kitej, and the Paradise Birds are heard proclaiming: 'The celestial gates are open to us; time has ceased; Eternity has begun.' The people come ou...

their epithalamium. Fevronia now learns that Kitej did not fall, but only disappeared; that the northern lights bore the prayers of the just to heaven; and also the cause of the blessed and miraculous sound heard by Kouterma. Then the Prince leads his bride into the cathedral while the people sing: 'Here, hail there be no more tears or sorrow, but everlasting joy and peace.'"

From this opera four "tone pictures" have been arranged in the form of a suite. First there is the Prelude—a Hymn to Nature, according to last week's program-book, but a Hymn to Solitude according to the German title in the score of the opera. Looking over these measures one suspects that Rimsky-Korsakov has known Wagner. He, too, has written a music of the solitude of nature. The second picture comes from the second act, as the title clearly indicates, "Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars." For a third there is the battle between Tartars and Russians, the "Battle of Kerjenetz," already played here as an isolated number; and lastly a title tells its tale: "The Glorious Immolation of the Virgin Fevronia, the Ascension into the Invisible City." [This fourth picture Mr. Koussevitzky has now cut away.]

Chorally, from Wolf

With Mr. Lang's chorus of The Cecilia, the other three numbers will be sung and played. Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider" is a setting of a ballad by Möricke. The poem tells of a mysterious "fire-rider," a person who can divine the existence of a fire, often at the distance of many miles. He also "exorcises" it with uplifted cross, again at a distance. But he is caught in a burning mill, and years later his skeleton is found in the cellar beneath the ruins. Wolf originally wrote "The Fire-Rider" in 1888, the year in which he set so many of Möricke's poems. But the later choral version is much more suitable for so huge a conception. Says Mr. Newman, "The end is much more impressive in the choral version than it is in the original ballad; the dark harmonies for the four voices suggest the atmosphere better than the single voice-part does, and the drum taps in the closing bars sound very ghostly." Georg Gräner in "Der Musikführer" gives the following analysis: "Who is the fire-rider? Why does he ride abroad? Why does he come to his death by fire? To answer these questions and thereby afford an introduction into the spooky mystic of this ballad I quote the following from Ernst Decsey's excellent 'Hugo Wolf': 'There are people who can recognize a distant fire by signs such as the color of a stray cloud in a clear sky; or the fire-wind which springs up even in a wind-becalmed region, usually in the boughs of a tree. Such people are fire-

Continued on Page Eleven

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANNER
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MAR 3 - 1927

practicable for lying purposes.

CHARLES STRATTON WILL GO ON AIR

Clarksville, Tenn., March 3.—(Special.)—Clarksville and Nashville admirers of Charles Stratton, tenor, a native of this city, will have the opportunity of hearing him over the radio on Saturday and on March 25, according to announcements received here.

On March 5 Mr. Stratton will be heard over WEEI, Boston, or WJZ New York, at 8:15 Eastern time, with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Stratton will sing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony over WEAF at 9 p. m., Eastern time, on March 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 4 1927

No, Not Charlie; Only a Composer

Koussevitzky Points Out Latter, with Comedian in Cambridge Audience.

BOSTON, March 4—There was a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night. Serge Koussevitzky was present, as expected, acting as conductor. Another person was present who was not expected, Charlie Chaplin, and before the concert was finished many persons were commenting that it was remarkable that Mr. Koussevitzky should have pointed him out.

As a matter of fact, Koussevitzky did point out a person, but it was not Charlie, and it is not certain that Koussevitzky knew that a brother artist was present. The person pointed out by the conductor was the composer of one of the pieces played by the orchestra. Charlie disappeared immediately after the concert.

with the receipt last night of a ... contribution from a group of Masons headed by William L. Sweet and other contributions from 15 individuals during the past three days, the $6000 guarantee fund sought for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Albee Theatre next year is oversubscribed by $267.

The concert committee, headed by Dr. William H. P. Faunce as honorary chairman, last night expressed its appreciation to the contributors for their support in the drive. Sixty-three persons in all have underwritten the $6267 total, with individual subscriptions varying from $5 to $1000.

The committee also announces that approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors. A similar agreement has been made this year.

The pledge from the Masons this year represents the amount returned to them from their large underwriting a year ago.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, in a letter to Dr. Faunce, referred to Brown's award to Koussevitzky of the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Brown a year ago. "This token of appreciation of my work left a profound impression in my soul and encouraged my further musical activities in this country," he said. "On the first anniversary of the event I wish to extend to you and to all members of the faculty my warmest greetings."

In addition to the Masonic group, the following subscribers pledged $392 in completion of the fund: Mrs. William Gammell, Mrs. Edgar J. Lowes, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Helen R. Ostby, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Louise C. Hoppin, Clara W. Brown, Mrs. J. K. H. Nightingale, Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, Howard Langley, Mrs. C. J. Steedman, Helen W. Church, Mrs. Mary Greene Chapin, "R. E. P.," and an anonymous subscriber "In Memory of Eva Swift Gardner."

A contribution acknowledged Tuesday "In Memory of William T. Crandell" was given by Mrs. Crandell.

headed by William L. Sweet and other contributions from 15 individuals during the past three days, the $6000 guarantee fund sought for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Albee Theatre next year is oversubscribed by $267.

The concert committee, headed by Dr. William H. P. Faunce as honorary chairman, last night expressed its appreciation to the contributors for their support in the drive. Sixty-three persons in all have underwritten the $6267 total, with individual subscriptions varying from $5 to $1000.

The committee also announces that approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors. A similar agreement has been made this year.

The pledge from the Masons this year represents the amount returned to them from their large underwriting a year ago.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, in a letter to Dr. Faunce, referred to Brown's award to Koussevitzky of the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Brown a year ago. "This token of appreciation of my work left a profound impression in my soul and encouraged my further musical activities in this country," he said. "On the first anniversary of the event I wish to extend to you and to all members of the faculty my warmest greetings."

In addition to the Masonic group, the following subscribers pledged $392 in completion of the fund: Mrs. William Gammell, Mrs. Edgar J. Lowes, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Helen R. Ostby, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Louise C. Hoppin, Clara W. Brown, Mrs. J. K. H. Nightingale, Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, Howard Langley, Mrs. C. J. Steedman, Helen W. Church, Mrs. Mary Greene Chapin, "R. E. P.," and an anonymous subscriber "In Memory of Eva Swift Gardner."

A contribution acknowledged Tuesday "In Memory of William T. Crandell" was given by Mrs. Crandell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

MAR 1 - 1927

GREAT BEETHOVEN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN IN BOSTON

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the "Ninth Symphony," the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solennis," the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY CONCERT FUND PASSES QUOTA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Providence next year. Its return was made possible by the oversubscribing of the $6000 guarantee fund which would have to be raised in Providence before the orchestra could be induced to come here next season. A last minute drive resulted in the fund being oversubscribed by $267. Sixty-three persons have underwritten the total amount with contributions ranging from $5 to $1000.

Approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 4 - 1927

Symphony Orchestra Concert Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitsky Will Wield Baton For Broadcast From WJZ, WBZ And KDKA.

New York, March 4.—Three "blue network" stations—WJZ, WBZ and KDKA—will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:10 o'clock tomorrow night. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony Hall, Boston.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, and will occupy about fifteen minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission.

Professor Marshall was formerly organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the World War was the assistant director of camp music of the United States Army, having assumed his post at the head of the music departments of the two New England colleges since the signing of the armistice. His background and musical education fit him ideally for the work which he is doing for the listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 5 - 1927

STRATTON SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

But Chorus and Orchestra Will Feature Radioed Concert From Boston Tonight

Tonight WBZ and its chain of stations will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. An unusual program has been arranged, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the list is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Later follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms's greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton will be heard, the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Gl'nka.

Prof John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:—

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude, Hymn to Nature
Bridal Procession, The Invasion of the Tartars
The Battle of Kerjenetz
"Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30 ..... Prokofieff
Finale of the opera, "A Life for the Czar," for chorus and orchestra ..... Glinka
The Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, will assist
Soloist, Charles Stratton

Other programs for the evening ... low:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

MAR 3 1927

Stratton to Sing from WEEI Saturday Evening

Information received from Boston to-day is to the effect that Charles Stratton, noted tenor, will be the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Saturday night of this week and that the concert will be broadcast from the state WEEI at 8 o'clock.

There will also be a chorus of 100 voices and the leader of the orchestra will explain in person some of the tendencies of modern music. As Mr. Stratton is very well and favorably known here it is probable that St. Albans radio owners will tune in on the Boston station Saturday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND OVERSUBSCRIBED

$6000 Guarantee to Bring Orchestra to City Again Next Year Exceeded by $267.

MASONS RETURN DONATION

Fifteen Individual Contributions Complete Sum Needed.—Koussevitzky Letter Expresses Appreciation to Brown

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND OVERSUBSCRIBED TOTAL NOW $62

Guarantee to Bring Orchestra to Providence Again Next Year is Exceeded. — Masons Return Donation. — 15 Individuals Also Aid.

With the receipt last night of a large ... group of Masons

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A LAVISH PROGRAM FROM MANY LANDS IN DIVERS VOICES

TRANS MHR 3

Continued from Page Nine

s, fire-feelers, fire-riders. Their craft s illicita—forbidden knowledge. But e aware of a fire they are driven by demoniac force, without rest until they fly to the fire. But magic forbad the fire-riders to put out the fire that they have discovered. Möricke's fire-rider is not playing the game when he exorcises fires with a crucifix. Therefore, according to the rights and custom of magic, he pays for his misdeed with his life, which he forfeits in the ruins of the burning mill.'" Wolf's own words, "The first principle in art with me is strict, inexorable truth, truth even as far as gruesomeness," apply with especial force to "The Fire-Rider."

Chorally from Delius

Of "The Song of the High Hills," Mr. Philip Heseltine in his book about Delius writes: "In 'Appalachia' and 'A Song of the High Hills' the chorus is used sparingly, with the effect that its entries are thrilling in their unexpectedness, and its climaxes a crowning glory of sound. . . . The structure of 'A Song of the High Hills' is like the rugged outline of a great range of mountains whose heights are hidden from the eyes of the crowd. The music is full of a sense of spacious solitudes and far horizons. The elation of the ascent is succeeded by a mood of ecstatic contemplation, and the soul rises through the pure still air to the very heights of rapture, losing all consciousness of itself as the mountain-tops are lost from the ken of man, among the wandering mists and the eternal snows. Certain commentators on the work have thought fit to see, in the relation between the choruses and the orchestra in this work, some such opposed relation as is supposed to exist between the mountaineer and the peak which baffles his attempts to scale it. But the relation is more spiritual than that. It is only a false materialistic duality that can regard Man and Nature as separate entities pitted against each other; for the aspects of Nature are only the manifestations in terms of matter of the diverse aspects of the soul of Man that ebbs with autumn and flows with the tide of spring, aspires to heaven with the mountains, sings in the winds and runs with the rivers along the waters of time." Delius wrote the piece in 1911-12 it was first performed in February, 1920 at a Philharmonic Concert in London under Albert Coates.

Holy Russia

There is no reason at this late day to recall in detail Glinka's epoch-making opera (in Russia) "A Life for the Tsar." The Musical World in 1880 analyzed the last chorus to be heard on Friday and Saturday. "For the final chorus Glinka was fortunate enough to hit upon a simple and grand motive, with a broad rhythm. With this motive are skillfully blended the voices of the principal personages. First given by the chorus who are accompanied by a military band on the stage, the motive, always varied with great art, reappears several times. The orchestra has here more than one surprise for the auditor, it sometimes diminishes to a simple pizzicato, and sometimes collects all its force to modulate in the most unexpected and stirring manner. At length the chorus are silent and the instruments stop; the grand voice of the bells is heard rising heavenward. And immediately afterward, as though in an unrestrainable fit of enthusiasm, the voice of the crowd sustained by a flourish on the brass and by all the instruments in the orchestra, resume the hymn in concert and with triumphal power. The movement is quickened as though the enthusiasm would increase even more, and the curtain falls on this grandiose outburst, this burning act of religious and patriotic faith, this manifestation of the love which her children bear to great and holy Russia."

Mrs. Newmarch thus describes the end of the opera: "Then the scene changes to the Red Square under the walls of the Kremlin, and all individual sentiment is merged in a flood of loftier emotion. The close of the act is the apotheosis of the Tsar and of the spirit of loyalty. . . . Once again the great crowd takes up the 'Slavsia' or 'Glory' motive, and amid the pealing of bells. e opera ends with a triumphant chorus m up the whole char- sia" people. 'Every beauty,' says M. pressed into service eir ruler and God Not one degree in rchy is lacking; not deal, not one ray from f the fatherland.'"

A. H. M.

[illegible] est with Ko[illegible] but she prays, and presently he lea[illegible]er. Then little lamps appear in the t[illegible] and gold and silver flowers spring u[illegible] the grass; while the Paradise Birds, [illegible]onost and Sirin, sing to comfort he[illegible]olonost tells her he is the messeng[illegible]eath. She replies that she has no fe[illegible]eath, and weaves herself a ga[illegible]resently the spirit of the youn[illegible] appears to her. He tells her that h[illegible] has been killed, 'but now,' he sa[illegible]nk God, I am alive.' He gives Fe[illegible] some bread, bidding her eat before [illegible] starts on her long journey, 'who b[illegible]es our bread knows eternal happiness.' Fevronia eats and throws some of the crumbs to the birds; then with a prayer, 'Christ receive me into the habitations of the just,' she disappears with the spirit of the Prince.

"After an orchestral interlude, the curtain rises upon the apotheosis of the City of Kitej, and the Paradise Birds are heard proclaiming: 'The celestial gates are open to us; time has ceased; Eternity has begun.' The people come [illegible] their epithalamium. Fevronia now learns that Kitej did not fall, but only disappeared; that the northern lights bore the prayers of the just to heaven; and also the cause of the blessed and miraculous sound heard by Kouterma. Then the Prince leads his bride into the cathedral while the people sing: 'Here hall there be no more tears or sorrow, but everlasting joy and peace.'"

From this opera four "tone pictures" have been arranged in the form of a suite. First there is the Prelude—a Hymn to Nature, according to last week's program-book, but a Hymn to Solitude according to the German title in the score of the opera. Looking over these measures one suspects that Rimsky-Korsakov has known Wagner. He, too, has written a music of the solitude of nature. The second picture comes from the second act, as the title clearly indicates, "Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars." For a third there is the battle between Tartars and Russians, the "Battle of Kerjenetz," already played here as an isolated number; and lastly a title tells its tale: "The Glorious Immolation of the Virgin Fevronia, the Ascension into the Invisible City." [This fourth picture Mr. Koussevitzky has now cut away.]

Chorally, from Wolf

With Mr. Lang's chorus of The Cecilia, the other three numbers will be sung and played. Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider" is a setting of a ballad by Möricke. The poem tells of a mysterious "fire-rider," a person who can divine the existence of a fire, often at the distance of many miles. He also "exorcises" it with uplifted cross, again at a distance. But he is caught in a burning mill, and years later his skeleton is found in the cellar beneath the ruins. Wolf originally wrote "The Fire-Rider" in 1888, the year in which he set so many of Möricke's poems. But the later choral version is much more suitable for so huge a conception. Says Mr. Newman, "The end is much more impressive in the choral version than it is in the original ballad; the dark harmonies for the four voices suggest the atmosphere better than the single voice-part does, and the drum taps in the closing bars sound very ghostly."

Georg Gräner in "Der Musikführer" gives the following analysis: "Who is the fire-rider? Why does he ride abroad? Why does he come to his death by fire? To answer these questions and thereby afford an introduction into the spooky mystic of this ballad I quote the following from Ernst Decsey's excellent 'Hugo Wolf': 'There are people who can recognize a distant fire by signs such as the color of a stray cloud in a clear sky; or the fire-wind which springs up even in a wind-becalmed region, usually in the boughs of a tree. Such people are fire-

Continued on Page Eleven

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

MAR 1 - 1927

GREAT BEETHOVEN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN IN BOSTON

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the "Ninth Symphony," the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solennis," the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

MAR 3 1927

Stratton to Sing from WEEI Saturday Evening

Information received from Boston to-day is to the effect that Charles Stratton, noted tenor, will be the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Saturday night of this week and that the concert will be broadcast from the state WEEI at 8 o'clock.

There will also be a chorus of 100 voices and the leader of the orchestra will explain in person some of the tendencies of modern music. As Mr. Stratton is very well and favorably known here it is probable that St. Albans radio owners will tune in on the Boston station Saturday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANNER
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MAR 3 - 1927

practicable for flying purposes.

CHARLES STRATTON WILL GO ON AIR

Clarksville, Tenn., March 3.—(Special.)—Clarksville and Nashville admirers of Charles Stratton, tenor, a native of this city, will have the opportunity of hearing him over the radio on Saturday and on March 25, according to announcements received here.

On March 5 Mr. Stratton will be heard over WEEI, Boston, or WJZ New York, at 8:15 Eastern time, with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Stratton will sing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony over WEAF at 9 p. m., Eastern time, on March 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 4 1927

No, Not Charlie; Only a Composer

Koussevitzky Points Out Latter, with Comedian in Cambridge Audience.

BOSTON, March 4—There was a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night. Serge Koussevitzky was present, as expected, acting as conductor. Another person was present who was not expected, Charlie Chaplin, and before the concert was finished many persons were commenting that it was remarkable that Mr. Koussevitzky should have pointed him out.

As a matter of fact, Koussevitzky did point out a person, but it was not Charlie, and it is not certain that Koussevitzky knew that a brother artist was present. The person pointed out by the conductor was the composer of one of the pieces played by the orchestra. Charlie disappeared immediately after the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY CONCERT FUND PASSES QUOTA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Providence next year. Its return was made possible by the oversubscribing of the $6000 guarantee fund which would have to be raised in Providence before the orchestra could be induced to come here next season. A last minute drive resulted in the fund being oversubscribed by $267. Sixty-three persons have underwritten the total amount with contributions ranging from $5 to $1000.

Approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND OVERSUBSCRIBED

$6000 Guarantee to Bring Orchestra to City Again Next Year Exceeded by $267.

MASONS RETURN DONATION

Fifteen Individual Contributions Complete Sum Needed.—Koussevitzky Letter Expresses Appreciation to Brown

With the receipt last night of a large contribution from a group of Masons headed by William L. Sweet and other contributions from 15 individuals during the past three days, the $6000 guarantee fund sought for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Albee Theatre next year is oversubscribed by $267.

The concert committee, headed by Dr. William H. P. Faunce as honorary chairman, last night expressed its appreciation to the contributors for their support in the drive. Sixty-three persons in all have underwritten the $6267 total, with individual subscriptions varying from $5 to $1000.

The committee also announces that approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors. A similar agreement has been made this year.

The pledge from the Masons this year represents the amount returned to them from their large underwriting a year ago.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, in a letter to Dr. Faunce, referred to Brown's award to Koussevitzky of the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Brown a year ago. "This token of appreciation of my work left a profound impression in my soul and encouraged my further musical activities in this country," he said. "On the first anniversary of the event I wish to extend to you and to all members of the faculty my warmest greetings."

In addition to the Masonic group, the following subscribers pledged $392 in completion of the fund: Mrs. William Gammell, Mrs. Edgar J. Lowe, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Helen R. Ostby, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Louise C. Hoppin, Clara W. Brown, Mrs. J. K. H. Nightingale, Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, Howard Langley, Mrs. C. J. Steedman, Helen W. Church, Mrs. Mary Greene Chapin, "R. E. P.," and an anonymous subscriber "In Memory of Eva Swift Gardner."

A contribution acknowledged Tuesday "In Memory of William T. Crandell" was given by Mrs. Crandell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.

MAR 4 - 1927

Symphony Orchestra Concert Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitsky Will Wield Baton For Broadcast From WJZ, WBZ And KDKA.

New York, March 4.—Three "blue network" stations—WJZ, WBZ and KDKA—will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 o'clock tomorrow night. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony Hall, Boston.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, and will occupy about fifteen minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission.

Professor Marshall was formerly organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the World War was the assistant director of camp music in the United States Army, having assumed his post at the head of the music departments of the two New England colleges since the signing of the armistice. His background and musical education fit him ideally for the work which he is doing for the listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND OVERSUBSCRIBED TOTAL NOW $62

Guarantee to Bring Orchestra to Providence Again Next Year is Exceeded. — Masons Return Donation. — 15 Individuals Also Aid.

With the receipt last night of a large contribution from a group of Masons headed by William L. Sweet and other contributions from 15 individuals during the past three days, the $6000 guarantee fund sought for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Albee Theatre next year is oversubscribed by $267.

The concert committee, headed by Dr. William H. P. Faunce as honorary chairman, last night expressed its appreciation to the contributors for their support in the drive. Sixty-three persons in all have underwritten the $6267 total, with individual subscriptions varying from $5 to $1000.

The committee also announces that approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors. A similar agreement has been made this year.

The pledge from the Masons this year represents the amount returned to them from their large underwriting a year ago.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, in a letter to Dr. Faunce, referred to Brown's award to Koussevitzky of the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Brown a year ago. "This token of appreciation of my work left a profound impression in my soul and encouraged my further musical activities in this country," he said. "On the first anniversary of the event I wish to extend to you and to all members of the faculty my warmest greetings."

In addition to the Masonic group, the following subscribers pledged $392 in completion of the fund: Mrs. William Gammell, Mrs. Edgar J. Lowe, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Helen R. Ostby, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Louise C. Hoppin, Clara W. Brown, Mrs. J. K. H. Nightingale, Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, Howard Langley, Mrs. C. J. Steedman, Helen W. Church, Mrs. Mary Greene Chapin, "R. E. P.," and an anonymous subscriber "In Memory of Eva Swift Gardner."

A contribution acknowledged Tuesday "In Memory of William T. Crandell" was given by Mrs. Crandell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 5 - 1927

STRATTON SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

But Chorus and Orchestra Will Feature Radioed Concert From Boston Tonight

Tonight WBZ and its chain of stations will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. An unusual program has been arranged, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the list is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Later follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms's greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton will be heard, the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:—

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude, Hymn to Nature
Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars
The Battle of Kerjenetz
"Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30 ..... Prokofieff
Finale of the opera, "A Life for the Czar," for chorus and orchestra ..... Glinka
The Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, will assist
Soloist, Charles Stratton

Other programs for the evening follow:—

INFORMATION OBSCURED

A LAVISH PROGRAM FROM MANY LANDS IN DIVERS VOICES

TRANS MAR 3

Continued from Page Five

s, fire-feelers, fire-riders. Their craft s illicita—forbidden knowledge. But e aware of a fire they are driven by demoniac force, without rest until they ly to the fire. But magic forbade the ire-riders to put out the fire that they have discovered. Möricke's fire-rider is not playing the game when he exorcises fires with a crucifix. Therefore, according to the rights and custom of magic,
he pays for his misdeed with his life, which he forfeits in the ruins of the burning mill.'" Wolf's own words, "The first principle in art with me is strict, inexorable truth, truth even as far as gruesomeness," apply with especial force to "The Fire-Rider."

Chorally from Delius

Of "The Song of the High Hills," Mr.
Philip Heseltine in his book about Delius writes: "In 'Appalachia' and 'A Song of the High Hills' the chorus is used sparingly, with the effect that its entries are thrilling in their unexpectedness, and its climaxes a crowning glory of sound.
. . . The structure of 'A Song of the High Hills' is like the rugged outline of a great range of mountains whose heights are hidden from the eyes of the crowd. The music is full of a sense of spacious solitudes and far horizons. The elation of the ascent is succeeded by a mood of ecstatic contemplation, and the soul rises through the pure still air to the very heights of rapture, losing all consciousness of itself as the mountain-tops are lost from the ken of man, among the wandering mists and the eternal snows.
Certain commentators on the work have thought fit to see, in the relation between the choruses and the orchestra in this work, some such opposed relation as is supposed to exist between the mountaineer and the peak which baffles his attempts to scale it. But the relation is more spiritual than that. It is only a false materialistic duality that can regard Man and Nature as separate entities pitted against each other; for the aspects of Nature are only the manifestations in terms of matter of the diverse aspects of the soul of Man that ebbs with autumn and flows with the tide of spring, aspires to heaven with the mountains, sings in the winds and runs with the rivers along the waters of time." Delius wrote the piece in 1911-12 it was first performed in February, 1920 at a Philharmonic Concert in London under Albert Coates.

Holy Russia

There is no reason at this late day to recall in detail Glinka's epoch-making opera (in Russia) "A Life for the Tsar." The Musical World in 1880 analyzed the last chorus to be heard on Friday and Saturday. "For the final chorus Glinka was fortunate enough to hit upon a simple and grand motive, with a broad rhythm. With this motive are skillfully blended the voices of the principal personages. First given by the chorus who are accompanied by a military band on the stage, the motive, always varied with great art, reappears several times. The orchestra has here more than one surprise for the auditor, it sometimes diminishes to a simple pizzicato, and sometimes collects all its force to modulate in the most unexpected and stirring manner. At length the chorus are silent and the instruments stop; the grand voice of the bells is heard rising heavenward. And immediately afterward, as though in an unrestrainable fit of enthusiasm, the voice of the crowd sustained by a flourish on the brass and by all the instruments in the orchestra, resume the hymn in concert and with triumphal power. The movement is quickened as though the enthusiasm would increase even more, and the curtain falls on this grandiose outburst, this burning act of religious and patriotic faith, this manifestation of the love which her children bear to great and holy Russia."

Mrs. Newmarch thus describes the end of the opera: "Then the scene changes to the Red Square under the walls of the Kremlin, and all individual sentiment is merged in a flood of loftier emotion. The close of the act is the apotheosis of the Tsar and of the spirit of loyalty. . . . Once again the great crowd takes up the 'Slavsia' or 'Glory' motive, and amid the pealing of bells e opera ends with a triumphant chorus m up the whole charsia's people. 'Every beauty,' says M.
pressed into service heir ruler and God
Not one degree in rchy is lacking; not deal, not one ray from of the fatherland.'"

A. H. M.

est with Ko... but she prays, and presently he lea... er. Then little lamps appear in the t... and gold and silver flowers spring u... the grass; while the Paradise Birds, ...onost and Sirin, sing to comfort he... olonost tells her he is the messenge... eath. She replies that she has no fe... leath, and weaves herself a gar... resently the spirit of the youn... appears to her. He tells her that h... has been killed, 'but now, he sa... nk God, I am alive.' He gives Fe... some bread, bidding her eat before ... starts on her long journey; 'whe... tes our bread knows eternal happines... Fevronia eats and throws some of the crumbs to the birds; then with a prayer, 'Christ receive me into the habitations of the just,' she disappears with the spirit of the Prince.

"After an orchestral interlude, the curtain rises upon the apotheosis of the City of Kitej, and the Paradise Birds are heard proclaiming: 'The celestial gates are open to us; time has ceased; Eternity has begun.' The people come ov...

their epithalamium. Fevronia now learns that Kitej did not fall, but only disappeared; that the northern lights bore the prayers of the just to heaven, and also the cause of the blessed and miraculous sound heard by Kouterma. Then the Prince leads his bride into the cathedral while the people sing: 'Here hall there be no more tears or sorrow, but everlasting joy and peace.'"

From this opera four "tune pictures" have been arranged in the form of a suite. First there is the Prelude—a Hymn to Nature, according to last week's program-book, but a Hymn to Solitude according to the German title in the score of the opera. Looking over these measures one suspects that Rimsky-Korsakov has known Wagner. He, too, has written a music of the solitude of nature. The second picture comes from the second act, as the title clearly indicates, "Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars." For a third there is the battle between Tartars and Russians, the "Battle of Kerjenetz," already played here as an isolated number; and lastly a title tells its tale: "The Glorious Immolation of the Virgin Fevronia, the Ascension into the Invisible City." [This fourth picture Mr. Koussevitzky has now cut away.]

Chorally, from Wolf

With Mr. Lang's chorus of The Cecilia, the other three numbers will be sung and played. Hugo Wolf's "The Fire-Rider" is a setting of a ballad by Möricke. The poem tells of a mysterious "fire-rider," a person who can divine the existence of a fire, often at the distance of many miles. He also "exorcises" it with uplifted cross, again at a distance. But he is caught in a burning mill, and years later his skeleton is found in the cellar beneath the ruins. Wolf originally wrote "The Fire-Rider" in 1888, the year in which he set so many of Möricke's poems. But the later choral version is much more suitable for so huge a conception. Says Mr. Newman, "The end is much more impressive in the choral version than it is in the original ballad; the dark harmonies for the four voices suggest the atmosphere better than the single voice-part does, and the drum taps in the closing bars sound very ghostly."

Georg Gräner in "Der Musikführer" gives the following analysis: "Who is the fire-rider? Why does he ride abroad? Why does he come to his death by fire? To answer these questions and thereby afford an introduction into the spooky mystic of this ballad I quote the following from Ernst Decsey's excellent 'Hugo Wolf': 'There are people who can recognize a distant fire by signs such as the color of a stray cloud in a clear sky; or the fire-wind which springs up even in a wind-becalmed region, usually in the boughs of a tree. Such people are fire-

Continued on Page Eleven

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

MAR 1 - 1927

GREAT BEETHOVEN PROGRAM TO BE GIVEN IN BOSTON

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the "Ninth Symphony," the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solennis," the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

MAR 3 1927

Stratton to Sing from WEEI Saturday Evening

Information received from Boston to-day is to the effect that Charles Stratton, noted tenor, will be the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Saturday night of this week and that the concert will be broadcast from the state WEEI at 8 o'clock.

There will also be a chorus of 100 voices and the leader of the orchestra will explain in person some of the tendencies of modern music. As Mr. Stratton is very well and favorably known here it is probable that St. Albans radio owners will tune in on the Boston station Saturday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANNER
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MAR 3 - 1927

practicable for flying purposes.

CHARLES STRATTON WILL GO ON AIR

Clarksville, Tenn., March 3.—(Special.)—Clarksville and Nashville admirers of Charles Stratton, tenor, a native of this city, will have the opportunity of hearing him over the radio on Saturday and on March 25, according to announcements received here.

On March 5 Mr. Stratton will be heard over WEEI, Boston, or WJZ New York, at 8:15 Eastern time, with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Stratton will sing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony over WEAF at 9 p. m., Eastern time, on March 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 4 1927

No, Not Charlie; Only a Composer

Koussevitzky Points Out Latter, with Comedian in Cambridge Audience.

BOSTON, March 4—There was a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last night. Serge Koussevitzky was present, as expected, acting as conductor. Another person was present who was not expected, Charlie Chaplin, and before the concert was finished many persons were commenting that it was remarkable that Mr. Koussevitzky should have pointed him out.

As a matter of fact, Koussevitzky did point out a person, but it was not Charlie, and it is not certain that Koussevitzky knew that a brother artist was present. The person pointed out by the conductor was the composer of one of the pieces played by the orchestra. Charlie disappeared immediately after the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY CONCERT FUND PASSES QUOTA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Providence next year. Its return was made possible by the oversubscribing of the $6000 guarantee fund which would have to be raised in Providence before the orchestra could be induced to come here next season. A last minute drive resulted in the fund being oversubscribed by $267. Sixty-three persons have underwritten the total amount with contributions ranging from $5 to $1000.

Approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND OVERSUBSCRIBED

$6000 Guarantee to Bring Orchestra to City Again Next Year Exceeded by $267.

MASONS RETURN DONATION

Fifteen Individual Contributions Complete Sum Needed.—Koussevitzky Letter Expresses Appreciation to Brown

with the receipt last night of a large contribution from a group of Masons headed by William L. Sweet and other contributions from 15 individuals during the past three days, the $6000 guarantee fund sought for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Albee Theatre next year is oversubscribed by $267.

The concert committee, headed by Dr. William H. P. Faunce as honorary chairman, last night expressed its appreciation to the contributors for their support in the drive. Sixty-three persons in all have underwritten the $6267 total, with individual subscriptions varying from $5 to $1000.

The committee also announces that approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors. A similar agreement has been made this year.

The pledge from the Masons this year represents the amount returned to them from their large underwriting a year ago.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, in a letter to Dr. Faunce, referred to Brown's award to Koussevitzky of the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Brown a year ago. "This token of appreciation of my work left a profound impression in my soul and encouraged my further musical activities in this country," he said. "On the first anniversary of the event I wish to extend to you and to all members of the faculty my warmest greetings."

In addition to the Masonic group the following subscribers pledged $392 in completion of the fund: Mrs. William Gammell, Mrs. Edgar J. Lowne, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Helen R. Ostby, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Louise C. Hoppin, Clara W. Brown, Mrs. J. K. H. Nightingale, Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, Howard Langley, Mrs. C. J. Steedman, Helen W. Church, Mrs. Mary Greene Chapin, "R. E. P.," and an anonymous subscriber "In Memory of Eva Swift Gardner."

A contribution acknowledged Tuesday "In Memory of William T. Crandell" was given by Mrs. Crandell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.

MAR 4 - 1927

Symphony Orchestra Concert Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitsky Will Wield Baton For Broadcast From WJZ, WBZ And KDKA.

New York, March 4.—Three "blue network" stations—WJZ, WBZ and KDKA—will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:10 o'clock tomorrow night. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony Hall, Boston.

One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, and will occupy about fifteen minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission.

Professor Marshall was formerly organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the World War was the assistant director of camp music in the United States Army, having assumed his post at the head of the music departments of the two New England colleges since the signing of the armistice. His background and musical education fit him ideally for the work which he is doing for the listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 4 - 1927

SYMPHONY FUND OVERSUBSCRIBED TOTAL NOW $6267

Guarantee to Bring Orchestra to Providence Again Next Year is Exceeded. — Masons Return Donation. — 15 Individuals Also Aid.

With the receipt last night of a large contribution from a group of Masons headed by William L. Sweet and other contributions from 15 individuals during the past three days, the $6000 guarantee fund sought for the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Albee Theatre next year is oversubscribed by $267.

The concert committee, headed by Dr. William H. P. Faunce as honorary chairman, last night expressed its appreciation to the contributors for their support in the drive. Sixty-three persons in all have underwritten the $6267 total, with individual subscriptions varying from $5 to $1000.

The committee also announces that approximately 20 per cent. of the fund raised last year will be returned to the subscribers by the orchestra, which agreed to divide its profits in excess of a stipulated sum with the guarantors. A similar agreement has been made this year.

The pledge from the Masons this year represents the amount returned to them from their large underwriting a year ago.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, in a letter to Dr. Faunce, referred to Brown's award to Koussevitzky of the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Brown a year ago. "This token of appreciation of my work left a profound impression in my soul and encouraged my further musical activities in this country," he said. "On the first anniversary of the event I wish to extend to you and to all members of the faculty my warmest greetings."

In addition to the Masonic group, the following subscribers pledged $392 in completion of the fund: Mrs. William Gammell, Mrs. Edgar J. Lowne, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Miss Helen R. Ostby, Mrs. A. H. Tillinghast, Louise C. Hoppin, Clara W. Brown, Mrs. J. K. H. Nightingale, Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, Howard Langley, Mrs. C. J. Steedman, Helen W. Church, Mrs. Mary Greene Chapin, "R. E. P.," and an anonymous subscriber "In Memory of Eva Swift Gardner."

A contribution acknowledged Tuesday "In Memory of William T. Crandell" was given by Mrs. Crandell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 5 - 1927

STRATTON SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

But Chorus and Orchestra Will Feature Radioed Concert From Boston Tonight

Tonight WBZ and its chain of stations will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. An unusual program has been arranged, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the list is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Later follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms's greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton will be heard, the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:—

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider) for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude, Hymn to Nature
Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars
The Battle of Kerjenetz
"Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30 ..... Prokofieff
...ale of the opera, "A Life for the ...ar," for chorus and orchestra ..... Glinka
... Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor, will assist ...
...oloist, Charles Stratton
...r programs for the evening

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
THE ORIGINAL — NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 5 - 1927

Choral Selections Included in Boston Symphony Concert

Broadcast from Boston Tonight Will Feature Prominent Work of Rimsky Korsakov.

Tonight stations WBZ, KDKA and WJZ will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of Boston. An unusual and unique program has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore. The Cecilia Chorus Society will assist the orchestra.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the Finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius, Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices, Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra, Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54, Brahms
Intermission.
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia," Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude. Hymn to Nature.
Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars.
The Battle of Kerjenetz.
"Sept, ils cont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30, Prokofieff
Finale of the opera, "A Life for the Czar," for chorus and orchestra, Glinka

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
MAR 5 1927

Boston Symphony Here on April 4

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excell the centenary festival to be goven in Symphony hall, Boston, March 22 to 29 inclusive.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzke, conductor, will perform all of the nine symphonies, the great Missa Solennis, and there will also be included chamber music, and commemorative addresses.

Monday, April 4, the complete orches with Mr. Koussevitzke, will come to New London for the season's final concert in the Connecticut College series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
MAR 5 1927

ing from a serious illness.

Chaplin Attends Boston Concert

BOSTON, March 4 (United Press)—Charlie Chaplin, whose marital affairs have aroused the interest of the nation, planned to return to New [illegible] after visiting Boston.

While here the film comedian heard the Boston symphony orchestra play the first performance of a concertino for the harp composed by his friend, Germaine Tailleferre, in private life Mrs. Ralph Barton.

Accompanied by Mrs. Barton and Mr. and Mrs. Daniel A. De Menocal, at whose home he spent the night, Chaplin entered Sanders theatre unannounced. His identity did not long remain secret, however. A doorman recognized the actor and asked:

"May I shake hands with you Mr. Chaplin?"

"Certainly, I am glad to know you," the comedian replied.

Chaplin left the theatre immediately after the concert, declining to discuss with the press the divorce action of his wife, Lita Grey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Worcester
MAR 5 1927

Boston Symphony to Hold Beethoven Celebration

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven centenary celebration on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29 at Symphony Hall, Boston, when all the composer's nine symphonies will be played. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solennis" and the Great Mass. It is reported in Boston that Ernest Newman of The London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton will be soloists on this occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 5 192

Chorus Will Aid Symphony Tonight

Tonight Westinghouse Stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also Stations WJZ in New York city, will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

An unusual programme has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of two numbers, the programme is made of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangements heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled, "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the programme includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, and the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programmes heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 5 - 1927

THURSDAY evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" ("They Are Seven!") for tenor, chorus and orchestra, will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert. These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music of the Russian composer, which has been introduced to Paris and Boston in recent seasons by Koussevitzky. Other choral numbers to be performed at each concert are Roger Ducasse's Symphonic Poem "Sarabande" and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Orchestral numbers to introduce the Thursday program are Weber's "Oberon" overture and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the arrangement which Maurice Ravel has especially made for Koussevitzky.

On the Saturday program, in addition to the choral music, Ottorino Respighi's "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") will have its first New York performance. This score was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston two weeks ago. It is a series of four "Impressions" entitled the Flight Into Egypt, Saint Michael Archangel; the Matin of Saint Claire Saint Gregory the Great.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DEL.
MAR 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT FROM WJZ

Three of the National Broadcasting Company's blue network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA will broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8.1[illegible] o'clock. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitskey and will open in Symphon[illegible] Hall, Boston. One of the feature[illegible] of this concert will be the explana[illegible] tion interpretation and interestin[illegible] facts regarding the selections to b[illegible] rendered by the orchestra and the[illegible] composers. This material will [illegible] furnished for the benefit of the rad[illegible] audience only, by Professor John [illegible] Marshall, head of the music depar[illegible] ments of Boston University and Holy Cross College and will occupy ab[illegible] 15 minutes time immediately prec[illegible] ing the opening of the concert a[illegible] the entire period during the int[illegible] mission. Professor Marshall [illegible] formerly organist with the Bos[illegible] Symphony Orchestra and during [illegible] World War was the assistant dir[illegible] tor of camp music of the Uni[illegible] States Army, having assumed [illegible] post at the head of the music [illegible] partments of the two New Engla[illegible] colleges since the signing of [illegible] armistice. His background and m[illegible] sical education fits him ideally [illegible] the work which he is doing for [illegible] listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 5 - 1927

UNUSUAL PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A program of unusual interest, replete with great brilliance and beauty, is announced for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven under its celebrated Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, March 9.

A feature of the program will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Two other noted musicians have scored for orchestra this humorous and whole charming suite of piano pieces by the great Russian composer, Maurice Ravel made this orchestration especially for Koussevitzky and since he is probably the most skilful, delicate and fanciful orchestrator living, it is not surpris-

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MAR5 1927

RADIO FEATURES

Three of the National Broadcasting Company's Blue Network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA, will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at 8:10 tonight. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony hall, Boston. One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only, by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College and will occupy about 15 minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission.

The Balkite Hour this evening [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 5 - 1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT WOOLSEY HALL MARCH 9

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
THE ORIGINAL — NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1927

TO-NIGHT WBZ, WBZA, KDKA and WJZ, will join in broadcasting the eighteenth concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An unusual and unique program has been arranged for to-night's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Thenfollows Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire-Rider" by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the finale to the opera "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Professor John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills" for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(Prelude; Hymn to Nature; Bridal Procession; the invasion of the Tartars; the Battle of Kerjenetz.)
"Sept, ils cont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. [illegible] Prokofieff

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HENRY ROMEIKE NEW YORK
THE ORIGINAL
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 5 - 1927

Choral Selections Included in Boston Symphony Concert

Broadcast from Boston Tonight Will Feature Prominent Work of Rimsky Korsakov.

Tonight stations WBZ, KDKA and WJZ will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of Boston. An unusual and unique program has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore. The Cecilia Chorus Society will assist the orchestra.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the Finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius, Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices, Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra, Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54, Brahms
Intermission.
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia," Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude. Hymn to Nature.
Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars.
The Battle of Kerjenetz.
"Sept, ils cont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30, Prokofieff
Finale of the opera, "A Life for the Czar," for chorus and orchestra. Glinka

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
MAR 5 1927

Boston Symphony Here on April 4

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excell the centenary festival to be goven in Symphony hall, Boston, March 22 to 29 inclusive.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzke, conductor, will perform all of the nine symphonies, the great Missa Solennis, and there will also be included chamber music, and commemorative addresses.

Monday, April 4, the complete orches with Mr. Koussevitzke, will come to New London for the season's final concert in the Connecticut College series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
MAR 5 1927

ing from a serious disease.

Chaplin Attends Boston Concert

BOSTON, March 4 (United Press)—Charlie Chaplin, whose marital affairs have aroused the interest of the nation, planned to return to New York today after a brief visit

Boston.

While here the film comedian heard the Boston symphony orchestra play the first performance of a concertino for the harp composed by his friend, Germaine Tailleferre, in private life Mrs. Ralph Barton.

Accompanied by Mrs. Barton and Mr. and Mrs. Daniel A. De Menocal, at whose home he spent the night, Chaplin entered Sanders theatre unannounced. His identity did not long remain secret, however. A doorman recognized the actor and asked:

"May I shake hands with you Mr. Chaplin?"

"Certainly, I am glad to know you," the comedian replied.

Chaplin left the theatre immediately after the concert, declining to discuss with the press the divorce action of his wife, Lita Grey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAR5 1927

Boston Symphony to Hold Beethoven Celebration

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will hold a Beethoven centenary celebration on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29 at Symphony Hall, Boston, when all the composer's nine symphonies will be played. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solennis" and the Great Mass. It is reported in Boston that Ernest Newman of The London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton will be soloists on this occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR5 192

Chorus Will Aid Symphony Tonight

Tonight Westinghouse Stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also Stations WJZ in New York city, will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

An unusual programme has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of two numbers, the programme is made of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangements heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled, "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the programme includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, and the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programmes heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 5 - 1927

THURSDAY evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" ("They Are Seven!") for tenor, chorus and orchestra, will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert. These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music of the Russian composer, which has been introduced to Paris and Boston in recent seasons by Koussevitzky. Other choral numbers to be performed at each concert are Roger Ducasse's Symphonic Poem "Sarabande" and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Orchestral numbers to introduce the Thursday program are Weber's "Oberon" overture and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the arrangement which Maurice Ravel has especially made for Koussevitzky.

On the Saturday program, in addition to the choral music, Ottorino Respighi's "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") will have its first New York performance. This score was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston two weeks ago. It is a series of four "Impressions" entitled the Flight Into Egypt, Saint Michael Archangel: the Matin of Saint Claire Saint Gregory the Great.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DEL.
MAR 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT FROM WJZ

Three of the National Broadcasting Company's blue network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA will broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8.1 o'clock. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitskey and will open in Symphony Hall, Boston. One of the feature of this concert will be the explanation interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to b rendered by the orchestra and the composers. This material will b furnished for the benefit of the radi audience only, by Professor John Marshall, head of the music depar ments of Boston University and Holy Cross College and will occupy ab 15 minutes time immediately prec ing the opening of the concert a the entire period during the int mission. Professor Marshall v formerly organist with the Bost Symphony Orchestra and during World War was the assistant dir tor of camp music of the Uni States Army, having assumed post at the head of the music partments of the two New Engla colleges since the signing of armistice. His background and m sical education fits him ideally the work which he is doing for listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 5 - 1927

UNUSUAL PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A program of unusual interest, replete with great brilliance and beauty, is announced for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven under its celebrated Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, March 9.

A feature of the program will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Two other noted musicians have scored for orchestra this humorous and whole charming suite of piano pieces by the great Russian composer. Maurice Ravel made this orchestration especially for Koussevitzky and since he is probably the most skilful, delicate and fanciful orchestrator living, it is not surpris-music were conceived—not for the piano but for a full orchestra.

Koussevitzky introduced this score in London and Paris with great success. It has been a feature of his concerts in Boston and New York, and in the latter city he will give another performance of it this week.

The little pieces to be played are characteristic of Moussorgsky, who had a knack of describing in a song or a piano piece little incidents of life about him. Sometimes he showed an excellent sense of humor. Almost always his musical characterization was perfect.

A dear friend of Moussorgsky was the artist, Hartmann, and when after his death there was an exhibition of his paintings, the composer wrote this suite of piano pieces describing the pictures he liked best. In the music, a "promenade" leads us from one picture to the next—we may suppose it to be Moussorgsky wandering about the gallery, looking eagerly as a picture, and then pausing to muse over the memory of his friend.

The pictures are as follows—"Gnome," "Tuileries" (children playing about under the eye of their nurse), "Bydlo" (A Polish ox cart), "Ballet of the Chicks in their shells" (a sketch for a ballet), Samuel Goldenberg and Peter Schmuyle (Two Jews, having an argument), "Limoges" (a market place), Catacombs (showing skulls, "illuminated gently from the interior"), "The Hut on Fowl's Legs" (from a Russian fairy tale), "The Gate at Kiev" (a massive closing number).

Of all the music that Brahms ever wrote probably none equals his Second Symphony in sheer lyric lovliness. This most melodious of his four symphonies was thus described by Hanslick after the first performence: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to meditative seriousness. If the thematic development in the second symphony appears less remarkable than that in the first, the themes themselves seem more flowing, more spontaneous, and their development seems more natural, more pellucid, and therefore more effective. We cannot, therefore, proclaim too loudly our joy that Brahms, after he had given intense expression in his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MAR5 1927

RADIO FEATURES

Three of the National Broadcasting Company's Blue Network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA, will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at 8:10 tonight. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony hall, Boston. One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only, by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College and will occupy about 15 minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission.

The Balkite Hour this evening will

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 5 - 1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT WOOLSEY HALL MARCH 9

HENRY ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1927

TO-NIGHT WBZ, WBZA, KDKA and WJZ, will join in broadcasting the eighteenth concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An unusual and unique program has been arranged for to-night's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Pictures from the opera "The Legend of the invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire-Rider" by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the finale to the opera "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Professor John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills" for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia." ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(Prelude; Hymn to Nature; Bridal Procession; the invasion of the Tartars; the Battle of Kerjenetz.)
"Sept, ils cont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30 ..... Prokofieff

THIS CLIPPING FROM W YORK JO
MAR 5-
NEXT WEE
THE CONC
HALL

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 5 - 1927

Choral Selections Included in Boston Symphony Concert

Broadcast from Boston Tonight Will Feature Prominent Work of Rimsky Korsakov.

Tonight stations WBZ, KDKA and WJZ will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of Boston. An unusual and unique program has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore. The Cecilia Choral Society will assist the orchestra.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the Finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius, Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices, Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra, Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54, Brahms
Intermission.
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia," Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude. Hymn to Nature.
Bridal Procession. The Invasion of the Tartars.
The Battle of Kerjenetz.
"Sept, ils cont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30, Prokofieff
Finale of the opera, "A Life for the Czar," for chorus and orchestra, Glinka

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
MAR5 1927

Boston Symphony Here on April 4

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excell the centenary festival to be goven in Symphony hall, Boston, March 22 to 29 inclusive.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzke, conductor, will perform all of the nine symphonies, the great Missa Solennis, and there will also be included chamber music, and commemorative addresses.

Monday, April 4, the complete orches with Mr. Koussevitzke, will come to New London for the season's final concert in the Connecticut College series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
MAR 5 1927

ing from a serious disease.

Chaplin Attends Boston Concert

BOSTON, March 4 (United Press)—Charlie Chaplin, whose marital affairs have aroused the interest of the nation, planned to return to New York today after a brief visit

Boston.

While here the film comedian heard the Boston symphony orchestra play the first performance of a concertino for the harp composed by his friend, Germaine Tailleferre, in private life Mrs. Ralph Barton.

Accompanied by Mrs. Barton and Mr. and Mrs. Daniel A. De Menocal, at whose home he spent the night, Chaplin entered Sanders theatre unannounced. His identity did not long remain secret, however. A doorman recognized the actor and asked:

"May I shake hands with you Mr. Chaplin?"

"Certainly, I am glad to know you," the comedian replied.

Chaplin left the theatre immediately after the concert, declining to discuss with the press the divorce action of his wife, Lita Grey.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Worcester
MAR5 1927

ton Symphony to Hold Beethoven Celebration

he Boston Symphony Orchestra, the baton of Serge Koussevitwill hold a Beethoven centenary ation on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 8 and 29 at Symphony Hall, on, when all the composer's nine phonies will be played. In the nth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solennis" and the Great Mass. It is reported in Boston that Ernest Newman of The London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton will be soloists on this occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR5 192

Chorus Will Aid Symphony Tonight

Tonight Westinghouse Stations WBZ, WBZA and KDKA, also Stations WJZ in New York city, will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

An unusual programme has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of two numbers, the programme is made of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangements heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled, "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the programme includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, and the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programmes heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 5 - 1927

THURSDAY evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" ("They Are Seven!") for tenor, chorus and orchestra, will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert. These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music of the Russian composer, which has been introduced to Paris and Boston in recent seasons by Koussevitzky. Other choral numbers to be performed at each concert are Roger Ducasse's Symphonic Poem "Sarabande" and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Orchestral numbers to introduce the Thursday program are Weber's "Oberon" overture and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the arrangement which Maurice Ravel has especially made for Koussevitzky.

On the Saturday program, in addition to the choral music, Ottorino Respighi's "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") will have its first New York performance. This score was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston two weeks ago. It is a series of four "Impressions" entitled the Flight Into Egypt, Saint Michael Archangel; the Matin of Saint Claire Saint Gregory the Great.

JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DEL.
MAR 5 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT FROM WJZ

Three of the National Broadcasting Company's blue network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA will broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8.10 o'clock. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitskey and will open in Symphony Hall, Boston. One of the features of this concert will be the explanation interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only, by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College and will occupy about 15 minutes time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission. Professor Marshall was formerly organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the World War was the assistant director of camp music of the United States Army, having assumed that post at the head of the music departments of the two New England colleges since the signing of the armistice. His background and musical education fits him ideally for the work which he is doing for the listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 5 - 1927

UNUSUAL PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A program of unusual interest, replete with great brilliance and beauty, is announced for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven under its celebrated Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will take place in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, March 9.

A feature of the program will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Two other noted musicians have scored for orchestra this humorous and whole charming suite of piano pieces by the great Russian composer. Maurice Ravel made this orchestration especially for Koussevitzky and since he is probably the most skilful, delicate and fanciful orchestrator living, it is not surpris-music were conceived—not for the piano but for a full orchestra.

Koussevitzky introduced this score in London and Paris with great success. It has been a feature of his concerts in Boston and New York, and in the latter city he will give another performance of it this week.

The little pieces to be played are characteristic of Moussorgsky, who had a knack of describing in a song or a piano piece little incidents of life about him. Sometimes he showed an excellent sense of humor. Almost always his musical characterization was perfect.

A dear friend of Moussorgsky was the artist, Hartmann, and when after his death there was an exhibition of his paintings, the composer wrote this suite of piano pieces describing the pictures he liked best. In the music, a "promenade" leads us from one picture to the next—we may suppose it to be Moussorgsky wandering about the gallery, looking eagerly as a picture, and then pausing to muse over the memory of his friend.

The pictures are as follows—"Gnome," "Tuileries" (children playing about under the eye of their nurse), "Bydlo" (A Polish ox cart), "Ballet of the Chicks in their shells" (a sketch for a ballet), Samuel Goldenberg and Peter Schmuyle (Two Jews, having an argument), "Limoges" (a market place), Catacombs (showing skulls, "illuminated gently from the interior"), "The Hut on Fowl's Legs" (from a Russian fairy tale), "The Gate at Kiev" (a massive closing number).

Of all the music that Brahms ever wrote probably none equals his Second Symphony in sheer lyric lovliness. This most melodious of his four symphonies was thus described by Hanslick after the first performence: "The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which on the one side is quickened to joyous humor and on the other is deepened to meditative seriousness. If the thematic development in the second symphony appears less remarkable than that in the first, the themes themselves seem more flowing, more spontaneous, and their development seems more natural, more pellucid, and therefore more effective. We cannot, therefore, proclaim too loudly our joy that Brahms, after he had given intense expression in his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MAR5 1927

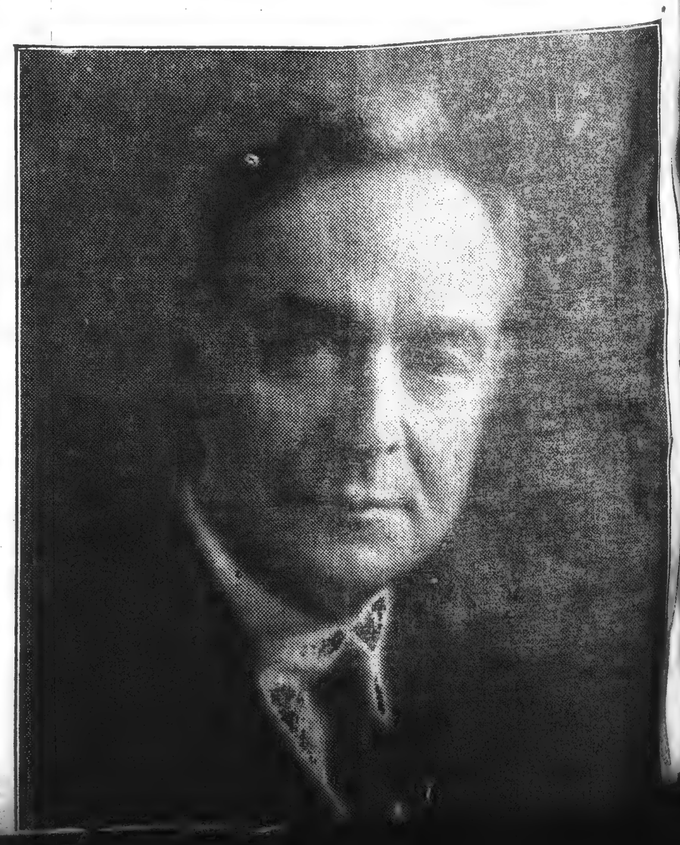
RADIO FEATURES

Three of the National Broadcasting Company's Blue Network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA, will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at 8:10 tonight. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony hall, Boston. One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers. This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience by Prof. John P. Marshall, of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College and will occupy about 15 minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermis-

Balkite Hour this evening

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 5 - 1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT WOOLSEY HALL MARCH 9



HENRY ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1927

TO-NIGHT WBZ, WBZA, KDKA and WJZ, will join in broadcasting the eighteenth concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An unusual and unique program has been arranged for to-night's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire-Rider" by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the finale to the opera "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Professor John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills" for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), chorus and orchestra .....
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms
Intermission.
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia" .....
.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
(Prelude; Hymn to Nature; Bridal Procession; the invasion of the Tartars.)
The Battle of Kerjenetz.)
"Sept, ils cont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. ..... Prokofieff

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK JOU
MAR 5 - 1927

NEXT WEE
THE CONC
HALL

ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1927

TO-NIGHT WBZ, WBZA, KDKA and WJZ will join in broadcasting the eighteenth concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An unusual and unique program has been arranged for to-night's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecilia society, Malcolm Lang, conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Thenfollows Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Pictures from the opera "The Legend of the invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire-Rider" by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills" by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" by Prokofieff, and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the finale to the opera "A Life for the Czar" by Glinka.

Professor John Patton Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius ..... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills" for orchestra and voices ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54 ..... Brahms
Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
(Prelude; Hymn to Nature; Bridal Procession; the invasion of the Tartars; the battle of Kerjenetz.)
"Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30 ..... Prokofieff

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 5 - 1927

Choral Selections Included in Boston Symphony Concert

Broadcast from Boston Tonight Will Feature Prominent Work of Rimsky Korsakov.

Tonight stations WBZ, KDKA and WJZ will join in broadcasting the 18th concert of the 1926-27 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of Boston. An unusual and unique program has been arranged for tonight's concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore. The Cecilia Choral Society will assist the orchestra.

The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C. Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms' greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf, "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the finale to the opera, "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give interesting information regarding the composer's treatment of it. These choral numbers present one of the most interesting and unusual programs heard in Symphony Hall for many seasons.

The complete program follows:

Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius, ... Langendoen
"The Song of the High Hills," for orchestra and voices. ..... Delius
"Der Feuereiter" (The Fire-Rider), for chorus and orchestra. ..... Wolf
"Ein Schicksalslied" (A Song of Destiny), for chorus and orchestra, Op. 54, ... Brahms

Intermission.

Tone pictures from the opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitej and the Virgin Fevronia." ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude; Hymn to Nature, Bridal Procession, The Invasion of the Tartars, The Battle of Kerjenetz.
"Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra, Op. 30, ... Prokofieff
Finale of the opera, "A Life for the Czar," for chorus and orchestra. ..... Glinka

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK JOURNAL
MAR 5 - 1927

NEXT WEEK IN THE CONCERT HALLS

An orchestra conductor new to the town will make his debut next week. He is Fritz Busch, and he comes as guest to direct the New York Symphony. His first concert takes place on Thursday afternoon, his programme being this piece of conservatism: Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Reger's variations on a theme of Mozart and the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony. His regular job is directing the Dresden Opera.

Leopold Stokowski, for the next concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Tuesday, will be less conservative. He will introduce a concertino for solo strings, horn, harp, "octavina," "guitarre" and orchestra by a Mexican named Carillo, who has been dabbling in divided tones, for which this piece is written. The octavina and guitarre, so-called, are inventions of the composer and produce eighth and sixteenth tones. There will also be a passacaglia by Anton von Webern, the Debussy "Nuages" and "Fetes" and the overture and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."

The Boston Orchestra, on Thursday and Saturday, brings the St. Cecilia chorus with it for first performances of Serge Prokofieff's "Seven, They Are Seven!" and Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande." Octorino Respigli's new "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") will also have a first performance at the Saturday concert.

Others of the more notable concerts of the week include those of the London String Quartet, which plays the whole sixteen quartets of Beethoven on consecutive days; the Friends of Music, presenting Bach's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MAR 5 - 1927

LAST season we heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra three times, only one of which, however, was a public concert. This season the organization has not visited Philadelphia and there has been, thus far, no announcement of a concert here. And yet, this is one of the great orchestras of the East and should surely visit Philadelphia at least two or three times in the course of each season.

The Chicago Orchestra has not been here for years, and other Western orchestral organizations which tour the East are rarely heard. The Cleveland Orchestra has never played a public concert here nor has that of Detroit. Although the Philadelphia Forum brought the latter organization here early in the present season. The orchestras from the cities farther West have never been here with the exception of one concert by the Minneapolis Orchestra a number of years ago.

Even as it is, Philadelphia hears a greater number of out-of-town orchestras than any other city of the country except New York, but since the cancellation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series some years ago, we get only two visiting orchestras, both from New York, with occasionally a semiprivate concert such as the Forum or the local Philharmonic Society from one of the other large orchestras. Judging from the attendance at most of these visiting orchestra concerts, there would seem to be a field along these lines for the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
MAR 5 - 1927

Boston Symphony on Air To-night

THE eighteenth concert of the 1926-1927 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard through WJZ this evening.

An unusual program has been arranged for this concert, for with the exception of the first two numbers, the program is made up of selections for chorus and orchestra, departing from the straight instrumental arrangement heard generally heretofore and presenting the Cecelia Society, Malcolm Lang conductor. The concert begins with a composition by one of the members of the Boston Symphony, J. C Langendoen, entitled "Variations on a Dutch Theme of Adrianus Valerius." Then follows Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pictures from the opera "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kite and the Virgin Fevronia." The choral portion of the program includes the "Song of Destiny," one of Brahms's greatest choral works, "The Fire Rider," by Hugo Wolf; "The Song of the High Hills," by Delius; "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," by Prokofieff and in which the eminent tenor soloist, Charles Stratton, will be heard, the finale to the opera "A Life for the Czar," by Glinka.

Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will as usual familiarize the radio audience with the themes of the instrumental numbers, and in discussing the choral works will read the text and give

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 5 - 1927

THREE of the National Broadcasting Company's blue network stations, WJZ, WBZ and KDKA, will broadcast the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8.10 o'clock tonight. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and will open in Symphony Hall, Boston. One of the features of this concert will be the explanation, interpretation and interesting facts regarding the selections to be rendered by the orchestra and their composers.

This material will be furnished for the benefit of the radio audience only by Prof. John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College, and will occupy about 15 minutes' time immediately preceding the opening of the concert and the entire period during the intermission.

Professor Marshall was formerly organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and during the World War was the assistant director of camp music of the United States Army, having assumed his post at the head of the music departments of the two New England colleges since the signing of the armistice. His background and musical education fit him ideally for the work which he is doing for the listening audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony in Beethoven Tribute

BOSTON, March 5.—Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary festival to be given in Symphony hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London string quartet and the Lenox string quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

Ernest Newman, of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven, as a part of the festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZANESVILLE, OHIO
TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

PLAY NINE SYMPHONIES IN BEETHOVEN FEAST

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solennis" and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman of The London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performer by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette, Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
MAR 6 - 1927

Musical Tribute to Beethoven Planned

Of the musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 22 to 29, inclusive.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzke, conductor, will perform all of the nine symphonies, the great "Missa Solennis," and there will also be included chamber music, and commemorative addresses.

Monday, April 4, the complete orchestra with Mr. Koussevitzke will be in New London for the season's final concert in the Connecticut College series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.
MAR 6 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the 100th anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the centenary festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London string quartet and the Lenox string quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

Ernest Newman of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven, as a part of the festival.

The order of programs will be as follows:

Tuesday, March 22—Missa Solennis.
Wednesday, March 23—Symphonies 1, 2 and 3.
Thursday, March 24—Chamber music (Carl Friedberg and London String Quartet).
Friday, March 25—Symphonies 4 and 5.
Saturday, March 26—Symphonies 6 and 7.
Monday, March 28—Commemorative exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, and concluding with the last quartet.
Tuesday, March 29—Eighth and Ninth (Choral) Symphonies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 6 - 1927

An Ear for Music

By A. H. S.

THE appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, March 9, at Woolsey Hall is the outstanding musical event of the coming week. The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:15 P. M.

The splendid organization needs no introduction to New Haven music-lovers and patrons of the "finer arts." It would be difficult indeed to find an orchestra which has a greater following and which has succeeded in living up to the ideal sand traditions which the founder, Mr. Higginson demanded, in every detail. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized today as being one of the finest trained symphonic organizations in the world.

On the program for Wednesday evening Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is presenting a Suite by Mousorgsky entitled "Pictures at an Exhibition." Written originally for the pianoforte it has been transcribed for orchestra by no less a celebrity than Maurice Ravel.

It was at the suggestion of Mr. Koussevitzky that Ravel undertook to orchestrate the suite which Moussorgsky wrote as a tribute to a great artist who had been a life-long friend of his, and whose drawings and water-colors has been placed on exhibition shortly after the artists' death. So impressed was Moussorgsky with his friend's art that he decided to 'drawing music' the best of the sketches. The result was the "Suite" which will be of partcular interest to music lovers on Wednesday evening.

The program in full is as follows: Weber, Overture "Oberon;" Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Moussorgsky, Pictures at an exhibition (arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel); Brahms, Symphony 2 in D major; (1) Allegro non troppo; (2), Adagnio non troppo; (3) Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino; (4), Allegro con spirito.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL
MAR6_1927

Ottorino Respighi's newest composition, Stained Glass Windows, a symphonic poem suggested by angelic or saintly figures seen across a cathedral, and consequently mystic in character, will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week.

Cyril Scott is busy writing a symphonic poem which will be called Disaster at Sea.

Henry Rabaud is setting to music a cinema film.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
MAR 6 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY WEDNESDAY AT WOOLSEY HALL.

A program of unusual interest, replete with great brilliance and beauty, is announced for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven under its celebrated Russian leader, Serge Koussevitsky. The concert will be in Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening, March 9.

A feature of the program will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Two other noted musicians have scored for orchestra this numerous and whole ch[illegible] sure

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
MAR 6 - 1927

108

Boston Orchestra Gives Concert in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky will make their last visit of the season to Brooklyn for a concert in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, March 11.

A feature of this concert will be three choral numbers in which the orchestra will combine with the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston, which is journeying to New York and Brooklyn for this week's symphony concerts.

The choral numbers will be a Sarabande by Roger Ducasse, "Der Feuereiter" ("The Fire-Rider") by Hugo Wolf, an arrangement of this composer's dramatic song, and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's Opera, "Prince Igor."

The symphony of the evening will be the second of Brahms in D major, popular as one of this master's most melodious scores. The introductory number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's tone poem, "Sadko."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
MAR 6 - 1927

Beethoven Centen... Celebrated E... Boston Sym...

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony, the Orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the Master's great Mass.

Quartet will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

...ary to Be ...laborately by ...phony Orchestra

Ernest Newman, of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven, as a part of the Festival.

The order of programmes will be as follows:—

Tuesday, March 22 — Missa Solennis.

Wednesday, March 23—Symphonies 1, 2 and 3.

Thursday, March 24—Chamber Music (Carl Friedberg and London String Quartet).

Friday, March 25.—Symphonies 4 and 5.

Saturday, March 26—Symphonies 6 and 7.

Monday, March 28—Commemorative Exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, and concluding with the last quartet.

Tuesday, March 29—8th and 9th (Choral) Symphonies.

THI CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
MAR 6 - 1927

Following her various performances of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony this season, Nevada Van de Veer has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another performance of the work on March 29 in Boston, thus making five major symphony orchestras that are employing the services of the popular contralto this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 6 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussewitsky, gives the fourth of its Brooklyn concerts this Friday evening at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Institute. The program announced is:

Rimsky-Korsakow .....“Sadko”
Wolf.....“Der Feuerreiter”
Roger-Ducasse .....Sarabande
Brahms.....Second Symphony
Borodin.....Dances from “Prince Igor”

A feature of this concert will be the singing of the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston in the works by Roger-Ducasse, Wolf and Borodin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
MAR 6 - 1927

Beethoven Festival by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world on March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Ded Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Chas. Stratton and Fred Patton.

Ernest Newman, of London, [illegible] most writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven as a part of the festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
MAR 6 - 1927

Last Pair of Concerts

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, “Sept, ils sont sept!” (“They Are Seven!”) for tenor, chorus and orchestra, will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert.

These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music of the Russian composer, which has been introduced to Paris and Boston in recent seasons by Koussevitzky. Other choral numbers to be performed at each concert are Roger Ducasse's Symphonic Poem Sarabande and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's “Prince Igor.” Orchestral numbers to introduce the Thursday program are Weber's “Oberon” overture and Moussorgsky's “Pictures at an Exhibition” in the arrangement which Maurice Ravel has especially made for Koussevitzky.

On the Saturday program, in addition to the choral music, Ottorino Respighi's “Vetrate di Chiesa” (“Church Windows”) will have its first New York performance. This score was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston two weeks ago. It is a series of four “Impressions” entitled “The Flight Into Egypt,” “Saint Michael, Archangel,” “The Matin of Saint Claire,” “Saint Gregory the Great.”

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 6 - 1927

ASSISTED by the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston, Malcolm Lang, conductor, and Charles Stratton, tenor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of New York concerts in Carnegie Hall this week. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. The Thursday evening program is as follows:

Weber.....Overture to “Oberon”
Moussorgsky....Pictures at an Exhibition
Prokofieff.....“Sept, ils sont sept!”
Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra
Ducasse .....Sarabande
Prokofieff.....
Repetition of “Sept, ils sont sept!”
Borodin.....Dances from “Prince Igor”

The Prokofieff work on this program is new to New York. It is a setting of a poem by the Russian, Constantin Balmont, inspired by an inscription found on the wall of an Akkadian temple, in the region of Babylon and intended as an incantation against seven demons.

Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct the following program on Saturday afternoon:

Rimsky-Korsakow .....“Sadko”
Respighi.....
“Church Windows,” Impressions for Orchestra.
Ducasse .....Sarabande
Prokofieff.....“Sept, ils sont Sept!”
Borodin.....Dances from “Prince Igor”

A novelty also appears on this program: the Respighi suite, which Mr. Koussewitsky recently introduced to Boston. It is in four movements titled (1) La fuga in Egitto; (2) San Michele Archangelo; (3) Il Mattutino di Santa Chiara, and (4) San Gregorio Magno.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
MAR 6 - 1927

A soprano voice of beautiful quality, clear, birdlike and true to pitch was heard singing from the stage of Shea's Buffalo Theater last evening. It was announced later that this songbird was Melba Moore appearing in the Publix Revue at this theater. An air and variations by Proch and one of the suite from A Day in Venice, by Nevin arranged for voice were exquisitely sung, by this artist. Rudy Weidoeft, the world's premier saxophonist was also heard on this program in several enjoyable numbers among which were Matonetta, Estralita and Rubato, the last by Mayhew Lake.

Over KDKA, Pittsburgh, last night fragments of the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and the Cecelia Society, a choral organization consisting of 109 voices directed by Malcolm Lang, was heard. Remarks of value to music students regarding the works presented were given by Professor John Patton Marshall before the concert began and during the intermissions. Among the orchestral numbers heard was an Old Melody, written in 1622, Variations on an old Dutch theme, Song of Destiny by Brahms and three tone pictures from an opera by Rimsky-Korsakov.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, assisted by the Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m.

Sadko, a Tone Picture, Op. 5, Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. Brahms
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices).....Roger-Ducasse
Der Feuerreiter (The Fire Rider), for chorus and orchestra.....Wolf
Polovtsian Dances from “Prince Igor” Borodin

Saturday

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, assisted by Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

Sadko, a Tone Picture, Op. 5, Rimsky-Korsakoff
Vetrate di Chiesa (Four Impressions), Respighi
(First time in New York.)
Sarabande, for orchestra and voices, Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept, for tenor chorus and orchestra.....Prokofieff
Polovtsian Dances, from “Prince Igor,” Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAR 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn Next Friday Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the last concert but one of the Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. A feature of the programme will be three choral numbers in which the orchestra combines with the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston. The choral numbers are a Sarabande by Ducasse, “The Fire-Rider” by Hugo Wolf and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's “Prince Igor.”

The symphony of the evening will be Brahms' Second. Rimsky-Korsakoff's “Sadko” opens the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

On its fourth New York visit, with concerts Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall this week and Friday night in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony will be assisted by the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang. In all three concerts Serge Koussevitzky will present Serge Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, “Sept, ils sont sept!” for tenor, chorus and orchestra.

The work was composed in Russia in 1917, but, the manuscript remaining there, was not performed until May 29, 1924, when it had its premiere in a concert of Mr. Koussevitzky's annual spring Paris series at the opera. The work was twice performed on that occasion, and also will be given twice on Thursday night. In the program notes for the Paris performance it was stated:

“During the excavations made in Mesopotamia, where the Akkadians, an ancient people, whose history precedes that of the Babylonians, formerly lived, many cureiform inscriptions were found and deciphered. Among these documents was found an inscription on the wall of an Akkadian temple. The inscription represented formulas of incantation against seven horrible demons who, according to Akkadian belief, were the authors of all human woes (the celebrated Assyriologist Winkles often quotes this inscription in his studies).

“The sombre and mystical force of this incantation has more than once inspired the great Russian poet Constantin Balmont, who has written three poems on the same subject. The last of the three, with some modifications, serves in a noteworthy manner this composition of Prokofieff's. The theme of the solo tenor represents a priest conjuring; the chorus, a crowd of fanatical, over-excited believers.”

Other choral numbers to be given in all three concerts are Roger-Ducasse's symphonic poem “Sarabande” and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's “Prince Igor.” Hugo Wolf's “Der Feuerreiter,” for chorus and orchestra, will be heard in Brooklyn and on Saturday in Carnegie Hall.

Respighi's “Vetrate di Chiesa” (Church Windows) will have its first New York performance in the Saturday program. The score was written especially for the Boston Symphony and was first performed in its Boston concerts of February 25-26. It is a series of four “Impressions,” entitled “The Flight Into Egypt,” “St. Michael Archangel,” “The Matin of St. Claire” and “St. Gregory the Great.”

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. Assisted by Charles Stratton, tenor, and the Cecilia Society of Boston.

Invisible City of Kitesh....Rimsky-Korsakov
Hymn to Nature; Invasion of Tartars; Battle of Kerjenetz; Immolation of the Virgin Fevronia.
Suite in F major (new).....Ravel
Sept, Ils Sont Sept (new).....Prokofieff
Sept, Ils Sont Sept.....Ducasse
Sarabande .....Prokofieff
Sept. Ils Sont Sept.....
(Repeated).
Dances, “Prince Igor”.....Borodin

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, assisted by Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

Overture to “Oberon”.....Weber
Pictures at an Exhibition Moussorgsky-Ravel
Suite in F major.....Roussel
First time in New York
Sept, ils sont sept (invocation for tenor, chorus and orchestra) Op. 30 Prokofieff
First time in New York
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices).....Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept (repeated)....Prokofieff
Prolpvstian Dances from “Prince Igor” Borodin

THI CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

Beethoven Week

Boston Has Elaborate Series March 22-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will hold an elaborate celebration in Symphony Hall, Boston, of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death in the week of March 22-29, with the following program:

Tuesday night, March 22—Missa Solemnis in D, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; soloists, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton.

Wednesday night, March 23—Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3.

Thursday night, March 24—London String Quartet and Carl Friedberg, pianist, in trio, quartet and piano sonata.

Friday afternoon, March 25—Symphonies Nos. 4, 5.

Saturday night, March 26—Symphonies Nos. 6, 7.

Monday night, March 28—Testimonial commemorative exercises, including address by Ernest Newman, London critic and writer on music, and performance of the last quartet (Op. 135) by the Lenox String Quartet.

Tuesday night, March 29—Symphonies Nos. 8, 9, with Harvard Glee Club and Radcliff Choral Society; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

The Friday and Saturday concerts are open only to subscribers to the Boston Symphony's regular Friday and Saturday series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, presented Ottorino Respighi's newest manuscript work, “Vertrati di Chiesa,” or “Stained Glass Windows,” Feb. 25-26. The work was composed in 1926, and the score is still in manuscript. The orchestral parts were printed in 1927.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

FROM Boston the Cecilia Chorus is coming to New York this week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its last trip but one for the season. The New England singers will appear in Mr. Koussevitzky's two programs in Manhattan and a third one in Brooklyn. They have trained under Malcolm Lang, son of the veteran B. J. Lang, who many years ago made the voice of the Cecilia Society heard in the land of the older Handel and Haydn.

Prokofieff's “Akkadian Incantation,” after a French text, “Sept, Ils Sont Sept,” somewhat modified from its original by the Russian poet Constantin Balmont, is the “pièce de résistance” among a novel series of ultra-modern and exotic choral works which the same forces have just tried out in Symphony Hall, Boston, as noted in these pages last week.

At Carnegie Hall the Prokofieff earickler will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the same program. It will be performed at the Saturday matinee. These will be the first New York hearings of this “barbarian music” of the Russian composer, which was introduced to Paris also by Koussevitsky.

Respighi's “Vetrate di Chiesa,” cheduled for its first local hearing t the Saturday concert, is an instrumental work written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and produced by he composer in Boston two weeks ago.

N. Y. TIMES MAR 6

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Koussevitzky.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4.....Bach
Church Windows (new).....Respighi
Flight into Egypt; St. Michael; St. Clara; St. Gregory the Great.
Sarabande .....Ducasse
Sept, Ils Sont Sept.....Prokofieff
Dances, Prince Igor.....Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Ottorino Respighi conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own works Feb. 18. Alfredo Casella conducted the accompaniment to the piano concerto, with Respighi at the piano. The other compositions consisted of the second suite of old dances and airs for the lute, the “Belfager” overture, the “Fountains of Rome,” all heard in Boston for the first time, and “Il Tramonte,” for soprano and strings, with Mme. Elsa Respighi as the singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 6 - 1927

Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, “Sept, ils son sept” (“They are Seven!”), for tenor, chorus and orchestra will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert. These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 7 - 1927

REMARKABLE PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A programme of unusual interest, replete with great brilliance and beauty, is announced for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven under its celebrated Russian leader, Serge Koussevitsky. The conecrt will take place in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening, March 9th.

A feature of the programme will be Moussorgsky's “Pictures at an Exhibition”. Two other noted musicians have scored for orchestra this humorous and whole charming suite of piano pieces by the great Russian composer. Maurice Ravel made this orchestration especially for Koussevitsky and since he is probably the most skilful, delicate, and fanciful orchestrator liing, it is not surprising that this version sounds as if the music were conceived—not for the piano but for a full orchestra.

The little pieces to be played are characteristic of Moussorgsky, who had a knack of describing in a song or a piano pie ce little incidents of life about him. Sometimes he showed an excellent sense of humor. Almost always his musical characterization was perfect.

In the music, a “promenade” leads us from one picture to the next—we may suppose it to be Moussorgsky wandering about the gallery, looking eagerly at a picture, and then pausing to muse over the memory of his friend.

The pictures are as follows—“Gnome”; “Tuileries” (Children playing about under the eye of their nurses); “Bydlo” (A Polish ox Cart); “Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells” (A sketch for a ballet); Samuel Goldenberg and Peter Schmuyle (Two Jews, having an argument); “Limoges” (A Market Palce); Catacombs (showing skulls, “illuminated gently from the interior”); “The Hut on Fowl's Legs” (From a Russian Fairy Tale); The Gate at Kiev (A massive closing number).

The programme will open with Weber's Overture to his fairy opera, “Oberon”. Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures crystallizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing. The “Oberon” Overture, with its high brilliance and its songful and lovely melodies, is in keeping with Oberon's Magic Kingdom, and the ramantic nature of the composer himself.

Still another prime feature of the program will be Wangner's prelude to Lohengrin, which is listed as the second number of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 6 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussewitsky, gives the fourth of its Brooklyn concerts this Friday evening at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Institute. The program announced is:

Rimsky-Korsakow ..... "Sadko"
Wolf ..... "Der Feuerreiter"
Roger-Ducasse ..... Sarabande
Brahms ..... Second Symphony
Borodin ..... Dances from "Prince Igor"

A feature of this concert will be the singing of the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston in the works by Roger-Ducasse, Wolf and Borodin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
MAR 6 - 1927

Beethoven Festival by Boston Symphony Orchestra

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world on March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week.

All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solennis, the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Ded Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Chas. Stratton and Fred Patton.

Ernest Newman, of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven as a part of the festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
MAR 6 - 1927

Last Pair of Concerts

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" ("They Are Seven!") for tenor, chorus and orchestra, will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert.

These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music of the Russian composer, which has been introduced to Paris and Boston in recent seasons by Koussevitzky. Other choral numbers to be performed at each concert are Roger Ducasse's Symphonic Poem Sarabande and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Orchestral numbers to introduce the Thursday program are Weber's "Oberon" overture and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the arrangement which Maurice Ravel has especially made for Koussevitzky.

On the Saturday program, in addition to the choral music, Ottorino Respighi's "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") will have its first New York performance. This score was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and had its first performance in Boston two weeks ago. It is a series of four "Impressions" entitled "The Flight Into Egypt," "Saint Michael, Archangel," "The Matin of Saint Claire," "Saint Gregory the Great."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 6 - 1927

ASSISTED by the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston, Malcolm Lang, conductor, and Charles Stratton, tenor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of New York concerts in Carnegie Hall this week. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. The Thursday evening program is as follows:

Weber ..... Overture to "Oberon"
Moussorgsky ..... Pictures at an Exhibition
Prokofieff ..... "Sept, ils sont sept!"
Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra
Ducasse ..... Sarabande
Prokofieff .....
Repetition of "Sept, ils sont sept!"
Borodin ..... Dances from "Prince Igor"

The Prokofieff work on this program is new to New York. It is a setting of a poem by the Russian, Constantin Balmont, inspired by an inscription found on the wall of an Akkadian temple, in the region of Babylon and intended as an incantation against seven demons.

Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct the following program on Saturday afternoon:

Rimsky-Korsakow ..... "Sadko"
Respighi .....
"Church Windows," Impressions for Orchestra.
Ducasse ..... Sarabande
Prokofieff ..... "Sept, ils sont Sept!"
Borodin ..... Dances from "Prince Igor"

A novelty also appears on this program: the Respighi suite, which Mr. Koussewitsky recently introduced to Boston. It is in four movements titled (1) La fuga in Egitto; (2) San Michele Archangelo; (3) Il Mattutino di Santa Chiara, and (4) San Gregorio Magno.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
MAR 6 - 1927

A soprano voice of beautiful quality, clear, birdlike and true to pitch was heard singing from the stage of Shea's Buffalo Theater last evening. It was announced later that this songbird was Melba Moore appearing in the Publix Revue at this theater. An air and variations by Proch and one of the suite from A Day in Venice, by Nevin arranged for voice were exquisitely sung, by this artist. Rudy Weidoeft, the world's premier saxophonist was also heard on this program in several enjoyable numbers among which were Matonetta, Estralita and Rubato, the last by Mayhew Lake.

Over KDKA, Pittsburgh, last night fragments of the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and the Cecelia Society, a choral organization consisting of 109 voices directed by Malcolm Lang, was heard. Remarks of value to music students regarding the works presented were given by Professor John Patton Marshall before the concert began and during the intermissions. Among the orchestral numbers heard was an Old Melody, written in 1622, Variations on an old Dutch theme, Song of Destiny by Brahms and three tone pictures from an opera by Rimsky-Korsakov.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, assisted by the Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m.

Sadko, a Tone Picture, Op. 5, Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. Brahms
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices) ..... Roger-Ducasse
Der Feuerreiter (The Fire Rider), for chorus and orchestra ..... Wolf
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin

Saturday

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, assisted by Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

Sadko, a Tone Picture, Op. 5, Rimsky-Korsakoff
Vetrate di Chiesa (Four Impressions), Respighi
(First time in New York.)
Sarabande, for orchestra and voices, Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept, for tenor chorus and orchestra ..... Prokofieff
Polovtsian Dances, from "Prince Igor," Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAR 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn Next Friday Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the last concert but one of the Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. A feature of the programme will be three choral numbers in which the orchestra combines with the mixed chorus of the Cecelia Society of Boston. The choral numbers are a Sarabande by Ducasse, "The Fire-Rider" by Hugo Wolf and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

The symphony of the evening will be Brahms' Second. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" opens the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

On its fourth New York visit, with concerts Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall this week and Friday night in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony will be assisted by the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang. In all three concerts Serge Koussevitzky will present Serge Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" for tenor, chorus and orchestra.

The work was composed in Russia in 1917, but, the manuscript remaining there, was not performed until May 29, 1924, when it had its premiere in a concert of Mr. Koussevitzky's annual spring Paris series at the opera. The work was twice performed on that occasion, and also will be given twice on Thursday night. In the program notes for the Paris performance it was stated:

"During the excavations made in Mesopotamia, where the Akkadians, an ancient people, whose history precedes that of the Babylonians, formerly lived, many cureiform inscriptions were found and deciphered. Among these documents was found an inscription on the wall of an Akkadian temple. The inscription represented formulas of incantation against seven horrible demons who, according to Akkadian belief, were the authors of all human woes (the celebrated Assyriologist Winkles often quotes this inscription in his studies).

"The sombre and mystical force of this incantation has more than once inspired the great Russian poet Constantin Balmont, who has written three poems on the same subject. The last of the three, with some modifications, serves in a noteworthy manner this composition of Prokofieff's. The theme of the solo tenor represents a priest conjuring; the chorus, a crowd of fanatical, over-excited believers."

Other choral numbers to be given in all three concerts are Roger-Ducasse's symphonic poem "Sarabande" and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Hugo Wolf's "Der Feuerreiter," for chorus and orchestra, will be heard in Brooklyn and on Saturday in Carnegie Hall.

Respighi's "Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows) will have its first New York performance in the Saturday program. The score was written especially for the Boston Symphony and was first performed in its Boston concerts of February 25-26. It is a series of four "Impressions," entitled "The Flight Into Egypt," "St. Michael Archangel," "The Matin of St. Claire" and "St. Gregory the Great."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Assisted by Charles Stratton, tenor, and the Cecilia Society of Boston.

Invisible City of Kitesh ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Hymn to Nature; Invasion of Tartars; Battle of Kerjenetz; Immolation of the Virgin Fevronia.
Suite in F major (new) ..... Ravel
Sept, Ils Sont Sept (new) ..... Prokofieff
Sarabande ..... Ducasse
Sept. Ils Sont Sept ..... Prokofieff
(Repeated).
Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, assisted by Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Pictures at an Exhibition ..... Moussorgsky-Ravel
Suite in F major ..... Roussel
First time in New York
Sept, ils sont sept (invocation for tenor, chorus and orchestra) Op. 30 Prokofieff
First time in New York
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices) ..... Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept (repeated) ..... Prokofieff
Prolovstian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 6 - 1927

Beethoven Week

Boston Has Elaborate Series March 22-29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will hold an elaborate celebration in Symphony Hall, Boston, of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death in the week of March 22-29, with the following program:

Tuesday night, March 22—Missa Solemnis in D, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; soloists, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton.

Wednesday night, March 23—Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 3.

Thursday night, March 24—London String Quartet and Carl Friedberg, pianist, in trio, quartet and piano sonata.

Friday afternoon, March 25—Symphonies Nos. 4, 5.

Saturday night, March 26—Symphonies Nos. 6, 7.

Monday night, March 28—Testimonial commemorative exercises, including address by Ernest Newman, London critic and writer on music, and performance of the last quartet (Op. 135) by the Lenox String Quartet.

Tuesday night, March 29—Symphonies Nos. 8, 9, with Harvard Glee Club and Radcliff Choral Society; soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

The Friday and Saturday concerts are open only to subscribers to the Boston Symphony's regular Friday and Saturday series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, presented Ottorino Respighi's newest manuscript work, "Vertrati di Chiesa," or "Stained Glass Windows," Feb. 25-26. The work was composed in 1926, and the score is still in manuscript. The orchestral parts were printed in 1927.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

FROM Boston the Cecilia Chorus is coming to New York this week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its last trip but one for the season. The New England singers will appear in Mr. Koussevitzky's two programs in Manhattan and a third one in Brooklyn. They have trained under Malcolm Lang, son of the veteran B. J. Lang, who many years ago made the voice of the Cecilia Society heard in the land of the older Handel and Haydn.

Prokofieff's "Akkadian Incantation," after a French text, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," somewhat modified from its original by the Russian poet Constantin Balmont, is the "pièce de résistance" among a novel series of ultra-modern and exotic choral works which the same forces have just tried out in Symphony Hall, Boston, as noted in these pages last week.

At Carnegie Hall the Prokofieff ear-tickler will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the same program. It will be performed at the Saturday matinee. These will be the first New York hearings of this "barbarian music" of the Russian composer, which was introduced to Paris also by Koussevitsky.

Respighi's "Vetrate di Chiesa," scheduled for its first local hearing at the Saturday concert, is an instrumental work written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and produced by the composer in Boston two weeks ago.

N.Y. TIMES MAR 6

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Koussevitzky.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 ..... Bach
Church Windows (new) ..... Respighi
Flight into Egypt; St. Michael; St. Clara; St. Gregory the Great.
Sarabande ..... Ducasse
Sept, Ils Sont Sept ..... Prokofieff
Dances, Prince Igor ..... Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

Ottorino Respighi conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own works Feb. 18. Alfredo Casella conducted the accompaniment to the piano concerto, with Respighi at the piano. The other compositions consisted of the second suite of old dances and airs for the lute, the "Belfager" overture, the "Fountains of Rome," all heard in Boston for the first time, and "Il Tramonte," for soprano and strings, with Mme. Elsa Respighi as the singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 6 - 1927

later.

Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last pair of concerts but one of the New York season. Features of both concerts will be numbers for chorus and orchestra, in which the Cecilia Society of Boston, trained by Malcolm Lang, will assist. Prokofieff's Akkadian Incantation. "Sept, ils son sept" ("They are Seven!"), for tenor, chorus and orchestra will be performed at the Thursday concert and repeated in the latter part of the program. It will also be performed at the Saturday concert. These will be the first New York hearings of this barbarian music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 1927

REMARKABLE PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

A programme of unusual interest, replete with great brilliance and beauty, is announced for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven under its celebrated Russian leader, Serge Koussevitsky. The concert will take place in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening, March 9th.

A feature of the programme will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition". Two other noted musicians have scored for orchestra this humorous and whole charming suite of piano pieces by the great Russian composer. Maurice Ravel made this orchestration especially for Koussevitsky and since he is probably the most skilful, delicate, and fanciful orchestrator living, it is not surprising that this version sounds as if the music were conceived—not for the piano but for a full orchestra.

The little pieces to be played are characteristic of Moussorgsky, who had a knack of describing in a song or a piano pie ce little incidents of life about him. Sometimes he showed an excellent sense of humor. Almost always his musical characterization was perfect.

In the music, a "promenade" leads us from one picture to the next—we may suppose it to be Moussorgsky wandering about the gallery, looking eagerly at a picture, and then pausing to muse over the memory of his friend.

The pictures are as follows—"Gnome"; "Tuileries" (Children playing about under the eye of their nurses); "Bydlo" (A Polish ox Cart); "Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells" (A sketch for a ballet); Samuel Goldenberg and Peter Schmuyle (Two Jews, having an argument); "Limoges" (A Market Place); Catacombs (showing skulls, "illuminated gently from the interior"); "The Hut on Fowl's Legs" (From a Russian Fairy Tale); The Gate at Kiev (A massive closing number).

The programme will open with Weber's Overture to his fairy opera, "Oberon". Weber's immortality rests upon his three principal operatic overtures crystallizations of a genius which was most finely realized in his colorful orchestral writing. The "Oberon" Overture, with its high brilliance and its songful and lovely melodies, is in keeping with Oberon's Magic Kingdom and the romantic nature of the composer himself.

Still another prime feature of the program will be Wangner's prelude to Lohengrin, which is listed as the second number of the evening.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

110

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
ST. LOUIS, MO.
MAR 8 - 1927

THE SYMPHONY AT A CRISIS.

Those conducting the business affairs of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra announce that no contracts will be made with leader or players until the orchestra is assured of sufficient financial support to warrant going ahead. Deprived of its recital hall by fire, at the end both of its season and its money resources, there is a possibility the orchestra may be disbanded after sixty years of existence.

It is not a pleasant situation to record. The newer orchestras of Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Detroit and Cleveland, to say nothing of the well-supported organizations of Chicago, Boston, New York and Philadelphia, have reason to smile complacently when hearing the lament from St. Louis. The orchestra here has lived for years from hand to mouth. No rich men have come forward as in other cities to place the St. Louis orchestra permanently on its financial feet. The periodical drives to save it have been temporary relief only. On this one cultural asset St. Louis has fallen down.

There have been successful drives in St. Louis for almost everything else. What seems to be needed is not temporary relief, but a campaign for permanent endowment. No organization, musical or otherwise, can do its best work if bankruptcy is perpetually just ahead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 9 - 1927

Northampton

Smith Applauds Boston Symphony

Students Revel in Program, Find Every Gesture of Koussevitsky Has Real Significance.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, played in John M. Green Hall last night. Each visit of this orchestra finds it playing with added luster. Koussevitsky, already a favorite at Smith College, was vociferously greeted by the large audience, composed chiefly of students, and was recalled many times after each number.

The program opened with Concerto Grosse in B minor for string orchestra by Handel. This work gave ample opportunity for exhibiting the splendid tone of the string selections. It lacked somewhat the appeal of the other offerings on the program as far as the audience was concerned. One could not help but revel in the variety of tonal color and the elegance of phrasing.

The second number introduced the charming "Classical Symphony" by Prokofieff. This work, said to have been written as Mozart might have written for modern orchestra, is a delightful work. Its melodies are varied and it has a true Mozartian spirit. Especially lovely was the Larghetto which introduced, several lovely solo passages for various instruments. The finale is brilliantly written. Following this came Ravel's "La Valse" a stunning piece of composition, a true tone poem. Its themes are lovely and its contrasts from the calm beauty of the waltz to Bacchanalean fury reminded one of Schelling's "Victory Ball."

Mr. Koussevitsky chose to play the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor, one of the finest of all his symphonies and one of the least heard hereabouts. It is a work of tremendous power especially the first movement which is unusually long and intricate. The other three movements are comparatively simple beside the first. There is a deal of lovely melody in the Andantino and the pizzacati playing in the Scherzo is something at which to marvel. One could only listen and wonder at the skill with which these passages were played, especially the bass viol section. The finale is magnificent in its intensity. Mr. Koussevitsky built up tremendous climaxes and yet had at his command the finest pianissimos and a whole flood of colors in between the two.

One might call Koussevitsky the conductor with a thousand gestures but if one watches closely one will note that every gesture, no matter how slight of fleeting, means something. It is almost as interesting to watch his gestures as it is to listen to their results.

The orchestra has seldom been heard to better advantage than tonight. Tonally, one could hardly hope for more color from any section. One is also indebted to Mr. Koussevitsky for the inclusion on the program of such works as those by Ravel and Prokofieff. As we have noted the audience was most enthusiastic and with reason. John M. Green Hall is well adapted for an orchestra the size of the Boston organization, large enough to stand a huge volume of tone and yet intimate enough so that the most delicate pianissimos are not lost. Mr. Koussevitsky had the orchestra share the applause with him several times.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 10 1927

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

It was a large and appreciative audience that greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at Woolsey hall last evening.

Serge Koussevitzky has now made of his 110 players a most perfected organization. But for the Moussorgsky novelty, the program might have passed for one of the New Haven Symphony orchestra's Sunday afternoon events. The personnel of the Boston symphony may be said to have been the pick of many lands. There are no old man among the players. In fact, to the contrary, they appear on the whole, fairly youthful.

The old saying, it's not what you do, but how you do it that counts applies to last evening's concert. When have we heard the old overture to "Oberon" played with such dainty, velvety tonal coloring and such precision of attack? When can we recall such exquisite refinement of tone as shown by the strings in the delicate pianissimos of Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin." Surely Koussevitzky brought new beauties to these old time favorites.

An eccentric novelty is found in "Pictures at an Exhibition" originally a group of pianoforte pieces composd by Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky and later arranged for orchestra by Joseph Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky (1835-1881) has to his credit a number of orchestras works, piano pieces, songs and the operas "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantschina" all marked by crude strength but possessing originality. This just about expresses the character of this work depicting ten pictures hanging in an art gallery. About all the resources of the orchestra are utilized even to the snare drum and the harps. There is naturally a great diversity of moods. Some are grandly majestic others tinkling and trivial but all demanding a great deal of the finest of detail. This alone made the various sketches seem like eloquent music but it is doubtful if it is music destined to last. However it was accorded an ovation.

Of course the Brahms No. 2 symphony was superbly played. Both conductor and players were obviously very familiar with the work, Koussevitzky hardly looking at the score. There was a magnificent solidity of tone and artful finish to all four movements. The finale, taken at a ferocious tempo, created the wildest of enthusiasm. In a word—yesterday was a red letter day for the lover of music—symphonic.

E. A. LEOPOLD.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Journal - Courier
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 10 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Never has more beauty been crowded into a scant hour and a half than last evening in Woolsey hall when Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led his one hundred and ten musicians through a program typical of the Boston Symphony. There was a certain duribility, and strength of beauty in the program combined with a dash of modernism, such as all symphony programs have nowadays. A breath of a melody, hushed and reverent, and the large audience realized that the unusual and changeful Overture to "Oberon" by Carl von Weber had begun. With scarcely a movement of his hand, Koussevitzky directed the work and it was not until the dreamy passage had been brought to an end by a sudden crash of cords that the conductor raised his baton for the brilliant real part of the overture with its varied themes within themes, concluding with a dash and spirit that brings all the instruments into play. The etheral loveliness of Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" was next heard. Indeed the entire program was poignant with a peaceful quiet harmony that seems peculiarly attractive to Koussevitzky. He seems to have a distinct mental control over his musicians for in playing they seem almost hypnotized by the great subdued force in their leader who makes absolutely no outward display of emotion. His techique is so irrisitable that the eyes of everyone in the audience were glued to him for the most part of the evening. There is something fascinating in watching an imposing and scholarly looking man like Koussevitsky, draw from a large group of men every bit of strength that is in them, with scorcely a flicker of the baton. And this is made more interesting by the fact that there are many young men in the orchestra this year, some perhaps for their first season.

Of a distinctly different flavor was the third number on the program, a remarkable orchestration, (at Koussevitsky's request) of Moussorgsky's unusual "Tableaux d'une Exposition." The composer has pictured himself wandering through an art gallery, stopping here and there to examine pictures. A delicious thread of humor runs throughout the entire work until the end when a more serious mode is upon the composer. The introduction is called "Promenade", and is in ultra modern form. Then comes a grotesque bit called "Gnomus", with strange musical combinations symbolic of the gambols of a distorted little gnome. A fleeting instant of gaiety with the children at play in the Tuileries gardens and then one wanders on to view a "Bydlo" a Polish wagon with enormous wheels, oxen drawn, visualizes its rumbling approach as the wind instruments cry, and then in martial tempo it passes one and disappears in the distance—a faint rumble and it is gone. The fourth picture was called "Ballet of Chickens in their Shells" and was inspired by a drawing made by Hartmann for the staging of a scene in the ballet of "Trilby." This was as light as the down on the backs of the chicks and through it all they could be distinctly heard, the airy thing ending in a funny little "peep". A conversation as well as a characterization of two Polish Jews, Samuel Goldenberg, rich and imposing and Schmuyle, wizened and poor. Although there were two distinct themes, played at once, one could not help but distinguish between the two and disualize the two men, the high nasal tones of the poor one in the strident wind instruments, against the booming voice of the rich fellow. The other three pictures, "Catacombs," "The Hut on Fowls' Legs" and "The Gate of the Bohatyrs at Kiev," were on a more massive style, dignified and sweeping and with great depth.

Brahms' romantic Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73, was played in the last half of the program. From its four movements one derived a great spiritual peace, combined with a serious sense of the beautiful. The plaintive melody that is woven so subtley into this tender symphony, is most alluring, while the teasing, gracefulness of the dance movement drives one on to the irrisitable piquancy of the finale bright and glowing. Brahms in his best mood. It was over and Koussevitzky, mopping his brow, made a

THIS CLIPPING FROM PATRIOT
HARRISBURG, PA.
MAR 8 - 1927

BOSTON TO HEAR NINE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Miss Solennis" and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman, of The London Sunday Times, is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven at the concert of Monday, March 28.

Solo singers to appear at the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
MAR 9 1927

The former Ayers St. man, who now lives on Rosedale, informs me that the chorus with the Boston Symphony Saturday night was the Orpheus Club of Boston, of 220 voices. Their first number was "Song of a High Hill," and the listener who thought much of their work was humming was correct. They used merely the syllable "Ah" much of the time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
MAR 8 1927

Boston to Honor Beethoven With Brilliant Program

It is reasonably safe to say that no tribute to Beethoven of the many that are to be paid all over the world this year, the hundredth anniversary of the master symphonist's death, will equal the centennary festival to be given under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Tuesday, March 22 through Tuesday, March 29. The program of this festival, which was announced in Boston on January 29, is of so comprehensive a nature that it is doubtful if a precedent could be found when one considers both the participants and the scope of the festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitsky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies and various overtures. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist in several concertos. Ernest Newman, English critic, will journey from London to Boston, to give an address on Beethoven.

In the Ninth Symphony, on Tuesday evening, March 29, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solemnis, on the opening day of the festival. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth.

Quartets will be performed by the

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
MAR 9 1927

DX. at East Palestine, supplements Rosedale's dope on the chorus that sang with the Boston Symphony Saturday night. He says it was the Cecelian Society of Boston. Rosedale said it was the Orpheus Club. Now, who's right? Or were there two choruses?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
MAR 10 1927

LIFE OF FLIVVER PUT TO MUSIC

Boston Symphony to Present New Composition on Auto.

BOSTON, Thursday.—The making of a flivver, its ages of depreciation and its rattling apart are all depicted in a new musical composition for the symphony orchestra here.

The ultra modern in musical composition has just been completed by Frederick S. Converse, of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the sub-title, "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
MAR 10 1927

Flivver in Music.

Boston, March 10.—The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for [illegible] by the Boston Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM Eve.
NEWS
DENVER, COLO.
MAR 10 1927

FLIVVER SYMPHONY THEME

BOSTON, March 10.—The lowly flivver has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver Ten Million," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, thru a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 10 1927

MUSIC EPIC OF A FORD IN 'FLIVVER 10,000,000'

F. S. Converse Writes Symphony for Boston Orchestra Which Sketches Life of an Auto.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., March 9.—The ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the Symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prologue is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is behold this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
CINCINNATI, O.
MAR 10 1927

[illegible] friend a flat after last session.

FLIVVER IN SYMPHONY

Rattler Made Subject of Composition for Boston Orchestra

By United Press.

BOSTON, March 10.—The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphony composition by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver 10,000,000," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, thru a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM [illegible] TIMES
MAR 6 - 1927

[illegible]spighi conducted the Bos-
[illegible]y Orchestra in a program
[illegible] works Feb. 18. Alfredo
[illegible]ucted the accompaniment
[illegible] concerto, with Respighi
The other compositions the second suite of old airs for the lute, the overture, the "Fountains ll heard in Boston for the and "Il Tramonte," for strings, with Mme. Elsa the singer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YORK WORLD
MAR 6 - 1927

[illegible]evening and Saturday
t Carnegie Hall, the Boston Orchestra will give its last ncerts but one of the New
n. Features of both cone numbers for chorus and n which the Cecilia Society trained by Malcolm Lang.
Prokofieff's Akkadian In-
"Sept, ils son sept" ("They "), for tenor, chorus and will be performed at the concert and repeated in the of the program. It will formed at the Saturday cone will be the first New York this barbarian music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EGISTER
HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 7 - 1927

KABLE PROGRAM
BY KOUSSEVITZKY

mme of unusual interest, h great brilliance and announced for the coming Boston Symphony Orches-
Haven under its celesian leader, Serge Kous-
The conecrt will take oolsey Hall, Wednesday
rch 9th.
of the programme will rgsky's "Pictures at an
Two other noted musiscored for orchestra this nd whole charming suite ces by the great Russian Maurice Ravel made this especially for Koussince he is probably the , delicate, and fanciful iling, it is not surprisis version sounds as if ere conceived—not for for a full orchestra.
pieces to be played are of Moussorgsky, who of describing in a song le ce little incidents of n. Sometimes he showed ense of humor. Almost usical characterization

c, a "promenade" leads picture to the next—we t to be Moussorgsky
but the gallery, looking picture, and then paus-ver the memory of his es are as follows—lleries" (Children playier the eye of their lo" (A Polish ox Cart): Chicks in their Shells"

a ballet); Samuel Gold-Peter Schmuyle (Two an argument); "Lim-ket Palce); Catacombs lls, "illuminated gently rior"); "The Hut on (From a Russian Fairy ate at Kiev (A massive er).
mme will open with ture to his fairy opera, eber's immortality rests ee principal operatic stallizations of a genius ost finely realized in his hestral writing. The erture, with its high d, its songful and lovely n keeping with Oberon's dom, and the ramantic
e composer himself.
er prime feature of the l be Wangner's prelude
, which is listed as the er of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
ST. LOUIS, MO.
MAR 8 - 1927

THE SYMPHONY AT A CRISIS.

Those conducting the business affairs of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra announce that no contracts will be made with leader or players until the orchestra is assured of sufficient financial support to warrant going ahead. Deprived of its recital hall by fire, at the end both of its season and its money resources, there is a possibility the orchestra may be disbanded after sixty years of existence.

It is not a pleasant situation to record. The newer orchestras of Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Detroit and Cleveland, to say nothing of the well-supported organizations of Chicago, Boston, New York and Philadelphia, have reason to smile complacently when hearing the lament from St. Louis. The orchestra here has lived for years from hand to mouth. No rich men have come forward as in other cities to place the St. Louis orchestra permanently on its financial feet. The periodical drives to save it have been temporary relief only. On this one cultural asset St. Louis has fallen down.

There have been successful drives in St. Louis for almost everything else. What seems to be needed is not temporary relief, but a campaign for permanent endowment. No organization, musical or otherwise, can do its best work if bankruptcy is perpetually just ahead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PATRIOT
HARRISBURG, PA.
MAR 8 - 1927

BOSTON TO HEAR NINE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Miss Solennis" and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman, of The London Sunday Times, is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Giesseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevado van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. Carl Friedberg will play works for piano solo.

Ernest Newman of London has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven at the concert of Monday, March 28.

Solo singers to appear at the festival are Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
MAR 8 1927

Boston to Honor Beethoven With Brilliant Program

It is reasonably safe to say that no tribute to Beethoven of the many that are to be paid all over the world this year, the hundredth anniversary of the master symphonist's death, will equal the centennary festival to be given under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Tuesday, March 22 through Tuesday, March 29. The program of this festival, which was announced in Boston on January 29, is of so comprehensive a nature that it is doubtful if a precedent could be found when one considers both the participants and the scope of the festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitsky, will perform Beethoven's nine symphonies and various overtures. Masterpieces from his choral and chamber music will also be played; celebrities of the musical world will assist in several concertos. Ernest Newman, English critic, will journey from London to Boston, to give an address on Beethoven.

In the Ninth Symphony, on Tuesday evening, March 29, the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the Missa Solemnis, on the opening day of the festival. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses are now being trained in these two choral scores by Messrs. Davison and Woodworth.

Quartets will be performed by the

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
MAR 9 1927

The former Ayers St. man, who now lives on Rosedale, informs me that the chorus with the Boston Symphony Saturday night was the Orpheus Club of Boston, of 220 voices. Their first number was "Song of a High Hill," and the listener who thought much of their work was humming was correct. They used merely the syllable "Ah" much of the time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

DX. at East Palestine, supplements Rosedale's dope on the chorus that rang with the Boston Symphony Saturday night. He says it was the Cecelian Society of Boston. Rosedale said it was the Orpheus Club. Now, who's right? Or were there two choruses?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
MAR 10 1927

LIFE OF FLIVVER PUT TO MUSIC

Boston Symphony to Present New Composition on Auto.

BOSTON, Thursday.—The making of a flivver, its ages of depreciation and its rattling apart are all depicted in a new musical composition for the symphony orchestra here.

The ultra modern in musical composition has just been completed by Frederick S. Converse, of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the sub-title, "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 9 - 1927

Northampton

Smith Applauds Boston Symphony

Students Revel in Program, Find Every Gesture of Koussevitsky Has Real Significance.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

NORTHAMPTON, March 9 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, played in John M. Green Hall last night. Each visit of this orchestra finds it playing with added luster. Koussevitsky, already a favorite at Smith College, was vociferously greeted by the large audience, composed chiefly of students, and was recalled many times after each number.

The program opened with Concerto Grosse in B minor for string orchestra by Handel. This work gave ample opportunity for exhibiting the splendid tone of the string selections. It lacked somewhat the appeal of the other offerings on the program as far as the audience was concerned. One could not help but revel in the variety of tonal color and the elegance of phrasing.

The second number introduced the charming "Classical Symphony" by Prokofieff. This work, said to have been written as Mozart might have written for modern orchestra, is a delightful work. Its melodies are varied and it has a true Mozartian spirit. Especially lovely was the Larghetto which introduced, several lovely solo passages for various instruments. The finale is brilliantly written. Following this came Ravel's "La Valse" a stunning piece of composition, a true tone poem. Its themes are lovely and its contrasts from the calm beauty of the waltz to Bacchanalean fury reminded one of Schelling's "Victory Ball."

Mr. Koussevitsky chose to play the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor, one of the finest of all his symphonies and one of the least heard hereabouts. It is a work of tremendous power especially the first movement which is unusually long and intricate. The other three movements are comparatively simple beside the first. There is a deal of lovely melody in the Andantino and the pizzacati playing in the Scherzo is something at which to marvel. One could only listen and wonder at the skill with which these passages were played, especially the bass viol section. The finale is magnificent in its intensity. Mr. Koussevitsky built up tremendous climaxes and yet had at his command the finest pianissimos and a whole flood of colors in between the two.

One might call Koussevitsky the conductor with a thousand gestures but if one watches closely one will note that every gesture, no matter how slight of fleeting, means something. It is almost as interesting to watch his gestures as it is to listen to their results.

The orchestra has seldom been heard to better advantage than tonight. Tonally, one could hardly hope for more color from any section. One is also indebted to Mr. Koussevitsky for the inclusion on the program of such works as those by Ravel and Prokofieff. As we have noted the audience was most enthusiastic and with reason. John M. Green Hall is well adapted for an orchestra the size of the Boston organization, large enough to stand a huge volume of tone and yet intimate enough so that the most delicate pianissimos are not lost. Mr. Koussevitsky had the orchestra share the applause with him several times.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
MAR 10 1927

Flivver in Music.

Boston, March 10.—The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for [illegible] by the Boston Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
DENVER, COLO.
MAR 10 1927

FLIVVER SYMPHONY THEME

BOSTON, March 10.—The lowly flivver has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver Ten Million," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, thru a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 10 1927

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

It was a large and appreciative audience that greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at Woolsey hall last evening.

Serge Koussevitzky has now made of his 110 players a most perfected organization. But for the Moussorgsky novelty, the program might have passed for one of the New Haven Symphony orchestra's Sunday afternoon events. The personnel of the Boston symphony may be said to have been the pick of many lands. There are no old man among the players. In fact, to the contrary, they appear on the whole, fairly youthful.

The old saying, it's not what you do, but how you do it that counts applies to last evening's concert. When have we heard the old overture to "Oberon" played with such dainty, velvety tonal coloring and such precision of attack? When can we recall such exquisite refinement of tone as shown by the strings in the delicate pianissimos of Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin." Surely Koussevitzky brought new beauties to these old time favorites.

An eccentric novelty is found in "Pictures at an Exhibition" originally a group of pianoforte pieces composd by Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky and later arranged for orchestra by Joseph Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky (1835-1881) has to his credit a number of orchestras works, piano pieces, songs and the operas "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantschina" all marked by crude strength but possessing originality. This just about expresses the character of this work depicting ten pictures hanging in an art gallery. About all the resources of the orchestra are utilized even to the snare drum and the harps. There is naturally a great diversity of moods. Some are grandly majestic others tinkling and trivial but all demanding a great deal of the finest of detail. This alone made the various sketches seem like eloquent music but it is doubtful if it is music destined to last. However it was accorded an ovation.

Of course the Brahms No. 2 symphony was superbly played. Both conductor and players were obviously very familiar with the work, Koussevitzky hardly looking at the score. There was a magnificent solidity of tone and artful finish to all four movements. The finale, taken at a ferocious tempo, created the wildest of enthusiasm. In a word—yesterday was a red letter day for the lover of music—symphonic.

E. A. LEOPOLD.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 10 1927

MUSIC EPIC OF A FORD IN 'FLIVVER 10,000,000'

F. S. Converse Writes Symphon for Boston Orchestra Which Sketches Life of an Auto.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., March 9.—The ult modern in musical composition is re resented in a symphonic cycle ju completed by Frederick S. Converse the New England Conservatory Music, in which a characteristic Am ican product is portrayed and follow on its way through the United Stat "Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of t piece, with the subtitle "A Joyo Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conduct of the Boston Symphony orchest has received it for performance ne month at the Symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening p logue is "Dawn in Detroit" and n comes a scene "March of the Wo ers," cheerfully making their way well-rewarded toil; then a scene in Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue terspersed with machine-like sound

Having thus set the scene, Mr. C verse passes to the hero. It is b this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the so of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Journal - Courier
MAR 10 1927

110

KOUSSEVITZKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Never has more beauty been crowded into a scant hour and a half than last evening in Woolsey hall when Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led his one hundred and ten musicians through a program typical of the Boston Symphony. There was a certain duribility, and strength of beauty in the program combined with a dash of modernism, such as all symphony programs have nowadays. A breath of a melody, hushed and reverent, and the large audience realized that the unusual and changeful Overture to "Oberon" by Carl von Weber had begun. With scarcely a movement of his hand, Koussevitzky directed the work and it was not until the dreamy passage had been brought to an end by a sudden crash of cords that the conductor raised his baton for the brilliant real part of the overture with its varied themes within themes, concluding with a dash and spirit that brings all the instruments into play. The etheral loveliness of Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" was next heard. Indeed the entire program was poignant with a peaceful quiet harmony that seems peculiarly attractive to Koussevitzky. He seems to have a distinct mental control over his musicians for in playing they seem almost hypnotized by the great subdued force in their leader who makes absolutely no outward display of emotion. His techique is so irrisitable that the eyes of everyone in the audience were glued to him for the most part of the evening. There is something fascinating in watching an imposing and scholarly looking man like Koussevitsky, draw from a large group of men every bit of strength that is in them, with scorcely a flicker of the baton. And this is made more interesting by the fact that there are many young men in the orchestra this year, some perhaps for their first season.

Of a distinctly different flavor was the third number on the program, a remarkable orchestration, (at Koussevitsky's request) of Moussorgsky's unusual "Tableaux d'une Exposition." The composer has pictured himself wandering through an art gallery, stopping here and there to examine pictures. A delicious thread of humor runs throughout the entire work until the end when a more serious mode is upon the composer. The introduction is called "Promenade", and is in ultra modern form. Then comes a grotesque bit called "Gnomus", with strange musical combinations symbolic of the gambols of a distorted little gnome. A fleeting instant of gaiety with the children at play in the Tuileries gardens and then one wanders on to view a "Bydlo" a Polish wagon with enormous wheels, oxen drawn, visualizes its rumbling approach as the wind instruments cry, and then in martial tempo it passes one and disappears in the distance—a faint rumble and it is gone. The fourth picture was called "Ballet of Chickens in their Shells" and was inspired by a drawing made by Hartmann for the staging of a scene in the ballet of "Trilby." This was as light as the down on the backs of the chicks and through it all they could be distinctly heard, the airy thing ending in a funny little "peep". A conversation as well as a characterization of two Polish Jews, Samuel Goldenberg, rich and imposing and Schmuyle, weened and poor. Although there were two distinct themes, played at once, one could not help but distinguish between the two and disualize the two men, the high nasal tones of the poor one in the strident wind instruments, against the booming voice of the rich fellow. The other three pictures, "Catacombs," "The Hut on Fowls' Legs" and "The Gate of the Bohatyrs at Kiev," were on a more massive style, dignified and sweeping and with great depth.

Brahms' romantic Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73, was played in the last half of the program. From its four movements one derived a great spiritual peace, combined with a serious sense of the beautiful. The plaintive melody that is woven so subtley into this tender symphony, is most alluring, while the teasing, gracefulness of the dance movement drives one on to the irrisitable piquancy of the finale bright and glowing. Brahms in his best mood. It was over and Koussevitzky, mopping his brow, made a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
CINCINNATI, O.
MAR 10 1927

friend a hat after last [illegible]

FLIVVER IN SYMPHONY

Rattler Made Subject of Composition for Boston Orchestra

By United Press.

BOSTON, March 10.—The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphony composition by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver 10,000,000," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, thru a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Indorsed and Referred

To the Musical Editor of the Transcript:

Mr. Koussevitzky has never turned a deaf ear to music of the immediate hour. Assiduously he has sought out new works by Prokofieff, Bartok, Krasa, Webern, Hindemith and the like; so much so that, elsewhere, the Boston Orchestra has a "modernist" reputation. The conductor, likewise, has been host to such American composers, either of native stock or now resident in this country, as seemed to him vital and interesting; witness Messrs. Loeffler, Hill, Copland, Bloch and Gilbert. All the more unaccountable, then, is his neglect of a composer as "advanced" as anyone, one could well imagine, and now living in America.

About a year ago the People's Symphony Orchestra produced the "Hyperprism" of Edgar Varèse. With all respect and gratitude to Mr. Mason, it may be said that, with the means at his command, he could scarcely do justice to the score; a music stripped to the bare essentials of rhythm and sonority should receive a performance excelling in those two essentials, from a virtuoso orchestra and a virtuoso conductor. At any rate, he who listens may hear; and to some in the audience (especially those who h heard the piece as Mr. Stokowski will it) it was apparent that here was music with an attack and a point view as new to his age as the music Hector Berlioz was to its own. To the it seemed that sooner of later this mus ought to (and would) find its way to larger and more appreciative audienc in Symphony Hall. Mr. Koussevitzk could do wonders with such a piec given an orchestra such as now grac the stage "at these concerts." No le the earlier, but more ambitious, "Amer ques" invites his scrutiny. If such piece is difficult to produce, so was t "Alpensymphonie" of Strauss, sto piece last season. Certainly the redoub able Edgar, able to set New York the ears, ought to arouse curiosity the minds of all Bostonians to whom ea new piece is an adventure. Open wi the gates, ye powers that be; the mus of Var[illegible]loud for performan an audience.

Cambridge, March 7. W. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES LEADER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 10 1927

Boston Symphony Heard In Concert Here With Koussevitzky Conducting

The internationally famous Bosto Symphony orchestra, under the direc tion of Serge Koussevitzky, eminen conductor, presented a program o nineteenth century music in Woolse hall last evening before an audienc which proved one of the largest an most appreciative ever assembled i the spacious auditorium for a sym phony concert.

The concert, given under the aus pices of the Yale School of Musi afforded music lovers an opportunit to hear an orchestra which has gained an enviable reputation and an unusually pleasing program which included the works of Weber, Wagner, Moussorgsky and Brahms.

Director Koussevitzky has received great praise as a conductor in his two seasons of leadership of the Bos ton Symphony. A Russian by birth, as an imaginative artist of extensive evocative and delineative powers, he has attained through his concerts in all of the musical centers of Europe a renowned international reputation. Not only is he a great leader, but also one of the most expert bass viol players in the world.

The program chosen by Koussevitzky for the evening was comprised of contrasting types of Nineteenth century music. The first number, Weber's Overture from "Oberon," was the oldest composition on the program. Freidrich Weber, called the founder of the romantic movement in Germany, was eminent in Europe in the early eighties as a composer of dramatic music. "Oberon," his last opera, was written in 1826. Of a later date, Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" shows the development of German opera reaching its apogem in Wagner's compositions, contrasting in style to the preceding work.

Of an entirely different sort of music was "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky, which was third on the program and which immediately preceded Brahms 2nd Symphony, the concluding number. As the title indicates, this composition is a group of sketches of which the subjects are taken from pictures by the celebrated Russian architect, Rathmann. Moussorgsky, imaginative, yet realistic musical painter, wrote these originally for the piano. They were but recently arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel, the French modern composer.

The symphony, the "Meat" of the program, afforded a brilliant conclusion to the unusually pleasing program. In this symphony occurs one of the rare instances in which a theme is presented in two contrasting aspects.

Although several of the musicians have been playing with the orchestra since it was first organized, some forty-five or more years ago, several new faces were noted this season. Despite the extreme youthfulness of some of the members, each and every one is truly an artist.

Koussevitzky is the most fascinating conductor who has ever appeared here with the famous orchestra and we hope he will be here again next season. He is truly a master.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 11 1927

Other Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought one of his provocative and interesting programs to Carnegie Hall last night, and, what is more, conducted works in which his distinguished talents shone with special brilliance.

The high light of the purely orchestral part of the program was the Ravel arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition." Ravel orchestrated this piano suite at Mr. Koussevitzky's request in 1923 and the conductor seems to pour his all into the interpretation—from the fantastic picture of the little gnome and the sly portrayal of the two Polish Jews, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, to the magnificent and majestic portrait of the gate at Kiev in the massive old Russian style.

For the remainder of the concert the Boston Orchestra had the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia Society, with Charles Stratton as soloist. To this impressive array of musicians was intrusted the first New York performance of Prokofieff's "Incantation" for tenor, chorus and orchestra, after an ancient cuneiform inscription, "Sept, ils sont sept."

Breathlessly exciting and theatrically feverish, this mad chant tells of the seven horrible demons of Akkadian belief.

They know not goodness nor kindness,
They are without regret, remorse;
They are deaf to prayer and entreaties,
They cause earth and sky to shrink.
They grind men as man grind grain.
Seven, they are seven!
Twice their number is seven!
Divine skies, conjure them!
Sacred soil, conjure them!

It is futile to try to convey with words the eerie, wild supplications of this chorus or the primitive, barbaric fury of the music. The effect, however, is that of an exhorter, and a throng of believers, fanatically terrorized, who finally are overcome with awe and utter subdued mutterings as the orchestra resolves the work into a smooth, sustained harmony.

Mr. Koussevitzky played "Sept, ils sont sept," twice last night, and with good effect. Certainly he provided one of the most exciting of musical moments.

W. H. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 11 1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Syhpmony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall, was again one of superlative technical brilliancy and of unusual interest in the character of the program. The purely orchestral compositions were the Weber "Oberon" overture and the Moussorgsky "Pictures from an Exposition," with Ravel's orchestration. The presence of the Cecilia Society of Boston and of Charles Stratton, tenor, enabled Mr. Koussevitsky to give the first performance in New York of Prokofieff's "Incantation" for tenior, chorus and orchestra, after an ancient cuneiform inscription, "Sept, ils sont sept." There were also performed the "Sarabande," symphonic poem for orchestra and voices, of Ducasse, and the "Polovstian Dances" from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Mr. Koussevitsky produced "Sept, ils, sont sept" at his concert in the Paris Opera House May 29, 1924. The program consisted principally of modern and ultra-modern music. Prokofieff was present in wholly conventional garb, looking as bland and as innocent of Akkadian inscriptions and their implications of cruelty and terror as any baby of this strange twentieth century "Sept, ils sont sept"; was played twice at that concert, a wise proceeding, repeated last night.

The Seven are the seven horrible demons of Akkadian belief, authors of all human woe. They are in the sky and the abyss; they rise in the west, they loom in the east; their immensity fills heaven and earth; they grind men as men grint grain. The effect of text and music is that of exhorter and a crowd of fanatical believers. There is breathless repetition of the cries and execrations of teh leader by the chorus. There are mad incantations, ceremonies, supplications. The chorus invokes the wrathful deities with a march-like chant, over which the solo voice incites and exhorts. The mood becomes more breathless, more terrified. Suddenly there are soft, sustained harmonies by the orchestra through which, as through a veil, are heard the subdued mutterings of many voices—the worshippers, overcome with awe and terror. This final effect is a good idea, but perhaps the weakest part of the piece, the most obviously theatrical.

The whole work savors of the theatrical. But what theatre! What rhymtical impact, what barbaric fury. [illegible] barbarism is a little conscious, a little sophisticated in its technic. Mr. Prokofieff had drawn upon the ancient Scythians for studies in musical primitivism before he tried the Akkadians; and before that one Stravinsky had set the fashion with a work that still overshadows all of its successors. Hence the flavor of "Sept, ils sont sept," is not quite as new, and has not quite the tang that it had even three years ago. It remains, nevertheless an exciting and extremely effctive piece of music. e Mr. Stratton and the Cecilia Society acquitted themselves well of a very difficult task twice visited upon them.

There was another Russian on last night's program whose music, more familiar than that of Prokofieff, requires less description, but that music is abundant, overflowing with originality and genius. We refer to Moussorgsky and his "Pictures at an Exhibition" and their orchestration, which is also an act of genius, by Ravel. Nor would the word genius be very far from the point as regarding Mr. Koussevitsky's revelation of the contents of these amazing pieces.

Stil lanother Russian, Borodin by name, knew how to write music, and drew from mysterious sources of his land and his blood—he was the natural son of a Georgian Prince—the wild, sweet, nomadic flavor of his music. The wind of the steppes sweeps through his beautiful, vigorous and now familiar score, and the spirit of the East is in the dances. Mr. Koussevitsky saw to it, in spite of choral cooperation that was not decisive, that the music sounded. In Ducasse's "Sarabande" the intonation of the singers was defective. The work itself is mannered and rather aridly post-Debussyan. The compositions of Prokofieff and Moussorgsky, above all Moussorgsky, were the commanding moments of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 11 1927

Flivver Symphony Ready for Boston

Musical Saga of Ford Automobile Finished by Frederick S. Converse.

BOSTON, March 11—The ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prolog is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING WORLD
MAR 11 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A program of unusual interest was ffered in Carnegie Hall yesterday vening by the Boston Symphony Orhestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. It was the appeal of he grotesque, however, rather than the eautiful.

The chief item was a first time resentation of "Sept, Ils sont sept," n incantation for tenor, chorus and rchestra, by Prokofieff, with a chorus f about 100 voices from the Cecilia ociety under the direction of Malcolm ang, and with Charles Stratton as oloist. The rendition was at full blast. houted rather than sung, with voices istorted and the orchestra mounting o frenzies. There was much tittering n the audience and shaking of heads. Many puzzled expressions were to be bserved.

This chief item was repeated a little urther along in the program—because it was suggested the first reaction would probably be one of rebellion, but at second hearing the work might take on some meaning.

Mr. Koussevitzky began with Weber's verture to "Oberon," given with his ustomary enthusiasm. If this piece eemed noisy, it was but a prelude to Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's 'Pictures at an Exhibition," the blare and boom of which was a fitting introduction to Prokofieffs monstrous piece Ducasses "Sarabande," a symphonic poem for irchestra and voices, and Borodin's Polovtsian dances from 'Prince Igor," for orchestra with horus, completed an amazing program.

—J. B. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
MAR 11 1927

Alas, Saint Cecilia!

So far as the program which Serge Koussevitzky concocted for the fourth Thursday visit of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall last night had any discernible plan or purpose, it seems to have aimed at making the most of the presence of the Cecilia Society chorus, brought over specially from Boston. The principal object of the choral co-operation was to present for the first (and also second) time on this benighted island an affair by Serge Prokofieff inscribed with the apparently Wordsworthian title of "Seven, they are seven" (to be linguistically exact "Sept, ils sont sept").

This is further defined as an "incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra," and was heard in such centers of enlightenment as Boston as far back as last April and in Paris in the antediluvian May tide of 1924. In each case Mr. Koussevitzky was the officiative hierophant and each time he played it twice to expedite the vulgar understanding. The same process of illumination was employed yesterday evening.

Choruses for symphony concerts are not obtained without much prayer and fasting, and the conductor who occasionally bags one does not like to let it idle. So Mr. Koussevitzky made the Cecilia people an excuse for cluttering up his bill with the vocal and orchestral symphonic poem of Roger-Ducasse denominated simply "Sarabande," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," which may surrender but which simply will not die. To this strangely assorted business the "Oberon" overture and Moussorgsky's "Exposition Pictures" in Ravel's orchestral vesture supplied, for better or worse, a duplex and mismated preamble.

In many ways the performances were as bad as the musical collocation was heathenish. That of Weber's overture was oneof the most turgid in orchestral quality, lumbering in progress and perverse or irresponsible in effect, calculated to mar its poetry and design, that has haunted local concert rooms in a lustrum. Oberon's elfin folk stirred with the graceful gait of furniture movers, and the clarinet, singing its famous melody, wept tears of glucose. Certain details of the Moussorgsky "Pictures" are more Mr. Koussevitzky's affair, but in others his tempi seemed ineptly chosen. Is it not time to dissipate once and for all the superstitious reverence which clings about this absurdly overrated work, whereof not more than a fourth is worthy of the creator of "Boris"?

The seventeen-year-old "Sarabande" of the prosy and plodding Roger-Ducasse calls for no lengthy homilies at present. The Philharmonic played it in 1918, and the interim has not detracted from its machine made properties. It drags itself stodgily from nowhere to nowhere. It is neither better nor worse for its wordless and lugubrious chorusings. Perhaps it is not quite as awful as its composer's mimodrame "Orphee," out of which the Paris Opera made last summer a mortal affliction in three acts.

Some feeble hisses. mingled with the polite applause that greeted Prokofieff's lucubrations last evening. There were also ribald folk who tittered at the ritual of devil worship (or, to be more precise, of exorcism). It seems that a cuneiform inscription was found and deciphered on the wall of an Akkadian temple somewhere in the blessed demesnes of Mesopotamia. It amounted to an efficacious preventive against the machinations of seven devils, the agents of all human woes. The Russian, Constantin Balmont, turned it into verse, and Prokofieff set it to music for a tenor soloist, a mixed chorus and a considerable orchestra.

This music comes as near to being nothing at all as anything capable of performance can be. The first hearing last night made this certain. The second made it more so. One heard wails and squallings, ostinato figures, vigorous thumps and long drawn chords. One heard not a molecule of music. At the beginning some thought that Charles Stratton, the tenor, had fallen afoul of Mr. Koussevitzky and, instead of singing, was in the course of a wordy altercation with the revered conductor. Eventually, one made out that the harassed and struggling young man was hoarsely bawling "Ils sont sept." No doubt this exorcism would avail to check the worst depredations of Hades. But the cure might prove so much worse than the disease that some of us would probably choose to [illegible] tea

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK JOURNAL P.
MAR 11 1927

BOSTON ORCHESTRA
PLAYS NEW MUSIC

Serge Koussexitzky, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, brought with it to Carnegie Hall last night the St. Cecilia Chorus and Charles Stratton, tenor, to help him give first performances of Serge Prokofieff's incantation, "Sept. ils sont sept" (Seven, They Are Seven!") and Roger Ducasse's "Saraband." The Prokofieff piece was repeated toward the end of the programme, Mr. Koussevitzky setting such store by it.

It will be given again on Saturday, as will the Ducasse music. Last night was a busy one for reviewers and since no other part of Prokofieff's output has yet seemed so wildly important as to demand immediate consideration, this may await review on Monday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.
MAR 11 1927

* * *

Those Imps of WGCP lived up to their name last night when they painted the picture of Martinelli and Scotti on the stage of the Metropolitan, accompanied by the Boston Symphony and singing "Where Do You Work John?" And, at that, we are sure that these two haughty gentlemen couldn't begin to sing it so well as the Imps. They are in a class by themselves when it comes to that particular song.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM YORK AMERICAN
MAR 11 1927

Boston Symphony Concert

By GRENA BENNETT.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the musical escorts of a new Russian composition, given its first and second New York hearing at Carnegie Hall last night, for the novelty was played twice in the one programme.

The work, which is from the pen of Prokofieff, bears the queer title, Sept, ils sont sept" (Seven, they are Seven), an incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra. It bears no relation to the childhood poem, "We Are Seven," nor to the stars in the diadem worn by Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel." Mr Prokofieff's inspiration was derived from a work by the Russian poet, Constantin Balmont who, in turn, was moved to versify after learning of an ancient cuneiform inscription discovered on the walls of an Akkadian temple in Mesopotamia.

The composer transmitted to his score the gloomy mysticism that permeates the poem, illustrating its hopelessness with shrieks of error or wailing of despair

Prokofieff proves anew, moreover, that he is not a melodist. His pen hankers after tone combinations that shock with sudden but definite dissonance. This, perhaps, is a more faithful tone portrait to ideas like: "They grind men as they grind grain . . seven gods malevolent . . seven frightful laughs.

The vocal parts were sung by Charles Stratton, tenor, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society. Their work was a marvelous accomplishment of a task tremendously difficult and exacting. So, too, was that of the musicians, whose reading of a most strange score was a feat of technical efficiency. Twice in one evening was something of a dose.

The other Russian, but less extreme, numbers on the programme were Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a very interesting and diverting number, and the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Works by Weber and Ducasse completed the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
ST. LOUIS, MO.
MAR 11 1927

FLIVVER' IS SUBJECT OF SYMPHONIC COMPOSITION

BOSTON, March 11—([illegible] C. I. —The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver 10,000,000," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, through a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

A. H. M.

TRANS—MAR 11

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Casella's ballet, "La Giara," heard and warmly applauded as suite for orchestra at the Symphony Concerts in January, will pass to the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House on Saturday afternoon, March 19. Mr. Serafin will conduct; Miss Galli, Mr. Berger and Mr. Angelo will be the principal dancers. The action has been set back to the Sicily of fifty years ago and the ballet will be dressed and framed accordingly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 11 1927

The Boston Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor, assisted by the Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston. Carnegie Hall. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

PROGRAM

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Pictures at an Exhibition.....Moussorgsky-Ravel
Sept, ils sont sept (Invocation for tenor chorus and orchestra) Op. 30....Prokofieff
First time in New York
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices).....Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept (repeated).....Prokofieff
Prolovstian Dances from "Prince Igor".....Borodin

Mr. Koussevitzky put into practice at last night's Boston Symphony concert a belief which we happen to share with him—namely, that new works, novel in style and content, should be repeated on the same program. So, having duly performed as the third number on his list the remarkable novelty by Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sont sept" (music little calculated to woo the ear of the conformist), he repeated it as the fifth number, after a tactfully assuaging interjection provided by Ducasse's "Sarabande" (one of Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic offerings of a year ago). At least, we assume that he carried out this programatic scheme, for we were unable to permit ourselves the luxury of a second hearing of Prokofieff's work.

* * *

A single hearing of the piece (which was quite new to this region, though the music is ten years old) was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art.

Prokofieff has set for tenor, chorus and orchestra the text of a poem by the Russian poet, Balmont, based upon a strange and baleful cuneiform inscription found at Mesopotamia in an excavated temple of the Akkadians, a people more ancient than the Babylonians. The inscription, and the poem from which it derives, embody formulas of incantation against seven monstrous demons, bringers of unimaginable evil, who, according to the belief of the terrified Akkadians, were the horrible multi-tongued fountain of all human woe. The tenor voice utters the shattering, high-pitched incantation of the priest, screaming his frenzied conjurations against the menacing blackness of the pagan night:

Seven, they are seven!
In the deep abyss,
They are seven!
Divine skies, conjure them!
Sacred soil, conjure them!

In the background, thronging about him, the chorus surges, beseeching, tumultuous, fanatical, uttering the faith and the entreaty of the believers, who cannot quite believe in aught but the horrors that their own imaginings conjure out of the dark mysteriousness of the world.

* * *

Prokofieff has embodied this tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmness of human contacts.

The music was startlingly well done last night by the chorus of the Cecilia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose), by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor, by Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

The work will be repeated at Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony: with which hint to "the acute and honorable minority" this report must cease.

From
TIMES
Indianapolis, Ind.
MAR 11 192

BOSTON—The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver 10,000,000," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, through a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES

MUSIC EPIC OF A FORD

IN 'FLIVVER 10,000,000'

TIMES MAR 11

F. S. Converse Writes Symphony for Boston Orchestra Which Sketches Life of an Auto.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., March 9.—The ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the Symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prologue is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 11 1927

Like a frightened wind in a sibylline cave, Serge Prokofieff's incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" for the first time sent shivers through Carnegie Hall last night. Twice it was done, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Cecilia Society chorus of Boston, and Charles Stratton, tenor; and its eerie exorcism of the seven evil demons of Mesopotamia brought approval which drowned out the militant hissing of certain sceptics by the rear exit.

The program began in orthodoxy with Weber's "Oberon" Overture and was concluded with a rendition of Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," by orchestra and chorus

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROOKLYN TIMES
MAR 12 1927

Music Notes

The Fourth Boston

Serge Koussevitsky brought h Boston Symphony Society to t Academy of Music last night for th fourth in the series of five concer planned this season for Brooklynite The program selected was slight different from previous offerin here in that the soloists for the ev ning proved to be the Cecilia Soci of Boston.

The conductor opened his progra with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Sadk tone picture, a work not unkno but somewhat unfamiliar in th days of Strauss. Mr. Koussevit read the work with a determinat to bring out its descriptive val with the result that only a ballet necessary to give the visual touch

The Brahms No. 2 followed w the conductor giving a refresh rendition and his musicians foll ing his every whim and mood. W losing no essential virility, the c ductor refused to be led into any aggeration and gave the second adagio movement a broad rea with the final allegro con spirit dashing and vigorous mood.

Roger Ducasse's "Sarabande" Hugo Wolfe's "Fire Rider" gave choral assistants an opportunity be heard. In both instances voices were utilized as adjuncts the orchestra. The Ducasse w offered wordless choral parts in this we had an effective presen tion without the chorus interfer with the role of the orchestra, bu the Wolfe with the verses in E lish the diction was inferior and words were lost in the crashes of orchestra and only the tone color survived.

The Polovtsian dances from second act of "Prince Igor" clo the program with the orchestra a chorus functioning as one.

* * *

The Boston Symphony orches giving a recital in New York this noon. Mr. Koussevitszky is pres a novelty in the performance of "C Windows" by Respeghi.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 12 1927

"A Joyous Epic"

(H. T. P. in Boston Evening Transcript.)

The elder, like the younger, American composers answer to the spirit of the time. On occasion, they put by deep thoughts and make merry; forego "world-themes" and find subject-matter around the corner. With a smile on his face, as one who has enjoyed the job, Mr. Converse lately finished such a piece of music. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has a quick and sympathetic ear for native humors in tones, has received it for performance next month at the Symphony concerts. "Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, while by sub-title it is "A Joyous Epic." The purpose is plain: to celebrate a characteristic American product and to follow it briefly on its way through the American world. Hence, for beginning, "Dawn in Detroit;" next a "March of the Workers," cheerfully on the way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford Factory—a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born—this "Flivver 10,000,000"—to the sound of Skriabin-like trumpets. Smoothly it runs upon the roads. Its progress is interrupted by what Mr. Converse's students at the Conservatory have wantonly named "the petting scene." More modestly, he labels it "America's Romance." It befalls on the night of May by the roadside; it is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

"Flivver 10,000,000" resumes the road. In a collision Fate assails it; but with many a creak and strain, it rights itself, according to the notorious habit of the species; vanishes, still wheezing, into dimmer and dimmer distance. . . . Mr. Converse and Mr. Koussevitzky do well when they lead such an American music into the Symphony Concerts. In substance and in spirit, it is more of this American hour than a bale of symphonies and three cases of tone-poems. There is only to add that the orchestra will be enriched by

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
MAR 12 1927

OTHER MUSIC.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society participated. The program opened with Rimsky-Korsakow's "Sadko," a tone-poem, included, before the intermission, the Second Symphony of Brahms, and closed with three numbers for orchestra and chorus: Ducasse's "Sarabande," Hugo Wolf's "The Fire Rider," and the Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

* * *

WE ARE beholden to Mr. Koussewitsky for playing us the "Sadko," last given in New York at a concert of this same orchestra during the reign of Pierre Monteux. Here is another of Rimksy's glowing sound legends; here, again, we are reminded of Paul Rosenfeld's accurate metaphor: that Rimsky's tonal canvases are the illustrations of fairy lore. "Sadko" might be played more often, though it lacks the inspired brilliance of "Scheherazade." It colorfully tells the tale of a Russian merchant prince who with his music roused the subjects of the sea king to bacchanalian violences. Mr. Koussewitsky's Brahms was a trifle theatric, but in the trio of choral works he made ample demonstration of his finer gifts. Ducasse's poem, the "Sarabande" (with wordless parts sung by small chorus) was exquisitely done, and imagination vivified the performance of Wolf's magnificent "Fire Rider." The Dances from "Prince Igor" were lustily accomplished.

F. A.

* * *

WE must permit ourselves a word of congratulation to Mr. Laubenthal for his Siegfried at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon. Comparisons are sometimes heartless, and so it must be granted Mr. Laubenthal he is, for all his strangulations of tone, his disputes with the pitch, a better protagonist of the Ring's third drama than Mr. Kirchoff, Mr. Schorr, Mr. Bolch, Mr. Schuetzendorf and Mr. Wolfe sang yesterday. The Bruennhilde was Mme. Larsen-Todsen, the Erda was Karin Branzell. In the evening a third representation of "The King's Henchmen" took place with the familiar cast inclu

Gubin N.Y.

Respighi's "Church Windows" Unveiled by Koussevitzky at Boston Symphony

By LAWREN

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

I. Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko." A Tone Picture, Op. 5.
II. Respighi, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four Impressions for Orchestra.
I La fuga in Egitto (The Flight Into Egypt.)
II San Michele Arcangelo (The Archangel Michael.)
III Il Mattutino di Santa Chiara. (The Matin of Saint Clara.)
IV San Gregorio Magno (Saint Gregory the Great.)
(First time in New York)
III. Ducasse, Sarabande, Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Voices.
IV. Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra. Op. 30.
V. Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor" for orchestra with chorus.
The Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, Conducter
Soloist, Charles Stratton

OTTORINO RESPIGHI as a music-maker is enamored of the Italian scene—happily and rightly, for its sounds and colors and implications are deeply rooted in his Latin soul. He cannot forget the sound of Roman fountains, the sight of them under changing lights, or the suggestions that the ancient pines of the Villa Borghese or the Appian Way stir in his racial memory. And now, having sat in fancy or actuality in various Italian churches, with the sunlight falling through stained glass windows and patterning their figured legends upon his far-wandering imagination, he has set to music the visions they have summoned.

Mr. Koussevitzky let us hear their precipitation in orchestral sound at the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday, for the first time in New York (he had accomplished their first performance anywhere at a concert on the Orchestra's native heath a fortnight ago). They are still in manuscript.

* * *

"Four Impressions for Orchestra," Respighi calls them, with the general title, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four brief tone-poems for orchestra they actually are. Music, said Whitman, is what awakes in you when you are reminded by the instruments. Mr. Respighi's four orchestral "Vetrate di Chiesa" convey to us what awoke in him when he was reminded by certain pictured legends, holy myths, recorded miracles, transilluminated by a Latin sun.

* * *

Looking into the deep glow of the imaging glass, he was reminded of the Flight into Egypt, and he would paint in tones for us "the little caravan on a starry night carrying the Treasure of the World," giving us music of grave pace and low tones; music half urgent, half awed.

Again he looked and saw the sunlight of high heaven reflected from the flaming sword of the Archangel Michael, prince of the celestial hosts, warring against the enemies of the Lord, blinding the eyes of the rebellious angels—Michael in his flashing armor, with a glory round his head. (Mr. Respighi lived too late, alas, to have seen the buckler of Michael, covered with red velvet, used in his war with Lucifer, which was shown in a Norman church as late as 1607, until a hardhearted Bishop withdrew it from the public gaze.)

* * *

Yet again, Mr. Respighi looked into the jeweled fires, now dimmed and quiet in the fading light, and was reminded of the ancient Umbrian world of St. Francis, and of the fountains that deepen the peace of the old garden of Saint Claire, and of the distant bells that cross faintly the plain of Assisi through the thin blue dusk, with the silver-leaved olive trees and the heights beyond.

And he thought of Saint Claire herself, who was the young and radiant Lady Claire, and became the most devout disciple and "noble plant" of St. Francis, exchanging her patrician robes for sackcloth, and her pearl-stiff girdle for a cincture of rope, and letting her long, bright hair, shorn by Francis's hand, fall at her feet, whilst she veiled her sweet face in black. It was for her that St. Francis built with his own hands a few rough cells in the little convent of St. Damian; and it was there, near her garden and her fountain, that she fell ill and, lamenting that she had not strength to attend the matins at the Church of St. Francis, was miraculously transported there and was afterward borne back to her bed, greatly comforted.

* * *

Finally, Mr. Respighi, looking into his mirroring windows, was aware of a rich and splendid blaze of light, or away, and he beheld Saint Gregory the Great in all his papal glory, blessing the throng, as a thousand candles flamed through the haze of incense and set fire to the last of these fenestral pictures of a haunting past.

* * *

All this, and more, Mr. Respighi has striven to import into his music. To say that he has scarcely succeeded is not an overwhelming reproach to him. The themes are profound and exquisite and tremendous enough to provoke wonder that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite a Wagner or a Straus or a Debussy or a Loeffler, should have been able at any point even to graze the hem of his poetical imaginings. At his worst, as in the music that would evoke for us the pontifical magnificence of Gregory, he is, to be sure, a somewhat distressing spectacle as he seeks to raise himself by the straps of Wagners' seven league boots. Is Mr. Respighi's allusion to the "Parsifal" bell theme, by the way, an intentional quotation? Even if it is, the reminder of the introduction to "Träume" surely is not!

* * *

This is the poorest of the four tone-

1/2

SIC Mar 12

ICE GILMAN

poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. "The Flight into Egypt" is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of "Pelléas" put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of bluster-ing impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucence, so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis' day—that water itself had been washed and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Signor Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, "at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars."

New Real Estate offerings are coming on the market every day. Keep watching the Herald Tribune classified columns.—Advt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 12 1927

Flivver Symphony Ready for Boston

Musical Saga of Ford Automobile Finished by Frederick S. Converse.

BOSTON, March 11—The ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prolog is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 11 1927

The Boston Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor; assisted by the Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston. Carnegie Hall. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

PROGRAM

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Pictures at an Exhibition.....Moussorgsky-Ravel
Sept, ils sont sept (Invocation for tenor, chorus and orchestra) (Op. 30)....Prokofieff
First time in New York
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices).....Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept (repeated).....Prokofieff
Prolovstian Dances from "Prince Igor".....Borodin

Mr. Koussevitzky put into practice at last night's Boston Symphony concert a belief which we happen to share with him—namely, that new works, novel in style and content, should be repeated on the same program. So, having duly performed as the third number on his list the remarkable novelty by Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sont sept" (music little calculated to woo the ear of the conformist), he repeated it as the fifth number, after a tactfully assuaging interjection provided by Ducasse's "Sarabande" (one of Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic offerings of a year ago). At least, we assume that he carried [illegible] this programatic scheme, for we were unable to permit ourselves the luxury of a second hearing of Prokofieff's work.

* * *

A single hearing of the piece (which was quite new to this region, though the music is ten years old) was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art.

Prokofieff has set for tenor, chorus and orchestra the text of a poem by the Russian poet, Balmont, based upon a strange and baleful cuneiform inscription found at Mesopotamia in an excavated temple of the Akkadians, a people more ancient than the Babylonians. The inscription, and the poem from which it derives, embody formulas of incantation against seven monstrous demons, bringers of unimaginable evil, who, according to the belief of the terrified Akkadians, were the horrible multi-tongued fountain of all human woe. The tenor voice utters the shattering, high-pitched incantation of the priest, screaming his frenzied conjurations against the menacing blackness of the pagan night:

> Seven, they are seven!
> In the deep abyss,
> They are seven!
> Divine skies, conjure them!
> Sacred soil, conjure them!

In the background, thronging about him, the chorus surges, beseeching, tumultuous, fanatical, uttering the faith and the entreaty of the believers, who cannot quite believe in aught but the horrors that their own imaginings conjure out of the dark mysteriousness of the world.

* * *

Prokofieff has embodied this tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmness of human contacts.

The music was startlingly well done last night by the chorus of the Cecilia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose), by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor, by Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

The work will be repeated at Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony: with which hint to "the elite and honorable minority" this report must cease.

From
TIMES
Indianapolis, Ind.
MAR 11 192

BOSTON—The lowly "flivver" has been made the subject of a symphonic composition recently completed by Frederick S. Converse for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The ultra-modern music, entitled "Flivver 10,000,000," sketches the life of an auto from its Detroit factory, through a petting scene by the roadside, and a collision.

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES
MUSIC EPIC OF A FORD IN 'FLIVVER 10,000,000'
TIMES MAR 11
F. S. Converse Writes Symphony for Boston Orchestra Which Sketches Life of an Auto.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., March 9.—The ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the Symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prologue is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 11 1927

Like a frightened wind in a sibylline cave, Serge Prokofieff's incantation, "Sept, ils sont sept!" for the first time sent shivers through Carnegie Hall last night. Twice it was done, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Cecilia Society chorus of Boston, and Charles Stratton, tenor; and its eerie exorcism of the seven evil demons of Mesopotamia brought approval which drowned out the militant hissing of certain sceptics by the rear exit.

The program began in orthodoxy with Weber's "Oberon" Overture and was concluded with a rendition of Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," by orchestra and chorus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROOKLYN TIMES
MAR 12 1927

Music Notes

The Fourth Boston

Serge Koussevitsky brought h[illegible] Boston Symphony Society to t[illegible] Academy of Music last night for th[illegible] fourth in the series of five concer[illegible] planned this season for Brooklynite[illegible] The program selected was slight[illegible] different from previous offerin[illegible] here in that the soloists for the ev[illegible] ning proved to be the Cecilia Soci[illegible] of Boston.

The conductor opened his progra[illegible] with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Sadk[illegible] tone picture, a work not unkno[illegible] but somewhat unfamiliar in th[illegible] days of Strauss. Mr. Koussevit[illegible] read the work with a determinat[illegible] to bring out its descriptive val[illegible] with the result that only a ballet [illegible] necessary to give the visual touch.

The Brahms No. 2 followed w[illegible] the conductor giving a refresh[illegible] rendition and his musicians foll[illegible] ing his every whim and mood. W[illegible] losing no essential virility, the c[illegible] ductor refused to be led into any[illegible] aggeration and gave the second[illegible] adagio movement a broad read[illegible] with the final allegro con spirit[illegible] dashing and vigorous mood.

Roger Ducasse's "Sarabande" [illegible] Hugo Wolfe's "Fire Rider" gave [illegible] choral assistants an opportunity [illegible] be heard. In both instances [illegible] voices were utilized as adjuncts [illegible] the orchestra. The Ducasse w[illegible] offered wordless choral parts [illegible] in this we had an effective presen[illegible] tion without the chorus interfer[illegible] with the role of the orchestra, but [illegible] the Wolfe with the verses in E[illegible] lish the diction was inferior and [illegible] words were lost in the crashes of [illegible] orchestra and only the tone [illegible] color survived.

The Polovtsian dances from [illegible] second act of "Prince Igor" clo[illegible] the program with the orchestra [illegible] chorus functioning as one.

* * *

The Boston Symphony orches[illegible] giving a recital in New York this [illegible] noon. Mr. Koussevitszky is pres[illegible] a novelty in the performance of "[illegible] Windows" by Respeghi.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 12 1927

"A Joyous Epic"

(H. T. P. in Boston Evening Transcript.)

The elder, like the younger, American composers answer to the spirit of the time. On occasion, they put by deep thoughts and make merry; forego "world-themes" and find subject-matter around the corner. With a smile on his face, as one who has enjoyed the job, Mr. Converse lately finished such a piece of music. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has a quick and sympathetic ear for native humors in tones, has received it for performance next month at the Symphony concerts. "Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, while by sub-title it is "A Joyous Epic." The purpose is plain: to celebrate a characteristic American product and to follow it briefly on its way through the American world. Hence, for beginning, "Dawn in Detroit;" next a "March of the Workers," cheerfully on the way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford Factory—a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born—this "Flivver 10,000,000"—to the sound of Skriabin-like trumpets. Smoothly it runs upon the roads. Its progress is interrupted by what Mr. Converse's students at the Conservatory have wantonly named "the petting scene." More modestly, he labels it "America's Romance." It befalls on the night of May by the roadside; it is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

"Flivver 10,000,000" resumes the road. In a collision Fate assails it; but with many a creak and strain, it rights itself, according to the notorious habit of the species; vanishes, still wheezing, into dimmer and dimmer distance. . . . Mr. Converse and Mr. Koussevitzky do well when they lead such an American music into the Symphony Concerts. In substance and in spirit, it is more of this American hour than a bale of symphonies and three cases of tone-poems. There is only to add that the orchestra will be enriched by [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
MAR 12 1927

OTHER MUSIC.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society participated. The program opened with Rimsky-Korsakow's "Sadko," a tone-poem, included, before the intermission, the Second Symphony of Brahms, and closed with three numbers for orchestra and chorus: Ducasse's "Sarabande," Hugo Wolf's "The Fire Rider," and the Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

* * *

WE ARE beholden to Mr. Koussewitsky for playing us the "Sadko," last given in New York at a concert of this same orchestra during the reign of Pierre Monteux. Here is another of Rimksy's glowing sound legends; here, again, we are reminded of Paul Rosenfeld's accurate metaphor: that Rimsky's tonal canvases are the illustrations of fairy lore. "Sadko" might be played more often, though it lacks the inspired brilliance of "Scheherazade." It colorfully tells the tale of a Russian merchant prince who with his music roused the subjects of the sea king to bacchanalian violences. Mr. Koussewitsky's Brahms was a trifle theatric, but in the trio of choral works he made ample demonstration of his finer gifts. Ducasse's poem, the "Sarabande" (with wordless parts sung by small chorus) was exquisitely done, and imagination vivified the performance of Wolf's magnificent "Fire Rider." The Dances from "Prince Igor" were lustily accomplished.

F. A.

* * *

WE must permit ourselves a word of congratulation to Mr. Laubenthal for his Siegfried at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon. Comparisons are sometimes heartless, and so it must be granted Mr. Laubenthal he is, for all his strangulations of tone, his disputes with the pitch, a better protagonist of the Ring's third drama than Mr. Kirchoff. Mr. Schorr, Mr. Bolch, Mr. Schuetzendorf and Mr. Wolfe sang yesterday. The Bruennhilde was Mme. Larsen-Todsen, the Erda was Karin Branzell. In the evening a third representation of "The King's Henchmen" took place with the familiar cast [illegible]

Gubin N.Y.
Respighi's "Church Windows" Unveiled by Koussevitzky at Boston Symphony

By LAWREN[illegible]

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

I. Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko." A Tone Picture. Op. 5.
II. Respighi, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four Impressions for Orchestra.
I La fuga in Egitto (The Flight Into Egypt.)
II San Michele Arcangelo (The Archangel Michael.)
III Il Mattutino di Santa Chiara (The Matin of Saint Clara.)
IV San Gregorio Magno (Saint Gregory the Great.)
(First time in New York)
III. Ducasse, Sarabande, Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Voices.
IV. Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sent sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra. Op. 30.
V. Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor" for orchestra with chorus.

The Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, Conducter
Soloist, Charles Stratton

OTTORINO RESPIGHI as a music-maker is enamored of the Italian scene—happily and rightly, for its sounds and colors and implications are deeply rooted in his Latin soul. He cannot forget the sound of Roman fountains, the sight of them under changing lights, or the suggestions that the ancient pines of the Villa Borghese or the Appian Way stir in his racial memory. And now, having sat in fancy or actuality in various Italian churches, with the sunlight falling through stained glass windows and patterning their figured legends upon his far-wandering imagination, he has set to music the visions they have summoned.

Mr. Koussevitzky let us hear their precipitation in orchestral sound at the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday, for the first time in New York (he had accomplished their first performance anywhere at a concert on the Orchestra's native heath a fortnight ago). They are still in manuscript.

* * *

"Four Impressions for Orchestra," Respighi calls them, with the general title, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four brief tone-poems for orchestra they actually are. Music, said Whitman, is what awakes in you when you are reminded by the instruments. Mr. Respighi's four orchestral "Vetrate di Chiesa" convey to us what awoke in him when he was reminded by certain pictured legends, holy myths, recorded miracles, transilluminated by a Latin sun.

* * *

Looking into the deep glow of the imaging glass, he was reminded of the Flight into Egypt, and he would paint in tones for us "the little caravan on a starry night carrying the Treasure of the World," giving us music of grave pace and low tones; music half urgent, half awed.

Again he looked and saw the sunlight of high heaven reflected from the flaming sword of the Archangel Michael, prince of the celestial hosts, warring against the enemies of the Lord, blinding the eyes of the rebellious angels—Michael in his flashing armor, with a glory round his head. (Mr. Respighi lived too late, alas, to have seen the buckler of Michael, covered with red velvet, used in his war with Lucifer, which was shown in a Norman church as late as 1607, until a hardhearted Bishop withdrew it from the public gaze.)

* * *

Yet again, Mr. Respighi looked into the jeweled fires, now dimmed and quiet in the fading light, and was reminded of the ancient Umbrian world of St. Francis, and of the fountains that deepen the peace of the old garden of Saint Claire, and of the distant bells that cross faintly the plain of Assisi through the thin blue dusk, with the silver-leaved olive trees and the heights beyond.

And he thought of Saint Claire herself, who was the young and radiant Lady Claire, and became the most devout disciple and "noble plant" of St. Francis, exchanging her patrician robes for sackcloth, and her pearl-stiff girdle for a cincture of rope, and letting her long, bright hair, shorn by Francis's hand, fall at her feet, whilst she veiled her sweet face in black. It was for her that St. Francis built with his own hands a few rough cells in the little convent of St. Damian; and it was there, near her garden and her fountain, that she fell ill and, lamenting that she had not strength to attend the matins at the Church of St. Francis, was miraculously transported there and was afterward borne back to her bed, greatly comforted.

* * *

Finally, Mr. Respighi, looking into his mirroring windows, was aware of a rich and splendid blaze of light, and he beheld Saint Gregory the Great in all his papal glory, blessing the throng, as a thousand candles flamed through the haze of incense and set fire to the last of these fenestral pictures of a haunting past.

* * *

All this, and more, Mr. Respighi has striven to import into his music. To say that he has scarcely succeeded is not an overwhelming reproach to him. The themes are profound and exquisite and tremendous enough to provoke wonder that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite a Wagner or a Straus or a Debussy or a Loeffler, should have been able at any point even to graze the hem of his poetical imaginings. At his worst, as in the music that would evoke for us the pontifical magnificence of Gregory, he is, to be sure, a somewhat distressing spectacle as he seeks to raise himself by the straps of Wagners' seven league boots. Is Mr. Respighi's allusion to the "Parsifal" bell theme, by the way, an intentional quotation? Even if it is, the reminder of the introduction to "Träume" surely is not!

* * *

This is the poorest of the four tone-

SIC Mar 12
ICE GILMAN

poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. "The Flight into Egypt" is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of "Pelléas" put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of blustering impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucence, so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis' day—that water itself had been washed and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Signor Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, "at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars."

New Real Estate offerings are coming on the market every day. Keep watching the Herald Tribune classified columns.—Advt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 12 1927

Flivver Symphony Ready for Boston

Musical Saga of Ford Automobile Finished by Frederick S. Converse.

BOSTON, March 11—The ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prolog is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO

MAR 12 1927

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music

The season's fourth concert in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was held last night at the Academy of Music. The audience seemed to number more than at preceding concerts this year, due perhaps to the novelty offered by the appearance with the orchestra of the Cecilia Society (also from Boston), a large mixed vocal chorus under the direction of Malcolm Lang. The programme was:

"Sadko," A Tone Picture, Op. 5 (Rimsky-Korsakoff); Second Symphony (Brahms); Sarabande, Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Voices (Ducasse); "Der Feuerreiter" (The Fire-Rider), for Chorus and Orchestra (Hugo Wolf); Polovtsian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor," for Orchestra with Chorus.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," although touched here and there with the inspired accents of a master, does not in its entirety measure up to other serious works by the famous Russian, either in thematic content, contrapuntal development or variety of interest in harmonic structure. It is a fair opening number when other more meaty and weighty things are to follow, and that is about all that can be said for it.

The D major symphony of Brahms is frequently heard in Brooklyn, its last performance having been under Herbert J. Braham's conductorship at the December concert by the Brooklyn Orchestra Society.

The opening movement impresses one at once with its sprightly freshness and wonderfully lyric pastorical utterance. It is truly a Teutonic spring song of inexpressible beauty, sweetness and purity. In the noble second movement (Adagio non troppo), the greatest and highest reach of the work, one felt a certain lack of cohesion and indefiniteness in the interpretation of Mr. Koussevitzky. There were unplumbed depths of nobility and grandeur, uncharted seas of emotion and sentiment. Nor did Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the finale (Allegro con spirito) raise the interest or value of the complete performance. His emphatic articulation of the ostinato figure which underlies the opening theme, to the subordination of the latter, reminded one of the fact that the Russian conductor began his musical career as a player of the contrabass. Mr. Koussevitzky also took peculiar liberties with the mysterious phrase in triplets midway in the movement. It was a rousing finale, perhaps, but fell short in full musical justice to Brahms' wonted climaxes and brilliantly powerful symphonic endings. It became evident, throughout the symphony, that the entire standard of Mr. Koussevitzky's direction was somewhat tainted with a trite perfunctoriness and lack of vital interest in the work itself. A similar impression of the indifference that has marked this conductor's work of late was noted during his reading of the Cesar Franck symphony at last month's Brooklyn concert by the Boston orchestra.

Roger Ducasse's "Sarabande," which figured on Toscanini's programmes of a year ago, is modern in trend, with the basic harmonic structure erected on the whole-tone scale. The number has very little to say of vital interest and says that little none too well. Hugo Wolf's number, originally a setting for voice and piano (of Morike's poem), and later arranged by the composer for chorus and orchestra, evinced sparks of the master song writer's genius and was the outstanding number of the three in which last night's visiting chorus took part. The singing of the Cecilia Society showed vocal training of a superior quality. The ensemble was pleasant to listen to and the body of singers were good to look upon. It was withal a real novelty in these programmes.

The Boston Symphony's concluding concert in Brooklyn will take place on Friday evening, April 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be heard next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, in the first performance of a symphony lately composed for this orchestra by Alexander Tansman, the Polish artist. As soloist at this concert, Richard Burgin, concertmaster, will appear with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Glazounov. Handel's "Water Music" will open, and Weber's "Oberon" overture will close the program. TRAV

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

As the week of the Beethoven draws near, it is announced that all seats have been taken for the opening and closing performances of March 22 and 29, at which the Master's Mass and last two symphonies will be played.

Seats are still available for March 23 when the first three symphonies will be played. March 24, when chamber music will be played by the London String quartet and a pianist to be announced, and March 28, when there will be commemorative exercises with an address by Ernest Newman, and the Last Quartet performed by the Lenox String quartet. MAR 12

MASS TO BE REPEATED

The pending performance of Beethoven's Missa Solennis at the coming centennial festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, is of the highest interest because this great score, owing to its extreme difficulties, is so seldom given. All seats having been long since taken for the performance on March 22, the Mass will be repeated on the following Sunday, March 27, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davidson's choruses at Harvard and Radcliffe have generously offered their services, and the quartet of soloists will be the same as at the first performance.

N Y WORLD MU

By Samue

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Assisted by the Cecilia Society chorus and Charles Stratton, tenor. At Carnegie Hill.

THE PROGRAM

"Sadko," tone picture....Rimsky-Korsakov
"Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") four impressions, for orchestra, Respighi
First time in New York.
Saraband, symphonic poem for orchestra and voices.....Ducasse
"Sept, ils sont cept!" (incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra)...Prokofieff
Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin

The Boston Orchestra

At their matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra presented Respighi's latest work, "Church Windows," a suite in four movements, as a first time in New York.

Mr. Respighi seems to find inspiration in musical categories. The success of his "Fountains of Rome" proved that the new form was as grateful to the listener as the composer. I think the form of the "Fountains" and its successors, the "Pines of Rome" and the new "Church Windows" is new, though it closely resembles the old-fashioned symphonic suite. It is new because all the movements in the suite are variations not of a certain melody or theme but of an idea. In this way each movement is a distinct entity, though the same idea underlies the work as a whole. Evidently in "Church Windows" Respighi desired to represent a few of the salient aspects of the Church of Rome as pictured in stained glass legends. The four movements are called "The Flight Into Egypt," "The Archangel Michael," "The Matin of St. Clara" and "Gregory the Great" and bear no thematic relation to each other. Yet the composition is homogeneous through the use of old church modes and not a little through the binding effect of the title.

Respighi has been more successful in "The Matin of St. Clara" section than in the others. I don't remember who St. Clara was, but the music about her is wistful and tender. It breathes of a delicate piety and guileless acts of charity, a saint in whom one can confide as one who will understand and be indulgent. "The Flight Into Egypt," on the other hand, seemed to me a sanctimonious narrative containing nothing of the dramatic quality of the momentous incident. "The Archangel Michael" was noisily militant and "Gregory the Great" a most pompous successor to St. Peter.

The incantation "Sept, ils sont sept" for tenor, chorus and orchestra by Prokofieff, for which Mr. Koussevitzky imported the St. Cecilia Chorus of Boston, is effective as a supplication of a superstitious folk to the seven evil spirits who rule the destinies of men. Musically not much can be said in its favor. The Ducasse "Sarabande" for orchestra and voices was not even effective. The real music of the afternoon came at the beginning, with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and at the end with the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." A large audience applauded Mr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra, the St. Cecilia Chorus and Mr. Charles Straton, the tenor soloist.

SIC MAR 12

Chotzinoff

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

TIMES MAR 12

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was again one of superlative technical brilliancy and of unusual interest in the character of the program. The purely orchestral compositions were the Weber "Oberon" overture and the Moussorgsky "Pictures From an Exposition," with Ravel's orchestration. The presence of the Cecilia Society of Boston and of Charles Stratton, tenor, enabled Mr. Koussevitsky to give the first performance in New York of Prokofieff's "Incantation" for tenor, chorus and orchestra, after an ancient cuneiform inscription, "Sept, ils sont sept." There were also performed the "Sarabande," symphonic poem for orchestra and voices, of Ducasse, and the "Polovstian Dances" from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Mr. Koussevitsky produced "Sept, ils sont sept" at his concert in the [illegible] House May 29, 1924. The program consisted principally of modern and ultra-modern music. Prokofieff was present in wholly conventional garb, looking as bland and as innocent of Akkadian inscriptions and their implications of cruelty and terror as any baby of this strange twentieth century "Sept, ils sont sept," was played twice at that concert, a wise proceeding, repeated last night.

The Seven are the seven horrible demons of Akkadian belief, authors of all human woe. They are in the sky and the abyss; they rise in the west, they loom in the east; their immensity fills heaven and earth; they grind men as men grind grain. The effect of text and music is that of exhorter and a crowd of fanatical believers. There is breathless repetition of the cries and execrations of the leaders by the chorus. There are mad incantations, ceremonies, supplications. The chorus invokes the wrathful deities with a march-like chant, over which the solo voice incites and exhorts. The mood becomes more breathless, more terrified. Suddenly there are soft, sustained harmonies by the orchestra, through which, as through a veil, are heard the subdued mutterings of many voices—the worshipers, overcome with awe and terror. This final effect is a good idea, but perhaps the weakest part of the piece, the most obviously theatrical.

The whole work savors of the theatrical. But what theatre! What rhymthical impact, what barbaric fury! Perhaps this barbarism is a little conscious, a little sophisticated in its technic. Mr. Prokofieff had drawn upon the ancient Scythians for studies in musical primitivism before he tried the Akkadians; and before that one Stravinsky had set the fashion with a work that still overshadows all of its successors. Hence the flavor of "Sept, ils sont sept," is not quite as new, and has not quite the tang that it had even three years ago. It remains, nevertheless an exciting and extremely effective piece of music. Mr. Stratton and the Cecilia Society acquitted themselves well of a very difficult task twice visited upon them.

There was another Russian on last night's program whose music, more familiar than that of Prokofieff, requires less description, but that music is abundant, overflowing with originality and genius. We refer to Moussorgsky and his "Pictures at an Exhibition" and their orchestration, which is also an act of genius, by Ravel. Nor would the word genius be very far from the point as regarded Mr. Koussevitsky's revelation of the contents of these amazing pieces.

Still another Russian, Borodin by name, knew how to write music, and drew from mysterious sources of his land and his blood—he was the natural son of a Georgian Prince—the wild, sweet, nomadic flavor of his music. The wind of the steppes sweeps through his beautiful, vigorous and now familiar score, and the spirit of the East is in the dances. Mr. Koussevitsky saw to it, in spite of choral cooperation that was not decisive, that the music sounded. In Ducasse's "Sarabande" the intonation of the singers was defective. The work itself is mannered and rather aridly post-Debussyan. The compositions of Prokofieff and Moussorgsky, above all Moussorgsky, were the commanding moments of the evening.

The Boston Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor, assisted by the Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston. Carnegie Hall. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

PROGRAM

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel
Sept, ils sont sept (invocation for tenor chorus and orchestra) Op. 30...Prokofieff
First time in New York
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices).....Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept (repeated)....Prokofieff
Prolovstian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin

Mr. Koussevitzky put into practice at last night's Boston Symphony concert a belief which we happen to share with him—namely, that new works, novel in style and content, should be repeated on the same program. So, having duly performed as the third number on his list the remarkable novelty by Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sont sept" (music little calculated to woo the ear of the conformist), he repeated it as the fifth number, after a tactfully assuaging interjection provided by Roger-Ducasse's 'Sarabande" (one of Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic offerings of a year ago). At least, we assume that he carried out this programatic scheme, for we were unable to permit ourselves the luxury of a second hearing of Prokofieff's work.

* * *

A single hearing of the piece (which was quite new to this region, though the music is ten years old) was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art.

Prokofieff has set for tenor, chorus and orchestra the text of a poem by the Russian poet, Balmont, based upon a strange and baleful cuneiform inscription found at Mesopotamia in an excavated temple of the Akkadians, a people more ancient than the Babylonians. The inscription, and the poem from which it derives, embody formulas of incantation against seven monstrous demons, bringers of unimaginable evil, who, according to the belief of the terrified Akkadians, were the horrible multi-tongued fountain of all human woe. The tenor voice utters the shattering, high-pitched incantation of the priest, screaming his frenzied conjurations against the menacing blackness of the pagan night:

Seven, they are seven!
In the deep abyss,
[illegible]

Sacred soil, conjure them!

In the background, thronging about him, the chorus surges, beseeching, tumultuous, fanatical, uttering the faith and the entreaty of the believers, who cannot quite believe in aught but the horrors that their own imaginings summon out of the dark mysteriousness of the world.

* * *

Prokofieff has embodied this tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmness of human contacts.

The music was startlingly well done last night by the chorus of the Cecilia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose), by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor, by Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

The work will be repeated at Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony: with which hint to "the acute and honorable minority" this report must cease.

N Y MUSIC TIMES

MAR By OLIN DOWNES. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those "pessimistically" or "conservatively" inclined—"conservatively" meaning, in the eyes of the smart ones, whoever prefers for any reason an old piece of music to a new one, or remarks on the patent deficiencies of a composition that delights the sophomoric—might have found good grounds for such leanings in the program offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by Mr. Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charles Stratton, tenor, and the Cecilia Society.

When all is said and done, what was the most fascinating and inspired music on the program? Certainly the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," repeated from the concert of the preceding Thursday, and the symphonic poem, "Sadko," of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Between these two works, which opened and ended the program, were a composition of Respighi, new to this city, "Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows); the Sarabande of Dukas, and Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept"—these last two also repetitions. Respighi, who has written in various movements of fountains and pines and now of church windows, utilizes a large orchestra and discharges platitudes, Ducasse is imitative, post-Debussyan, and sterile of original ideas. Prokofieff is another matter, but the gulf between him and his two great predecessors is more than one of time, or of technic. It is one of spontaneity and feeling.

And feeling, after all, is important. It surcharges the somewhat thin invention and workmanship of Rimsky-Korsakoff—elementary by the side of that of the modern Russian—with an unforgettable beauty and romantic vision. It lifts Borodin to the skies, even after the amazing orchestration, the delineative power, of M. Prokofieff in his sensationally dramatic creation.

It may be urged that the period of romanticism and the naïveté of the time and country of Borodin are things of the past, and no good weeping over them. Nevertheless, the emotion, the force of inspiration, the need of expression that compelled the earlier Russians to compose, must be at the basis of all living music; and the comparisons afforded by yesterday's concert were not to the advantage of the living.

The orchestra again played in very brilliant fashion. The performances of the chorus were better yesterday than on Thursday, in intonation, in certainty and quality of tone. But the steppes of Asia lie far from the Hub of the Universe.

[illegible] ducted.

Other Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought one of his provocative and interesting programs to Carnegie Hall last night, and, what is more, conducted works in which his distinguished talents shone with special brilliance.

The high light of the purely orchestral part of the program was the Ravel arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition." Ravel orchestrated this piano suite at Mr. Koussevitzky's request in 1923 and the conductor seems to pour his all into the interpretation—from the fantastic picture of the little gnome and the sly portrayal of the two Polish Jews, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, to the magnificent and majestic portrait of the gate at Kiev in the massive old Russian style.

For the remainder of the concert the Boston Orchestra had the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia Society, with Charles Stratton as soloist. To this impressive array of musicians was intrusted the first New York performance of Prokofieff's "Incantation" for tenor, chorus and orchestra, after an ancient cuneiform inscription, "Sept, ils sont sept."

Breathlessly exciting and theatrically feverish, this mad chant tells of the seven horrible demons of Akkadian belief.

They know not goodness nor kindness,
They are without regret, remorse;
They are deaf to prayer and entreaties,
They cause earth and sky to shrink.
They grind men as man grind grain.
Seven, they are seven!
Twice their number is seven!
Divine skies, conjure them!
Sacred soil, conjure them!

It is futile to try to convey with words the eerie, wild supplications of this chorus or the primitive, barbaric fury of the music. The effect, however, is that of an exhorter, and a throng of believers, fanatically terrorized, who finally are overcome with awe and utter subdued mutterings as the orchestra resolves the work into a smooth, sustained harmony.

Mr. Koussevitzky played "Sept, ils sont sept," twice last night, and with good effect. Certainly he provided one of the most exciting of musical moments.

W. H. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN

MAR 13 1927

Detroit Flivver Immortalized In Latest Symphony

[illegible]

Detroit [illegible] its leading [illegible] in music [illegible] cycle recently completed by Frederick S. Converse, well known Boston composer devoted to modern life, romance, adventure and [illegible] the flivver [illegible] ed "Flivver [illegible] verse for [illegible] on the staff of the New England Conservatory of Music, Harvard University [illegible] oratorio "Jason," The Pilgrim Fathers," and [illegible] has written [illegible] automobile [illegible] its first performance [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The flivver [illegible] prologue [illegible] which the [illegible] making [illegible] bile plant [illegible]

Workers [illegible] machine [illegible] [illegible] sound [illegible] of "Flivver [illegible] sequence [illegible] phony [illegible] lights [illegible] roads [illegible] by the [illegible] ping [illegible] party [illegible] Romance [illegible] through [illegible] sober [illegible] composer [illegible] of [illegible] to [illegible]

As [illegible] thought [illegible] a me[illegible] Gomez [illegible] "Flivver [illegible] ed as [illegible] nth dec[illegible] sical [illegible] by [illegible] by the [illegible] tra. [illegible] be heard [illegible]

FAYETTE [illegible]

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

As the week of the Beethoven [illegible] draws near, it is announced that all seats have been taken for the opening and closing performances of March 22 and 29, at which the Master's Mass and last two symphonies will be played.

Seats are still available for March 23, when the first three symphonies will be played; March 24, when chamber music will be played by the London string quartet and a pianist to be announced, and March 28, when there will be commemorative exercises, with an address by Mr. Newman, and the Last Quartet, performed by the Lenox string quartet. HER MAR 13

MASS FOR PENSION FUND

The pending performance of Beethoven's Missa Solennis at the coming centennial festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, is of the highest interest because this Mass, owing to its extreme difficulties, is so seldom given. It has not been heard in Boston since it was performed at the inauguration of Symphony hall in 1900. It will be heard in several cities of the new and old world during the centennial week.

All seats having been long since taken for the performance in Symphony hall on March 22, the Mass will be repeated on the following Sunday, March 27, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davisson's choruses at Harvard and Radcliffe have generously offered their services, and the quartet of soloists will be the same as at the first performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO

MAR 12 1927

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music

The season's fourth concert in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was held last night at the Academy of Music. The audience seemed to number more than at preceding concerts this year, due perhaps to the novelty offered by the appearance with the orchestra of the Cecilia Society (also from Boston), a large mixed vocal chorus under the direction of Malcolm Lang. The programme was:

"Sadko," A Tone Picture, Op. 5 (Rimsky-Korsakoff); Second Symphony (Brahms); Sarabande, Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Voices (Ducasse); "Der Feuerreiter" (The Fire-Rider), for Chorus and Orchestra (Hugo Wolf); Polovtsian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor," for Orchestra with Chorus.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," although touched here and there with the inspired accents of a master, does not in its entirety measure up to other serious works by the famous Russian, either in thematic content, contrapuntal development or variety of interest in harmonic structure. It is a fair opening number when other more meaty and weighty things are to follow, and that is about all that can be said for it.

The D major symphony of Brahms is frequently heard in Brooklyn, its last performance having been under Herbert J. Braham's conductorship at the December concert by the Brooklyn Orchestra Society.

The opening movement impresses one at once with its sprightly freshness and wonderfully lyric pastorical utterance. It is truly a Teutonic spring song of inexpressible beauty, sweetness and purity. In the noble second movement (Adagio non troppo), the greatest and highest reach of the work, one felt a certain lack of cohesion and indefiniteness in the interpretation of Mr. Koussevitzky. There were unplumbed depths of nobility and grandeur, uncharted seas of emotion and sentiment. Nor did Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the finale (Allegro con spirito) raise the interest or value of the complete performance. His emphatic articulation of the ostinato figure which underlies the opening theme, to the subordination of the latter, reminded one of the fact that the Russian conductor began his musical career as a player of the contrabass. Mr. Koussevitzky also took peculiar liberties with the mysterious phrase in triplets midway in the movement. It was a rousing finale, perhaps, but fell short in full musical justice to Brahms' wonted climaxes and brilliantly powerful symphonic endings. It became evident, throughout the symphony, that the entire standard of Mr. Koussevitzky's direction was somewhat tainted with a trite perfunctoriness and lack of vital interest in the work itself. A similar impression of the indifference that has marked this conductor's work of late was noted during his reading of the Cesar Franck symphony at last month's Brooklyn concert by the Boston orchestra.

Roger Ducasse's "Sarabande," which figured on Toscanini's programmes of a year ago, is modern in trend, with the basic harmonic structure erected on the whole-tone scale. The number has very little to say of vital interest and says that little none too well. Hugo Wolf's number, originally a setting for voice and piano (of Morike's poem), and later arranged by the composer for chorus and orchestra, evinced sparks of the master song writer's genius and was the outstanding number of the three in which last night's visiting chorus took part. The singing of the Cecilia Society showed vocal training of a superior quality. The ensemble was pleasant to listen to and the body of singers were good to look upon. It was withal a real novelty in these programmes.

The Boston Symphony's concluding concert in Brooklyn will take place on Friday evening, April 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be heard next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, in the first performance of a symphony lately composed for this orchestra by Alexander Tansman, the Polish artist. As soloist at this concert, Richard Burgin, concertmaster, will appear with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Glazounov. Handel's "Water Music" will open, and Weber's "Oberon" overture will close the program.

TRAV

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

As the week of the Beethoven draws near, it is announced that all seats have been taken for the opening and closing performances of March 22 and 29, at which the Master's Mass and last two symphonies will be played.

Seats are still available for March 23 when the first three symphonies will be

---

...March 24, when chamber mu... sic will be played by the London Strin... quartet and a pianist to be announce... and March 28, when there will be com... memorative exercises with an addres... by Ernest Newman, and the Last Quar... tet performed by the Lenox String quar... tet.

MAR 12

MASS TO BE REPEATED

The pending performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis at the coming centennial festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, is of the highest interest because this great score, owing to its extreme difficulties, is so seldom given. All seats having been long since taken for the performance on March 22, the Mass will be repeated on the following Sunday, March 27, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davidson's choruses at Harvard and Radcliffe have generously offered their services, and the quartet of soloists will be the same as at the first performance.

N Y WORLD MU

By Samue

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Assisted by the Cecelia Society chorus and Charles Stratton, tenor. At Carnegie Hill.

THE PROGRAM

"Sadko," tone picture.....Rimsky-Korsakov
"Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows") four impressions, for orchestra, Respighi

First time in New York.

Sarabande, symphonic poem for orchestra and voices.....Ducasse
"Sept, ils sont cept!" (incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra)...Prokofieff
Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin

The Boston Orchestra

At their matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra presented Respighi's latest work, "Church Windows," a suite in four movements, as a first time in New York.

Mr. Respighi seems to find inspiration in musical categories. The success of his "Fountains of Rome" proved that the new form was as grateful to the listener as the composer. I think the form of the "Fountains" and its successors, the "Pines of Rome" and the new "Church Windows" is new, though it closely resembles the old-fashioned symphonic suite. It is new because all the movements in the suite are variations not of a certain melody or theme but of an idea. In this way each movement is a distinct entity, though the same idea underlies the work as a whole. Evidently in "Church Windows" Respighi desired to represent a few of the salient aspects of the Church of Rome as pictured in stained glass legends. The four movements are called "The Flight Into Egypt," "The Archangel Michael," "The Matin of St. Clara" and "Gregory the Great" and bear no thematic relation to each other. Yet the composition is homogeneous through the use of old church modes and not a little through the binding effect of the title.

Respighi has been more successful in "The Matin of St. Clara" section than in the others. I don't remember who St. Clara was, but the music about her is wistful and tender. It breathes of a delicate piety and guileless acts of charity, a saint in whom one can confide as one who will understand and be indulgent. "The Flight Into Egypt," on the other hand, seemed to me a sanctimonious narrative containing nothing of the dramatic quality of the momentous incident. "The Archangel Michael" was noisily militant and "Gregory the Great" a most pompous successor to St. Peter.

---

SIC MAR 12

Chotzinoff

The incantation "Sept, ils sont sept" for tenor, chorus and orchestra by Prokofieff, for which Mr. Koussevitzky imported the St. Cecilia Chorus of Boston, is effective as a supplication of a superstitious folk to the seven evil spirits who rule the destinies of men. Musically not much can be said in its favor. The Ducasse "Sarabande" for orchestra and voices was not even effective. The real music of the afternoon came at the beginning, with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" and at the end with the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." A large audience applauded Mr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra, the St. Cecilia Chorus and Mr. Charles Straton, the tenor soloist.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

TIMES MAR 12

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was again one of superlative technical brilliancy and of unusual interest in the character of the program. The purely orchestral compositions were the Weber "Oberon" overture and the Moussorgsky "Pictures From an Exposition," with Ravel's orchestration. The presence of the Cecilia Society of Boston and of Charles Stratton, tenor, enabled Mr. Koussevitsky to give the first performance in New York of Prokofieff's "Incantation" for tenor, chorus and orchestra, after an ancient cuneiform inscription, "Sept, ils sont sept." There were also performed the "Sarabande," symphonic poem for orchestra and voices, of Ducasse, and the "Polovstian Dances" from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Mr. Koussevitsky produced "Sept, ils sont sept" at his concert in the ... House May 29, 1924. The program consisted principally of mod... ern and ultra-modern music. Prokofieff was present in wholly conventional garb, looking as bland and as innocent of Akkadian inscriptions and their implications of cruelty and terror as any baby of this strange twentieth century "Sept, ils sont sept," was played twice at that concert, a wise proceeding, repeated last night.

The Seven are the seven horrible demons of Akkadian belief, authors of all human woe. They are in the sky and the abyss; they rise in the west, they loom in the east; their immensity fills heaven and earth; they grind men as men grind grain. The effect of text and music is that of exhorter and a crowd of fanatical believers. There is breathless repetition of the cries and execrations of the leaders by the chorus. There are mad incantations, ceremonies, supplications. The chorus invokes the wrathful deities with a march-like chant, over which the solo voice incites and exhorts. The mood becomes more breathless, more terrified. Suddenly there are soft, sustained harmonies by the orchestra, through which, as through a veil, are heard the subdued mutterings of many voices—the worshipers, overcome with awe and terror. This final effect is a good idea, but perhaps the weakest part of the piece, the most obviously theatrical.

The whole work savors of the theatrical. But what theatre! What rhymthical impact, what barbaric fury! Perhaps this barbarism is a little conscious, a little sophisticated in its technic. Mr. Prokofieff had drawn upon the ancient Scythians for studies in musical primitivism before he tried the Akkadians; and before that one Stravinsky had set the fashion with a work that still overshadows all of its successors. Hence the flavor of "Sept, ils sont sept," is not quite as new, and has not quite the tang that it had even three years ago. It remains, nevertheless an exciting and extremely effective piece of music. Mr. Stratton and the Cecilia Society acquitted themselves well of a very difficult task twice visited upon them.

There was another Russian on last night's program whose music, more familiar than that of Prokofieff, requires less description, but that music is abundant, overflowing with originality and genius. We refer to Moussorgsky and his "Pictures at an Exhibition" and their orchestration, which is also an act of genius, by Ravel. Nor would the word genius be very far from the point as regarded Mr. Koussevitsky's revelation of the contents of these amazing pieces.

Still another Russian, Borodin by name, knew how to write music, and drew from mysterious sources of his land and his blood—he was the natural son of a Georgian Prince—the wild, sweet, nomadic flavor of his music. The wind of the steppes sweeps through his beautiful, vigorous and now familiar score, and the spirit of the East is in the dances. Mr. Koussevitsky saw to it, in spite of choral cooperation that was not decisive, that the music sounded. In Ducasse's "Sarabande" the intonation of the singers was defective. The work itself is mannered and rather aridly post-Debussyan. The compositions of Prokofieff and Moussorgsky, above all Moussorgsky, were the commanding moments of the evening.

The Boston Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor, assisted by the Cecilia Society Chorus of Boston. Carnegie Hall. Tenor soloist, Charles Stratton.

PROGRAM

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel
Sept, ils sont sept (invocation for tenor chorus and orchestra) Op. 30...Prokofieff
First time in New York
Sarabande (Symphonic Poem for orchestra and voices).....Roger-Ducasse
Sept, ils sont sept (repeated)....Prokofieff
Prolovstian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin

Mr. Koussevitzky put into practice at last night's Boston Symphony concert a belief which we happen to share with him—namely, that new works, novel in style and content, should be repeated on the same program. So, having duly performed as the third number on his list the remarkable novelty by Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sont sept" (music little calculated to woo the ear of the conformist), he repeated it as the fifth number, after a tactfully assuaging interjection provided by Roger-Ducasse's 'Sarabande" (one of Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic offerings of a year ago). At least, we assume that he carried out this programatic scheme, for we were unable to permit ourselves the luxury of a second hearing of Prokofieff's work.

* * *

A single hearing of the piece (which was quite new to this region, though the music is ten years old) was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art.

Prokofieff has set for tenor, chorus and orchestra the text of a poem by the Russian poet, Balmont, based upon a strange and baleful cuneiform inscription found at Mesopotamia in an excavated temple of the Akkadians, a people more ancient than the Babylonians. The inscription, and the poem from which it derives, embody formulas of incantation against seven monstrous demons, bringers of unimaginable evil, who, according to the belief of the terrified Akkadians, were the horrible multi-tongued fountain of all human woe. The tenor voice utters the shattering, high-pitched incantation of the priest, screaming his frenzied conjurations against the menacing blackness of the pagan night:

Seven, they are seven!
In the deep abyss,
...

Divine skies, conjure them!
Sacred soil, conjure them!

In the background, thronging about him, the chorus surges, beseeching, tumultuous, fanatical, uttering the faith and the entreaty of the believers, who cannot quite believe in aught but the horrors that their own imaginings summon out of the dark mysteriousness of the world.

* * *

Prokofieff has embodied this tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmness of human contacts.

The music was startlingly well done last night by the chorus of the Cecilia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose), by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor, by Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

The work will be repeated at Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony: with which hint to "the acute and honorable minority" this report must cease.

NY MUSIC TIMES MAR

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Those "pessimistically" or "conservatively" inclined—"conservatively" meaning, in the eyes of the smart ones, whoever prefers for any reason an old piece of music to a new one, or remarks on the patent deficiencies of a composition that delights the sophomoric—might have found good grounds for such leanings in the program offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by Mr. Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charles Stratton, tenor, and the Cecilia Society.

When all is said and done, what was the most fascinating and inspired music on the program? Certainly the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," repeated from the concert of the preceding Thursday, and the symphonic poem, "Sadko," of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Between these two works, which opened and ended the program, were a composition of Respighi, new to this city, "Vetrate di Chiesa" (Church Windows); the Sarabande of Dukas, and Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept"—these last two also repetitions. Respighi, who has written in various movements of fountains and pines and now of church windows, utilizes a large orchestra and discharges platitudes, Ducasse is imitative, post-Debussyan, and sterile of original ideas. Prokofieff is another matter, but the gulf between him and his two great predecessors is more than one of time, or of technic. It is one of spontaneity and feeling.

And feeling, after all, is important. It surcharges the somewhat thin invention and workmanship of Rimsky-Korsakoff—elementary by the side of that of the modern Russian—with an unforgettable beauty and romantic vision. It lifts Borodin to the skies, even after the amazing orchestration, the delineative power, of M. Prokofieff in his sensationally dramatic creation.

It may be urged that the period of romanticism and the naïveté of the time and country of Borodin are things of the past, and no good weeping over them. Nevertheless, the emotion, the force of inspiration, the need of expression that compelled the earlier Russians to compose, must be at the basis of all living music; and the comparisons afforded by yesterday's concert were not to the advantage of the living.

The orchestra again played in very brilliant fashion. The performances of the chorus were better yesterday than on Thursday, in intonation, in certainty and quality of tone. But the steppes of Asia lie far from the Hub of the Universe.

Other Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brought one of his provocative and interesting programs to Carnegie Hall last night, and, what is more, conducted works in which his distinguished talents shone with special brilliance.

The high light of the purely orchestral part of the program was the Ravel arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an exhibition." Ravel orchestrated this piano suite at Mr. Koussevitzky's request in 1923 and the conductor seems to pour his all into the interpretation—from the fantastic picture of the little gnome and the sly portrayal of the two Polish Jews, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, to the magnificent and majestic portrait of the gate at Kiev in the massive old Russian style.

For the remainder of the concert the Boston Orchestra had the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia Society, with Charles Stratton as soloist. To this impressive array of musicians was intrusted the first New York performance of Prokofieff's "Incantation" for tenor, chorus and orchestra, after an ancient cuneiform inscription, "Sept, ils sont sept."

Breathlessly exciting and theatrically feverish, this mad chant tells of the seven horrible demons of Akkadian belief.

They know not goodness nor kindness,
They are without regret, remorse;
They are deaf to prayer and entreaties,
They cause earth and sky to shrink.
They grind men as man grind grain.
Seven, they are seven!
Twice their number is seven!
Divine skies, conjure them!
Sacred soil, conjure them!

It is futile to try to convey with words the eerie, wild supplications of this chorus or the primitive, barbaric fury of the music. The effect, however, is that of an exhorter, and a throng of believers, fanatically terrorized, who finally are overcome with awe and utter subdued mutterings as the orchestra resolves the work into a smooth, sustained harmony.

Mr. Koussevitzky played "Sept, ils sont sept," twice last night, and with good effect. Certainly he provided one of the most exciting of musical moments.

W. H. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN

MAR 13 1927

Detroit Flivver Immortalized In Latest Symphony

(Special to ... Tribune.)

Detroit, Mich. —Detroit and its leading industry are enshrined in music through a symphonic cycle recently completed by Frederick S. Converse well known Boston composer devoted to the birth, life, romance, ... age and death of the flivver. The symphony entitled "Flivver 10,000,000," Mr. Converse, for many years a professor on the staffs of the New England Conseratory of Music and Harvard University and composer of the oratorio "Jab," "The Pipe of Desire," and other well known works, has written the musical epic of the automobile. The work is to have its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The flivver cycle opens with a prologue "Dawn in Detroit," after which the factorymen are heard making their way to the automobile plant in the "March of the Workers." The rattle and clang of machinery and the bustle of busy workmen are heard in a lively fugue, leading up to the trumpet sounds which announce the birth of "Flivver No. 10,000,000." In subsequent movements of the symphony the flivver careers gaily and lightly about over the smooth roads at the start of its life, parks by the roadside for a woodsy evening accompaniment for a petting party scene entitled "America's Romance," and then goes on through the musical stages of sober middle age and noisy decrepitude until it wheezes itself out of existence in a final diminuendo movement.

As Richard Strauss years ago was thought to have expressed the then acme of musical modernity in his Domestic Symphony, so Converse's "Flivver No. 10,000,000" is described as ultra modern to the present nth degree of modernity. Its musical merit however is testified to by its acceptance for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is not known when it will be heard in Detroit.

FAYETTE ...

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

As the week of the Beethoven festival draws near, it is announced that all seats have been taken for the opening and closing performances of March 22 and 29, at which the Master's Mass and last two symphonies will be played.

Seats are still available for March 23, when the first three symphonies will be played; March 24, when chamber music will be played by the London string quartet and a pianist to be announced; and March 28, when there will be commemorative exercises, with an address by Mr. Newman, and the Last Quartet, performed by the Lenox string quartet.

HER MAR 13

MASS FOR PENSION FUND

The pending performance of Beethoven's Missa Solennis at the coming centennial festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, is of the highest interest because this Mass, owing to its extreme difficulties, is so seldom given. It has not been heard in Boston since it was performed at the inauguration of Symphony hall in 1900. It will be heard in several cities of the new and old world during the centennial week.

All seats having been long since taken for the performance in Symphony hall on March 22, the Mass will be repeated on the following Sunday, March 27, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davison's choruses at Harvard and Radcliffe have generously offered their services, and the quartet of soloists will be the same as at the first performance.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 14 1927

MUSIC IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The last generation of Hartford music lovers who mourn the present regime giving them but one Boston Symphony concert a year have been somewhat comforted by the excellent radio reception of the Springfield station broadcasting direct from Symphony hall. One of the most interesting features of the program is the applause which follows every number and every appearance of Koussevitsky, for after watching his dynamic figure and sharing his enthusiasms for one afternoon during the winter, it is easy to picture him hurrying on to the stage, bestowing a radiant if casual smile on the multitude before him and taking up his baton. That thunderous applause brings to the radio program the hitherto missing ink, the rapport between the performer and the audience. The last week in March will bring to Boston on the centenary of Beethoven's death a wonderful anniversary festival. And for the few lucky thousands who can crowd into Symphony hall, there will be many times that number who will tune in to get the whole cycle of symphonies during the week. Then—in April—another of Koussevitsky's surprises will be due. The Boston modernists will shout and the conservatists will shiver when this latest apothesis of American mechanism comes into the concert hall. Some years ago Richard Strauss portrayed home life in his "Symfonia Domestica" with its three dominant themes which were promptly labeled "Pa, Ma and the Baby." That was modern, but not typical of the age, for domestic life as interpreted by Strauss might represent any epoch or any country. But our age of mechanics has come to be a feature in much of the co temporary music and the youn Americans who study in Paris ha outdone the Parisians in their u of strident, imitative sounds.

Boston was scandalized by t Copeland symphony two years ag but after the adored conductor h played it twice in one season to a low its beauty to sink in and h added several renderings of Stravi sky's most modern composition, Bo ton sighed and accepted the inev table. After these years of inte sive training in the unusual and t bizarre, she will probably welcon with more or less enthusiasm t new work of a native son—Profess Frederick S. Converse of the Ne England Conservatory. It is d scribed as a symphonic cycle and title is. "Flivver 10,000,000." T musical translation of the m characteristic invention of the ti and the country is, as its subti promises, "A Joyous Epic" and t various scenes of the compositi are labeled in a manner to rea the most unimaginative listener. T prologue is: "Dawn in Detroit," second movement, "The March the Workers." A scene in the f tory is program music of the m pronounced type, while in the n movemen "Flivver 10,000,000" g fairly under way on the road. O movement called "America's mance," pays its respects to motor which has quite superseded old "best parlor" as a backgrou for modern courtship and the h movement shows a collision wh the fliver suffers in quite the e manner but finally recovers, as f vers d and goes on its happy w

We have had to listen to a lot criticism of late concerning the la of research facilities for our s entists and the shortsightedness Amerian donors who limit th gifts severely practical resea for some specific germ. It is c solingo feel that in music our co posers are not hampered in ch search for the richest and m modern types of drama and t "one hours" has brought into be the very triumph of American n chanic the epitome of Americ life.

tain, that she fell ill and, lamenting that she had not strength to attend the matins at the Church of St. Francis, was miraculously transported there and afterward borne back to her bed, greatly comforted.

* * *

Finally, Mr. Respighi, looking into his mirrorring windows, was aware of a rich and splendid blaze of light, and a clamor of deep bells burst upon his ears, and he beheld Saint Gregory the Great in all his papal glory, blessing the throng, as a thousand candles flamed through the haze of incense and fire to the last of these fenestra figures of a haunting past.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1927

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Respighi's "Church Windows" Unveiled by Koussevitzky at the Boston Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

1. Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko." A Tone Picture, Op. 5.
2. Respighi, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four Impressions for Orchestra.
   I La fuga in Egitto (The Flight Into Egypt.)
   II San Michele Arcangelo (The Archangel Michael.)
   III Il Mattutino di Santa Chiara (The Matin of Saint Clara.)
   IV San Gregorio Magno (Saint Gregory the Great.)
   (First time in New York)
3. Ducasse, Sarabande, Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Voices.
4. Prokofieff, "Sept. ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra. Op. 30.
5. Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor" for orchestra with chorus.

The Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, Conductor
Soloist, Charles Stratton

OTTORINO RESPIGHI as a music-maker is enamored of the Italian scene—happily and rightly, for its sounds and colors and implications are deeply rooted in his Latin soul. He cannot forget the sound of Roman fountains, the sight of them under hanging lights, or the suggestions that the ancient pines of the Villa Borghese or the Appian Way stir in his racial memory. And now, having sat in fancy or actuality in various Italian churches, with the sunlight falling through stained glass windows and patterning their figured legends upon his far-wandering imagination, he has set to music the visions they have summoned.

Mr. Koussevitzky let us hear their precipitation in orchestral sound at the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday, for the first time in New York (he had accomplished their first performance anywhere at a concert on the Orchestra's native heath a fortnight ago). They are still in manuscript.

This was the feature of the concert. The other numbers were either repetitions of works played at the previous concert, or they were familiar pieces. The performances were often brilliant, admirably diversified in style.

* * *

"Four Impressions for Orchestra," Respighi calls his work, with the general title, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four brief tone-poems for orchestra they actually are. Music, said Whitman, is what awakes in you when you are reminded by the instruments. Mr. Respighi's four orchestral "Vetrate di Chiesa" convey to us what awoke in him when he was reminded by certain pictured legends, holy myths, recorded miracles, transilluminated by a Latin sun.

* * *

Looking into the deep glow of the imaging glass, he was reminded of the Flight into Egypt, and he would paint in tones for us "the little caravan on a starry night carrying the Treasure of the World," giving us music half urgent, half awed.

Again he looked and saw the sunlight of high heaven reflected from the flaming sword of the Archangel Michael, prince of the celestial hosts, blinding the eyes of the rebellious angels—Michael in his flashing armor, with a glory round his head. (Mr. Respighi lives too late, alas, to have seen the buckler of Michael, covered with red velvet, used in his war with Lucifer, which was shown in a Norman church until 1607, when a hardhearted Bishop withdrew it from the public gaze.)

* * *

Yet again, Mr. Respighi looked into the jeweled fires, now dimmed and quiet in the fading light, and was reminded of the ancient Umbrian world of St. Francis, and of the fountains that deepen the peace of the old garden of Saint Claire, and of the distant bells that cross faintly the plain of Assisi through the thin blue dusk, with the silver-leaved olive trees and the heights beyond.

And he thought of Saint Claire herself, who was the young and radiant Lady Claire, and became the most devout disciple and "noble plant" of St. Francis, exchanging her patrician robes for sackcloth, and her pearl-stiff girdle for a cincture of rope, and letting her long, bright hair, shorn by Francis's hand, fall at her feet, whilst she veiled her sweet face in black. It was for her that St. Francis built with his own hands a few rough cells in the little convent of St. Damian; and it was there, near her garden and her fountain, that she fell ill and, lamenting that she had not strength to attend the matins at the Church of St. Francis, was miraculously transported there and afterward borne back to her bed, greatly comforted.

* * *

Finally, Mr. Respighi, looking into his mirrorring windows, was aware of a rich and splendid blaze of light, and a clamor of deep bells burst upon his ears, and he beheld Saint Gregory the Great in all his papal glory, blessing the throng, as a thousand candles flamed through the haze of incense and fire to the last of these fenestra figures of a haunting past.

Ottorino Respighi

Composer of "Church Windows," the Novelty Performed by Koussevitsky at the Boston Symphony Concert

* * *

All this, and more, Mr. Respighi has striven to import into his music. To say that he has scarcely succeeded is not an overwhelming reproach to him. The themes are profound and exquisite and tremendous enough to provoke wonder that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite a Wagner or a Strauss or a Debussy or a Loeffler, should have been able at any point even to graze the hem of his poetical imaginings. At his worst, as in the music that would evoke for us the pontifical magnificence of Gregory, he is, to be sure, a somewhat distressing spectacle as he seeks to raise himself by the straps of Wagners' seven league boots. (Is Mr. Respighi's allustion to the "Parsifal" bell theme, by the way, an intentional quotation? Even if it is, the reminder of the introduction to "Träume" surely is not!)

* * *

This is the poorest of the four tone-poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. "The Flight into Egypt" is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of "Pelléas" put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of bluster-ing impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucence, so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis's day—that water itself had been washed, and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Mr. Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, "at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
MAR 14 1927

Italian St

Respighi's "Church W to Us by Ser

By Pit

Thanks to Rome's fountains and Rome's pines, Ottorino Respighi has unquestionably won first place for popularity among those younger composers of Italy who cater to symphony concert audiences. But it seems very doubtful whether his latest orchestral composition, "Church Windows" ("Vetrate di chiesa") will add materially to his vogue. It certainly is little calculated to increase his serious fame.

"Church Windows," officially "four impressions for orchestra," was composed last summer and is still in manuscript. Serge Koussevitzky, who had brought these alleged pieces forward late in Febphony Orchestra in Boston, introduced them to New York at the concert given by that estimable band in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The subjects of the four "impressions" could hardly be more attractive. I quote from the program notes of Mr. Philip Hale:—

"I. The Flight Into Egypt. A tonal representation of the little caravan on a starry night carrying the Treasure of the World.

"II. The Archangel Michael. Michael, with flaming sword in hand, drives from heaven the rebellious angels.

"III. The Matin of Saint Chiara (St. Claire). It is told in the 'Fioretti di S. Francesco' how Saint Claire, being gravely sick, and lamenting that she could not attend the matin at the church at Portiuncula, was transported miraculously so that she could take part in the service.

"IV. St. Gregory the Great, clothed in pontifical vestments, blesses the throng; he is represented in all his splendor at ceremonial services of the Church."

Here is matter to inspire the right composer to give of his best and to stir the senses and the feelings of the listener. In view of Saturday's disclosure, one is forced to conclude that Signor Respighi can't be quite the right composer. What he has given here is less suggestive of the ecclesiastical glass that one sees in the cathedrals of Chartres and Bourges and Le Mans, and perhaps in some Italian churches, than of a cheap, brightly-colored chromo.

Signor Respighi is a musician who knows his business thoroughly. Nobody can put a resounding platitude more plausibly than he. Master of a rich and sonorous orchestral palette, he scores what he writes ingratiatingly. But the plain truth of the matter seems to be that all this assembled splendor of ecclesiastical glass moved him not at all—or, at any rate, to no higher flights than are achieved in first class music for a movie. As accompaniment to something appropriate and good upon the screen, these four "impressions" would serve excellently.

Rimsky-Kersakoff's still interesting fantasia "Sadko" shared the first part of the program with "Church Windows." In the second part the Cecilia chorus of Boston aided and abett-d the orchestra in Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande," Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" and the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," all repeated from Thursday night's Carnegie Hall program of the Bostonians. Again Charles Stratton was the tenor soloist in the Prokofieff incantation.

ained Glass.

Vindows" Are Introduce ge Koussevitzky.

ts Sanborn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 14 1927

Music

The Boston Symphony, Harol Bauer and the Intercollegiate Glee Club Contest

THE Boston Symphony concert o Saturday afternoon offered the fol lowing most interesting program: Rim sky-Korsakov's "Sadko," Respighi' "Vetrate di Chiesa" (first time in New York), Ducasse's "Sarabande," symphonic poem for orchestra and voices, Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," Incantation for tenor, choru and orchestra, and Borodin's Polort sian dances fro the opera "Princ Igor" for orchestr with chorus.

Olga Samaroff

The Cecilia Society of Boston co operated in the second half of th program and that excellent artis Charles Stratton undertook the diffi cult tenor solo in Prokofieff's "Sept, Il Sont Sept."

The impression produced by the last named work was for me by far the outstanding one of the concert. Compose in 1917, this music might just as wel have been addressed to the evil spirit which took possession of the world in 1914 as to those which inspired Con stantin Balmont's poem used in the Prokofieff cantata, even though his specific demons adorned the wall (in an inscription) of an Akkadian temple excavated in Mesopotamia. Music more than any medium can link the most remote ages with our own through expressing emotions and reactions which are human and ageless.

PROKOFIEFF has caught and expressed in music of compelling power, the fear of the unknown forces of the universe which has existed in all ages and found its way into most religions. The Japanese today who finds the earth rocking under him, the Italian peasant who flees from the lava stream of Vesuvius, human beings of all ages cowering before evil passions,

...ne ...ry of a hurricane at sea must have experienced in some degree the emotions expressed in this Prokofieff cantata in which the chorus and the tenor backed by a barbaric orchestra address the seven terrible spirits which "are neither male nor female," knowing "not goodness nor kindness" being "without regret, remorse" and "deaf to prayers and entreaties."

According to Akkadian belief these seven malevolent gods were the authors of all human woes. As far as can be judged by hearing a work once this music seems to me to contain most vital elements. It was spontaneous, the musical ideas were fresh and unhackneyed, the form was concise—I had the impression that there was not a superfluous note—and the whole composition was eloquent in the sense of firing the imagination and arousing emotions inspired by a poetic idea rather than describing a literary picture.

In fact, so powerful was the incantation that we can be thankful those terrible Akkadian spirits were not aroused from their eternal sleep to demonstrate their evil powers on the spot. Mr. Koussewitzky conducted this extraordinary work with fire and with evident understanding. The singing of the Cecilia Society was impressive and Mr. Stratton has a real achievement to his credit in his accomplishment of the difficult task of the solo tenor part.

By Olga Samaroff

Beside this impression, other unfamiliar works on the program faded into comparative insignificance. Respighi, in my opinion, fell far below what we have come to expect of him, in the "Vetrate di Chiesa."

It seemed to me rather limp music unfortified by any real creative impulse. The Ducasse Sarabande contains interesting writing, especially in the use of the voices, but in my memory it has been completely overpowered by its barbaric neighbor on the program, the Prokofieff Cantata. The performance of the entire program invites praise.

YESTERDAY afternoon, Harold Bauer, in the best of form, delighted a large audience in Town Hall with his highly individual art as a pianist. A tireless explorer in the domain of unfamiliar music, Mr. Bauer unearthed yesterday a most curious work "David and Goliath" by Johann Kuhnau (1660-1722). If Mr. Bauer were setting out to prove the fact that there is nothing new under the sun in music, he has found an argument most useful in regard to certain much-discussed aspects of the art. In Kuhnau's quaint work we find program music of the most unblushing description, and we are made to realize that it was not Wagner who discovered the leit-motif. Mr. Bauer played this work with extraordinary imagination, and with a happy blending of seriousness and humor.

Other clavier music of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by Claudio Merulo, Leonardo Leo, Scarlatti, Rameau, Couperin and Duphly formed the first half of the program. In the light of Mr. Bauer's deep understanding this music had wonderful vitality and charm, and many were the moments wherein he created such a tonal illusion of older instruments that one could scarcely believe he evoked the sounds in question from a modern piano.

A superb performance of Beethoven's last piano sonata formed the peak of an engrossing recital, which closed with a Brahms-Debussy group and aroused real enthusiasm.

The Intercollegiate Glee Club contest, which took place on Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall, seemed to me to have such national importance that it will be discussed in a special article in the Evening Post of Saturday.

CONCERT CHRONICLE
TIMES MAR 15

Echos de Voyage

AT the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York last week, Mr. Koussevitzky proffered two pieces new to the Manhattanese—Prokofiev's incantation, "They Are Seven!" and Respighi's suite, "Church Windows." As far as the reviews went, it pleased some of the younger gentlemen to dismiss both pieces curtly. Mr. Chotzinoff of The World was quite sure that "not much, musically, could be said in favor" of Prokofiev's conjuration. He confessed, moreover, that he had forgotten "who Saint Clare was." but, listening to Respighi's visioning music, happily surmised that "she was a saint in whom one could confide" with a fair prospect of understanding and indulgence. In turn, Mr. Downes of The Times was equally sure that Respighi's measures no more than "discharge platitudes," in which the reviewer is admittedly expert. He was kinder toward Prokofiev and his barbarians. The music was "exciting"; it was also "effective"; it "savored of the theatrical." It was "a little conscio...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 14 1927

MUSIC IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The last generation of Hartford music lovers who mourn the present regime giving them but one Boston Symphony concert a year have been somewhat comforted by the excellent radio reception of the Springfield station broadcasting direct from Symphony hall. One of the most interesting features of the program is the applause which follows every number and every appearance of Koussevitsky, for after watching his dynamic figure and sharing his enthusiasms for one afternoon during the winter, it is easy to picture him hurrying on to the stage, bestowing a radiant if casual smile on the multitude before him and taking up his baton. That thunderous applause brings to the radio program the hitherto missing link, the rapport between the performer and the audience. The last week in March will bring to Boston on the centenary of Beethoven's death a wonderful anniversary festival. And for the few lucky thousands who can crowd into Symphony hall, there will be many times that number who will tune in to get the whole cycle of symphonies during the week. Then—in April—another of Koussevitsky's surprises will be due. The Boston modernists will shout and the conservatists will shiver when this latest apothesis of American mechanism comes into the concert hall. Some years ago Richard Strauss portrayed home life in his "Symfonia Domestica" with its three dominant themes which were promptly labeled "Pa, Ma and the Baby." That was modern, but not typical of the age, for domestic life as interpreted by Strauss might represent any epoch or any country. But our age of mechanics has come to be a feature in much of the contemporary music and the young Americans who study in Paris have outdone the Parisians in their use of strident, imitative sounds.

Boston was scandalized by the Copeland symphony two years ago but after the adored conductor had played it twice in one season to allow its beauty to sink in and had added several renderings of Stravinsky's most modern composition, Boston sighed and accepted the inevitable. After these years of intensive training in the unusual and the bizarre, she will probably welcome with more or less enthusiasm the new work of a native son—Professor Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory. It is described as a symphonic cycle and the title is. "Flivver 10,000,000." The musical translation of the most characteristic invention of the time and the country is, as its subtitle promises, "A Joyous Epic" and the various scenes of the composition are labeled in a manner to reach the most unimaginative listener. The prologue is: "Dawn in Detroit," the second movement, "The March of the Workers." A scene in the factory is program music of the most pronounced type, while in the next movement "Flivver 10,000,000" gets fairly under way on the road. One movement called "America's Romance," pays its respects to the motor which has quite superseded the old "best parlor" as a background for modern courtship and the last movement shows a collision when the flivver suffers in quite the epic manner but finally recovers, as flivvers do, and goes on its happy way.

We have had to listen to a lot of criticism of late concerning the lack of research facilities for our scientists and the shortsightedness of American donors who limit their gifts to severely practical research for some specific germ. It is consoling to feel that in music our composers are not hampered in their search for the richest and most modern types of drama and that "one hours" has brought into being the very triumph of American mechanic the epitome of American life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1927

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Respighi's "Church Windows" Unveiled by Koussevitzky at the Boston Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sergei Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

1. Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko." A Tone Picture, Op. 5.
2. Respighi, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four Impressions for Orchestra.
   I La fuga in Egitto (The Flight Into Egypt.)
   II San Michele Arcangelo (The Archangel Michael.)
   III Il Mattutino di Santa Chiara (The Matin of Saint Clara.)
   IV San Gregorio Magno (Saint Gregory the Great.)
   (First time in New York)
3. Ducasse, Sarabande, Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Voices.
4. Prokofieff, "Sept, ils sont sept!" Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra. Op. 30.
5. Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor" for orchestra with chorus.

The Cecilia Society, Malcolm Lang, Conductor
Soloist, Charles Stratton

OTTORINO RESPIGHI as a musicmaker is enamored of the Italian scene—happily and rightly, for its sounds and colors and implications are deeply rooted in his Latin soul. He cannot forget the sound of Roman fountains, the sight of them under hanging lights, or the suggestions that the ancient pines of the Villa Borghese or the Appian Way stir in his racial memory. And now, having sat in fancy in actuality in various Italian churches, with the sunlight falling through stained glass windows and patterning their figured legends upon his far-wandering imagination, he has set to music the visions they have summoned.

Mr. Koussevitzky let us hear their precipitation in orchestral sound at the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday, for the first time in New York (he had accomplished their first performance anywhere at a concert on the Orchestra's native heath a fortnight ago). They are still in manuscript.

This was the feature of the concert. The other numbers were either repetitions of works played at the previous concert, or they were familiar pieces. The performances were often brilliant, admirably diversified in style.

* * *

"Four Impressions for Orchestra," Respighi calls his work, with the general title, "Vetrate di Chiesa" ("Church Windows"). Four brief tone-poems for orchestra they actually are. Music, said Whitman, is what awakes in you when you are reminded by the instruments. Mr. Respighi's four orchestral "Vetrate di Chiesa" convey to us what awoke in him when he was reminded by certain pictured legends, holy myths, recorded miracles, transilluminated by a Latin sun.

* * *

Looking into the deep glow of the imaging glass, he was reminded of the Flight into Egypt, and he would paint in tones for us "the little caravan on a starry night carrying the Treasure of the World," giving us music half urgent, half awed.

Again he looked and saw the sunlight of high heaven reflected from the flaming sword of the Archangel Michael, prince of the celestial hosts, blinding the eyes of the rebellious angels—Michael in his flashing armor, with a glory round his head. (Mr. Respighi lives too late, alas, to have seen the buckler of Michael, covered with red velvet, used in his war with Lucifer, which was shown in a Norman church until 1607, when a hardhearted Bishop withdrew it from the public gaze.)

* * *

Yet again, Mr. Respighi looked into the jeweled fires, now dimmed and quiet in the fading light, and was reminded of the ancient Umbrian world of St. Francis, and of the fountains that deepen the peace of the old garden of Saint Claire, and of the distant bells that cross faintly the plain of Assisi through the thin blue dusk, with the silver-leaved olive trees and the heights beyond.

And he thought of Saint Claire herself, who was the young and radiant Lady Claire, and became the most devout disciple and "noble plant" of St. Francis, exchanging her patrician robes for sackcloth, and her pearl-stiff girdle for a cincture of rope, and letting her long, bright hair, shorn by Francis's hand, fall at her feet, whilst she veiled her sweet face in black. It was for her that St. Francis built with his own hands a few rough cells in the little convent of St. Damian; and it was there, near her garden and her fountain, that she fell ill and, lamenting that she had not strength to attend the matins at the Church of St. Francis, was miraculously transported there and afterward borne back to her bed, greatly comforted.

* * *

Finally, Mr. Respighi, looking into his mirrorring windows, was aware of a rich and splendid blaze of light, and a clamor of deep bells burst upon his ears, and he beheld Saint Gregory the Great in all his papal glory, blessing the throng, as a thousand candles flamed through the haze of incense and set fire to the last of these fenestral figures of a haunting past.

* * *

Ottorino Respighi

Composer of "Church Windows," the Novelty Performed by Koussevitsky at the Boston Symphony Concert

poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. "The Flight into Egypt" is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of "Pelléas" put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of blustering impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucence, so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis's day—that water itself had been washed, and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Mr. Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, "at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars."

All this, and more, Mr. Respighi has striven to import into his music. To say that he has scarcely succeeded is not an overwhelming reproach to him. The themes are profound and exquisite and tremendous enough to provoke wonder that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite a Wagner or a Strauss or a Debussy or a Loeffler, should have been able at any point even to graze the hem of his poetical imaginings. At his worst, as in the music that would evoke for us the pontifical magnificence of Gregory, he is, to be sure, a somewhat distressing spectacle as he seeks to raise himself by the straps of Wagners' seven league boots. (Is Mr. Respighi's allustion to the "Parsifal" bell theme, by the way, an intentional quotation? Even if it is, the reminder of the introduction to "Träume" surely is not!)

* * *

This is the poorest of the four tone-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
MAR 14 1927

Italian St

Respighi's "Church W to Us by Ser

By Pit

Thanks to Rome's fountains and Rome's pines, Ottorino Respighi has unquestionably won first place for popularity among those younger composers of Italy who cater to symphony concert audiences. But it seems very doubtful whether his latest orchestral composition, "Church Windows" ("Vetrate di chiesa") will add materially to his vogue. It certainly is little calculated to increase his serious fame.

"Church Windows," officially "four impressions for orchestra," was composed last summer and is still in manuscript. Serge Koussevitzky, who had brought these all-ed pieces forward late in Febphony Orchestra in Boston, introduced them to New York at the concert given by that estimable band in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The subjects of the four "impressions" could hardly be more attractive. I quote from the program notes of Mr. Philip Hale:—

"I. The Flight Into Egypt. A tonal representation of the little caravan on a starry night carrying the Treasure of the World.

"II. The Archangel Michael. Michael, with flaming sword in hand, drives from heaven the rebellious angels.

"III. The Matin of Saint Chiara (St. Claire). It is told in the 'Fioretti di S. Francesco' how Saint Claire, being gravely sick, and lamenting that she could not attend the matin at the church at Portiuncula, was transported miraculously so that she could take part in the service.

"IV. St. Gregory the Great, clothed in pontifical vestments, blesses the throng; he is represented in all his splendor at ceremonial services of the Church."

Here is matter to inspire the right composer to give of his best and to stir the senses and the feelings of the listener. In view of Saturday's disclosure, one is forced to conclude that Signor Respighi can't be quite the right composer. What he has given here is less suggestive of the ecclesiastical glass that one sees in the cathedrals of Chartres and Bourges and Le Mans, and perhaps in some Italian churches, than of a cheap, brightly-colored chromo.

Signor Respighi is a musician who knows his business thoroughly. Nobody can put a resounding platitude more plausibly than he. Master of a rich and sonorous orchestral palette, he scores what he writes ingratiatingly. But the plain truth of the matter seems to be that all this assembled splendor of ecclesiastical glass moved him not at all—or, at any rate, to no higher flights than are achieved in first class music for a movie. As accompaniment to something appropriate and good upon the screen, these four "impressions" would serve excellently.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's still interesting fantasia "Sadko" shared the first part of the program with "Church Windows." In the second part the Cecilia chorus of Boston aided and abett.d the orchestra in Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande," Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" and the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," all repeated from Thursday night's Carnegie Hall program of the Bostonians. Again Charles Stratton was the tenor soloist in the Prokofieff Incantation.

xined Glass.

Vindows" Are Introduc ge Koussevitzky.

ts Sanborn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 14 1927

Music

The Boston Symphony, Harol Bauer and the Intercollegiate Glee Club Contest

THE Boston Symphony concert o Saturday afternoon offered the fol lowing most interesting program: Rim sky-Korsakov's "Sadko," Respighi' "Vetrate di Chiesa" (first time in New York), Ducasse's "Sarabande," symphonic poem for orchestra and voices, Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept," Incantation for tenor, choru and orchestra, and Borodin's Polort sian dances fro the opera "Princ Igor" for orchestr with chorus.

Olga Samaroff

The Cecilia Society of Boston co operated in the second half of th program and that excellent artis Charles Stratton undertook the diffi cult tenor solo in Prokofieff's "Sept, Il Sont Sept."

The impression produced by the last named work was for me by far the outstanding one of the concert. Composed in 1917, this music might just as well have been addressed to the evil spirits which took possession of the world in 1914 as to those which inspired Constantin Balmont's poem used in the Prokofieff cantata, even though his specific demons adorned the wall (in an inscription) of an Akkadian temple excavated in Mesopotamia. Music more than any medium can link the most remote ages with our own through expressing emotions and reactions which are human and ageless.

PROKOFIEFF has caught and expressed in music of compelling power, the fear of the unknown forces of the universe which has existed in all ages and found its way into most religions. The Japanese today who finds the earth rocking under him, the Italian peasant who flees from the lava stream of Vesuvius, human beings of all ages cowering before evil passions, the [illegible] of a hurricane at sea, must have experienced in some degree the emotions expressed in this Prokofieff cantata in which the chorus and the tenor backed by a barbaric orchestra address the seven terrible spirits which "are neither male nor female," knowing "not goodness nor kindness" being "without regret, remorse" and "deaf to prayers and entreaties."

According to Akkadian belief these seven malevolent gods were the authors of all human woes. As far as can be judged by hearing a work once this music seems to me to contain most vital elements. It was spontaneous, the musical ideas were fresh and unhackneyed, the form was concise—I had the impression that there was not a superfluous note—and the whole composition was eloquent in the sense of firing the imagination and arousing emotions inspired by a poetic idea rather than describing a literary picture.

In fact, so powerful was the incantation that we can be thankful those terrible Akkadian spirits were not aroused from their eternal sleep to demonstrate their evil powers on the spot. Mr. Koussewitzky conducted this extraordinary work with fire and with evident understanding. The singing of the Cecilia Society was impressive and Mr. Stratton has a real achievement to his credit in his accomplishment of the difficult task of the solo tenor part.

By Olga Samaroff

Beside this impression, other unfamiliar works on the program faded into comparative insignificance. Respighi, in my opinion, fell far below what we have come to expect of him, in the "Vetrate di Chiesa."

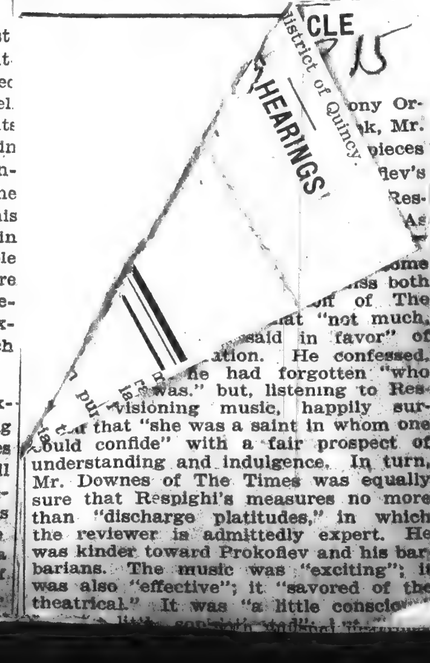
It seemed to me rather limp music unfortified by any real creative impulse. The Ducasse Sarabande contains interesting writing, especially in the use of the voices, but in my memory it has been completely overpowered by its barbaric neighbor on the program, the Prokofieff Cantata. The performance of the entire program invites praise.

YESTERDAY afternoon, Harold Bauer, in the best of form, delighted a large audience in Town Hall with his highly individual art as a pianist. A tireless explorer in the domain of unfamiliar music, Mr. Bauer unearthed yesterday a most curious work "David and Goliath" by Johann Kuhnau (1660-1722). If Mr. Bauer were setting out to prove the fact that there is nothing new under the sun in music, he has found an argument most useful in regard to certain much-discussed aspects of the art. In Kuhnau's quaint work we find program music of the most unblushing description, and we are made to realize that it was not Wagner who discovered the leit-motif. Mr. Bauer played this work with extraordinary imagination, and with a happy blending of seriousness and humor.

Other clavier music of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by Claudio Merulo, Leonardo Leo, Scarlatti, Rameau, Couperin and Duphly formed the first half of the program. In the light of Mr. Bauer's deep understanding this music had wonderful vitality and charm, and many were the moments wherein he created such a tonal illusion of older instruments that one could scarcely believe he evoked the sounds in question from a modern piano.

A superb performance of Beethoven's last piano sonata formed the peak of an engrossing recital, which closed with a Brahms-Debussy group and aroused real enthusiasm.

The Intercollegiate Glee Club contest, which took place on Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall, seemed to me to have such national importance that it will be discussed in a special article in the Evening Post of Saturday.



[illegible] ony Or- [illegible] k, Mr. [illegible] pieces [illegible] lev's [illegible] Res- [illegible] As [illegible] ome [illegible] ss both [illegible] of The [illegible] at "not much, [illegible] said in favor" of [illegible] ation. He confessed. [illegible] he had forgotten "who [illegible] was." but, listening to Res- [illegible] visioning music, happily sur- [illegible] that "she was a saint in whom one [illegible] ould confide" with a fair prospect of understanding and indulgence. In turn, Mr. Downes of The Times was equally sure that Respighi's measures no more than "discharge platitudes," in which the reviewer is admittedly expert. He was kinder toward Prokofiev and his barbarians. The music was "exciting"; it was also "effective"; it "savored of the theatrical." It was "a little conscio[illegible]

A single hearing of the piece was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art. . . . Prokofiev has embodied a tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmth of human contacts. . . . The music was startlingly well done by the chorus of the Cecelia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose); by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor; bq Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

Toward Respighi's Suite Mr. Gilman also just, though not always kind: "I say that he had scarcely succeeded is no an overwhelming reproach to him. Th themes are profound and exquisite an tremendous enough to provoke wonde that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite Wagner or a Straus or a Debussy or Loeffler, should have been able at an point even to graze the hem of his poet cal imaginings. At his worst, as in th music that would evoke for us the pont fical magnificence of Gregory, he is, I be sure, a somewhat distressing specti cle as he seeks to raise himself by th straps of Wagner's seven-league boots.

"This is the poorest of the four tone poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. 'The Flight into Egypt' is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of 'Pelléas' put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of blustering impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Continued on Page Twelve

"Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucense so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis' day—that water itself had been washed and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Mr. Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, 'at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars.'"

Incidents and Prospects

This department owes an apology to its readers. Transcribing literally the inscription above Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-pictures, recently played at the Symphony Concerts, it has more than once, in the last fortnight, written of "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitesch and the Virgin Fevronia"—not once suspecting that it was using a word "banned" hereabouts in a title. Indeed, it only repeated the phrasing of the program-book of the Symphony Concerts. As yet that pamphlet has not been "withdrawn" from circulation or sale.

Mr. Koussevitzky began yesterday the orchestral rehearsals for the Beethoven Centenary Festival, first taking the Mass in hand. Before work began he reminded the waiting men that "our greatest and most formidable task lies ahead"; that the concerts of the festival should excel all those before. "I suggest," he ended, "that before we begin to rehearse the music, we stand for a moment in silent reverence of the greatest genius in music, Beethoven."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 18 1927

CONCERT BY 325 STUDENTS.

Harvard, Radcliffe and Boston Symphony to Honor Beethoven.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 17.—The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Beethoven's "Missa Solennis" in Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22 and 27 as a part of the Beethoven centennial celebration.

Rehearsals of the 325 Harvard and Radcliffe singers have been going on for months under the direction of George W. Woodworth, Harvard '24, and Professor Archibald T. Davison of the university's music department. The entire production will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be presented by the club on March 29 as a part of the centennial program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 16 1927

The Centenary C of the

The Centenary Festival, commemorating the death of Ludwig van Beethoven, to be held in Symphony H Boston, March 22-29, has assumed p portions in keeping with the gigan figure that Beethoven presents in t musical world. The Nine Symphoni Missa Solennis, Chamber Music, a commemorative addresses; the Bost Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevit ky; the Harvard Glee Club, Radcli Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Dav son; the London String Quartet, t Lenox String Quartet; Ernest Newma Walter Gieseking; Florence Austra Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreelan Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Vee Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton— What a garland of triumph for a cen tury to wear on its brow, and the firs century at that.

As time goes, it did not take Posterity long to determine the status o Beethoven, and if the patron who attends all these offerings meets with no mental or physical mishap, he will have something to boast of the rest of his days. For this is the opportunity of a lifetime, and an opportunity that comes in a lifetime to the favored few only. For people who are musically inclined, people who play well

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

HER MAR 17

Alexander Tansman's Symphony, composed last summer, and dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, will be performed for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. Mr. Tansman has written a long article about the symphony, in which he has much to say concerning his intentions. We hasten to say for the benefit of the ultra-conservative in the audience that Mr. Tansman's intentions are strictly honorable. He has followed the classic form, modified only to suit the modern spirit; he assures us that his music is neither "atonal" nor "polytonal." In the Scherzo he makes use of Polish dance tunes.

The other pieces on the program are selections from Handel's "Water Music," Glazounov's violin concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist), and our old tried and approved friend the overture to "Oberon." Glazounov's concerto was first played here by Mr. Zimbalist when he appeared here for the first time, Oct. 27 1911, [illegible] home.

The Beethoven festival will begin Tuesday night with a performance of the great Mass in D. We regret to say that it is not fully determined how Beethoven was dressed at the first performance of the Kyrie, Credo and Agnus Dei at Vienna on May 7, 1824. Thalberg, who was present, said the composer wore a black dresscoat, white neckerchief and waistcoat, black satin small clothes, black silk stockings, shoes with buckles. But Schindler talked with Beethoven just before the concert and told him to make himself ready: "Take your green coat which you can put on when you conduct. The theatre will be dark and no one will notice it. O great master, you do not own a black frock coat. The green one will have to do; in a few days the black one will be ready." Umlauf conducted and Beethoven sat in the orchestra.

The great mass was performed here for the first time by the Cecilia Society. It was also performed at the dedication of Symphony hall.

Concert Boston Symphony

and are fairly conversant in musical literature, rarely face an opportunity to hear even two Beethoven symphonies in close succession, unless they live in an unusual music centre. More apt are they to hear the same symphony repeated during the season by different orchestras, or two or three symphonies of some particular author strung along at considerable intervals through the entire season. They get a hazy notion of the contents of each, but no clean-cut, definite idea of any. For not everyone who says "Music, Music," can pick up a score and read it, nor does the player who makes use of a piano transcription realize anything of symphonic color.

But by taking such a sequence as that to be given in Boston from beginning to end he becomes aware of the Haydyn-Mozartian clarity of the first and the second symphony, splashed here and there by the wild Beethoven plunges and tuggings at the reins that in time made him the outstanding genius that the world is now celebrating; he comes nearer a decision as to the relative merits of the third and fifth, and is able to approximate an intelligent evaluation of those two. He can decide for himself whether joy bade farewell to Beethoven's heart after the writing of the Fourth, and whether although it was equal to many a merry prank in music even up to the very end, he felt no longer the heart pulsations of delight that filled his pages during that brief period of his love for Theresa. Was Grove right when he said of the Finale of this symphony: "It is well to remember that it is the last gay Finale that will be vouchsafed to us. . . . Beauty there will always be, and strength and nobility, but gaiety is gone. The finale of No. 5 is triumphant, of No. 6 is religious, those of Nos. 7 and 8 romantic, humorous, and rough; but the careless delight of this beautiful movement we shall encounter no more."

* * *

He can also determine the extent of Beethoven's love for nature and what this Nature was; whether it was the spectacle of the outside world that he could sit quietly and contemplate, or whether it was the urge and force and vitality—the vivid growth of things, the active principle of life—that stirred him to write as he did. And finally, he can determine the effect that Beethoven's later isolation and solitude had on his compositions, and distinguish between the flash of humor and the grotesque play of fancy in his last works and the healthy, rustic, 'unbuttoned' perversity of his earlier efforts.

* * *

And then he can hear the quartets. For during a period of a quarter century, unless he happens to be a quartet player, he has missed most of these, except perhaps two or three in Opus 18, or on rare occasions, one in Opus 59. For the various quartet organizations, instead of striving for variety, seem to duplicate each other's performance, as though engaged in a sort of competition rather than a dissemination of musical ideas and enjoyment. So if he has heard these and at rare intervals one or two from the later and more difficult ones, he has fared about as well as he could expect. Add to this the Lenore Overture No. 3, the Overture to Fidelio, a few songs and some piano sonatas and we get the musical sum total of the man who frequents the concert halls of any city but the most enterprising, which are few and far between.

Now if a man goes to the Centenary Festival and has the constitution to digest or even tolerate the feast that is offered—and it is strong food, much of it bear meat—he will at least know that he can sit down and eat with men whose diet, if not ambrosia, is at least food of those who look toward immortality.

M. C. W.
(Providence)

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
MAR 16 19

MUSIC IN

CACOPHONY RUNS WILD.

Special to The Mail and Empire.

New York, March 15.—The past week, orchestrally, has been one of cacophony run riot, that is, if cacophony can ever be said to run any other way! The main course of the trouble was Prokofieff's "Seven, They Are Seven" which Serge Koussevitzky gave with the Boston Symphony, and what's more, gave twice at the same concert lest its hearers might be unappreciative after one listening. Let no one be deceived into thinking that the title bore any reference to Wordsworth's "Simple Child That Lightly Draws Its Breath." What breath was drawn, was drawn heavily!

Mr. Prokofieff's title comes from an incantation either summoning or exorcising (just which, was not entirely clear) seven devils by a high priest of Akkadia. The work enlisted the St. Cecilia Chorus from Boston, imported for the event, and Charles Stratton, tenor, who impersonated the high-priest. The incantation is said to have been found in cuneiform on a wall somewhere or other in Mesopotamia. The only regret is that Mr. Prokofieff's music is of the Twentieth Century, because, heard in those ancient days, would certainly have driven any seven devils (or even eight!) quite out of hearing for a long period. The audience in Carnegie Hall listened with curiosity mingled with apprehension, and there were even a few futile hisses. The second hearing, after a Sarabanda for orchestra and voices, restored aural equilibrium, did not add anything new, certainly nothing of interest. One simply hoped it would be over, soon!

Casella's New Work.

At the Wanamaker Auditorium, Alfredo Casella conducted a concert of the rare Wanamaker violins with necessary wind and percussion added. The main meat of the evening was a Concerto Romano for organ brass, strings and tympani, which Mr. Casella composed on commission from Mr. Wanamaker especially for these concerts. The composer, after disclaiming on the program that the work is in any sense "program music," went on to say that it was inspired by meditations or hours of same, which he had spent in the city of St. Peter. He further called to memory that the prevailing style of Roman architecture and decoration was the "Berninian Rococo." Fortified with an encyclopaedic dictionary, one discovered that Bernini was a painter, sculptor and architect who came from Naples and who lived 1598—1680. Never having been in Rome, I beg leave to doubt that architecture anywhere could look the way this music sounds! That is, unless it were San Francisco ofter the earthquake, or Chicago after its fire!

Along with Mr. Casella's piece there was some Bach, Blessed Bach, and some Handel, as well as other early music. Anything more lovely than the arrangement of the Eisenach master's "Komm, suesse Tod" played on a rare viola, by Samuel

NEW YORK

By John Alan Haughton.

[illegible] of the Philadelphia Orchestra would be difficult to conceive.

"Church Windows."

At his second concert on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated the Prokofieff business and added for good measure, a work new to New York, "Church Windows," four impressions for orchestra by Respighi. The windows represented "The Flight Into Egypt," "Michael Subduing the Lost Angels," "Matin of Saint Clara," and "St. Gregory the Great."

Throughout, Respighi was most effective when most restrained. The Flight was a grave pastorale with Oriental suggestions based upon old modes, not uncommon in music of the Greek church. It also had fleeting likenesses to "Pelleas et Melisande," here and there. St. Michael, as might be supposed, subdued the foes of Heaven with much commotion and there was again some suggestion of old world ecclesiastical music, perhaps the kind that is sung in Heaven! The Santa Clara episode dealt with the legend of her being translated from her sick bed to the Church of St. Francis of Assisi, and then back again, greatly refreshed in spirit. This was, perhaps, the most striking of the four "panels," and might be listened to separately with much edification. The final scene, of St. Gregory in his magnificent robes giving benediction to thousands of kneeling devotees amid incense and candles, was the last and the least satisfactory of all. It smelt of Parsifal throughout, and the organ peals here and then were theatric, without being especially effective.

Leopold Stokowski produced as a [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 19 1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS "WATER MUSIC"

Burgin, Concert Master, to Appear as Soloist in Violin Concerts Through WBZ This Evening

The 19th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast tonight by WBZ the opening number being the so-called "Water Music" of Handel, with which an interesting story is connected.

The Water music was written for an aquatic fete given by the first King George of England, and was played under Handel's direction by an orchestra seated in a barge which followed the king's boat. Handel, through his continued absence from his post as kappelmeister, had risked the displeasure of his majesty. The king, however, was so greatly pleased with the Water music that he soon after granted him an annuity of 200 pounds a year. The second number of the program is a symphony by Alexander Tansman, a young Polish composer, whose "Dance of the Sorceress" was heard earlier this season. This symphony, which is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston symphony, will receive its initial performance at tonight's concert.

The numbers following the intermission are Glazounov's melodious concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, and the popular overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber.

Prof Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston universit[y] and Holy Cross college, will tell some interesting facts concerning the Tansman symphony, in which he will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist a personal friend of the composer. During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Glazounov concerto and the Weber overture. During this period he will be assisted in the thematic illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:—

"Water Music" ..... Han
Andante maestoso, allegro moderato, adagio, allegro con brio, andante, allegretto, menuetto, allegro molto.
Symphony in A minor ..... Tansm
Allegro giusto
Len to
Scherzo
Finale, allegro molto
Concerto for violin with orchestra, Op. 8 Glazou
Moderato, andante, moderato, allegro
Overture, "Oberon" ..... W
Soloist, Richard Burgin

The 118th Medical Regiment ba[nd] a permanent unit of the Connecti[cut] National Guard, will be heard in [a] program of popular selections [and] marches through WTIC, the Trav[elers] station at Hartford, this even[ing] at 8. Since it has been organized [the] band has been consistently engag[ed] for both military and civilian fu[nc]tions. The band, which is under [the] direction of Warrant Officer Philip Azzolina, consists of 33 pieces. Many of the members are professional musicians. Other programs follow:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
MAR 19 1927

Boston Symphony By Radio Tonight

Other Interesting Programs for Today and Sunday.

The programs of radio entertainment furnished radio fans throughout the world by station KDKA from the studio of the Pittsburgh Post and its affiliations with the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting company, for today and tomorrow are many. The Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Boston Symphony hall, provides the outstanding program of music for today, and the Westinghouse Band under the direction of T. J. Vastine, playing in the studio of the Pittsburgh Post at 6 o'clock will furnish the dinner concert.

At 7:15 o'clock the weekly meeting of The Pittsburgh Post Home Radio Club will be conducted by the chairman, James W. H. Weir. At 7:30 an address will be presented under the auspices of the Pittsburgh chapter of the Izaak Walton League.

For tomorrow a new program of music has been added to the Sunday broadcast by KDKA. This will take place from 2 to 3 o'clock and will feature Roxy with studic members of his Gang, the grand organ recently installed in the new Roxy theater, the tower chimes and a string orchestra. Miss Evelyn Herbert, daughter of the famous Victor Herbert, will sing.

At 11 o'clock the church service of the Calvary Episcopal Church will be broadcast direct from the pulpit, and at 4 o'clock the organ recital presented each Sunday afternoon by Dr. Charles Heinroth, director of music of the Carnegie Institute, to be broadcast from the Carnegie Music Hall, followed at 4:45 with the vesper service of the Shadyside Presbyterian church.

At 6:30 o'clock the Twilight Hour of Music, played by the KDKA Little Symphony orchestra under directions of Victor Saudek and vocal selections by the Carnegie Tech Glee Club, presents a program of famous Beethoven compositions.

In the evening at 7:45 o'clock the public dedication of the East End Christian Church will be conducted.

At 9:30 o'clock the sixth in the series of the National Weekly Revues originating in the studio of WJZ, will be heard by the listeners of station KDKA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 19 1927

Beethoven Centenary Program in Boston

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week. All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solemnis," the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. Ernest Newman of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven as a part of the festival.

The program will be as follows: Tuesday, March 22, "Missa Solemnis;" Wednesday, Symphonies 1, 2 and 3; Thursday, Chamber music by Carl Friedberg and London String Quartet; Friday, Symphonies 4 and 5; Saturday, Symphonies 6 and 7; Monday, commemorative exercises with an address by Mr. Newman, concluding with the last quartet and Tuesday, eighth and ninth Choral Symphonies.

A single hearing of the piece was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art. . . . Prokofiev has embodied a tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmth of human contacts. . . . The music was startlingly well done by the chorus of the Cecelia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose); by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor; bq Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

Toward Respighi's Suite Mr. Gilman is also just, though not always kind: "To say that he had scarcely succeeded is not an overwhelming reproach to him. The themes are profound and exquisite and tremendous enough to provoke wonder that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite a Wagner or a Straus or a Debussy or a Loeffler, should have been able at any point even to graze the hem of his poetical imaginings. At his worst, as in the music that would evoke for us the pontifical magnificence of Gregory, he is, to be sure, a somewhat distressing spectacle as he seeks to raise himself by the straps of Wagner's seven-league boots.

"This is the poorest of the four tone poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. 'The Flight into Egypt' is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of 'Pelléas' put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of blustering impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Continued on Page Twelve

"Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucense so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis' day—that water itself had been washed and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Mr. Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, 'at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars.' "

Incidents and Prospects

This department owes an apology to its readers. Transcribing literally the inscription above Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-pictures, recently played at the Symphony Concerts, it has more than once, in the last fortnight, written of "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitesch and the Virgin Fevronia"—not once suspecting that it was using a word "banned" hereabouts in a title. Indeed, it only repeated the phrasing of the program-book of the Symphony Concerts. As yet that pamphlet has not been "withdrawn" from circulation or sale.

Mr. Koussevitzky began yesterday the orchestral rehearsals for the Beethoven Centenary Festival, first taking the Mass in hand. Before work began he reminded the waiting men that "our greatest and most formidable task lies ahead"; that the concerts of the festival should exceed all those before. "I suggest," he ended, "that before we begin to rehearse the music, we stand for a moment in silent reverence of the greatest genius in music, Beethoven."

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

MER MAR 17

Alexander Tansman's Symphony, composed last summer, and dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, will be performed for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. Mr. Tansman has written a long article about the symphony, in which he has much to say concerning his intentions. We hasten to say for the benefit of the ultra-conservative in the audience that Mr. Tansman's intentions are strictly honorable. He has followed the classic form, modified only to suit the modern spirit; he assures us that his music is neither "atonal" nor "polytonal." In the Scherzo he makes use of Polish dance tunes.

The other pieces on the program are selections from Handel's "Water Music," Glazounov's violin concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist), and our old tried and approved friend the overture to "Oberon." Glazounov's concerto was first played here by Mr. Zimbalist when he appeared here for the first time, Oct. 27 1911, [illegible]

The Beethoven festival will begin Tuesday night with a performance of the great Mass in D. We regret to say that it is not fully determined how Beethoven was dressed at the first performance of the Kyrie, Credo and Agnus Dei at Vienna on May 7, 1824. Thalberg, who was present, said the composer wore a black dresscoat, white neckerchief and waistcoat, black satin small clothes, black silk stockings, shoes with buckles. But Schindler talked with Beethoven just before the concert and told him to make himself ready: "Take your green coat which you can put on when you conduct. The theatre will be dark and no one will notice it. O great master, you do not own a black frock coat. The green one will have to do; in a few days the black one will be ready." Umlauf conducted and Beethoven sat in the orchestra.

The great mass was performed here for the first time by the Cecilia Society. It was also performed at the dedication of Symphony hall.

CLIPPING FROM
Y. TIMES
MAR 18 1927

25 STUDENTS.

...ve and Boston ...nor Beethoven.

...w York Times.

...pose of in... March 17.—The ...s at these ... the Radcliffe ...fense condi... Boston Sym... While there ... present Bee... at might af... his" in Sym... Nicaraguan ... March 22 and ...xpect to visit ...hoven centen...

...ork the only ... Harvard and ...at the build... en going on ...nd are going ... direction of ...e that every ... Harvard '24, ... point to that ... Davison of ... pride. I have ...tment. The ... will allow the ... under the ...t in an emer... Witzky, di... opriation from ...hony Or... ...s will be put ... law now that ... will be ... ...ch 29 as a ... program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 16 1927

The Centenary C... of the

The Centenary Festival, commemorating the death of Ludwig van Beethoven, to be held in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 22-29, has assumed proportions in keeping with the gigantic figure that Beethoven presents in the musical world. The Nine Symphonies, Missa Solennis, Chamber Music, and commemorative addresses; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison; the London String Quartet, the Lenox String Quartet; Ernest Newman, Walter Gieseking; Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon , Jeannette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton—What a garland of triumph for a century to wear on its brow, and the first century at that.

As time goes, it did not take Posterity long to determine the status of Beethoven, and if the patron who attends all these offerings meets with no mental or physical mishap, he will have something to boast of the rest of his days. For this is the opportunity of a lifetime, and an opportunity that comes in a lifetime to the favored few only. For people who are musically inclined, people who play well and are fairly conversant in musical literature, rarely face an opportunity to hear even two Beethoven symphonies in close succession, unless they live in an unusual music centre. More apt are they to hear the same symphony repeated during the season by different orchestras, or two or three symphonies of some particular author strung along at considerable intervals through the entire season. They get a hazy notion of the contents of each, but no clean-cut, definite idea of any. For not everyone who says "Music, Music," can pick up a score and read it, nor does the player who makes use of a piano transcription realize anything of symphonic color.

...ncert Boston Symphony

But by taking such a sequence as that to be given in Boston from beginning to end he becomes aware of the Haydyn-Mozartian clarity of the first and the second symphony, splashed here and there by the wild Beethoven plunges and tuggings at the reins that in time made him the outstanding genius that the world is now celebrating; he comes nearer a decision as to the relative merits of the third and fifth, and is able to approximate an intelligent evaluation of those two. He can decide for himself whether joy bade farewell to Beethoven's heart after the writing of the Fourth, and whether although he was equal to many a merry prank in music even up to the very end, he felt no longer the heart pulsations of delight that filled his pages during that brief period of his love for Theresa. Was Grove right when he said of the Finale of this symphony: "It is well to remember that it is the last gay Finale that will be vouchsafed to us. . . . Beauty there will always be, and strength and nobility, but gaiety is gone. The finale of No. 5 is triumphant, of No. 6 is religious, those of Nos. 7 and 8 romantic, humorous, and rough; but the careless delight of this beautiful movement we shall encounter no more."

* * *

He can also determine the extent of Beethoven's love for nature and what this Nature was; whether it was the spectacle of the outside world that he could sit quietly and contemplate, whether it was the urge and force and vitality—the vivid growth of things, the active principle of life—that stirred him to write as he did. And finally, he can determine the effect that Beethoven's later isolation and solitude had on his compositions, and distinguish between the flash of humor and the grotesque play of fancy in his last works and the healthy, rustic, 'unbuttoned' perversity of his earlier efforts.

* * *

And then he can hear the quartets. For during a period of a quarter century, unless he happens to be a quartet player, he has missed most of these, except perhaps two or three in Opus 18, or on rare occasions, one in Opus 59. For the various quartet organizations, instead of striving for variety, seem to duplicate each other's performance, as though engaged in a sort of competition rather than a dissemination of musical ideas and enjoyment. So if he has heard these and at rare intervals one or two from the later and more difficult ones, he has fared about as well as he could expect. Add to this the Lenore Overture No. 3, the Overture to Fidelio, a few songs and some piano sonatas and we get the musical sum total of the man who frequents the concert halls of any city but the most enterprising, which are few and far between.

Now if a man goes to the Centenary Festival and has the constitution to digest or even tolerate the feast that is offered—and it is strong food, much of it bear meat—he will at least know that he can sit down and eat with men whose diet, if not ambrosia, is at least food of those who look toward immortality.

M. C. W.
(Providence)

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.

MAR 16 19...

...USIC IN ...OPHONY RUNS WILD.

...to The Mail and Empire.

...w York, March 15.—The past ... orchestrally, has been one of ...phony run riot, that is, if ca... ...ony can ever be said to run any ...r way! The main course of the ...able was Prokofieff's "Seven, ...y Are Seven" which Serge Kous...itzky gave with the Boston Sym...ony, and what's more, gave twice ...the same concert lest its hearers ...ght be unappreciative after one ...tening. Let no one be deceived ...into thinking that the title bore any reference to Wordsworth's "Simple Child That Lightly Draws Its Breath." What breath was drawn, was drawn heavily!

Mr. Prokofieff's title comes from an incantation either summoning or exorcising (just which, was not entirely clear) seven devils by a high priest of Akkadia. The work enlisted the St. Cecilia Chorus from Boston, imported for the event, and Charles Stratton, tenor, who impersonated the high-priest. The incantation is said to have been found in cuneiform on a wall somewhere or other in Mesopotamia. The only regret is that Mr. Prokofieff's music is of the Twentieth Century, because, heard in those ancient days, would certainly have driven any seven devils (or even eight!) quite out of hearing for a long period. The audience in Carnegie Hall listened with curiosity mingled with apprehension, and there were even a few futile hisses. The second hearing, after a ...rabanda for orchestra and voices, ...d restored aural equilibrium, did ...t add anything new, certainly no...ing of interest. One simply hoped ...would be over, soon!

Casella's New Work.

At the Wanamaker Auditorium, Alfredo Casella conducted a concert of the rare Wanamaker violins with necessary wind and percussion added. The main meat of the evening was a Concerto Romano for organ brass, strings and tympani, which Mr. Casella composed on commission from Mr. Wanamaker especially for these concerts. The composer, after disclaiming on the program that the work is in any sense "program music," went on to say that it was inspired by meditations or hours of same, which he had spent in the city of St. Peter. He further called to memory that the prevailing style of Roman architecture and decoration was the "Berninian Rococo." Fortified with an encyclopaedic dictionary, one discovered that Bernini was a painter, sculptor and architect who came from Naples and who lived 1598—1680. Never having been in Rome, I beg leave to doubt that architecture anywhere could look the way this music sounds! That is, unless it were San Francisco after the earthquake, or Chicago after its fire!

Along with Mr. Casella's piece there was some Bach, Blessed Bach, and some Handel, as well as other early music. Anything more lovely than the arrangement of the Eisenach master's "Komm, suesse Tod" played on a rare viola, by Samuel

NEW YORK

By John Alan Haughton.

...ilsbach of the Philadelphia Or...

...chestra would be difficult to conceive.

"Church Windows."

At his second concert on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated the Prokofieff business and added for good measure, a work new to New York, "Church Windows," four impressions for orchestra by Respighi. The windows represented "The Flight Into Egypt," "Michael Subduing the Lost Angels," "Matin of Saint Clara," and "St. Gregory the Great."

Throughout, Respighi was most effective when most restrained. The Flight was a grave pastorale with Oriental suggestions based upon old modes, not uncommon in music of the Greek church. It also had fleeting likenesses to "Pelleas et Melisande," here and there. St. Michael, as might be supposed, subdued the foes of Heaven with much commotion and there was again some suggestion of old world ecclesiastical music, perhaps the kind that is sung in Heaven! The Santa Clara episode dealt with the legend of her being translated from her sick bed to the Church of St. Francis of Assisi, and then back again, greatly refreshed in spirit. This was, perhaps, the most striking of the four "panels," and might be listened to separately with much edification. The final scene, of St. Gregory in his magnificent robes giving benediction to thousands of kneeling devotees amid incense and candles, was the last and the least satisfactory of all. It smelt of Parsifal throughout, and the organ peals here and then were theatric, without being especially effective.

Leopold Stokowski produced as a b...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 19 1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS "WATER MUSIC"

Burgin, Concert Master, to Appear as Soloist in Violin Concerts Through WBZ This Evening

The 19th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast tonight by WBZ the opening number being the so-called "Water Music" of Handel, with which an interesting story is connected.

The Water music was written for an aquatic fete given by the first King George of England, and was played under Handel's direction by an orchestra seated in a barge which followed the king's boat. Handel, through his continued absence from his post as kappelmeister, had risked the displeasure of his majesty. The king, however, was so greatly pleased with the Water music that he soon after granted him an annuity of 200 pounds a year. The second number of the program is a symphony by Alexander Tansman, a young Polish composer, whose "Dance of the Sorceress" was heard earlier this season. This symphony, which is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston symphony, will receive its initial performance at tonight's concert.

The numbers following the intermission are Glazounov's melodious concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, and the popular overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber.

Prof Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston universit...

and Holy Cross college, will tell some interesting facts concerning the Tansman symphony, in which he will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a personal friend of the composer. During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Glazounov concerto and the Weber overture. During this period he will be assisted in the thematic illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:—

"Water Music" ..... Han...
Andante maestoso, allegro moderato, adagio, allegro con brio, andante, allegretto, menuetto, allegro molto.
Symphony in A minor ..... Tansm...
Allegro giusto
Len to
Scherzo
Finale, allegro molto
Concerto for violin with orchestra, Op. 8... Glazou...
Moderato, andante, moderato, allegro
Overture, "Oberon" ..... W...
Soloist, Richard Burgin

The 118th Medical Regiment ba... a permanent unit of the Connecti... National Guard, will be heard in... program of popular selections ... marches through WTIC, the Tra... ers station at Hartford, this even... at 8. Since it has been organized ... band has been consistently enga... for both military and civilian f... tions. The band, which is under ... direction of Warrant Officer Ph... Azzolina, consists of 33 pieces. Many of the members are professional musicians. Other programs follow:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
MAR 19 1927

Boston Symphony By Radio Tonight

Other Interesting Programs for Today and Sunday.

The programs of radio entertainment furnished radio fans throughout the world by station KDKA from the studio of the Pittsburgh Post and its affiliations with the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting company, for today and tomorrow are many. The Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Boston Symphony hall, provides the outstanding program of music for today, and the Westinghouse Band under the direction of T. J. Vastine, playing in the studio of the Pittsburgh Post at 6 o'clock will furnish the dinner concert.

At 7:15 o'clock the weekly meeting of The Pittsburgh Post Home Radio Club will be conducted by the chairman, James W. H. Weir. At 7:30 an address will be presented under the auspices of the Pittsburgh chapter of the Izaak Walton League.

For tomorrow a new program of music has been added to the Sunday broadcast by KDKA. This will take place from 2 to 3 o'clock and will feature Roxy with studio members of his Gang, the grand organ recently installed in the new Roxy theater, the tower chimes and a string orchestra. Miss Evelyn Herbert, daughter of the famous Victor Herbert, will sing.

At 11 o'clock the church service of the Calvary Episcopal Church will be broadcast direct from the pulpit, and at 4 o'clock the organ recital presented each Sunday afternoon by Dr. Charles Heinroth, director of music of the Carnegie Institute, to be broadcast from the Carnegie Music Hall, followed at 4:45 with the vesper service of the Shadyside Presbyterian church.

At 6:30 o'clock the Twilight Hour of Music, played by the KDKA Little Symphony orchestra under directions of Victor Saudek and vocal selections by the Carnegie Tech Glee Club, presents a program of famous Beethoven compositions.

In the evening at 7:45 o'clock the public dedication of the East End Christian Church will be conducted.

At 9:30 o'clock the sixth in the series of the National Weekly Revues originating in the studio of WJZ, will be heard by the listeners of station KDKA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 19 1927

Beethoven Centenary Program in Boston

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week. All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Orchestra and chorus will likewise combine to perform the "Missa Solemnis," the master's great mass.

Quartets will be performed by the London String Quartet and the Lenox String Quartet. There will be other distinguished soloists, including Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Davies, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. Ernest Newman of London, foremost writer and authority on music, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will come to America especially to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven as a part of the festival.

The program will be as follows: Tuesday, March 22, "Missa Solemnis;" Wednesday, Symphonies 1, 2 and 3; Thursday, Chamber music by Carl Friedberg and London String Quartet; Friday, Symphonies 4 and 5; Saturday, Symphonies 6 and 7; Monday, commemorative exercises with an address by Mr. Newman, concluding with the last quartet and Tuesday, eighth and ninth Choral Symphonies.

...ic of the ...r the thi... show ...st rank ...trains

A single hearing of the piece was enough to persuade us of its imaginative veracity and its extraordinary quality as a work of art. . . . Prokofiev has embodied a tremendous conception in music that often conveys its imaginative essence. The opening, with the clamant, terror-haunted chanting of the priest, maddened by his fears, is superb; and so is the shuddering quietude of the close, as the tribe falls silent, breathless and spent, shrinking from the huge, anonymous night, crowding within the temple, drawing closer to the flickering torches and the delusive warmth of human contacts. . . . The music was startlingly well done by the chorus of the Cecelia Society (imported from Boston for the purpose); by Mr. Charles Stratton, the tenor; bq Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

Toward Respighi's Suite Mr. Gilman also just, though not always kind: "T say that he had scarcely succeeded is n an overwhelming reproach to him. Th themes are profound and exquisite an tremendous enough to provoke wonde that Mr. Respighi, who is not quite Wagner or a Straus or a Debussy or Loeffler, should have been able at an point even to graze the hem of his poet cal imaginings. At his worst, as in th music that would evoke for us the pont fical magnificence of Gregory, he is, be sure, a somewhat distressing spect cle as he seeks to raise himself by th straps of Wagner's seven-league boots.

"This is the poorest of the four tone poems—a futilely noisy and ineffectual piece of musical bombast. 'The Flight into Egypt' is better music, for it imposes a mood, and it is good to hear the Letter Scene from the first act of 'Pelléas' put to such good uses. As for Michael and his flaming sword, we can scarcely chalk up this music of blustering impotence to Mr. Respighi's credit. But his picture of the bedridden St. Claire, borne miraculously to hear the office at the Feast of the Nativity, is a different matter.

Continued on Page Twelve

"Here the composer has truly taken fire from the faint thin flame of that ancient ecstasy, and has given us music of delicately compassionate beauty, music of a singular tenderness and translucense so that one thinks involuntarily of that which was said of a certain achievement of St. Francis' day—that water itself had been washed and fire itself purified by fire. In the twilight of Mr. Respighi's murmurous music, with its color of the old church modes, its long, inverted organ-point, its delicate, distant bell tones, one could almost perceive another window, dimly lit, imaging the Saint himself upon his Assisian hill, with his hands lifted, 'at the end of a night of vigil, not unvisited by stars.'"

Incidents and Prospects

This department owes an apology to its readers. Transcribing literally the inscription above Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-pictures, recently played at the Symphony Concerts, it has more than once, in the last fortnight, written of "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitesch and the Virgin Fevronia"—not once suspecting that it was using a word "banned" hereabouts in a title. Indeed, it only repeated the phrasing of the program-book of the Symphony Concerts. As yet that pamphlet has not been "withdrawn" from circulation or sale.

Mr. Koussevitzky began yesterday the orchestral rehearsals for the Beethoven Centenary Festival, first taking the Mass in hand. Before work began he reminded the waiting men that "our greatest and most formidable task lies ahead"; that the concerts of the festival should exceed all those before. "I suggest," he ended, "that before we begin to rehearse the music, we stand for a moment in silent reverence of the greatest genius in music, Beethoven."

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

NEW YORK MAR 17

Alexander Tansman's Symphony, composed last summer, and dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, will be performed for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. Mr. Tansman has written a long article about the symphony, in which he has much to say concerning his intentions. We hasten to say for the benefit of the ultra-conservative in the audience that Mr. Tansman's intentions are strictly honorable. He has followed the classic form, modified only to suit the modern spirit; he assures us that his music is neither "atonal" nor "polytonal." In the Scherzo he makes use of Polish dance tunes.

The other pieces on the program are selections from Handel's "Water Music," Glazounov's violin concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist), and our old tried and approved friend the overture to "Oberon." Glazounov's concerto was first played here by Mr. Zimbalist when he appeared here for the first time, Oct. 27 1911, [illegible] Hall.

The Beethoven festival will begin Tuesday night with a performance of the great Mass in D. We regret to say that it is not fully determined how Beethoven was dressed at the first performance of the Kyrie, Credo and Agnus Dei at Vienna on May 7, 1824. Thalberg, who was present, said the composer wore a black dresscoat, white neckerchief and waistcoat, black satin small clothes, black silk stockings, shoes with buckles. But Schindler talked with Beethoven just before the concert and told him to make himself ready: "Take your green coat which you can put on when you conduct. The theatre will be dark and no one will notice it. O great master, you do not own a black frock coat. The green one will have to do; in a few days the black one will be ready." Umlauf conducted and Beethoven sat in the orchestra.

The great mass was performed here for the first time by the Cecilia Society. It was also performed at the dedication of [illegible] Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 18 1927

CONCERT BY 325 STUDENTS.

Harvard, Radcliffe and Boston Symphony to Honor Beethoven.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 17.—The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Beethoven's "Missa Solennis" in Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 22 and 27 as a part of the Beethoven centennial celebration.

Rehearsals of the 325 Harvard and Radcliffe singers have been going on for months under the direction of George W. Woodworth, Harvard '24, and Professor Archibald T. Davison of the university's music department. The entire production will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be presented by the club on March 29 as a part of the centennial program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 16 1927

The Centenary C of the

The Centenary Festival, commemorating the death of Ludwig van Beethoven, to be held in Symphony H Boston, March 22-29, has assumed p portions in keeping with the gigan figure that Beethoven presents in musical world. The Nine Symphoni Missa Solennis, Chamber Music, commemorative addresses; the Bost Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevit ky; the Harvard Glee Club, Radcli Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Dav son; the London String Quartet, t Lenox String Quartet; Ernest Newma Walter Gieseking; Florence Austra Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette Vreelan Tudor Davies, Nevada Van Der Vee Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton— What a garland of triumph for a cen tury to wear on its brow, and the firs century at that.

As time goes, it did not take Posterity long to determine the status o Beethoven, and if the patron who attends all these offerings meets with no mental or physical mishap, he will have something to boast of the rest of his days. For this is the opportunity of a lifetime, and an opportunity that comes in a lifetime to the favored few only. For people who are musically inclined, people who play well and are fairly conversant in musical literature, rarely face an opportunity to hear even two Beethoven symphonies in close succession, unless they live in an unusual music centre. More apt are they to hear the same symphony repeated during the season by different orchestras, or two or three symphonies of some particular author strung along at considerable intervals through the entire season. They get a hazy notion of the contents of each, but no clean-cut, definite idea of any. For not everyone who says "Music, Music," can pick up a score and read it, nor does the player who makes use of a piano transcription realize anything of symphonic color.

Concert Boston Symphony

But by taking such a sequence as that to be given in Boston from beginning to end he becomes aware of the Haydyn-Mozartian clarity of the first and the second symphony, splashed here and there by the wild Beethoven plunges and tuggings at the reins that in time made him the outstanding genius that the world is now celebrating; he comes nearer a decision as to the relative merits of the third and fifth, and is able to approximate an intelligent evaluation of those two. He can decide for himself whether joy bade farewell to Beethoven's heart after the writing of the Fourth, and whether although he was equal to many a merry prank in music even up to the very end, he felt no longer the heart pulsations of delight that filled his pages during that brief period of his love for Theresa. Was Grove right when he said of the Finale of this symphony: "It is well to remember that it is the last gay Finale that will be vouchsafed to us. . . . Beauty there will always be, and strength and nobility, but gaiety is gone. The finale of No. 5 is triumphant, of No. 6 is religious, those of Nos. 7 and 8 romantic, humorous, and rough; but the careless delight of this beautiful movement we shall encounter no more."

* * *

He can also determine the extent of Beethoven's love for nature and what this Nature was; whether it was the spectacle of the outside world that he could sit quietly and contemplate, or whether it was the urge and force and vitality—the vivid growth of things, the active principle of life—that stirred him to write as he did. And finally, he can determine the effect that Beethoven's later isolation and solitude had on his compositions, and distinguish between the flash of humor and the grotesque play of fancy in his last works and the healthy, rustic, 'unbuttoned' perversity of his earlier efforts.

* * *

And then he can hear the quartets. For during a period of a quarter century, unless he happens to be a quartet player, he has missed most of these, except perhaps two or three in Opus 18, or on rare occasions, one in Opus 59. For the various quartet organizations, instead of striving for variety, seem to duplicate each other's performance, as though engaged in a sort of competition rather than a dissemination of musical ideas and enjoyment. So if he has heard these and at rare intervals one or two from the later and more difficult ones, he has fared about as well as he could expect. Add to this the Lenore Overture No. 3, the Overture to Fidelio, a few songs and some piano sonatas and we get the musical sum total of the man who frequents the concert halls of any city but the most enterprising, which are few and far between.

Now if a man goes to the Centenary Festival and has the constitution to digest or even tolerate the feast that is offered—and it is strong food, much of it bear meat—he will at least know that he can sit down and eat with men whose diet, if not ambrosia, is at least food of those who look toward immortality.

M. C. W.
(Providence)

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
MAR 16 19

MUSIC IN

CACOPHONY RUNS WILD.

Special to The Mail and Empire.

New York, March 15.—The past week, orchestrally, has been one of cacophony run riot, that is, if cacophony can ever be said to run any other way! The main course of the trouble was Prokofieff's "Seven, They Are Seven" which Serge Koussevitzky gave with the Boston Symphony, and what's more, gave twice at the same concert lest its hearers might be unappreciative after one listening. Let no one be deceived into thinking that the title bore any reference to Wordsworth's "Simple Child That Lightly Draws Its Breath." What breath was drawn, was drawn heavily!

Mr. Prokofieff's title comes from an incantation either summoning or exorcising (just which, was not entirely clear) seven devils by a high priest of Akkadia. The work enlisted the St. Cecilia Chorus from Boston, imported for the event, and Charles Stratton, tenor, who impersonated the high-priest. The incantation is said to have been found in cuneiform on a wall somewhere or other in Mesopotamia. The only regret is that Mr. Prokofieff's music is of the Twentieth Century, because, heard in those ancient days, would certainly have driven any seven devils (or even eight!) quite out of hearing for a long period. The audience in Carnegie Hall listened with curiosity mingled with apprehension, and there were even a few futile hisses. The second hearing, after a sarabanda for orchestra and voices, had restored aural equilibrium, did not add anything new, certainly nothing of interest. One simply hoped it would be over, soon!

Casella's New Work.

At the Wanamaker Auditorium, Alfredo Casella conducted a concert of the rare Wanamaker violins with necessary wind and percussion added. The main meat of the evening was a Concerto Romano for organ brass, strings and tympani, which Mr. Casella composed on commission from Mr. Wanamaker especially for these concerts. The composer, after disclaiming on the program that the work is in any sense "program music," went on to say that it was inspired by meditations or hours of same, which he had spent in the city of St. Peter. He further called to memory that the prevailing style of Roman architecture and decoration was the "Berninian Rococo." Fortified with an encyclopaedic dictionary, one discovered that Bernini was a painter, sculptor and architect who came from Naples and who lived 1598—1680. Never having been in Rome, I beg leave to doubt that architecture anywhere could look the way this music sounds! That is, unless it were San Francisco ofter the earthquake, or Chicago after its fire!

Along with Mr. Casella's piece there was some Bach, Blessed Bach, and some Handel, as well as other early music. Anything more lovely than the arrangement of the Eisenach master's "Komm, suesse Tod" played on a rare viola, by Samuel

NEW YORK

By John Alan Haughton.

Ifrahey of the Philadelphia Orchestra would be difficult to conceive.

"Church Windows."

At his second concert on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated the Prokofieff business and added for good measure, a work new to New York. "Church Windows," four impressions for orchestra by Respighi. The windows represented "The Flight Into Egypt," "Michael Subduing the Lost Angels," "Matin of Saint Clara," and "St. Gregory the Great."

Throughout, Respighi was most effective when most restrained. The Flight was a grave pastorale with Oriental suggestions based upon old modes, not uncommon in music of the Greek church. It also had fleeting likenesses to "Pelleas et Melisande," here and there. St. Michael, as might be supposed, subdued the foes of Heaven with much commotion and there was again some suggestion of old world ecclesiastical music, perhaps the kind that is sung in Heaven! The Santa Clara episode dealt with the legend of her being translated from her sick bed to the Church of St. Francis of Assisi, and then back again, greatly refreshed in spirit. This was, perhaps, the most striking of the four "panels," and might be listened to separately with much edification. The final scene, of St. Gregory in his magnificent robes giving benediction to thousands of kneeling devotees amid incense and candles, was the last and the least satisfactory of all. It smelt of Parsifal throughout, and the organ peals here and then were theatric, without being especially effective.

Leopold Stokowski produced as a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 19 1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS "WATER MUSIC"

Burgin, Concert Master, to Appear as Soloist in Violin Concerts Through WBZ This Evening

The 19th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast tonight by WBZ the opening number being the so-called "Water Music" of Handel, with which an interesting story is connected.

The Water music was written for an aquatic fete given by the first King George of England, and was played under Handel's direction by an orchestra seated in a barge which followed the king's boat. Handel, through his continued absence from his post as kappelmeister, had risked the displeasure of his majesty. The king, however, was so greatly pleased with the Water music that he soon after granted him an annuity of 200 pounds a year. The second number of the program is a symphony by Alexander Tansman, a young Polish composer, whose "Dance of the Sorceress" was heard earlier this season. This symphony, which is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston symphony, will receive its initial performance at tonight's concert.

The numbers following the intermission are Glazounov's melodious concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, and the popular overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber.

Prof Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will tell some interesting facts concerning the Tansman symphony, in which he will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a personal friend of the composer. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will treat the Glazounov concerto and the Weber overture. During this period he will be assisted in the thematic illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:—

"Water Music" ..... Handel
Andante maestoso, allegro moderato, adagio, allegro con brio, andante, allegretto, menuetto, allegro molto.

Symphony in A minor ..... Tansman
Allegro giusto
Len to
Scherzo
Finale, allegro molto

Concerto for violin with orchestra, Op. 82 ..... Glazounov
Moderato, andante, moderato, allegro

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber

Soloist, Richard Burgin

The 118th Medical Regiment band, a permanent unit of the Connecticut National Guard, will be heard in a program of popular selections and marches through WTIC, the Travelers station at Hartford, this evening at 8. Since it has been organized the band has been consistently engaged for both military and civilian functions. The band, which is under the direction of Warrant Officer Philip Azzolina, consists of 33 pieces. Many of the members are professional musicians. Other programs follow:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
MAR 19 1927

Boston Symphony By Radio Tonight

Other Interesting Programs for Today and Sunday.

The programs of radio entertainment furnished radio fans throughout the world by station KDKA from the studio of the Pittsburgh Post and its affiliations with the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting company, for today and tomorrow are many. The Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Boston Symphony hall, provides the outstanding program of music for today, and the Westinghouse Band under the direction of T. J. Vastine, playing in the studio of the Pittsburgh Post at 6 o'clock will furnish the dinner concert.

At 7:15 o'clock the weekly meeting of The Pittsburgh Post Home Radio Club will be conducted by the chairman, James W. H. Weir. At 7:30 an address will be presented under the auspices of the Pittsburgh chapter of the Izaak Walton League.

For tomorrow a new program of music has been added to the Sunday broadcast by KDKA. This will take place from 2 to 3 o'clock and will feature Roxy with studio members of his Gang, the grand organ recently installed in the new Roxy theater, the tower chimes and a string orchestra. Miss Evelyn Herbert, daughter of the famous Victor Herbert, will sing.

At 11 o'clock the church service of the Calvary Episcopal Church will be broadcast direct from the pulpit, and at 4 o'clock the organ recital presented each Sunday afternoon by Dr. Charles Heinroth, director of music of the Carnegie Institute, to be broadcast from the Carnegie Music Hall, followed at 4:45 with the vesper service of the Shadyside Presbyterian church.

At 6:30 o'clock the Twilight Hour of Music, played by the KDKA Little Symphony orchestra under directions of Victor Saudek and vocal selections by the Carnegie Tech Glee Club, presents a program of famous Beethoven compositions.

In the evening at 7:45 o'clock the public dedication of the East End Christian Church will be conducted.

At 9:30 o'clock the sixth in the series of the National Weekly Revues originating in the studio of WJZ, will be heard by the listeners of station KDKA.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 19 1927

Beethoven Centenary Program in Boston

Of the many musical tributes to Beethoven which are to take place in every part of the musical world next March 26, the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death, it is doubtful whether any will excel the Centenary Festival to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, in that week. All of the nine symphonies will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. In the ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Harvard Glee [illegible] and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The ex- estra and chorus will likewise com- to perform the "Missa Solemnis," the aster's great mass.

tire- tets will be performed by the hild- String Quartet and the Lenox and Quartet. There will be other cad- shed soloists, including Flor- ittee ral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeannette nbers and Nevada Van Der Veer, Tudor Arthur Middleton, Charles mit- and Fred Patton. Ernest New- yorksondon, foremost writer and au- fort on music, has accepted the in- ecre- of the Boston Symphony Or- by a and will come to America ility y to pay a verbal tribute to the art- of Beethoven as a part of the nta-rogram will be as follows: Tues- March 22, "Missa Solemnis;" day, Symphonies 1, 2 and 3; ign, y, Chamber music by Carl rvic rg and London String Quartet; on Symphonies 4 and 5; Saturday, men nies 6 and 7; Monday, com- ce i tive exercises with an address ovid Newman, concluding with the ex artet and Tuesday, eighth and horal Symphonies.

demy arily

[illegible] ic of the f the th show st rank trains

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

MAR 19 ..

'Water Music' of Handel to Open Program Put on Ether by Three Stations

The nineteenth Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast to-night by Westinghouse Stations WBZ in Springfield, Mass., WBZ9 in Boston and KDKA in East Pittsburgh, Pa.

The opening number of the program will be the so-called "Water Music" of Handel, with which an interesting story is connected. The music was written for an aquatic fete given by King George the First of England, and was played under Handel's direction by an orchestra seated in a barge which followed the King's boat. Handel, through his continued absence from his post as Kappelmeister, had risked the displeasure of His Majesty.

The King, however, was so greatly pleased with the music that he soon after granted him an annuity of two hundred pounds a year. The second number of the program will be a symphony by Alexander Tansman, a young Polish composer, whose "Dance of the Sorceress" was heard earlier this season. This symphony, which is dedicated to Serge Koussevitsky, the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony, will receive its initial performance at to-night's concert.

The numbers following the intermission are Glazounov's melodious concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist; and the popular overture to "Oberon" by von Weber.

Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will address the radio audience just prior to the opening number, illustrating themes from the "Water Music," also telling some interesting facts concerning the Tansman symphony, in which he will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a personal friend of the composer. In the intermission Professor Marshall will treat the Glavounov Concerto and the Weber Overture. In this period he will be assisted in the thematic illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 19 1927

Composition of Handel Will Be Heard Tonight

Boston Symphony Concert Also Includes Work Dedicated to Serge Kousevitsky by Tansman.

The 19th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast tonight by Westinghouse stations WBZ and KDKA through the courtesy of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston.

The opening number of the program for tonight is the so-called "Water Music" of Handel. The second number is a symphony by Alexander Tansman, a young Polish composer, whose "Dance of the Sorceress" was heard earlier this season. This symphony, which is dedicated to Serge Koussevitsky, the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony, will receive its initial radio performance at tonight's concert.

The numbers following the intermission are Glazounov's melodious concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, and the popular overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will address the radio audience just prior to the opening number, illustrating themes from the Water Music, also telling some interesting facts concerning the Tansman Symphony, in which he will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a personal friend of the composer. During the intermission Prof. Marshall will treat the Glazounov Concerto and the Weber Overture. During this period he will be assisted in the thematic illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

"Water Music,"	Handel
Symphony in A minor,	Tansman
Intermission.
Concerto for violin with orchestra,	Glazounov
Op. 82.
Overture, "Oberon,"	Weber

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

MAR 19 1927

Composition of Handel Will Be Heard Tonight

Boston Symphony Concert Also Includes Work Dedicated to Serge Kousevitsky by Tansman.

The 19th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast tonight by Westinghouse stations WBZ and KDKA through the courtesy of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston.

The opening number of the program for tonight is the so-called "Water Music" of Handel. The second number is a symphony by Alexander Tansman, a young Polish composer, whose "Dance of the Sorceress" was heard earlier this season. This symphony, which is dedicated to Serge Koussevitsky, the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony, will receive its initial radio performance at tonight's concert.

The numbers following the intermission are Glazounov's melodious concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist, and the popular overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber.

Prof. John Patten Marshall will address the radio audience just prior to the opening number, illustrating themes from the Water Music, also telling some interesting facts concerning the Tansman Symphony, in which he will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a personal friend of the composer. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will treat the Glazounov Concerto and the Weber Overture. During this period he will be assisted in the thematic illustrations by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

The complete symphony program for tonight follows:

"Water Music,"	Handel
Symphony in A minor,	Tansman
Intermission.
Concerto for violin with orchestra,	Glazounov
Op. 82.
Overture, "Oberon,"	Weber

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

MAR 19 1927

... d Burgin So... t With Boston Symphony

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXPRESS

MAR 19 1927

May I not (without being vain) rise a little in my own esteem upon receipt of an invitation by Manager W. H. Brennan and the Boston Symphony Board of Directors to attend next week's Beethoven memorial concert, March 22, 23, 24, 28 and 29, at Symphony Hall?

Commemoration programs compass all nine Beethoven symphonies in chronologic order and the "Missa Solemnis," under the famous Serge Koussevitzky as conductor. Two evenings will be devoted to piano and chamber music, the London and Lenox String quartets participating. During one of these Ernest Newman, the eminent English critic, who, as guest of the board of directors, has come to America especially for this occasion, will deliver the memorial address. It is a festival worthy of Boston and its symphonic traditions setting a high example.

DAVID BRUNO USSHER.

SYMPHONY IN 19TH CONCERT

Mar 19

Koussevitzky Conducts Program with Infinite Care and Gusto

HER

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, movements from the "Water" music; Tansman, symphony A minor; Glazounov, concerto for violin (Richard Burgin, violinist); Weber overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Tansman composed this symphony last summer and dedicated it to Mr. Koussevitzky. The performance yesterday was the first. The composer wrote a long description of the work too long for insertion in the orchestra's program-book. He had much to say about his intentions. What a composer purposes when he girds up his loins to write is not of so much importance as what he actually writes. When Mr Tansman said that this symphony is in the classic form with personal modifications made in order to revive the form by adapting it to modern requirements, he probably hoped to reassure the conservatives and lure the radicals to a hearing. New wine in old bottles. The question comes up: "Are these personal modifications a revelation of individual strength or weakness?" Has this composer last summer musical ideas, symphonic material of sufficient significance for a symphony constructed along the old classic lines? Could he develop richly this material?

The slow movement and the scherzo are the most ingeniously constructed, the most agreeable pages of the work. The adagio is often melodically beautiful though various elements that enter into the long continued melodic flow detract from the prevailing mood and give the impression of a laborious attempt to escape from what the composer might regard as too obvious expressiveness. The scherzo, based on Polish folk-dances, a polka and a mazurka, is delightful throughout. There is not a too close adherence to the dance form; the polka rhythm is not so aggressively forced as to remind one of the song still associated with Rosina Vokes. In this scherzo true invention, compelling rhythm, and a fine sense of color are to be recognized.

The first movement and the finale do not strike one so favorably. The thematic material is hardly of weight, nor is it employed clearly and effectively. The orchestration is often thick; the music, especially in the first movement, is at times bombastic. Sheer noise is not a symptom of strength. Again, in the first movement there is a lack of logical continuity, there are patchy contrasts, there are thunderous explosions for which no train of gunpowder has been laid. Thus, perhaps, did Mr. Tansman expect to win the admiration of the radicals while he was trying to appease the poker-backs by pointing out to them that he was at heart devotedly classical. "Personal modifications" are not to be ruthlessly condemned; but they depend on the musical individuality of the composer and his ability to modify and at the same time preserve.

Mr. Burgin, excellent violinist, admirable concert master, was enthusiastically applauded for the beauty of his tone, his technical proficiency, and his rhetorical taste in the interpretation of Glazounov's concerto. The first sections are of a suave nature that a violinist might easily turn into sugary sentimentalism, knowing that he would thus please many. Mr. Burgin avoided this pitfall. He played the music of these sections in a pleasingly emotional manner; abstained from unduly stressing sentiment or from introducing any heroic element foreign to the music. The finale, the weakest, most perfunctory and conventional portion of the concerto was performed with the requisite spirit. And so the hearty, spontaneous applause was more than a personal tribute to the artist who is warmly appreciated here as man and violinist.

It may be noted in connection with the approaching Beethoven festival, that Beethoven more than once expressed the opinion that Handel was the greatest composer who ever lived.

...iced at receiving the 40 volumes of Arnold's edition of Handel's works: "I have long wanted them, for Handel is the greatest, the ablest composer that ever lived. I can still learn from him." These volumes cheered him when he was on his bed of pain; Handel's scores were always in his mind during the last years of his life. The "Water" music was for an occasion, and not intended for a huge body of strings with other instruments, yet the music does not suffer when thus transferred into the concert hall; perhaps it gains thereby. A brilliant performance of Weber's overture brought an end to a concert that was greatly enjoyed. Tansman's Symphony, which Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with infinite care and gusto, was received respectfully at least, if not with lively admiration by the audience.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next Friday afternoon will comprise Beethoven's 4th and 5th symphonies; the program of Saturday evening, March 26, the 6th and 7th symphonies.

NEW SYMPHONY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Program of Work by Tansman

GLOBE MAR 19

The chief item on yesterday's Boston Symphony program was a new Symphony in A minor by the young Polish composer Alexander Tansman, dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, and performed for the first time anywhere. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. He was applauded with exceptional warmth both before and after the Glazunov concerto. The other numbers were excerpts from Handel's "Water Music," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Mr Tansman furnished a long description of his work, of which a part was printed in the program notes. He explains that: "The whole of my Symphony is conceived as absolute music. The form is that of the classic symphony, with modifications, intended to adapt it, to the demands of contemperaneous feeling. The Symphony is written without preconceived prejudices in favor of this or that school; in spite of some polytonal or atonal passages the whole work is conceived in a tonal spirit. The tonality, A minor, dominates."

Despite these anxious disclaimers of modernism, this symphony will not please those whose ideal is still Brahms or Franck. The chief theme of the first movement has a syncopated rhythm much nearer in style to American jazz than to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. There are many harsh clashes of sound.

The slow movement, however, described by its composer as "a long song whose melodic line is unbroken," is not aggressively modern.

Sustained Effects

Tansman in this new work reveals a capacity for sustained effects for which one had not previously given him credit. He can build cunningly sonorous climaxes, to which Mr Koussevitzky, according to his wont, gave full value.

Tansman has written a symphony which, at a first hearing, holds one's interest. But one felt that the workmanship was too facile; the technique and the musical ideas for the most part derivative.

Tansman, it still appears to the reviewer, is merely another of the young men in Paris who write up-to-date music with ease. There is no profundity, no nobility, no dignity, no austerity in this symphony. It lacks imaginative intensity. It lacks the superlative craftsmanship, the immense gusto of Stravinsky's best work, as well as the qualities of the great orchestral music of former generations.

Yet one was grateful to Mr Koussevitzky for the opportunity of hearing an interesting modern work. One, and only one, such piece should appear on every Boston Symphony program.

Mr Burgin's notable abilities as a violinist and his sensitive musical imagination might well have been spent on a work of greater value than Glazunov's concerto. It is well written, but dull. There are, however, but few violin concertos of interest apart from that of observing how cleverly a performer can surmount great difficulties. The audience plainly has a friendly regard for Mr Burgin. He played very well, but were he the world's greatest violinist the applause would have been no warmer.

Mr Koussevitzky's revival of the fragments from Mandel's "Water Music" gave especial pleasure. These little pieces were interpreted with the personal eloquence he brings to everything. There is always Koussevitzky in each number he conducts. His interpretations can never be described as self-effacing.

Familiar Overture

With Weber's familiar overture Mr Koussevitsky, as on a previous occasion, took his own way. His tempi are his own, not those of the score. Except for the unpleasant harshness of tone in loud passages so frequent under Koussevitsky the performance was brilliantly effective. There was much applause.

Next week's concerts are part of the Beethoven festival. Friday the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies will be played. Saturday instead of the usual repetition of the Friday program the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies will be given. This arrangement puts it out of the power of any one not a subscriber to both series to hear all nine of the Beethoven symphonies during the festival.

P. R.

BURGIN GETS OVATION AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Music-lovers who have attended the Symphony Concerts and have noticed with regularity the conscientious work of Richard Burgin, for the last seven seasons concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were not slow to show their appreciation when he appeared yesterday as soloist in Glazounov's concerto for violin and orchestra.

Burgin was greeted with hearty applause by audience and men of the orchestra when he came on the stage. And at the close of the concerto, which is in four movements played without pause, he was given one of the greatest ovations of the season. ADV MAR 19

It was an ovation well deserved of the merits of his solo-playing yesterday afternoonn. In a piece that is of great technical difficulty for the violinist he displayed above all a remarkable accuracy of intonation, beautiful tone, and admirable musicianship. Never the conventional virtuoso, he was content to subordinate his efforts to producing a performance notable for its finished ensemble. The concerto, which was last played here sixteen years ago, was good to hear.

Of quite a different character was a new symphony in A minor by Tansman, the Polish composer, whose music Mr. Koussevitzky has previously introduced to symphony audiences. This new work, dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky and given its first performance anywhere yesterday, was chiefly notable for its insistence on dance rhythms, an elementary characteristic of the symphonic form which composers have tended to ignore beginning with the romantic movement in music.

The music itself, although well made and exhibiting a certain individuality, did not impress the writer as much as the copious explanations of the composer in the program book would seem to warrant.

BRAND NEW SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Tansman's Work Well Received—Burgin Soloist

Post Mar 19

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A feature of the Koussevitzkian regime at Symphony Hall has been the not infrequent world premieres of European compositions. Already this year works by Lazar, Roussel and Respighi have thus been heard, and yesterday afternoon there was added to this list a brand-new Symphony by the Parisianized Pole, Alexander Tansman.

MAKES INSTANT APPEAL

As previously known here by his charming Sinfonietta and a less impressive Sorcerers' Dance, Tansman appeared to be an expert craftsman with a ready flow of attractive if not essentially individual ideas, harmonically enough of a modernist to stimulate his hearers but not so radical as to disturb them. In turn the Symphony of yesterday renewed and strengthened these impressions. Clearly it is no outstanding masterpiece but, soundly made, charged with rhythmic energy, brilliantly orchestrated and often, as in the fine slow movement, definitely melodious, the piece is one to make an instant appeal and to invite further acquaintance. In so far as may be judged, the performance of yesterday was one to put the music in its most favorable light.

On yesterday's programme only the Overture to "Oberon" which, in a performance genuinely effective save for an undue sentamentalizing of the second theme, ended the concert, was familiar music in Symphony Hall. For the rest there was the so-called "Water Music" of Handel and the Violin Concerto of Glazunov, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist. Written, according to legend, to placate an offended British sovereign, the "Water Music" had not been heard at the Symphony Concerts since 1900, when Mr. Gericke conducted seven of its 20 numbers. There were seven again upon yesterday's programme, each of them more or less entertaining, and certain of them revealing of a nimbler more picturesque Handel than is to be known through the oratorios and concertos.

Well-made but, like the bulk of the Russian's music, not strikingly original, Glazunov's Concerto contains many a toothsome passage. The orchestration is sonorous and continuously effective without overweighting the solo instrument, and the part for the latter is gratefully written. Of its persistent suavities and elegancies, Mr. Burgin yesterday made the most, and for his deft and musicianly playing he was ...rded with unusual heartiness.

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Next Tuesday evening, in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, assisted by the glee clubs of Harvard and Radcliffe and a quartet of soloists, will begin what will perhaps be the most remarkable of the many Beethoven commemorations which will mark the 100th anniversary of the master's death on March 26, 1827. TRAV

The first score of the festival to occupy the opening concert will be the great Mass in D. On Wednesday evening, March 23d, the first three symphonies will be performed. On Thursday evening, March 24, the London string quartet will perform Beethoven's quartet in E minor, Opus 59, No. 2, Harold Samuel will play the pianoforte Sonata in A flat, Opus 110. Mr. Samuel will combine with Messrs. James Levey, violinist, and C. W. Evans, 'cellist of the London string quartet in the master's great Trio in B flat, Opus 97.

The regular concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will become a part of the festival. Mr. Koussevitsky will perform the fourth and fifth symphonies on Friday, and the sixth and seventh symphonies on Saturday. On Monday evening, March 28th, there will be commemorative exercises. S. Foster Damon will read an ode to Beethoven which he has written for the occasion. There will be an address on Beethoven by Ernest Newman, the foremost English critic and writer on musical subjects, who has come from London on special invitation for this purpose. The evening will end with the performance of Beethoven's Last Quartet, Opus 135, known by the motto, "Muss es sein." This will be played by the Lenox string quartet.

The festival will close on Tuesday evening, March 29, with performances of the eighth and ninth symphonies. In the finale of the latter the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, and a quartet of soloists will assist the orchestra.

MASS FOR PENSION FUND

Beethoven's great mass in D, which is to open the Beethoven festival at Symphony hall, will be repeated there on Sunday afternoon, March 27th, at 3:30. MAR 19

This performance, which comes on the intervening Sunday of the festival series, will be given for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. As in the Tuesday performance, the Boston symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the following quartet of soloists: Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton.

The Missa Solennis has not been performed in Boston on account of its formidable difficulties since the dedication of Symphony hall, in October, 1900.

THRILLS OF SOUND; RECOVERED HANDEI ANIMATED SYMPHO

FROM OLD MASTERS TO A BRIG NEW HAND

TRANS PAR

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra Two Feats—Mr. Burgin and a Con of Glazunov—The "Water-Music" A Twenty-Six Years—Mr. Tansman Pleasure and Young Abilities

TWICE, yesterday afternoon, Symphony Orchestra should h arrested every ear. Concert-ha the world over, know the gr chord at the turn of Weber's Overture "Oberon." The hushed music has b singing the magic, the faerie, the legend that are background to the ope Across it and afar Oberon has blo his horn; through mists of fantasy ha stirred the sounds of his palace. Of sudden Weber bids the orchestra to single vast and crashing chord; th leaps, allegro con fuoco, into the swe and glow of chivalric adventure a medieval pageantry. On Friday, in o superb stroke from nearly five-score m that chord clove the air. Not one w too quick by the minutest fraction sound; by the same measure not o was too slow; in a single mass, like knife descending, every voice was weld A conductor's dream fulfilled; an au ence receiving a unique sensation; t famous chord, as it may sound across t concert-room no more than once in a lif time! To such precision and brillian has Mr. Koussevitzky now schooled th orchestra.

Applauded loud and long, playin above himself 'n a solo-piece, Mr. Bu gin, the concert-master, was heard Glazunov's Concerto. In the slow se tion of a continuous music, the cu ning composer gives to the solo-viol an unfolding, warm-voiced melody. moves against a background of th darker strings; while the muted voice of the deeper wood-winds accompany i The euphony, through these measures of the violin, the violoncellos and th clarinets—to cite the instruments tha came fullest to the ear—turned the hear to water. The composer's melody i itself may be no remarkable invention the secondary parts no masterpiece o figuration. Yet here was the beauty o musical sound become enchantment upon every perceiving sense. For the while there was only to listen, spelled. The music shifted; the magic vanished; but to have known that euphony was as rare sensation as the concert-hall

FOR the first time within long memory, Fred Stone, in a new extravaganza, will descend upon Boston in the spring—at the Colonial from Monday, April 11. Biennially his Bostonian public has expected him either in the autumn or at mid-winter. Now he routs precedent. Not only does he come in April, but within six months after the production of his present piece. The reason is not far to seek. Hitherto Mr. Stone has spread each entertainment over three seasons. Now, and hereafter, two will suffice—one for New York, Boston and Philadelphia; the other for remaining metropolitan stages.

Hence "Criss-Cross" at the Colonial as aforesaid. Under "Plays in Prospect," on the theater-pages of this paper, the curious will find a word about the new piece. Enough to say here that it is fresh variation on the approved model; that Mr. Fred renews and diversifies himself; that Miss Dorothy sings, acts and dances in fresh graces and ripening talents.

again in a lifetime, may yield. To such fineness of ear and hand and lips has Mr. Koussevitzky also schooled his choirs.

By no means upon that chord alone does the Overture to "Oberon" depend for twentieth-century life and being. Over seventeen pages, the program-book ransacked the storehouses of musical archæology for "historical and descriptive notes." Not thus mummified into scholastic plaything is Weber's pulsing, striding prelude. The mystery and magic of the beginning, the sheer loveliness of these glamourous veils of sound, conjure upon the imagination. The leap of the chord—and page after page outpours riches of melody and vigors of rhythm. The colors glow like the red and blue and gold of an illuminated chronicle; the measures unfold and we listeners rove romance with Sir Huon; a tutti and a climax, and the splendors of Charlemagne's court are opened. Music of legend and of chivalry, of love and arms and adventure, of the world made magic—and all in valiance and in poetry flooding. Not Wagner himself had more the genius of it. With reason he sounded mourning trumpets over Weber's grave. The Overture to "Oberon," like the Overture to "Euryanthe," mocks at archæology.

Glazunov's Concerto for Violin is music of another sort. It was made at the study-table, with the piano in easy reach; workmanship, and little else, is its saving virtue. The violinists court it, because it sets them alternately to flowing song in seductive vein or to feats of skill and surety. The public enjoys it because the melody meanders clear-voiced; while the cadenza, with not a little of the passage-work, is transparent exercise in virtuosity. How well it all lies for the violinist's bow and also for the casual ear! By every odds, Glazunov, composing a concerto, is an adroit craftsman and a ready speaker. Possibly his musical invention will not bear close inspection. Individual distinction hardly marks it; while not by too deep thought does he achieve development. But what would these "highbrows" have and what is a violin-concerto for—unless a Beethoven or a Brahms happens to write it? To give pleasure, of course, and to display variously the fiddler's prowess.

For these ends, Glazunov in A minor may serve well enough. Possibly Russian violinists can transfigure him; but, come over-seas, they usually prefer Chaikovsky. As it was, Mr. Burgin outdid himself. For once no self-consciousness, no hesitation beset him in a solo-part. He played freely and fully, wringing the last drop out of Glazunov's melodies and without a sentimental squeeze; achieved the cadenza as though it was a natural and not a perverse music; smoothed euphonies and spun transitions; kept an ear for tone and a hand for rhythm; in general and particular gave the pleasure of a sensitive musician and a fine-fingered virtuoso. Justly and repeatedly the audience hailed him as an old friend in new grace.

New acquaintance, so long had it been forgotten, proved the "Water-Music" of Handel. Now, the illustrious Georg Frideric is not exactly a store-house of orchestral pieces for these days. His overtures to operas and oratorios usually served routine purpose and will not bear transfer. His concertos are designed primarily for the solo-instrument. His "occasional" overtures are formalities. To and fro among the Concerti Grossi must the conductiors go, unless they turn aside to the "Water-Music" of 1715-17 or the "Fireworks-Music" of a much later day. Mr. Gericke was aware of the "Water-Music," liked it and in his earlier terms in Boston played numbers from it. In turn, Mr. Koussevitzky led it back, after twenty-six years, to the Symphony Concerts. In Manchester, Sir Hamilton Harty once ventured fragments of the "Fireworks-Music," written for a London spectacle in the seventeen-fifties. They were well received.

From the "Water-Music" Mr. Koussevitzky chose eight or nine numbers—the divisions were not easy to follow—among the superabundant twenty. They are written for horns, wood-winds, the usual string choir; were plainly designed to sound out-of-doors, across the reaches of the Thames, as the royal barge bore Majesty (and a mistress) along the river to supper. Perhaps, from that circumstance, there was none of the deep-voiced, full-curving, slow movements that present ears associate with Handel. Instead, sounded brisk and festal measures; dialogues between the different choirs, like tonal chatter overheard; episodes of the dance; occasional music of courtly pageantry; a stately and full-throated beginning and end; a single movement that was quietly songful—the nocturne, possibly, of this river-journey. Altogether they contained enough of the master to bear his stamp and to give the expected pleasure. It was amusing to bourrée with gusto, in less zeal to transfigure it Bach-wise than to keep the rhythms of folk-dance. The hand and the ear for music of ceremony were present and accomplishing, after the sonorous Handelian fashion. For new pleasure, stateliness sometimes yielded to the lighter vein of a royal fête intime; while if the Andante was nightpiece, it was imagined for a torch-lit and silvery river. Second-grade Handel, if the stern hearer will have it so, but Handel well worth Bostonian resurrection.

Finally, the new symphony of Mr. Tansman written in his thirtieth year, played for the first time anywhere, steadily exhilarating to hear. The composer, who has a rare knack at describing his own music, affirms that it is not "modernist." In degree, he is within the truth, since he uses atonality or polytonality sparingly and gently; indulges in no fantastic and vehement ejaculations; writes as though jazz and syncopation were not; imitates neither Stravinsky nor Honegger; affects no pseudo-ancientry; wrests no instrument from natural function. On the other hand, Mr. Tansman is "modernist" in brevity, directness and compactness; contraction of orthodox formulas and avoidance of measures for paper and the eye rather than for sound and the ear; frequent reliance upon incisive rhythms; a play of harmonies and timbres that is distinctly of our time; a pleasing scorn of tonal fuss, feathers and pretense. He is also his individual self in the pervading animation of the symphony. It is quick-witted and, outside the slow division, quick-moving; while the glint of the harmonies and the edge into which he sharpens the instrumental voices, give the whole music a surface and a speech of Alexander Tansman and no other. Being a Pole, he is warm-tempered and mercurial; by the same token he is also apt and elegant of hand.

Consequently no one heard as though aggrieved or "insulted"; no one overtaxed his musical wits to understand; while from all sides and all degrees of listeners came, not hard words, but hearty applause. In point of fact, Mr. Tansman writes in his slow movement a well-invented and well-conducted melody. It is simple and straightforward; has substance and warmth; gathers body and mood; sits well against the background; wins the ear and quickens the fancy; stirs them at climax, lures them at gentler moments with the tenderness, wistful and graceful both, that is one of Mr. Tansman's individualizing possessions. He writes a Scherzo gally, brightly, with a light curl of the lips, dividing it between a Polish polka and a Polish mazurka, ingeniously and amusingly interweaving or contrasting them. In his first movement he relies upon a vivid theme, energetic rhythm, animated handling; but again at opportune moments the Tansmanic tenderness returns. Rhythmic liveliness, readiness with ways and means, a playful zest, keep the finale fertile, spirited and vigorous.

Nowhere in the whole symphony is Mr. Tansman empty, metallic or merely clattering, as he was too often in his dance of last autumn. Time and again a happy turn arrests, and wins, the ear, keeping interest alert. From beginning to end youthful energy propels the music; youthful fervor deepens it; while youthful grace is as often garland upon it. Mr. Tansman has written no masterpiece—and there is not a reason why it should be expected of him. No more has he written a willed and cerebral, or a posturing and pretentious symphony. His temperament saves him from both pitfalls. The residue is a music that steadily pleases, savory of the time, savory of a composer, who, thrice blest by the Muses, now mates substance and skill and charm.

H. T. P.

Notably Partnered

Miss Anglin, Mrs. Fiske and Mr. Skinner Join Hands for a Year's Tour

THE elders of our stage are neither histrionically dead nor managerially sleeping. Beyond many of their complacent juniors, they have the will and the courage to new adventures. Hence the Fiske-Anglin Theater, which is to be a travelling company of the first rank, acting in the principal cities, proffering each season one or more plays, classic or modern, established or experimental. The two actresses have themselves organized it; "taken on" Mr. Skinner as colleague for 1927-28; agreed upon Shakspeare's farce, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," for first play. The tour will begin late next October and continue through thirty weeks, East, West, even South. For cast, Mr. Skinner will act Falstaff; Miss Anglin, Mistress Ford; Mrs. Fiske, Mistress Page—new parts for all three. If fortune is kind, the two actresses will continue their "theater" indefinitely.

New Tansman Work From Koussevitzky

MONITOR MAR 19

THE nineteenth Friday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall, Boston, with Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, as soloist. The program, which will be repeated this evening, was:

Handel—"Water Music"
Tansman—Symphony in A minor
Glazounoff—Violin Concerto, Op. 82
—Overture to "Oberon"

Though busy with preparations for the orchestra's Beethoven Festival, which begins next week, Mr. Koussevitzky continues to present novelties to us. Tansman's Symphony, dedicated to the Boston conductor, was written last summer and had its first performance yesterday. That hearing leaves the impression that this is the most sucessful among those efforts which come offhand to memory to pour new musical wine into old bottles. Certainly it marks a definite advance over the Sinfonietta andthe "Dance of the Sorceress." Here is a work that may well engage the attention of those who attach importance to Mr. Copland's Piano Concerto. Each work essays to bring, so to speak, a classical form up to date. Both exhibit the utmost latitude in respect of dissonance. The principal difference between them appears to be that Tansman, when he began to write, had something to say.

Tansman's Symphony bears evidence that its composer is aware of the work of Stravinsky and Strauss, as well as of the classic symphonists. But it seems on a first hearing far more original than his previous compositions heard in Boston. He has really achieved the "lyric outpouring" with which he does not hesitate to credit himself in his descriptive note. All the themes are clear and individual, and the development is full, but not tedious. The principal theme of the slow movement is so sustained and sonorous and pleasing that it may render its composer liable to expulsion from the ranks of true musical radicals. The Scherzo is based on a polka movement, the trio on a mazurka. The finale is in modified Rondo form. Throughout, dullness and repetitiousness are successfully avoided, contrast is deftly and justly employed and rhythms are flexible and vigorous. And tonality reigns, despite a few excursions. Perhaps Tansman will live up to his friends' expectations, after all.

What a delight it was to hear the "Water Music"—or half a dozen numbers of it. It had not been played in Boston for many years—too many. It is not necessary to debate whether this music actually was written to placate an irate Hanoverian monarch; certainly it would have been effective for that purpose. It is easy to imagine its effect heard across water. Its effect across a concert hall is only less charming. Here and throughout the afternoon the orchestra played superlatively.

Mr. Burgin has greatly matured as an artist since he came to Boston. He played yesterday with extraordinary technique, rare beauty of tone and more musicianship than his vehicle perhaps deserved. The "Oberon" Overture received one of those interpretations that are either intensely dramatic or extremely theatrical, according to one's taste and mood.

L. A. S.

SYMPHONY HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

MONITOR MAR 19

Number on Tonight's Program Dedicated to Conductor

The regular Saturday weekly ra diocast of concerts by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra will be give this evening by Stations WBZ Springfield, WBZA of Boston an KDKA of Pittsburgh, through th courtesy of the W. S. Quinby Com pany.

The opening number on the pr gram is the so-called "Water Music of Handel. The Water Music wa written for an aquatic fête given b King George I of England, and wa played by an orchestra under Ha del's direction, seated in a barge fo lowing the King's boat. Hand through continued absence from h post as Kappelmeister, had risk the displeasure of His Majesty, b the King was much pleased with t Water Music, and soon after grant him an annuity of £200 a year.

The second number on the pr gram is a symphony by Alexand Tansman, a young Polish compos whose "Dance of the Sorceress" w heard earlier this season. This sy phony, dedicated to Serge Kous vitzky, conductor, will receive its i tial performance tonight.

The numbers following the int mission are Glazounov's concerto f violin and orchestra, in which Ric ard Burgin, the concert master the orchestra, will be heard as so ist; and the overture, to "Aberd by Von Weber.

Prof. John P. Marshall will illu trate themes from the Water Mu as usual. He will be assisted Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a p sonal friend of the composer, M Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and M Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

THE GREATEST QUALITY OF BEETHOVEN

This we Boston, like t rest of t musical wo is to commemorate the centenary the death of Beethoven. The Bos Symphony Orchestra has planned series of festival performances of music unsurpassed by any of world-wide tributes to his mem Ernest Newman, who, like our Philip Hale, is a critic of univers acknowledged eminence, is co from London to make a speech week Monday on Beethoven's geni past have united to praise the master's work, and to investigate every detail of his life. Nothing new now remains to be said. But the greatest quality of Beethoven, his intense moral earnestness, perhaps needs to be emphasized anew. GLOBE MAR 20

Mr Senneck, in an unusually acute and sensible article in the March number of The American Mercury, has pointed out the fact that one of the reasons why the popularity of Beethoven among musicians is perceptibly on the wane is this very moral earnestness. This, he claims, is an age without moral earnestness, an age afraid to take life seriously, an age in revolt against the seriousness and sobriety of its elders. Such an age is likely to prefer Stravinsky, if not jazz, to Beethoven.

It is true that there is among musicians an undercurrent of protest against the indiscriminating reverence for Beethoven floridly expressed by such Victorian musical prophets as Sir George Grove. To Grove every note Beethoven wrote was apparently divinely inspired.

To a dispassionate listener it is of course obvious that Beethoven, like Shakspere, and like every other great genius, was not always at his best. But the perception that the "King Stephen" overture, and the music for "The Ruins of Athens" are inferior and perishable ought to blind nobody to the imperishable glory of Beethoven's masterpieces.

Granted that there are minor works of Beethoven, by which he himself would not wish to be judged, let us leave them out of the discussion and confine ourselves to the question of what is the essential element in his masterpieces.

"High Seriousness"

That element is what Matthew Arnold, writing of Sophocles, called "high-seriousness." Beethoven's music does not preach any specific moral lesson. One cannot put sermons in tones. Beethoven's music is not gloomy, not like that of Bach, austerely intellectual. It is intensely and universally human. But Beethoven had high hopes of humanity, which were not dashed by a lifetime full of disappointments. It is strange that a man so impatient that he quarreled sooner or later with every landlady and was at moments angered by every friend should have retained hope and faith.

It is doubly strange that a musician always pressed for ready money, never sure of public support, hampered by grave physical infirmities, chief among them incurable deafness, and all his life deprived of the home and family he so clearly craved, should have insisted on writing his one opera about "Fidelio, or Conjugal Love," and his best-known work for voices as a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

Beethoven had an inner life which went on seemingly untouched by the always unsatisfactory conditions of his wordly affairs. Those who listen to his Second Symphony next Wednesday night will find it difficult to believe a fact of which there is the clearest historical proof, that he composed it at the most unhappy period of his life, when he had just learned that he was becoming permanently and hopelessly deaf, when in addition one of his several unhappy love affairs had come to the usual end, separation. The music is full of gaiety and tenderness by turns, with not a hint of tragedy.

But into some of his music he did put those deeper feelings which do not appear in the Second Symphony. Consider his love music. Wagner, who lacks the moral earnestness of Beethoven, has written what to many people is the supreme love scene in the last scene of his "Tristan und Isolde," with the "Love Death" of Isolde.

Not an Ascetic

Beethoven gives to the heroine of his only opera at the climax of the work measures to sing of equal intensity and with an emotional quality that lifts them forever beyond and above anything of which Wagner was capable. Leonore, disguised as the youth Fidelio, has gained admittance to the cell where her husband is confined under an unjust sentence of death. She is bidding him farewell forever when in the distance the trumpet sounds indicating that the hope for reprieve and pardon from the King has arrived in time to save him.

Those who remember the repeated trumpet calls in the familiar "Leonore no 3" overture will recall the measures which each time follow, taken from Leonore's outburst of emotion. They rise to a serenity and purity of joy found only where there is moral earnestness, "high seriousness." The whole duet between Leonore and Florestan at this point in the opera, "O Namenlose Freude" is a fuller exemplification of the point at issue.

To Beethoven the world was not merely a place where one tried to have a good time, to advertise one's self into a well-paid career, to know the proper people, to be what is called a "success." Except for self advertising Beethoven no doubt would, if he could, have attained the other common human aims mentioned.

He was not an ascetic or a recluse by temperament. Nor was he insensitive to fame. But these worldly satisfactions were not enough. He had as his own words abundantly prove, a feeling which never left him that a man is put here in this world, not to enjoy himself, but to do the will of a higher Power whom Beethoven was not ashamed to worship as his God.

This sense of being a tool in the hands of God is felt, apparently, by all religious and earnest people. In an age notably less serious Beethoven would no doubt cease to exert the supreme fascination he has so long for those who take life seriously

The Stones in Spring

Change in the Calendar of the Familiar Entertainer

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Next Tuesday evening, in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, assisted by the glee clubs of Harvard and Radcliffe and a quartet of soloists, will begin what will perhaps be the most remarkable of the many Beethoven commemorations which will mark the 100th anniversary of the master's death on March 26, 1827.

TRAV

The first score of the festival to occupy the opening concert will be the great Mass in D. On Wednesday evening, March 23d, the first three symphonies will be performed. On Thursday evening, March 24, the London string quartet will perform Beethoven's quartet in E minor, Opus 59, No. 2. Harold Samuel will play the pianoforte Sonata in A flat, Opus 110. Mr. Samuel will combine with Messrs. James Levey, violinist, and C. W. Evans, 'cellist of the London string quartet in the master's great Trio in B flat, Opus 97.

The regular concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will become a part of the festival. Mr. Koussevitsky will perform the fourth and fifth symphonies on Friday, and the sixth and seventh symphonies on Saturday. On Monday evening, March 28th, there will be commemorative exercises. S. Foster Damon will read an ode to Beethoven which he has written for the occasion. There will be an address on Beethoven by Ernest Newman, the foremost English critic and writer on musical subjects, who has come from London on special invitation for this purpose. The evening will end with the performance of Beethoven's Last Quartet, Opus 135, known by the motto, "Muss es sein." This will be played by the Lenox string quartet.

The festival will close on Tuesday evening, March 29, with performances of the eighth and ninth symphonies. In the finale of the latter the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, and a quartet of soloists will assist the orchestra.

MASS FOR PENSION FUND

Beethoven's great mass in D, which is to open the Beethoven festival at Symphony hall, will be repeated there on Sunday afternoon, March 27th, at 3:30.

MAR 19

This performance, which comes on the intervening Sunday of the festival series, will be given for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. As in the Tuesday performance, the Boston symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the following quartet of soloists: Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton.

The Missa Solennis has not been performed in Boston on account of its formidable difficulties since the dedication of Symphony hall, in October, 1900.

THRILLS OF SOUND; RECOVERED HANDEL ANIMATED SYMPHO

FROM OLD MASTERS TO A BRIG NEW HAND

TRANSCRIPT MAR

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra Two Feats—Mr. Burgin and a Con of Glazunov—The "Water-Music" A Twenty-Six Years—Mr. Tansman Pleasure and Young Abilities

TWICE, yesterday afternoon, Symphony Orchestra should h arrested every ear. Concert-ha the world over, know the gr chord at the turn of Weber's Overture "Oberon." The hushed music has b singing the magic, the faerie, the legend that are background to the ope Across it and afar Oberon has blo his horn; through mists of fantasy ha stirred the sounds of his palace. Of sudden Weber bids the orchestra to single vast and crashing chord; th leaps, allegro con fuoco, into the swe and glow of chivalric adventure a medieval pageantry. On Friday, in q superb stroke from nearly five-score me that chord clove the air. Not one w too quick by the minutest fraction sound; by the same measure not o was too slow; in a single mass, like knife descending, every voice was welds A conductor's dream fulfilled; an au ence receiving a unique sensation; t famous chord, as it may sound across t concert-room no more than once in a lif time! To such precision and brilliant has Mr. Koussevitzky now schooled th orchestra.

Applauded loud and long, playin above himself in a solo-piece, Mr. Bu gin, the concert-master, was heard Glazunov's Concerto. In the slow se tion of a continuous music, the cu ning composer gives to the solo-violi an unfolding, warm-voiced melody. moves against a background of th darker strings; while the muted voice of the deeper wood-winds accompany i The euphony, through these measures of the violin, the violoncellos and th clarinets—to cite the instruments tha came fullest to the ear—turned the hear to water. The composer's melody ir itself may be no remarkable invention the secondary parts no masterpiece o figuration. Yet here was the beauty o musical sound become enchantment upon every perceiving sense. For the while there was only to listen, spelled. The music shifted; the magic vanished; but to have known that euphony was as rare sensation as the concert-hall, conjure upon the imagination. The leap of the chord—and page after page outpours riches of melody and vigors of rhythm. The colors glow like the red and blue and gold of an illuminated chronicle; the measures unfold and we listeners rove romance with Sir Huon; a tutti and a climax, and the splendors of Charlemagne's court are opened. Music of legend and of chivalry, of love and arms and adventure, of the world made magic—and all in valiance and in poetry flooding. Not Wagner himself had more the genius of it. With reason he sounded mourning trumpets over Weber's grave. The Overture to "Oberon," like the Overture to "Euryanthe," mocks at archæology.

Glazunov's Concerto for Violin is music of another sort. It was made at the study-table, with the piano in easy reach; workmanship, and little else, is its saving virtue. The violinists court it, because it sets them alternately to flowing song in seductive vein or to feats of skill and surety. The public enjoys it because the melody meanders clear-voiced; while the cadenza, with not a little of the passage-work, is transparent exercise in virtuosity. How well it all lies for the violinist's bow and also for the casual ear! By every odds, Glazunov, composing a concerto, is an adroit craftsman and a ready speaker. Possibly his musical invention will not bear close inspection. Individual distinction hardly marks it; while not by too deep thought does he achieve development. But what would these "highbrows" have and what is a violin-concerto for—unless a Beethoven or a Brahms happens to write it? To give pleasure, or course, and to display variously the fiddler's prowess.

For these ends, Glazunov in A minor may serve well enough. Possibly Russian violinists can transfigure him; but, come over-seas, they usually prefer Chaikovsky. As it was, Mr. Burgin outdid himself. For once no self-consciousness, no hesitation beset him in a solo-part. He played freely and fully, wringing the last drop out of Glazunov's melodies and without a sentimental squeeze; achieved the cadenza as though it was a natural and not a perverse music; smoothed euphonies and spun transitions; kept an ear for tone and a hand for rhythm; in general and particular gave the pleasure of a sensitive musician and a fine-fingered virtuoso. Justly and repeatedly the audience hailed him as an old friend in new grace.

New acquaintance, so long had it been forgotten, proved the "Water-Music" of Handel. Now, the illustrious Georg Frideric is not exactly a store-house of orchestral pieces for these days. His overtures to operas and oratorios usually served routine purpose and will not bear transfer. His concertos are designed primarily for the solo-instrument. His "occasional" overtures are formalities. To and fro among the Concerti Grossi must the conductiors go, unless they turn aside to the "Water-Music" of 1715-17 or the "Fireworks-Music" of a much later day. Mr. Gericke was aware of the "Water-Music," liked it and in his earlier terms in Boston played numbers from it. In turn, Mr. Koussevitzky led it back, after twenty-six years, to the Symphony Concerts. In Manchester, Sir Hamilton Harty once ventured fragments of the "Fireworks-Music," written for a London spectacle in the seventeen-fifties. They were well received.

From the "Water-Music" Mr. Koussevitzky chose eight or nine numbers—the divisions were not easy to follow—among the superabundant twenty. They are written for horns, wood-winds, the usual string choir; were plainly designed to sound out-of-doors, across the reaches of the Thames, as the royal barge bore Majesty (and a mistress) along the river to supper. Perhaps, from that circumstance, there was none of the deep-voiced, full-curving, slow movements that present ears associate with Handel. Instead, sounded brisk and festal measures; dialogues between the different choirs, like tonal chatter overheard; episodes of the dance; occasional music of courtly pageantry; a stately and full-throated beginning and end; a single movement that was quietly songful—the nocturne, possibly, of this river-journey. Altogether they contained enough of the master to bear his stamp and to give the expected pleasure. It was amusing to bourrée with gusto, in less zeal to transfigure it Bach-wise than to keep the rhythms of folk-dance. The hand and the ear for music of ceremony were present and accomplishing, after the sonorous Handelian fashion. For new pleasure, stateliness sometimes yielded to the lighter vein of a royal fête intime; while if the Andante was night-piece, it was imagined for a torch-lit and silvery river. Second-grade Handel, if the stern hearer will have it so, but Handel well worth Bostonian resurrection.

Finally, the new symphony of Mr. Tansman written in his thirtieth year, played for the first time anywhere, steadily exhilarating to hear. The composer, who has a rare knack at describing his own music, affirms that it is not "modernist." In degree, he is within the truth, since he uses atonality or polytonality sparingly and gently; indulges in no fantastic and vehement pleasing scorn of tonal fuss, feathers and pretense. He is also his individual self in the pervading animation of the symphony. It is quick-witted and, outside the slow division, quick-moving; while the glint of the harmonies and the edge into which he sharpens the instrumental voices, give the whole music a surface and a speech of Alexander Tansman and no other. Being a Pole, he is warm-tempered and mercurial; by the same token he is also apt and elegant of hand.

Consequently no one heard as though aggrieved or "insulted"; no one overtaxed his musical wits to understand; while from all sides and all degrees of listeners came, not hard words, but hearty applause. In point of fact, Mr. Tansman writes in his slow movement a well-invented and well-conducted melody. It is simple and straightforward; has substance and warmth; gathers body and mood; sits well against the background; wins the ear and quickens the fancy; stirs them at climax, lures them at gentler moments with the tenderness, wistful and graceful both, that is one of Mr. Tansman's individualizing possessions. He writes a Scherzo gaily, brightly, with a light curl of the lips, dividing it between a Polish polka and a Polish mazurka, ingeniously and amusingly interweaving or contrasting them. In his first movement he relies upon a vivid theme, energetic rhythm, animated handling; but again at opportune moments the Tansmanic tenderness returns. Rhythmic liveliness, readiness with ways and means, a playful zest, keep the finale fertile, spirited and vigorous.

Nowhere in the whole symphony is Mr. Tansman empty, metallic or merely clattering, as he was too often in his dance of last autumn. Time and again a happy turn arrests, and wins, the ear, keeping interest alert. From beginning to end youthful energy propels the music; youthful fervor deepens it; while youthful grace is as often garland upon it. Mr. Tansman has written no masterpiece—and there is not a reason why it should be expected of him. No more has he written a willed and cerebral, or a posturing and pretentious symphony. His temperament saves him from both pitfalls. The residue is a music that steadily pleases, savory of the time, savory of a composer, who, thrice blest by the Muses, now mates substance and skill and charm.

H. T. P.

Notably Partnered

Miss Anglin, Mrs. Fiske and Mr. Skinner Join Hands for a Year's Tour

THE elders of our stage are neither histrionically dead nor managerially sleeping. Beyond many of their complacent juniors, they have the will and the courage to new adventures. Hence the Fiske-Anglin Theater, which is to be a travelling company of the first rank, acting in the principal cities, proffering each season one or more plays, classic or modern, established or experimental. The two actresses have themselves organized it; "taken on" Mr. Skinner as colleague for 1927-28; agreed upon Shakspeare's farce, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," for first play. The tour will begin late next October and continue through thirty weeks, East, West, even South. For cast, Mr. Skinner will act Falstaff; Miss Anglin, Mistress Ford; Mrs. Fiske, Mistress Page—new parts for all three. If fortune is kind, the two actresses will continue their "theater" indefinitely.

FOR the first time within long memory, Fred Stone, in a new extravaganza, will descend upon Boston in the spring—at the Colonial from Monday, April 11. Biennially his Bostonian public has expected him either in the autumn or at mid-winter. Now he routs precedent. Not only does he come in April, but within six months after the production of his present piece. The reason is not far to seek. Hitherto Mr. Stone has spread each entertainment over three seasons. Now, and hereafter, two will suffice—one for New York, Boston and Philadelphia; the other for remaining metropolitan stages.

Hence "Criss-Cross" at the Colonial as aforesaid. Under "Plays in Prospect," on the theater-pages of this paper, the curious will find a word about the new piece. Enough to say here that it is fresh variation on the approved model; that Mr. Fred renews and diversifies himself; that Miss Dorothy sings, acts and dances in fresh graces and ripening talents.

again in a lifetime, may yield. To such fineness of ear and hand and lips has Mr. Koussevitzky also schooled his choirs.

By no means upon that chord alone does the Overture to "Oberon" depend for twentieth-century life and being. Over seventeen pages, the program-book ransacked the storehouses of musical archæology for "historical and descriptive notes." Not thus mummified into scholastic plaything is Weber's pulsing, striding prelude. The mystery and magic of the beginning, the sheer loveliness of these glamourous veils of sound, ejaculations; writes as though jazz and syncopation were not; imitates neither Stravinsky nor Honegger; affects no pseudo-ancientry; wrests no instrument from natural function. On the other hand, Mr. Tansman is "modernist" in brevity, directness and compactness; contraction of orthodox formulas and avoidance of measures for paper and the eye rather than for sound and the ear; frequent reliance upon incisive rhythms; a play of harmonies and timbres that is distinctly of our time; a

The Stones in Spring

Change in the Calendar of the Familiar Entertainer

Though busy with preparations for the orchestra's Beethoven Festival, which begins next week, Mr. Koussevitzky continues to present novelties to us. Tansman's Symphony, dedicated to the Boston conductor, was written last summer and had its first performance yesterday. That hearing leaves the impression that this is the most sucessful among those efforts which come offhand to memory to pour new musical wine into old bottles. Certainly it marks a definite advance over the Sinfonietta andthe "Dance of the Sorceress." Here is a work that may well engage the attention of those who attach importance to Mr. Copland's Piano Concerto. Each work essays to bring, so to speak, a classical form up to date. Both exhibit the utmost latitude in respect of dissonance. The principal difference between them appears to be that Tansman, when he began to write, had something to say.

Tansman's Symphony bears evidence that its composer is aware of the work of Stravinsky and Strauss, as well as of the classic symphonists. But it seems on a first hearing far more original than his previous compositions heard in Boston. He has really achieved the "lyric outpouring" with which he does not hesitate to credit himself in his descriptive note. All the themes are clear and individual, and the development is full, but not tedious. The principal theme of the slow movement is so sustained and sonorous and pleasing that it may render its composer liable to expulsion from the ranks of true musical radicals. The Scherzo is based on a polka movement, the trio on a mazurka. The finale is in modified Rondo form. Throughout, dullness and repetitiousness are successfully avoided, contrast is deftly and justly employed and rhythms are flexible and vigorous. And tonality reigns, despite a few excursions. Perhaps Tansman will live up to his friends' expectations, after all.

What a delight it was to hear the "Water Music"—or half a dozen numbers of it. It had not been played in Boston for many years—too many. It is not necessary to debate whether this music actually was written to placate an irate Hanoverian monarch; certainly it would have been effective for that purpose. It is easy to imagine its effect heard across water. Its effect across a concert hall is only less charming. Here and throughout the afternoon the orchestra played superlatively.

Mr. Burgin has greatly matured as an artist since he came to Boston. He played yesterday with extraordinary technique, rare beauty of tone and more musicianship than his vehicle perhaps deserved. The "Oberon" Overture received one of those interpretations that are either intensely dramatic or extremely theatrical, according to one's taste and mood.

L. A. S.

SYMPHONY HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

MONITOR MAR 19

Number on Tonight's Program Dedicated to Conductor

The regular Saturday weekly ra diocast of concerts by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra will be give this evening by Stations WBZ Springfield, WBZA of Boston an KDKA of Pittsburgh, through th courtesy of the W. S. Quinby Com pany.

The opening number on the pr gram is the so-called "Water Music of Handel. The Water Music wa written for an aquatic fête given b King George I of England, and wa played by an orchestra under Ha del's direction, seated in a barge fo lowing the King's boat. Hand through continued absence from h post as Kappelmeister, had risk the displeasure of His Majesty, h the King was much pleased with t Water Music, and soon after grant him an annuity of £200 a year.

The second number on the p gram is a symphony by Alexan Tansman, a young Polish compos whose "Dance of the Sorceress" w heard earlier this season. This sy phony, dedicated to Serge Kous vitzky, conductor, will receive its i tial performance tonight.

The numbers following the int mission are Glazounov's concerto violin and orchestra, in which Ri ard Burgin, the concert master the orchestra, will be heard as so ist; and the overture, to "Aber by Von Weber.

Prof. John P. Marshall will ill trate themes from the Water Mu as usual. He will be assisted Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, a p sonal friend of the composer, M Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and M Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

New Tansman Work From Koussevitzky

MONITOR MAR 19

THE nineteenth Friday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall, Boston, with Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, as soloist. The program, which will be repeated this evening, was:

Handel—"Water Music"
Tansman—Symphony in A minor
Glazounoff—Violin Concerto, Op. 82

THE GREATEST QUALITY OF BEETHOVEN

This we Boston, like rest of musical wo is to commemorate the centenary the death of Beethoven. The Bos Symphony Orchestra has planned series of festival performances of music unsurpassed by any of world-wide tributes to his mem Ernest Newman, who, like our Philip Hale, is a critic of univers acknowledged eminence, is co from London to make a speech Monday on Beethoven's geni past have united to praise the master's work, and to investigate every detail of his life. Nothing new now remains to be said. But the greatest quality of Beethoven, his intense moral earnestness, perhaps needs to be emphasized anew.

GLOBE MAR 20

Mr Senneck, in an unusually acute and sensible article in the March number of The American Mercury, has pointed out the fact that one of the reasons why the popularity of Beethoven among musicians is perceptibly on the wane is this very moral earnestness. This, he claims, is an age without moral earnestness, an age afraid to take life seriously, an age in revolt against the seriousness and sobriety of its elders. Such an age is likely to prefer Stravinsky, if not jazz, to Beethoven.

It is true that there is among musicians an undercurrent of protest against the indiscriminating reverence for Beethoven floridly expressed by such Victorian musical prophets as Sir George Grove. To Grove every note Beethoven wrote was apparently divinely inspired.

To a dispassionate listener it is of course obvious that Beethoven, like Shakspere, and like every other great genius, was not always at his best. But the perception that the "King Stephen" overture, and the music for "The Ruins of Athens" are inferior and perishable ought to blind nobody to the imperishable glory of Beethoven's masterpieces.

Granted that there are minor works of Beethoven, by which he himself would not wish to be judged, let us leave them out of the discussion and confine ourselves to the question of what is the essential element in his masterpieces.

"High Seriousness"

That element is what Matthew Arnold, writing of Sophocles, called "high seriousness." Beethoven's music does not preach any specific moral lesson. One cannot put sermons in tones. Beethoven's music is not gloomy, not like that of Bach, austerely intellectual. It is intensely and universally human. But Beethoven had high hopes of humanity, which were not dashed by a lifetime full of disappointments. It is strange that a man so impatient that he quarreled sooner or later with every landlady and was at moments angered by every friend should have retained hope and faith.

It is doubly strange that a musician always pressed for ready money, never sure of public support, hampered by grave physical infirmities, chief among them incurable deafness, and all his life deprived of the home and family he so clearly craved, should have insisted on writing his one opera about "Fidelio, or Conjugal Love," and his best-known work for voices as a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

Beethoven had an inner life which went on seemingly untouched by the always unsatisfactory conditions of his worldly affairs. Those who listen to his Second Symphony next Wednesday night will find it difficult to believe a fact of which there is the clearest historical proof, that he composed it at the most unhappy period of his life, when he had just learned that he was becoming permanently and hopelessly deaf, when in addition one of his several unhappy love affairs had come to the usual end, separation. The music is full of gaiety and tenderness by turns, with not a hint of tragedy.

But into some of his music he did put those deeper feelings which do not appear in the Second Symphony. Consider his love music. Wagner, who lacks the moral earnestness of Beethoven, has written what to many people is the supreme love scene in the last scene of his "Tristan und Isolde," with the "Love Death" of Isolde.

Not an Ascetic

Beethoven gives to the heroine of his only opera at the climax of the work measures to sing of equal intensity and with an emotional quality that lifts them forever beyond and above anything of which Wagner was capable. Leonore, disguised as the youth Fidelio, has gained admittance to the cell where her husband is confined under an unjust sentence of death. She is bidding him farewell forever when in the distance the trumpet sounds indicating that the hoped for reprieve and pardon from the King has arrived in time to save him.

Those who remember the repeated trumpet calls in the familiar "Leonore no 3" overture will recall the measures which each time follow taken from Leonore's outburst of emotion. They rise to a serenity and purity of joy found only where there is moral earnestness, "high seriousness." The whole duet between Leonore and Florestan at this point in the opera, "O Namenlose Freude" is a fuller exemplification of the point at issue.

To Beethoven the world was not merely a place where one tried to have a good time, to advertise one's self into a well-paid career, to know the proper people, to be what is called a "success." Except for self advertising Beethoven no doubt would, if he could, have attained the other common human aims mentioned.

He was not an ascetic or a recluse by temperament. Nor was he insensitive to fame. But these worldly satisfactions were not enough. He had as his own words abundantly prove, a feeling which never left him that a man's purpose here in this world, not to enjoy himself, but to do the will of a higher Power whom Beethoven was ashamed to worship as his God.

This sense of being a tool in the hands of God is felt, apparently, by religious and earnest people. In age notably less serious Beethoven would no doubt cease to exert the supreme fascination he has so long had for those who take life seriously over his Ninth Symphony is given, the undiminished response of the general as distinct from the professionally musical public to Beethoven would indicate that Mr Sonneck's fear lest Beethoven lose hold on people is premature.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

There will always be people to whom such things as the theme of the finale of the Pastoral Symphony (to which Beethoven gave the name of "Hymn of Thanksgiving After the Storm") make an appeal deeper and more permanent than the music of a sensualist like Wagner or a superficial person like Mendelssohn can ever make.

* * *

The pending performance of Beethoven's Missa Solennis at the coming centennial festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, is of the highest interest because this great score, owing to its extreme difficulties, is so seldom given. The Mass in D has not been heard in Boston since it was performed at the inauguration of Symphony Hall in 1900. It will be heard in several cities of the New and Old World during the centennial week.

All seats having been long since taken for the performance in Symphony Hall, March 22, the Mass will be repeated on the following Sunday, March 27, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Mr Koussevitzky and Dr Davison's choruses at Harvard and Radcliffe have generously offered their services, and the quartet of soloists will be the same as at the been paid in the schools to ... out the past year to two of Beethoven's compositions, "The Heavens Resound" and "The Ode to Joy," the latter being from the final movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. These two choral works will be sung later in the year in connection with the annual civic music festival in May.

* * *

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, has arranged a very elaborate festival stretching from Tuesday, the 22nd, to the following Tuesday, the 29th. On Friday and Sunday afternoons, and on the evenings of all of the other days, there will be programs devoted exclusively to the master's music. All nine symphonies, the great Solemn Mass in D, many string quartets and a commemorative address are included.

So great was the interest in the two choral works—the Mass and the Ninth Symphony, in which the orchestra will be joined by the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists—that tickets for these performances were sold out shortly after the first announcement, and the management added an extra performance of the Mass for Sunday afternoon. The commemorative address will be delivered by Ernest Newman, leading English music critic, who is making a trip to America especially for this purpose.

Music Notes and Comment

This week will be long remembered as that of the great Beethoven Festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in honor of the centenary of the composer's death. The extraordinary mature of these concerts scarcely needs to be emphasized. The fine program of chamber music scheduled for Thursday evening is not the least of the many opportunities to hear Beethoven's masterpieces. The Trio in B flat, opus 97, in particular, is one of his greatest works, and it is frequently performed in public.

As the programs printed elsewhere in this department today abundantly indicate there is an unexpected, and if reviews from the chief reviewers are desired, an injudicious number of minor recitals in conflict with the Beethoven series.

On Monday evening, March 28, there will be commemorative exercises. S. Foster Damon will read an ode to Beethoven which he has written for the occasion. There will be an address on Beethoven by Ernest Newman, the foremost English critic and writer on musical subjects. The evening will end with the performance of Beethoven's Last Quartet, Opus 135, known by the motto, "Muss es sein." This will be played by the Lenox string quartet.

The festival will close on Tuesday evening, March 29, with performances of the eighth and ninth symphonies. In the finale of the latter the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe and a ...

BIG BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL BEGINS HERE TUESDAY

ADV MAR 20

THE name Beethoven threatens to become a fixture on the front pages of newpapers during the present week. It will be a week of feverish activity among musicians and people interested in music, a period of such devotion to the life and works of a musician as has not been witnessed in many a year, perhaps never before.

People all over the world, more particularly in the United States and especially in Boston, will pay homage to the master-symphonist. And if you meekly suggest that you would like to know the reason for all the excitement you are in great danger of being mobbed by a crowd of music-lovers.

On Saturday, March 26th—or, as some say, the 27th—an even century will have elapsed since Ludwig von Beethoven died in Vienna. He is generally held among musicians to be the greatest composer of all time, though lovers of Bach and even of Richard Wagner rise up on occasion to dispute this ranking. The centennials of other composers have been celebrated in a modest way before this, but never before have there been such elaborate preparations as in the case of Beethoven.

Strangely enough America, which Beethoven never saw and about which he probably knew very little, will undertake a very large part in the celebration. The idea of a "Beethoven Week" is one for which the Columbia Phonograph Company and George Eastman are very largely responsible. Through their auspices, combined with those of the National Advisory Body of Beethoven Week, of which Mr. Eastman is chairman, plans have been made for a nation-wide festival and been accepted by scores of large cities.

* * *

THE program, as outlined by the National Advisory Body, includes civic exercises under the leadership of city officials and musical organizations, delivery of a centennial oration written by Daniel Gregory Mason, professor of music at Columbia University, performance of a special composition by Howard Hanson, an American composer, as a special tribute of the modern spirit to the genius of Beethoven, and a host of other activities.

In addition, every community is encouraged to add to the program in any way in which it can. And Boston has a very full schedule of activities. Thousands of children in the public schools will devote at least one hour of their class time to an appreciation of Beethoven.

Under the direction of Music Supervisor O'Shea and his corps of assistants, much attention has

WEEK-END CONCERTS: THE NEW GENERATION; RETURN OF A VETERAN

TANSMAN'S SYMPHONY AS FINGER-

TRANS POST MAR 2

The Parting of the Ways Between Younger and Older Listeners — Two Moods for One Music—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Troops of Friends at a "Jubilee" Matinee—Beethoven to the Hour

THE YOUNGER and the elder generation hear new music with different ears. Their respective reactions at Symphony Hall, on Friday and Saturday, to Mr. Tansman's symphony are one more item in the proof. Listeners in their twenties, or on either fringe of them, liked the piece; clapped it warmly; spoke their pleasure eagerly. Listeners in the fifties or the sixties did not resent it in the ludicrous fury that attended Mr. Copland's Concerto. They were, in fact, more uninterested than displeased. They heard the symphony indifferently; agreed that "they could see nothing in it." Mr. Tansman's music is not flagrantly "modernistic"; less still is it hard-hitting aggression in the manner of Mr. Copland. Before it nobody could possibly count himself "insulted." Rather, it is the work of an able composer, still feeling his way, who stirs to the impulses of his time and writes in its idiom. Younger hearers liked the energetic advance, the rhythmic liveliness, the vigorous climaxes of the new symphony. The concentrated brevities held them; the "edgy" harmonies and timbres pleased their ears; the lack of sentiment —or as they prefer to call it, "drool"— was congenial. To elder listeners these vigors were often empty, even bombastic; the semi-acidulous sonorities—in the wide sense of the word—rasped their ears; Mr. Tansman, in their view, "lacked feeling." Hence plaudits and silence on Friday; rather less plaudits and more silence on Saturday.

There is no reconciling these responses. The youngsters hear with the ears of their time and temper, according to their background of life and the art of music-making. Their minds may be scantily furnished; but they are fresh, open, honest. The elderly are less cased in prejudice than content with acquired and accepted experience, which now stretches through Debussy and ... Their background and their outlook upon living and the arts do not incline them to fresh experiments and new sensations. The musical hour is strange to them. When it does not vex them, it leaves them indifferent.

There is room for both generations in the concert-hall, and any conductor, with wisdom and a sense of balance, considers them both. It is right that neither should yield to the other, and very right that he, for his part, should regard the youngsters first. As composers, they are carrying the art of music forward—and all the brooms of all the Mrs. Partingtons will not stop the course. As audience, they are also providing the future hearers of music—and without them no symphony concerts may endure. Imagine them, here in Boston, after five years of Mr. Monteux and three of Mr. Koussevitzky, set back to the programs of Dr. Muck or Mr. Fiedler. Even the conservatives, no longer able to grumble, would rebel.

Like or dislike it, music akin to Mr. Tansman's symphony is the order of the day. The younger composers write it; the conductors, unless they wilfully shut their ears, cannot ignore it. They are not geniuses—these young composers; they are seldom remarkable and highly individualized talents. They are, however, practised craftsmen, writing aptly and tersely, here with vigor, there with fancy, occasionally with personal and imaginative ways and means. (Mr. Tansman's music, unlike Mr. Respighi's, for example, has a surface and a voice of its own.) As well-schooled musicians, they are not indifferent to the established forms; but, being also young composers in a restless day, they would mold them into new shapes for new ends. (Note what is practically Mr. Tansman's condensation of orthodox symphonic form.) They cannot, and they would not, escape the temper of their own time. Hence their brevity, their concentration, their blatant vigors—to force the adjective—their insistence upon a music of rhythmic energy and life.

As Mr. Tansman's symphony exemplifies these qualities, from it also sounds, though more rarely, their counterpart. With a light hand he spins, in the Scherzo, his Polish polka and mazurka. He charms the ear when his slow song drops away after the climax or a songful interlude parts—and stays—toward the close—the rushing measures of the finale. Grace haunts the second theme of the first movement though Mr. Koussevitzky, in a generous excess of zeal, tended to cover it. Finally, the residue, if not the manifest intent of this music of this day is pleasure. Mr. Tansman's symphony is no masterpiece. It is not laden with thought or enmeshed in beauty. It neither ranges the heights, nor searches the depths, of passion. Imagination does not wing it; or brooding meditation enrich it. Yet for the while it pleases. Again the temper of the time: we give pleasure; receive it—and pass to the next thing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 20 1927

Orchestral Guns.

Intimations made in this column a week ago of an orchestral onslaught upon New York during the past week were fulfilled. The Philadelphia vied with its co-visitor, the Boston Band, amid plenty of sonorities from the New York Symphony (the Philharmonic was on tour).

Leopold Stokowski's piece de resistance was the concertino for violin, cello, horn, harp, octavina and guitar . . . all employing such slight intervals as quarter, eighth and sixteenth tones. As a music composition, this concertino by Julian Carillo amounts to little. As an illustration of ultimate possibilities with a highly differentiated scale it served a purpose. It is doubtful if more than a few in Carnegie Hall were able to detect some of the differences in pitches which the various instruments sounded.

Serge Koussevitzky, with his Bostonians, plunged straightway into the moderns with Prokofieff's Sept Ils Sont Sept and Respighi's Church Windows —both new. He also presented Ravel's suite in F major, which had not previously been heard in this city.

There is no occasion to become unduly excited over any of the compositions mentioned . . . particularly those by Carillo and Prokofieff. The latter's music has always fallen into

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 20 1927

BOSTON CENTENARY.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, is to hold a Centenary Festival in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evenings of March 22, 23, 24, 28 and 29, in commemoration of the death of Beethoven. The Missa Solennis, some chamber music and the nine symphonies are to be presented during the festival.

Besides the Boston Orchestra, the London String Quartet, Carl Friedburg, pianist, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will give their services. Ernest Newman, a musical authority and writer, of London, has been specially invited to come to this country for the occasion and to deliver an address.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PENN.
MAR 20 1927

THE number of men taking an interest in good music today is increasing by leaps and bounds. A glance at the concert and opera audiences testifies to that. Little boys who a generation ago would have been ashamed to be seen carrying a fiddle are today striving to win a prize for answering questions proposed at children's concerts.

The Harvard Glee Club, once probably boasting a repertory in which "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" represented the highest general level (this is conjecture based on rumor), is today joining with Radcliffe College in performances of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and Ninth Symphony in the coming Beethoven Centenary Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This all means that our men are graduating from the so-called "anti-highbrowism" which one might regard as a juvenile disease of our young country. This particular crudity of our early youth not only robbed many men of endless enjoyment. It has robbed many a woman of cultural companionship with her husband. Our women, having more leisure than men were, generally speaking, ahead of the men in exploring the delights of musical culture. But the music movement spreading rapidly in our schools and colleges is changing everything, and there seems little doubt that there is a national music awakening of far-reaching importance.

No feature of it is more vital than the participation of our young men as demonstrated in the Intercollegiate Glee Club contest.

May they go forward to ever finer things and reap the reward that lies in a knowledge and love of good music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 20 1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall, Boston, March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29. The programs will be as follows:

BRITISH MUSIC CRITIC IN HUB

TRAV MAR 27

Ernest Newman Arrives for Beethoven Program

Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Sunday Times and one of the foremost interpreters of Beethoven's music, was one of 161 Boston passengers arriving here today on the Celtic of the White Star line. Mrs. Newman was with him.

Newman will lecture next Monday night in Symphony hall at the centenary celebration arranged in Beethoven's honor.

Another arrival was H. J. C. Grierson, professor of rhetoric and English language at the Universiyt of Ediburgh. He was accompanied by his daughter, L. H. Grierson.

Boston people included Eben D. Seccomb, a retired merchant of Winthrop road, Brookline; the Rev. Ralph T. Wegner of Oak View terrace, Jamaica Plain; Mrs. A. Brockway of Brookline; Miss Alice Patten of 47 Rockwell street, Boston; Miss Anlie Stoddard of Butler street, Dorchester, and W. H. Wright of Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
DETROIT, MICH.
MAR 20 1927

Music, Hume Grotesque

New American and European Compositions Gain Attention.

BY CHARLOTTE M. TARSNEY.

Two new musical works, the one, likely mostly humorous in character and soon to be heard in this country, the other, grotesque and odd in the daring lengths to which modernism has been carried, a work much discussed in musical circles abroad, are attracting the attention of students of the latest output of composers of the day. The American work is an "Epic of the Ford," by Converse. The European contribution to musical literature is a queer opera, featuring a Negro jazz band leader, by Ernest Krenek.

Program music of the ultra-modern type is said to be represented in a symphonic cycle, just completed by Frederick Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which the "Ford" car, a characteristic American product, is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joy-

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.
MAR 2 01927

Orchestral Guns.

Intimations made in this column a week ago of an orchestral onslaught upon New York during the past week were fulfilled. The Philadelphia vied with its co-visitor, the Boston Band, amid plenty of sonorities from the New York Symphony (the Philharmonic was on tour).

Leopold Stokowski's piece de resistance was the concertino for violin, celo, horn, harp, octavina and guitar . . . all employing such slight intervals as quarter, eighth and sixteenth tones. As a music composition, this concertino by Julian Carillo amounts to little. As an illustration of ultimate possibilities with a highly differentiated scale it served a purpose. It is doubtful if more than a few in Carnegie Hall were able to detect some of the differences in pitches which the various instruments sounded.

Serge Koussevitzky, with his Bostonians, plunged straightway into the modern with Prokofieff's Sept Ils Sont Sept and Respighi's Church Windows—both new. He also presented Ravel's suite in F major, which had not previously been heard in this city.

There is no occasion to become unduly excited over any of the compositions mentioned . . . particularly those by Carillo and Prokofieff. The latter's music has always fallen into the category of modern meowings; Carillo hasn't yet secured instruments capable of sounding faithfully the desired pitches.

...orous and ..., To the Fore

...it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

From Leipsic comes word of the sensational opera premiere, of Ernst Krenek's "Jonny spielt auf" overthrowing all previously conceived notions of an operatic work. The title, which freely translated means "Johnny Leads the Band" or "Johnny Strikes Up," is novel at the start and the hero is the Negro leader of a jazz band. The opera "seeks to interpret the rhythm and atmosphere of modern life in this age of technical science. "The speedy motor car, the loud speaker, the long distance telephone and the deluxe express trains are all embodied in the plot as requisite factors of today's existence. If one test of an art work is its true interpretation of contemoraneous life, this new opera, it is held, certainly presents many of its pertinent phases.

The Krenek plan of the work combines the opera style with that of the spectacular modern revue and the motion picture. One of the Leipsic critics claims that never before has an opera been written which interprets so intensively what the world is now experiencing in everyday life. It is a sordid view, however, from American standards. With the clean-up crusade now on in New York, so far as the theater is concerned, it is quite unlikely it would be accepted here, though Leipsic received it with enthusiasm. Unable to distinguish between good and bad, Johnny, the black hero of the opera greedily tastes and feels of everything that comes his way. He is portrayed an unscrupulous, bold, unprincipled character, an untutored, young barbarian.

The music of Krenek combines the rhythms of the latest dance hall numbers with the "atonal" technique this composer especially features. Jazz music, scored in this fashion becomes the high light of two of the scenes of the opera. The treatment of the orchestra is very modern. The sensational success of the work in Leipsic is believed due, in large measure, to the staging of Walter Brugman, who made the most in a scenic way of the amazing eccentricities suggest in the text and music.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Boston's Beethoven Centennial Recalls Struggles of Other Stricken Composers

BY R. L. HUMPHREY

I suggest that we stand in silent rence of the greatest genius in sic—Ludwig Von Beethoven."

o spoke Conductor Serge Koussesky to the players in the Bosto mphony Orchestra last Monday ring when he began his rehear for the Beethoven Centennial certs. And for a minute the hundred and fifteen musicians their famous leader solemnly unspoken tribute to the mem of the amazing composer who a hundred years ago this month.

f, With Freak Temperament

ne deaf Beethoven—a terrible- ered or clumsily high-spirited uncouth, so careless of dress o be jailed once as a tramp—was the greatest musical genius d music is a history of geniuses, ims more of them than does other art.

ny of music's geniuses, how- have suffered a great, if not a loss of widespread esteem to- because of changed musical s.

ethoven is the exception. Music who hear the most striking ples of un-to-date compositions often listen to Beethoven wards with a higher regard ever.

ill a "Modern" Composer

Koussevitzky is very fond of ntriducing ultra-modern scores at mphony concerts, but still he loves works of Beethoven, and interprets em with great distinction. And in his dresses to his players before last Monday's rehearsal, he referred to these modern compositions, thanking the men for their good work in "numerous scores of importance and difficulty." Then he said:

"Let us make our Beethoven Centennial concerts the finest we have ever performed."

There you have it—Beethoven's music still an all-powerful modern attraction a century after its creator's death. Why?

Beethoven expressed every human emotion, and in the most powerful effective fashion. His music voices both the most stormy and tragic agonies of mind and soul—and also perfect serenity or boisterous good humor.

It might almost be said that Beethoven is the only composer who could reach the greatest depths of seriousness and yet revelled in a sense of humor.

That brings Beethoven the man into discussion—a weird perpetual contradiction of human qualities at their greatest and at their pettiest.

His Human Frailties

Beethoven spoke, wrote and performed some of the world's worst jokes. He let his bad temper lead him into some of the most unreasonable actions against friends and associates.

But his boisterous jokes were a necessary safety valve against the pressure of resentful, even suicidal, thoughts caused by his deafness. His fits of temper were very often the direct consequence of two bodily ills suffered along with his deafness, and equally distressing. He pretty generally came to a realization of wrongs he had committed in his wrath, and man-like, was the first to try to patch up the damage.

The story of his deafness is a terrible tragedy. It did not come of a sudden accident. It developed with cruel deliberateness from disease of the nerve of hearing. The first faint signs of it gave the feeling that it was a condition that was irksome more than anything—something that would pass, with no grounds for alarm. Then in the course of a single year it made a horrifying advance which left Beethoven with no doubt that deafness had come upon him to stay. And more terrible still, he learned that it would grow increasingly worse with time.

This tragedy came at the height of his fame as a pianist and just as his genius as a composer was beginning to challenge his pianistic fame.

His writings show that he thought of suicide. Then he came to the conclusion that he had no right to do anything but struggle on. There was a strange but powerful religious spirit within him, and this triumphed.

He constantly kept before him these quotations:

"I am all that is, that was and that shall be. No mortal man hath lifted my veil.

"He is alone by Himself, and to Him alone do all things owe their being."

And perhaps he thanked God that despite the plague of deafness, it did not come until he had in his mind a knowledge of music so perfect that in his thoughts he could hear the effect of every combination of musical sounds he wrote down.

Two of Greatest Lost Sight

Blindness afflicted the last days of Johann Sebastian Bach and Handel. That was really a worse blow than deafness, for their knowledge of music was surely great enough to enable them, if deprived of the use of their ears, to hear their music with their minds as fast as they wrote it—while blindness put a stop to their writing.

In the case of each of these composers hope was raised by recourse to operations—only for the surgeon to fail and leave them hopeless. Bach died a year after he was stricken, but seven years of blindness were endured by Handel, who kept himself busy playing organ concertos and the organ parts in his own oratorios, besides having revisions added to one of his works. He kept active almost to the last, playing in his great "Messiah" eight days previous to his death.

A Wildcat Wife

The sunny nature of Joseph Haydn and the smooth course of his career for long years after he achieved fame make it easy to forget that he suffered a goodly share of ill fortune. As a boy, when the steady receipt of money for singing in the choir of St. Stephen's, Vienna, meant everything to him, and he was thrown out as soloist in favor of his own brother, Michael.

He led a precarious existence with friendly help and a few music pupils until he set his foot on the first rung of success by refusing to accept bitter disappointment. His ambitions had gone soaring when he found he had means of being introduced to the eminent teacher and composer, Porpora.

Porpora received him with a household manager. There were four declaration that he would never sons and two daughters in all, and to accept anyone for a pupil, because they provide for himself and his family, always rewarded him with the Mozart had to pick up money in the most hit and miss fashion.

But Joseph became his valet, won the crabbed old man over by his cheerfulness and intelligence, and received valuable lessons in composition. From then on he was on the road to earning modest but kept on with his own compositions for various services as a composer and teacher.

Despite his genius, no royalty or nobility gave him some definite post from which he could count on a steady income. Pupils were scarce, and he had to rely on getting himself hired as piano soloist, and on the drawing power of piano recitals given in his own name. With a level-headed wife, money might have been handled so as to reach the farthest and help the family over the rough spots. As it was, Mozart lived a continual nightmare of financial uncertainty and debt.

Greatest Offer Came at Death

Even after "Don Giovanni" had been produced with immense success in Prague, and the furore it caused was reported to the Emperor in Vienna, his Majesty declined to give Mozart a salaried appointment. But a little later the great composer Gluck died, and Mozart's expectations soared.

After some delay the Emperor made him royal composer—at a salary of about $400 a year, whereas Gluck's had been the reverse. But on the other hand, her mind was so carefree that she failed Mozart completely as a Mozart hoped that the new Emperor would give him an appointment, but he did not. Eventually, from trying to earn a decent money for his genius, Mozart very weak. He began to believe that he had been poisoned, but kept on with his composing. At last he was forced to go to bed.

Then—and not until then—cheerful financial news came to him. Some Hungarian noblemen had clubbed together to guarantee him a regular yearly income. Also word came from Amsterdam of a scheme to pay him money for compositions by a system of publishing his works by subscription. But he was soon dead of the malignant typhus.

Pianist With Crippled Finger

Poverty also preyed upon Berlioz and Wagner, who both after a Mozart's career was a series of struggles against poverty and ill health. Even after he had won wealth won by his playing than had ever been achieved by any other musician, met a harsh fate at the height of his success. He developed tuberculosis of the throat, and did not live long.

Chopin was also tubercular, and after a courageous struggle—during which he even gave a piano concert in London when he was so weak he had to be carried to the piano—he died of consumption.

Schumann's hopes of a career as a pianist were given a heart-breaking setback. Over-eager to make progress in developing his finger muscles, he used a machine which gave intensified finger exercises—and permanently injured the muscle of one finger by the strain. However, he was able eventually, by his high mental and artistic powers, to play with a peculiar charm which concealed his crippled condition.

Adding Sums Pained Beethoven

The marvellous singer, Malibran, at the height of her glory, and called to London for a series of lavishly paid engagements, was suddenly met by a cruel turn of fate. Out for a little healthful recreation, she fell from a horse and was very seriously shaken strings would be loosened up in recognition of such wide approval of the opera.

But the performances were forced to a halt by the Emperor's desperate illness, which ended in his death—and programmes made of entertainment in Vienna were all made out of the question by the official mourning of the city.

The new Emperor did not come from overwork or any recent amount of pianist Mozart became setback. Over-eager to make progress in developing his finger muscles, he used a machine which gave intensified finger exercises—and permanently injured the muscle of one finger by the strain. However, he was able eventually, by his high mental and artistic powers, to play with a peculiar charm which concealed his crippled condition.

The celebrated ballet dancer, Taglioni, was a hunchback, and her face was very plain, if not positively homely, but by her art she carried people's minds far away from these defects.

Among lighter troubles of illustrious musicians, it might be mentioned that Beethoven, for all his greatness, did not learn to dance in time, as a young man. Simple additions of figures always disturbed him, and often left him hopelessly beaten. And during the last weeks, when, although his mind was wracked by sickness, he kept his mind busy, trying over and over to master the simple multiplication

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
MAR 22 19

Engage Casella As Conductor for Boston Concerts

Alfredo Casella, distinguished conductor, composer and pianist, has signed a contract to become the regular conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, according to an announcement just made. The announcement proceeds as follows:

"In their many seasons, the 'Pops' have never been honored with a leader of such world-wide distinction and esteem. Casella has long been considered the most significant influence in the new symphonic school of musical composition in Italy, which has placed this nation again among the foremost in the creative development of music.

"Casella is now visiting the United States to conduct his music on several important occasions. As guest conductor at the regular Boston Symphony concerts of January 14 and 15, he conducted his Partita and his Ballet, La Giara. La Giara is about to be mounted at the Metropolitan Opera House, and is anticipated as the outstanding novelty of the New York musical season.

"Before he came to this country, Casella was famous not only as a composer, but as conductor of the foremost orchestras of Paris, Rome and other cities, and as undoubtedly the most brilliant pianist Italy has produced. Visiting the United States in 1921 and 1923, he presided, as guest, over the Boston, Philadelphia and other orchestras, conducting here his rhapsody, Italia, which, by the way, is a long-standing favorite at the 'Pops.'

"Casella will visit Boston next week to conduct Respighi's concerto at the regular symphony concerts, to inspect the 'Pops' library, and to make other plans for the 'Pops' season, which opens on May 2."

Casella's career shows him an artist of astonishing versatility. Born in Turin in 1883, of notably musical parents, he began to study piano at the age of four. His aptitude as a small boy for chemistry and electricity was such that a scientific vocation was contemplated for him. At twelve, however, he definitely dedicated himself to music. He entered the Paris Conservatory, where after studying the piano under Diemer, he took the First Prize in 1899. His master in composition was Faure.

In Rome in 1916 he founded the Society of Modern Music and a similar in 1923, together with d'Annunzalipero. Through these, con-

To Speak in Beethoven's Memory

TRANS Ernest Newman MAY 21

Music Critic of London Sunday Times, Who, With Mrs. Newman, Arrives in Boston Aboard Liner Celtic for Twelve-Day Visit

HERE to deliver the principal address at the Beethoven centenary memorial meeting in Symphony Hall, next Monday evening, Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in Boston today aboard the White Sar liner Celtic, accompanied by Mrs. Newman, and looking forward to attendance at the Symphony concerts during their brief stay on this side of the Atlantic. Mr. Newman plans to be in this country only twelve days, passing the first nine in Boston and the remainder in New York, whence he and Mrs. Newman are to sail on the return trip on April 2, aboard the Laconia.

This is Mr. Newman's first visit to America in two years. Jazz is to him especially anathema, and he has in the past given expression to his views on this subject. Asked today by shipnews reporters if he cared to say anything about jazz, Mr. Newman relied that he felt that he has already expressed himself sufficiently, and let it go at that.

The Celtic, from Liverpool and Queenstown, was a day late, due to unfavorable weather. She brought several hundred passengers for this port and New York, and departed for the latter port a little more than an hour after she had tied up at Commonwealth Pier.

As soon as the liner docked, C. A. Bray vice president of Lord & Spencer Company, Inc., of Boston, was removed in an ambulance to the Massachusetts General Hospital, ill with pneumonia which developed soon after he sailed from Liverpool. The patient, according to the ship's surgeon, Dr. Fitzpatrick, was much improved upon arrival having passed the crisis, so that his recovery is expected. Mr. Bray has completed a trip around the world, having gone overland to Los Angeles and sailing thence across the Pacific to the Orient.

Other cabin passengers landing here included Professor Herbert J. C. Grierson of the University of Edinburgh, authority on rhetoric and English literature, who is to make a lecture tour of American colleges, accompanied by Mrs Grierson; E. Willard Frost of Dorchester, William H. Wright of Boston, Rev. Ralph T. Wegner of Jamaica Plain, Miss Annie M. Stoddard of Dorchester, Eben D. Seccomb of Brookline, Mrs. D. L. Moore of Brookline, Mrs. A. P. Brockway of Brookline, Mrs. A. J. Blood of Swampscott and Miss Alice Patten of Boston.

LONDON CRITIC

Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Times, and his wife, who arrived here on the S. S. Celtic yesterday. They are here for the Beethoven centenary exercises.

POST MAR 22

INFORMATION OBSCURED

To Speak in Beethoven's Memory

TRANS Ernest Newman MAR 21

Music Critic of London Sunday Times, Who, With Mrs. Newman, Arrives in Boston Aboard Liner Celtic for Twelve-Day Visit

HERE to deliver the principal address at the Beethoven centenary memorial meeting in Symphony Hall, next Monday evening, Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in Boston today aboard the White Sar liner Celtic, accompanied by Mrs. Newman, and looking forward to attendance at the Symphony concerts during their brief stay on this side of the Atlantic. Mr. Newman plans to be in this country only twelve days, passing the first nine in Boston and the remainder in New York, whence he and Mrs. Newman are to sail on the return trip on April 2, aboard the Laconia.

This is Mr. Newman's first visit to America in two years. Jazz is to him especially anathema, and he has in the past given expression to his views on this subject. Asked today by shipnews reporters if he cared to say anything about jazz, Mr. Newman relied that he felt that he has already expressed himself sufficiently, and let it go at that.

The Celtic, from Liverpool and Queenstown, was a day late, due to unfavorable weather. She brought several hundred passengers for this port and New York, and departed for the latter port a little more than an hour after she had tied up at Commonwealth Pier.

As soon as the liner docked, C. A. Bray vice president of Lord & Spencer Company, Inc., of Boston, was removed in an ambulance to the Massachusetts General Hospital, ill with pneumonia which developed soon after he sailed from Liverpool. The patient, according to the ship's surgeon, Dr. Fitzpatrick, was much improved upon arrival, having passed the crisis, so that his recovery is expected. Mr. Bray has completed a trip around the world, having gone overland to Los Angeles and sailing thence across the Pacific to the Orient.

Other cabin passengers [illegible] were included Professor Herbert J. C. Grierson of the University of Edinburgh, authority on rhetoric and English literature, who is to make a lecture tour of American colleges, accompanied by Mrs. Grierson; E. Willard Frost of Dorchester, William H. Wright of Boston, Rev. Ralph T. Wegner of Jamaica Plain, Miss Annie M. Stoddard of Dorchester, Miss B. Secomb of Brookline, Mrs. H. L. Meyer of Brookline, Mrs. A. P. Brockway of Brookline, Mrs. A. J. Bicail of Swampscott and Miss Alice Patten of Boston.

Boston's Beethoven Centennial Recalls Struggles of Other Stricken Composers

BY R. L. HUMPHREY

I suggest that we stand in silent erence of the greatest genius in sic—Ludwig Von Beethoven."

o spoke Conductor Serge Koussesky to the players in the Boston mphony Orchestra last Monday rning when he began his rehearfor the Beethoven Centennial certs. And for a minute the hundred and fifteen musicians their famous leader solemnly unspoken tribute to the mem of the amazing composer who a hundred years ago this month.

f, With Freak Temperament

e deaf Beethoven—a terriblepered or clumsily high-spirited uncouth, so careless of dress o be jailed once as a tramp—was the greatest musical genius

d music is a history of geniuses, ims more of them than does other art.

any of music's geniuses, however, have suffered a great, if not a loss of widespread esteem todays, because of changed musical thoven is the exception. Music s who hear the most striking ples of un-to-date compositions often listen to Beethoven wards with a higher regard ever.

ill a "Modern" Composer

Koussevitzky is very fond of ucing ultra-modern scores at ny concerts, but still he loves rks of Beethoven, and interprets with great distinction. And in his dress to his players before last Monday's rehearsal, he referred to these modern compositions, thanking the men for their good work in "numerous scores of importance and difficulty." Then he said:

"Let us make our Beethoven Centennial concerts the finest we have ever performed."

There you have it—Beethoven's music still an all-powerful modern attraction a century after its creator's death.

Why?

Beethoven expressed every human emotion, and in the most powerful effective fashion. His music voices both the most stormy and tragic agonies of mind and soul—and also perfect serenity or boisterous good humor.

It might almost be said that Beethoven is the only composer who could reach the greatest depths of seriousness and yet revelled in a sense of humor.

That brings Beethoven the man into discussion—a weird perpetual contradiction of human qualities at their greatest and at their pettiest.

His Human Frailties

Beethoven spoke, wrote and performed some of the world's worst jokes. He let his bad temper lead him into some of the most unreasonable actions against friends and associates.

But his boisterous jokes were a necessary safety valve against the pressure of resentful, even suicidal, thoughts caused by his deafness. His fits of temper were very often the direct consequence of two bodily ills suffered along with his deafness, and equally distressing. He pretty generally came to a realization of wrongs he had committed in his wrath, and man-like, was the first to try to patch up the damage.

The story of his deafness is a terrible tragedy. It did not come of a sudden accident. It developed with cruel deliberateness from disease of the nerve of hearing. The first faint signs of it gave the feeling that it was a condition that was irksome more than anything—something that would pass, with no grounds for alarm. Then in the course of a single year it made a horrifying advance which left Beethoven with no doubt that deafness had come upon him to stay. And more terrible still, he learned that it would grow increasingly worse with time.

This tragedy came at the height of his fame as a pianist and just as his genius as a composer was beginning to challenge his pianistic fame.

His writings show that he thought of suicide. Then he came to the conclusion that he had no right to do anything but struggle on. There was a strange but powerful religious spirit within him, and this triumphed.

He constantly kept before him these quotations:

"I am all that is, that was and that shall be. No mortal man hath lifted my veil.

"He is alone by Himself, and to Him alone do all things owe their being."

And perhaps he thanked God that despite the plague of deafness, it did not come until he had in his mind a knowledge of music so perfect that in his thoughts he could hear the effect of every combination of musical sounds he wrote down.

Two of Greatest Lost Sight

Blindness afflicted the last days of Johann Sebastian Bach and Handel. That was really a worse blow than deafness, for their knowledge of music was surely great enough to enable them, if deprived of the use of their ears, to hear their music with their minds as fast as they wrote it—while blindness put a stop to their writing.

In the case of each of these composers hope was raised by recourse to operations—only for the surgeon to fail and leave them hopeless. Bach died a year after he was stricken, but seven years of blindness were endured by Handel, who kept himself busy playing organ concertos and the organ parts in his own oratorios, besides having revisions added to one of his works. He kept active almost to the in his great "Messiah" eight days previous to his death.

A Wildcat Wife

The sunny nature of Joseph Haydn and the smooth course of his career for long years after he achieved fame make it easy to forget that he suffered a goodly share of ill fortune. As a boy, when the steady receipt of money for singing in the choir of St. Stephen's Vienna, meant everything to him, and he was thrown out as soloist in favor of his own brother, Michael.

He led a precarious existence with friendly help and a few music pupils until he set his foot on the first rung of success by refusing to accept bitter disappointment. His ambitions had gone soaring when he found he had means of being introduced to the eminent teacher and composer, Porpora.

Porpora received him with a household manager. There were four declaration that he would not sons and two daughters in all, and to accept anyone for a pupil, provide for himself and his family, but Haydn had to pick up money in the most hit and miss fashion.

Despite his genius, no royalty or nobility gave him some definite post from which he could count on a steady income. Pupils were scarce, and he had to rely on getting himself hired as piano soloist, and on the drawing power of piano recitals given in his own name. With a level-headed wife, money might have been handled so as to reach the farthest and help the family over the rough spots. As it was, Mozart lived a continual nightmare of financial uncertainty and debt.

Greatest Offer Came at Death

Even after "Don Giovanni" had been produced with immense success in Prague, and the furore it caused was reported to the Emperor in Vienna, his Majesty declined to give Mozart a salaried appointment. But a little later the great composer Gluck died, and Mozart's expectations soared.

After some delay the Emperor made him royal composer—at a salary of about $40 a year, whereas Gluck's had been $1000. In time his majesty commissioned Mozart to write an opera. "Cosi Fan Tutte" was the result. It scored a thrilling success, and began what promised an unusual run. Mozart felt surely that the royal purse was the reverse. But on the other hand, her mind was so carefree that she failed Mozart completely as a household manager. There were four sons and two daughters in all, and to provide for himself and his family, Mozart had to pick up money in the most hit and miss fashion.

Despite his genius, no royalty or nobility gave him some definite post from which he could count on a steady income. Pupils were scarce, and he had to rely on getting himself hired as piano soloist, and on the drawing power of piano recitals given in his own name. With a level-headed wife, money might have been handled so as to reach the farthest and help the family over the rough spots. As it was, Mozart lived a continual nightmare of financial uncertainty and debt.

Greatest Offer Came at Death

Even after "Don Giovanni" had been produced with immense success in Prague, and the furore it caused was reported to the Emperor in Vienna, his Majesty declined to give Mozart a salaried appointment. But a little later the great composer Gluck died, and Mozart's expectations soared.

After some delay the Emperor made him royal composer—at a salary of about $40 a year, whereas Gluck's had been $1000. In time his majesty commissioned Mozart to write an opera. "Cosi Fan Tutte" was the result. It scored a thrilling success, and began what promised an unusual run. Mozart felt surely that the royal purse strings would be loosened up in recognition of such wide appr

But the performances we a halt by the Emperor's d ness, which ended in his programmes of entertainmen were all made out of the the official mourning of the Mozart hoped that the ne would give him an appointi did not. Eventually, from trying to earn a decent money for his genius, Moz very weak. He began to b he had been poisoned, but k his composing. At last he to go to bed.

Then—and not until the financial news came to Hungarian noblemen had gether to guarantee him yearly income. Also word Amsterdam of a scheme t money for compositions by a publishing his works by s But he was soon dead of nant typhus.

Pianist With Crippled Finger

Poverty also preyed upon Berlioz and Wagner, who both often had to shelve their talents as composers many times at the start, and earn money by hack work as writers of newspaper [illegible]

When Berlioz was violin wizard [illegible] more wealth won by his playing than had ever been achieved by any other musician, met a harsh fate at the height of his success. He developed tuberculosis of the throat, and did not live long.

Chopin was also tubercular, and after a courageous struggle—during which he even gave a piano concert in London when he was so weak he had to be carried to the piano—he died of consumption.

Schumann's hopes of a career as a pianist were given a heart-breaking setback. Over-eager to make progress in developing his finger muscles, he used a machine which gave intensified finger exercises—and permanently injured the muscle of one finger by the strain. However, he was able eventually, by his high mental and artistic powers, to play with a peculiar charm which concealed his crippled condition.

Adding Sums Pained Beethoven

The marvellous singer, Malibran, at the height of her glory, and called to London for a series of lavishly paid engagements, was suddenly met by a cruel turn of fate. Out for a little healthful recreation, she fell from a horse and was very seriously shaken up, her head being injured. But she could not be induced to [illegible] audiences [illegible]

The celebrated ballet dancer, Ta was a hunchback, and her face very plain, if not positively h but by her art she carried h minds far away from these de

Among lighter troubles of illu musicians, it might be mentione Beethoven, for all his greatness, not learn to dance in time, as a man. Simple additions of figure ways disturbed him, and often him hopelessly beaten. And during last weeks, when, although his was wracked by sickness, he kept mind busy, trying over and master the simple multiplication Engage... As Co... B...

Alfredo Case... ductor, compo... signed a contra... ...bee... lar conductor of th... Symphony Hall, Bos... an announcement ju... nouncement proceeds:

"In their many se... have never been hono... of such world-wide dis... teem. Casella has long ... the most significant ir... new symphonic school o... position in Italy, which ... nation again among th... the creative development...

"Casella is now visiting ... States to conduct his mu... important occasions. As g... tor at the regular Bosto... concerts of January 14 and ... ducted his Partita and hi... Giara. La Giara is about to ... ed at the Metropolitan Op... and is anticipated as the ... novelty of the New York m... son.

"Before he came to this ... Casella was famous not only ... poser, but as conductor of the ... orchestras of Paris, Rome a... cities, and as undoubtedly ... brilliant pianist Italy has p... Visiting the United States in 1... 1923, he presided, as guest, o... Boston, Philadelphia and other ... tras, conducting here his rh... Italia, which, by the way, is a... standing favorite at the 'Pops.'

"Casella will visit Boston next ... to conduct Respighi's concerto a... regular symphony concerts, to in... the 'Pops' library, and to make ... plans for the 'Pops' season, which o... on May 2."

Casella's career shows him an ar... of astonishing versatility. Born ... Turin in 1883, of notably musical pa... ents, he began to study piano at th... age of four. His aptitude as a smal... boy for chemistry and electricity was such that a scientifiec vocation was contemplated for him. At twelve, however, he definitely dedicated himself to music. He entered the Paris Conservatory, where after studying the piano under Diemer, he took the First Prize in 1899. His master in composition was Faure.

In Rome in 1916 he founded the Society of Modern Music and a similar ... in 1923, together with d'Annunzio ... salipero. Through these, con...

Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Times, and his wife, who arrived here on the S. S. Celtic yesterday. They are here for the Beethoven centenary exercises.

POST MAR 22

NEWMAN, MUSIC CRITIC, ARRIVES

HER — MAR 22

Will Give Address at Beethoven Memorial Meeting

Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Sunday Times, who will deliver the principal address at the Beethoven centenary memorial meeting in Symphony hall, Monday evening, arrived yesterday on the White Star liner Celtic. He is accompanied by Mrs. Newman and will remain in the United States only 12 days, most of that time in this city. Two years ago the famous critic visited the United States for a brief sojourn, and in reply to the question by interviewers yesterday stated emphatically that his opinion of jazz, then anathema, has not since changed, and the less said the better.

On board the Celtic was C. A. Gray, vice-president of Lord & Spencer Co., Inc., of this city, ill with pneumonia and necessitating removal to the Massachusetts General Hopital. He is convalescing, although wireless reports of his condition last week were disquieting. He was on a world tour, having sailed from San Francisco several months ago on a Dollar liner, which he left at Genoa to visit southern Europe on the way to Liverpool. His home is in Winthrop.

The Celtic, Capt. Berry, was expected Sunday, but arrival was delayed by fog and head gales. Among the 850 cabin passengers who landed here were Dr. H. J. C. Grierson, professor of rhetoric and English literature at the University of Edinburgh, accompanied by his daughter, Miss L. H. Grierson. Dr. Grierson will lecture at the Carnegie Institute of Technology at Pittsburgh. Also E. D. Seccomb of Brookline, returning from a Mediterranean tour; Miss Hilda L. Peterson of Lynn, who made a general tour; the Rev. R. T. Wegner, home from a visit to northern Africa; W. H. Wright, Boston wool importer, who attended the London sales; Mrs. Elsie L. Moore, Mrs. Alice P. Brockway of Brookline; Miss Annie M. Standard, E. Willard Frost of Dorchester; H. L. Holmes of Milford.

The Celtic's call at Commonwealth pier, South Boston, was brief as she resumed the passage to New York in about an hour, carrying several hundred additional passengers.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 23 1927

BRITISH MUSIC CRITIC AND WIFE

Ernest Newman, who will deliver the principal address at the Beethoven centenary memorial meeting at Symphony hall next Monday evening. He is shown with his wife on the deck of the Celtic as the liner approached its Boston berth.

Enjoying Some American Music

MR. AND MRS. ERNEST NEWMAN
Mr. Newman, Music Critic of London, to Participate in Special Beethoven Concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

MAR 23 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTOWN, ME.
JOURNAL

MAR 23 1927

1/22

BOSTON TO OFFER BEETHOVEN EVENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents First of Series of Seven Concerts; Tufts College Chime Will Play

Boston, March 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr Archibald T. Davison, and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given at the old Music hall. The opening of Symphony hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chime of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting at Symphony hall on Monday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 23 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
MAR 23 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM DISPATCH
YORK, PENN.
MAR 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF SERIES OF BEETHOVEN CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., March 22 (AP)—The Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall, was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon making the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his Ninth Symphony and in the chapel the Tufts String Quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E. minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

MAR 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A BEETHOVEN CONCERT

ALL OF COMPOSER'S NINE SYMPHONIES ARE TO BE PERFORMED

Boston, March 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed. The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old music hall.

On Saturday next at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethovens quartet in E minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
MAR 23 1927

COURIER-CITIZEN, WE

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS BEETHOVEN

Gives First of a Series of Seven Concerts Marking Anniversary of Composer's Death.

BOSTON, March 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Misso Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old music hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS BEETHOVEN

Orchestra Gives Concert Marking 100th Date of Composer's Death

BOSTON, March 22 (A. P.) — The Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The "Missa Solennis" was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music hall. The opening of Symphony hall was marked by a performance of the "Missa Solennis."

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beehoven's quartet in E minor. The orchestra of the New England Concervatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony hall next Monday evening.

OBSERVE ANNIVERSARY OF BEETHOVEN'S DEATH BY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston, Mar. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony orchestra tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of special training.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILLIAMSPORT, PA.
SUN

MAR 23 1927

FIRST OF BEETHOVEN ANNIVERSARY CONCERTS

Boston, March 23.—The Boston Symphony orchestra last night gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of special training.

AUGUSTA, ME.
JOURNAL

MAR 23 1927

husband, Carlo Cole.

Boston Symphony Concert on 100th Date Beethoven's Death

Boston, Mar. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Ludvig van Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solemnis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

They will also assist in the performance of the ninth (choral) symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony [illegible] in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor.

BEETHOVEN HONORED AT BOSTON CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Plays His Works to Celebrate 100th Anniversary.

BOSTON, March 22, (AP).—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting, after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the Ninth Symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-1882, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his Ninth Symphony, and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of [illegible] will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on [illegible] evening.

Ernest Newman, London music

NEWMAN, MUSIC CRITIC, ARRIVES HERE MAR 22

Will Give Address at Beethoven Memorial Meeting

Ernest Newman, music critic of the London Sunday Times, who will deliver the principal address at the Beethoven centenary memorial meeting in Symphony hall, Monday evening, arrived yesterday on the White Star liner Celtic. He is accompanied by Mrs. Newman and will remain in the United States only 12 days, most of that time in this city. Two years ago the famous critic visited the United States for a brief sojourn, and in reply to the question by interviewers yesterday stated emphatically that his opinion of jazz, then anathema, has not since changed, and the less said the better.

On board the Celtic was C. A. Gray, vice-president of Lord & Spencer Co., Inc., of this city, ill with pneumonia and necessitating removal to the Massachusetts General Hopital. He is convalescing, although wireless reports of his condition last week were disquieting. He was on a world tour, having sailed from San Francisco several months ago on a Dollar liner, which he left at Genoa to visit southern Europe on the way to Liverpool. His home is in Winthrop.

The Celtic, Capt. Berry, was expected Sunday, but arrival was delayed by fog and head gales. Among the 85 cabin passengers who landed here were Dr. H. J. C. Grierson, professor of rhetoric and English literature at the University of Edinburgh, accompanied by his daughter, Miss L. H. Grierson. Dr. Grierson will lecture at the Carnegie Institute of Technology at Pittsburgh. Also E. D. Seccomb of Brookline, returning from a Mediterranean tour; Miss Hilda L. Peterson of Lynn, who made a general tour; the Rev. R. T. Wegner, home from a visit to northern Africa; W. H. Wright, Boston wool importer, who attended the London sales; Mrs. Elsie L. Moore, Mrs. Alice P. Broadway of Brookline; Miss Annie M. Stoddard, E. Willard Frost of Dorchester; H. L. Holmes of Milford.

The Celtic's call at Commonwealth pier, South Boston, was brief as she resumed the passage to New York in about an hour, carrying several hundred additional passengers.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 23 1927

BRITISH MUSIC CRITIC AND WIFE

Ernest Newman, who will deliver the principal address at the Beethoven centenary memorial meeting at Symphony hall next Monday evening. He is shown with his wife on the deck of the Celtic as the liner approached its Boston berth.

Enjoying Some American Music

MONITOR MAR 22

MR. AND MRS. ERNEST NEWMAN
Mr. Newman, Music Critic of London, to Participate in Special Beethoven Concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTOWN, ME.
JOURNAL

MAR 23 1927

MAR 23 1927

122

BOSTON TO OFFER BEETHOVEN EVENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents First of Series of Seven Concerts; Tufts College Chime Will Play

Boston, March 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr Archibald T. Davison, and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given at the old Music hall. The opening of Symphony hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chime of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting at Symphony hall on Monday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 23 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
MAR 23 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM DISPATCH
YORK, PENN.
MAR 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF SERIES OF BEETHOVEN CONCERTS

Boston, Mass., March 22 (AP)—The Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall, was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon making the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his Ninth Symphony and in the chapel the Tufts String Quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E. minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUGUSTA, ME.
JOURNAL

MAR 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A BEETHOVEN CONCERT

ALL OF COMPOSER'S NINE SYMPHONIES ARE TO BE PERFORMED

Boston, March 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed. The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old music hall.

On Saturday next at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethovens quartet in E minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
MAR 23 1927

COURIER-CITIZEN, WE

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS BEETHOVEN

Gives First of a Series of Seven Concerts Marking Anniversary of Composer's Death.

BOSTON, March 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Misso Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old music hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS BEETHOVEN

Orchestra Gives Concert Marking 100th Date of Composer's Death

BOSTON, March 22 (A. P.) — The Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The "Missa Solennis" was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music hall. The opening of Symphony hall was marked by a performance of the "Missa Solennis."

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E minor. The orchestra of the New England Concervatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony hall next Monday evening.

OBSERVE ANNIVERSARY OF BEETHOVEN'S DEATH BY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston, Mar. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony orchestra tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of special training.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILLIAMSPORT, PA.
SUN

MAR 23 1927

FIRST OF BEETHOVEN ANNIVERSARY CONCERTS

Boston, March 23.—The Boston Symphony orchestra last night gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of special training.

husband, Carlo Cole.

Boston Symphony Concert on 100th Date Beethoven's Death

Boston, Mar. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Ludvig van Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solemnis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

They will also assist in the performance of the ninth (choral) symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethover's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony [illegible] in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor.

BEETHOVEN HONORED AT BOSTON CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Plays His Works to Celebrate 100th Anniversary.

BOSTON, March 22, (AP).—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting, after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the Ninth Symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-1882, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth Symphony, and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of [illegible] will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music

THE SOLEMN MASS BEGINS THE RITES AROUND BEETHOVEN

TRANS MAR23

THROUGH MANY YEARS A SCORE UNHEARD

The Arrayed Forces—Above All the Chorus—Dr. Davison's and Mr. Koussevitzky's Shares—Sensations Assorted—The Quality and the Impression of a Music of Dreams and Visions, Prayer and Praise

THE DILEMMA is unescapable. Beethoven's Solemn Mass is so seldom heard in American concert-halls that the most assiduous frequenter may not come to know it. Until it was revived last evening for the beginning of the Beethoven Centenary Festival it had not sounded through Symphony Hall for twenty-seven years. As many more may elapse before another ceremonial occasion brings it forth. Elsewhere in the United States performances have been few. Even in such seats of choral song as Germany or England they remain relatively rare. If the public that takes concert-going seriously is to become as familiar with the Mass in D as it is, say, with the Ninth Symphony, then revivals of the one must be as frequent as repetitions of the other. The irremovable obstacle is the different and laborious preparation of the Mass. Any expert orchestra can make way, with the usual rehearsals, through the first three movements of the Ninth Symphony. It is heard often enough for singers to keep themselves practised in the solo-measures of the choral finale. Enough choruses have also borne their part in this "Hymn to Joy" to make preparation a restudying of half-remembered pages.

On the other hand, consider the forces requisite, and the training essential, to such a performance as the Mass received yesterday and will receive again next Sunday. Extended far into the auditorium, the stage of Symphony Hall upreared more than 400 executants. Four solo-singers—Miss Marshall (substitute for the sick Mme. Austral) Miss Gordon, Mr. Davies and Mr. Middleton—had studied parts for which there is seldom call. Three hundred and more choristers from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society had undergone under Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth a year of preparation and six months of intensive rehearsal. In turn, Mr. Koussevitzky had schooled the Symphony Orchestra in a music that only the veterans had ever played before. Finally, the conductor had fused these contributing forces into a plastic whole, accustomed them to each other and his wielding hand. These things are not done in a corner; nor are they accomplished in a single day. If the Solemn Mass is to be brought to full and free performance, a year of various preparation is incumbent.

Possibly the exactions of the score are not as insurmountable as it is the custom to represent them. Once the solo-singers agree to Beethoven's insistence upon their voices as instruments added to his symphonic choir; once they submit to the high range and piercing sonorities that he requires, their way is relatively clear. If they are practised and resourceful, as was the quartet of Tuesday, they do not find it to difficult to follow. The orchestra is in equally adaptable case. The Ninth Symphony as repertory piece—more or less—has familiarized it with the instrumental speech of Beethoven's later years. It has only to apply this knowledge to the Mass, which is intrinsically a choral rather than a symphonic score. The hardest tax awaits the concert-master since he must play the violin-solo, threading the Benedictus. In memory, and anticipation, it usually lingers longest in those that recall the Mass at all. Enough that Mr. Burgin played it at a pace and with such felicity of tone and phrase that it exhaled Beethoven's mystical exaltation.

For the chorus—work of Dr. Davison's and Mr. Woodworth's hands—the task was indeed difficult. Yet here again the youthful quality of their mated choirs came to the rescue. These young singers, by the blessing of their years, are likely to count Beethoven's relentless intervals and mounting ranges far less formidable than would their elders. For them, moreover, by that same blessing, Beethoven's instrumental use of voices is but a figment of the schools. They are there to achieve the notes and with the will to achieve them; the will, besides, to become so secure that the mechanism of their song shall be second nature, strenuous but spontaneous. Furthermore, they are accustomed to sing in an equally distributed chorus with no solicitude about preponderant women over timider and fewer men. To the good again, they have been trained not only to release their voices but within them to release their souls. Comparable at last with the best English choruses—to cite the criterion—are these Cambridge choirs in disposition and ability to sing out; while, animated by the more nervous American temperament, they excel the Britons in fervor and variety of expression. Through the Mass they had been schooled assiduously to intervals, phrasing, rhythms, to Beethoven's every indication of his musical purpose. More: they had become familiar with his text; absorbed his emotions; assimiliated, as much as may be, his imaginings, gained some notion of the Mass not as a succession of notes, but as an integrated, far-ranging, full-laden whole.

Here enters the personal equation. It is the high fortune of Dr. Davison to inspirit his choirs, to lift them above themselves. At his call, their clear young voices gain new freedoms of plasticity and resonance; the cardinal virtues of choral singing become, not the routine of rehearsal but deeds of individual and assembled valor; through the tonal substance pierce the ardors of imagination, and emotion that give it birth. For climax comes the irresistible impulse to release in song these ferments—and the full deed crowns the shapen work. Doing such things ,these student-singers have learned something of the reason for living and the zest of it; of the pleasures of the arts and the rewards for the practice of them; of the inner warmth and thrill that spring from a task well done for the task's own sake.

Then Mr. Koussevitzky, spurred once more, as is his habit, by the magnitude and exaction of an impending deed. After three seasons, each interspersed with considerable choral concerts, his abilities on that score need no restatement. He wields orchestra, choirs and solo-singers into a single unity, elastic, interplaying, instantly and full-heartedly responsive. He charges it with his own energy of will and accomplishment; yet from no fervor lifts the directing hand. Add thereto, the ability, so to say, of the occasion. Time and again Mr. Koussevitzky has recalled the symphonies of Beethoven to the throbbing life, the characterizing vitality, with which they left the composer's pen to flood upon his age. He has stripped them of every accretion that the word "classic" comprehends. He has renewed their native voice and vigor. Now came the turn to do like office to the Solemn Mass and upon a rare occasion. Few of the listeners last evening, could have had any other standard of performance than present perceptions and instincts afford. Scarcely any shammed out memories of the quality of concerts long since, in human nature, forgotten. Yet by a kind of divination, came first the feeling, then the faith, that never before in America had the Mass of Beethoven gained such enlarging and intensifying voice.

The test is the immediate sensations of the concert-hall, and those sensations as retrospect sifts them. What would Beethoven have of his Kyrie? The vision of God upon his eternal throne; the hosts of heaven singing His majesty; to the voices of mortal man adding their voices of entreaty and salvation. It is the counterpart in a freer and deeper medium of those medieval frescoes wherein at the pinnacle sits Divine Presence enthroned; midway enranked, stand saints and angels; holy men and holy women; below we mortals in ascending petition. What, again, would Beethoven have of his Gloria? God militant upon His Universe, by its praises engirt—"Divine deus, res cœlestis, pater omnipotens . . . tu solus sanctus, tu solus dominus, tu solus altissimus . . ." The great fresco of adoration that Michael Angelo failed to limn and paint, now at a latter day achieved. Across it, since beauty is the complement of power and tenderness the minister of strength, the vision of the Son of God who taketh away the sins of the world.

Again, the Creed, thundering its affirmations of faith, reciting less as narrative than as holy mysteries incarnation, crucifixion and resurrection; re-marshalling the faiths; unfolding, through the sublimest of fugues, the life eternal. First, a vision of God; next, the proclamation of the sacred verities; last, the great longing in the hearts of men. Beethoven writes no Sanctus to multiply the acclamations of the Gloria. Instead, it is the ecstatic communion of men with God, the seer's dream of an all embracing unity with the divine compassion and righteousness. The Benedictus continues the rapt devotion. From the whole, in the Agnus Dei ascends the prayer for that peace which in God's own time shall hush the clamors and soothe the woes of earth; upon it seal His presence and His pity.

Beethoven was writing no liturgical service for the Roman Church, or for an Archduke tricked out with a bishopric. He was merely seizing an occasion and availing himself of a text and a formula—all three as implements to his own deeper purposes. No more did he set, from a purely æsthetic motive, to the writing of an objective and delineative music under the impulse of the Latin text and the Roman ritual. True, the music of the Gloria responds faithfully to every verbal phrase. True, Beethoven interrupts the broodings of the Sanctus, because the words, 'osanna in excelsis" stare him in the face. True yet again, sounds of the war, with which his Europe, like ours, had been lately scourged, are background to the final petition for peace. Yet who of composers minded to an æsthetic setting of the mass has not fastened upon the creed for the fullest play of his purpose, lavishing himself upon the narrative of Jesus. For Beethoven it becomes but the items of a mystery recited, a faith affirmed.

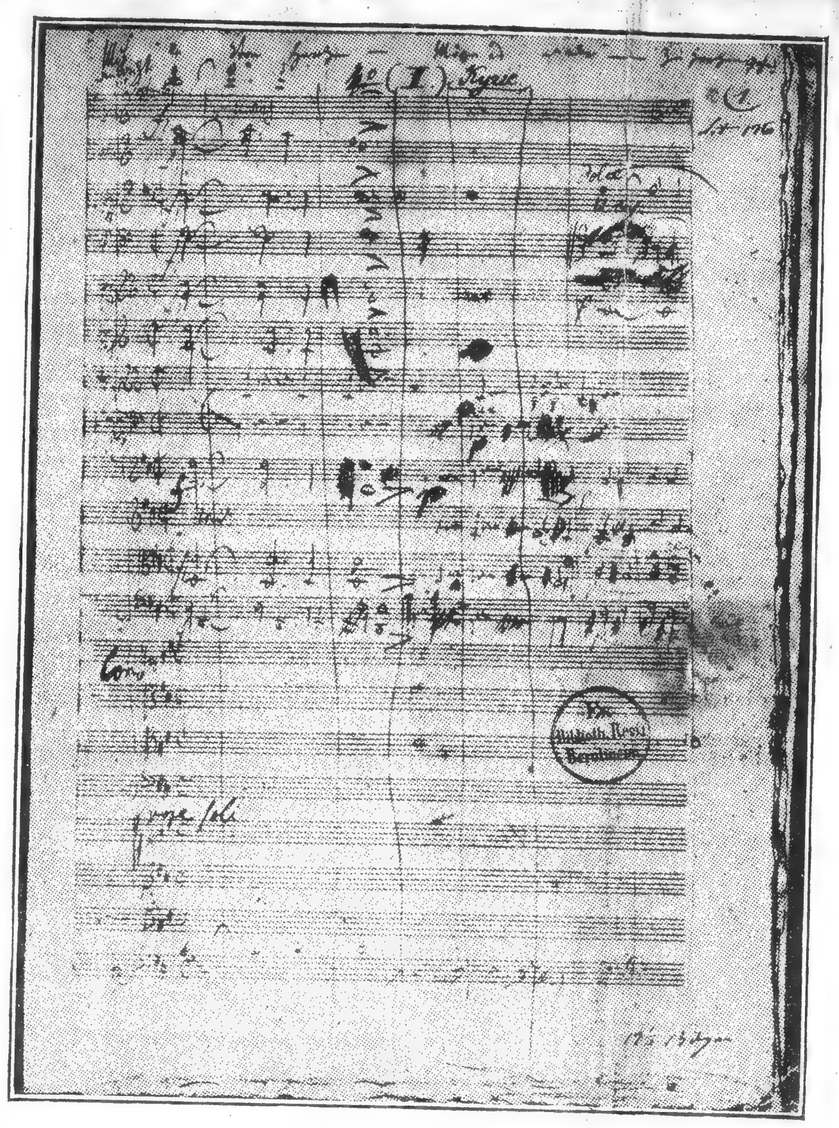
Less still did Beethoven set to the rearing of a musical monument for its own sake. He writes choruses of far-flung magnitude and upswelling might; he bids his solo-singers do varied and exacting offices, each apposite to the moment. He up-piles his forces as though he would scale the heavens by his ardors and with them make proclamation to the universe. At will and need he hushes them to the ecstasy of the Sanctus, the compassion of the Benediction, the visioned peace of the Agnus Dei. Whatever the means, or the process he attains these heights and depths, not for their overwhelming or possessing sake, but for the release of his spirit and for the incarnation of his vision. Moreover, the monument would not have been flawless. The Mass contains fugal passages that are intricate juggliery with counterpoint. It is interspersed with measures so awkwardly or so unattainably conceived that they fall short of the purpose. There are pages, more than once, that are mere getting-forward with the task and the text until the next sublimity mounts within.

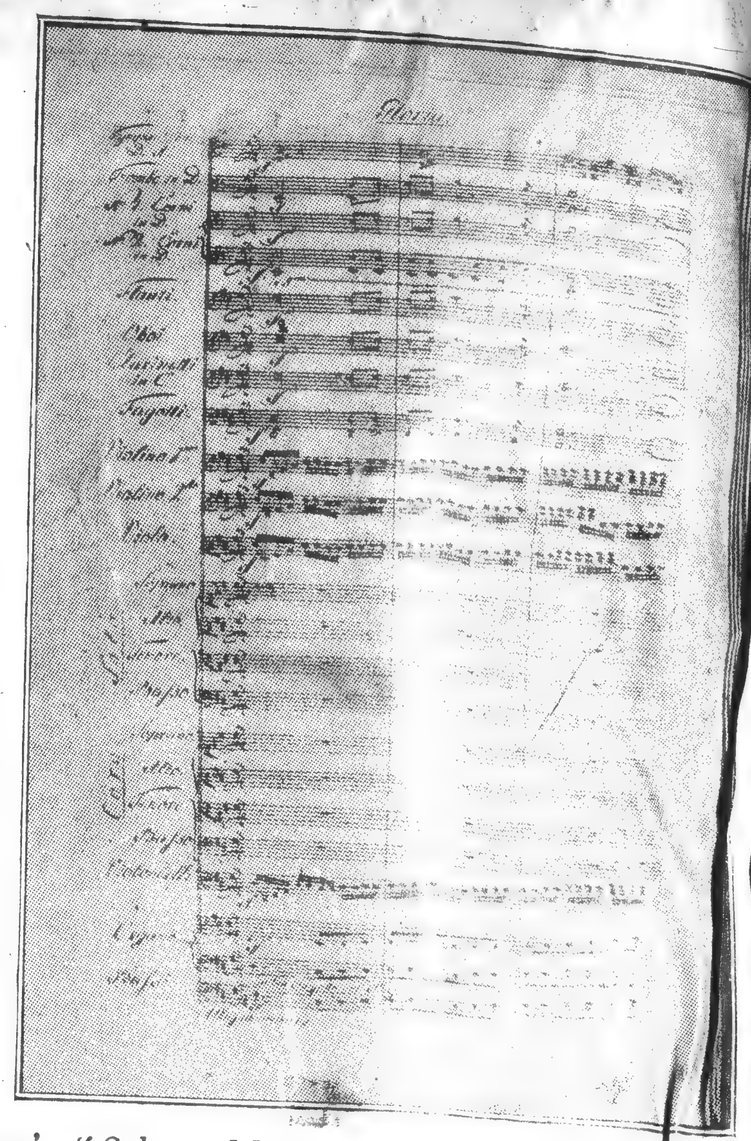
Least of all is the Mass the music of Beethoven, pietist and churchman, an apocryphal figure fondly reared by Monsieur d'Indy in Paris and the Lord Bishop in New York, because they would have him like their dogmatic selves. The Beethoven of the last Quartets, of parts of the Choral Symphony, of the Grosse Fugue, wrote also this Mass—he who had become dreamer of dreams and seer of visions, who for them would find in tones the symbols and the speech. God upon his throne: God militant over a praising universe—these are the visions. The aspiration of man to communion with Divinity, the peace that passeth understanding upon earth descending—those were the dreams. The faith that is emanation from God and answering affirmation from men—this was the holy mystery, in the Creed merely verbalized, he music should unfold in the symbols of tones.

In these final years, this abstract imagery possessed Beethoven. Beside which he found the expressive means of tone and tone-relationships, the matter and the processes of music, relatively concrete. In the Mass, the quartets, the Grosse Fugue, he strove both to enlarge and to sublimate them. His speech as seer must be this intractible music escaping these earthy bonds. Sometimes he succeeded: pages, as in the Mass, that open wide the doors of the spirit upon new vistas ascending, are the witness. Sometimes he failed and the ideal, as its habit is, averted its eyes and muted its lips. Then, as again in the Mass, he wrote a music that confesses its fruitless striving, or, oftener, a music in which we lesser men see, through a glass darkly, the will that is glory upon the halting deed.

H. T. P.

The Travail and The Monument





Two Pages from Beethoven's "Solemn Mass"

To left, Beginning of the Kyrie in the Composer's Own Hand; to right, Beginning of the Gloria in a "Fair Copy" for Some Long Forgotten Prince At the Top of the Page from the Kyrie Stands, in German, the Familiar Inscription: "From the Heart—to the Heart May It Find Its Way Again."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
MAR 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS BEETHOVEN

Orchestra Gives Concert Marking 100th Date of Composer's Death

BOSTON, March 22 (A P) — The Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The "Missa Solemnis" was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old music hall. The opening of Symphony hall was marked by a performance of the "Missa Solemnis."

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts college in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony hall on Saturday evening.

---

formance of the Ninth Symphony. In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old music hall.

On Saturday next at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tuft's College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts string quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's quartet in E minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.
MAR 23 192

BEETHOVEN WEEK OPENS IN BOSTON

BOSTON, March 22. (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting.

They will also assist in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAR 23 1927

HONORS BEETHOVEN

Gives Missa Solemnis in First of Series Marking Centenary of Composer's Death.

COLLEGE GROUPS ASSIST

Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society Specially Trained for Concert.—Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Orchestra

Boston, March 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 23 1927

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Boston Beethoven Festival Opens Extensive Program With the 'Missa Solemnis'

BOSTON has reminded us of its high musical traditions by inaugurating the most ambitious celebration of the centenary of Beethoven's death to be held on this side of the Atlantic. Throughout Occidental civilization the event is being observed in some degree wherever high-type music is known. During the coming week the special Beethoven programs of the New York Philharmonic in New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and the Beethoven Association in New York will be reviewed in these columns. Memorial exercises arranged by the Beethoven Week Association will be held at Town Hall under the auspices of a distinguished committee headed by George Eastman of Rochester on Friday.

Olga Samaroff

Two official representatives of the United States Government, Karl Engel, head of the music division of the Library of Congress in Washington, and the noted musicologist. Oscar Sonneck, are in Vienna taking part in the elaborate international celebration held there this week under the auspices of the Austrian Government.

The Friends of Music of New York ushered in this Beethoven year in October with a superb performance of the "Missa Solemnis," the Metropolitan Opera has contributed a fine revival of "Fidelio," Toscanini directed an unforgettable performance of the Ninth Symphony, the London String Quartet has played the entire set of string quartets and the Grosse Fuge, and Katherine Bacon has played the thirty-two piano sonatas. But the Boston Symphony offers the most comprehensive general program of all in holding a festival from March 22 to 29, inclusive, during which the "Missa Solemnis" and all nine symphonies are announced.

In addition the B flat trio will be played by Harold Samuel, James Levey and Warwick Evans. Harold Samuel will play the Piano Sonata Opus 110. and the London String Quartet will play the E minor quartet Opus 59 on March 24. On March 28 Ernest Newman of London will deliver an address, S. Foster Damon will read an ode and the Lenox String Quartet will play the Opus 135.

THE magnitude of this undertaking impelled me to leave Gotham uncriticized—so far as I am concerned—for twenty-four hours and witness the inauguration of the Boston Festival in last night's performance of the colossal "Missa Solemnis."

Paul Bekker writes of this extraordinary work: "Beethoven tears down the walls that divide the church from the world. His church extends as far as his eye can reach. He builds his altar in the center of the world. He tolerates no dogmatic boundaries. 'From the heart—may it reach the heart,' wrote Beethoven of the Kyrie. Herewith he designated the audience he wishes to address: Those whose hearts can receive what his own has felt."

Stony would be the heart that gave no response to the spiritual fervor of the Kyrie and the Gloria of the "Missa Solemnis"—dead the esthetic perceptions which failed to recognize the unearthly beauty of the Benedictus. The "Missa Solemnis" of Beethoven, the B minor mass of Bach, the St. Matthew and St. John Passions of Bach—these are towering peaks in musical literature which reach into other worldly regions hidden from most mortals by the clouds—there where only genius and religious exaltation of the highest type penetrate and form their conceptions of the mysteries of the universe.

A highly interesting feature of last night's performance in Boston was the participation of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Their respective conductors, A. T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, who had trained them in their difficult task, received an ovation at the end of the performance when Mr. Koussewitzky brought them forward to share the applause.

THE fact in itself that young Americans of both sexes can take part in such performances during their college life and do it as well as they did is enormously significant for our cultural life. Barring one moment of noticeable uncertainty and an occasional lapse of intonation [illegible] tessitura, the youthful chorus was surprisingly effective and sang with evident understanding. As a matter of fact, it was considerably more effective than the quartet of soloists—Miss Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton—which formed the weakest part of the performance.

Miss Marshall labored earnestly with the difficult soprano part, but as the evening wore on her voice showed the strain due to the prevailingly high register. Jeanne Gordon's rich voice was curiously ineffective. I may be entirely mistaken, but I had the impression she was not very familiar with the music and was afraid to let herself [illegible] Tudor Davies was apparently at ho[illegible] in the tenor part and was the m[illegible] effective of the solo singers. Arth[illegible] Middleton sang with expressiveness, b[illegible] without achieving any very outstandi[illegible] impressiveness.

Mr. Koussewitzky was evidently hea[illegible] and soul in a performance which gav[illegible] me the impression that preoccupatio[illegible] with substance was still too strong t[illegible] admit of a free soaring of the spirit[illegible] Beethoven is himself largely to blam[illegible] for the fact that only the most excep[illegible]tional gifts and circumstances produce a performance that is not earthbound by the sheer weight of the difficulties with which the performers have to contend.

The fingers of one hand are too many to count the great renditions of the "Missa Solemnis" I can remember among many performances I have heard. But the one last night—as indeed the whole plan of the Beethoven Festival—is greatly to the credit of Mr. Koussewitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the City of Boston itself. Symphony Hall held a large and reverent audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
MAR 23 1927

Symphony Gives Beethoven Concert

Boston, Mar. 23 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, last night gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 150th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony, and in the chapel the Tufts String Quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

---

given. Mr. Burgin played most musically the violin solo in the "Benedictus."

Miss Austral was prevented by a severe cold from taking the solo soprano part. Miss Marshall, who had sung the music in New York; replaced her at short notice. While all the soloists strove valiantly, with the difficulties that over a century ago drove to desparation the first quartet—and Mmes. Sontag and Unger were famous for musicianship and vocal skill—it must be said that last night the two men were much more satisfactory in solo work than were their sisters in art; nor in ensemble was there always a just balance.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with a care, an appreciation of text and music, an enthusiasm beyond all praise. His interpretation of the mighty work was an inspiration.

Would it be irreverent to say that this mass as a whole is not a sacred opus, but an ecclesiatstical opera?

There was a great and deeply interested audience. The Mass will be heard next Sunday for the benefit of the pen-

PERFORM MASS BY BEETHOVEN

Symphony Orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe Clubs Join in Music

IS OPENING OF GREAT FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and these solo singers: Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton, gave a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D last night in Symphony hall. This was the first concert of the Beethoven festival. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The glee club had been trained by Dr. Davison; the choral society by G. Wallace Woodworth. John P. Marshall was the organist.

This Mass known to many as the Missa Solemnis (or "Missa Solennis") has led certain commentators to write in the Corinthian manner; to indulge in hifalutin. We are told that the music provides us "with a genuine release into the infinite." The same writer asks: "Does it not tap the mysterious reservoir of the beautiful?"

"One forgets the physical nature of his surroundings,"—i.e. in Symphony hall the statues of gods and goddesses, satyrs, dancing fauns—"and is immersed in an ecstatic contemplation of divine verities"; although Count Keyserling is said to phrase it somewhat better: as "the opening of the consciousness to the influences which are awaiting liberation in the innermost depths of the soul, which, when liberated, connect the spirit directly with God."

There are others, as Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who insist that the later works of Beethoven were inspired by his strong, abiding deep faith in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church; but Beethoven, though he was baptized a Catholic and died a Catholic, was negligent in his religious duties during his life and was profoundly impressed by Hindu and Egyptian religious thought. Even Dr. Hermann Deiters, a devout Roman Catholic churchman, in his long analysis of the Mass, points out the departure of the music from some of the dogmas as well as the rubrics of the church.

As a matter of fact Beethoven wrote the Mass for the installation of his friend and patron the Archduke Rudolph as Archbishop of Olmuetz. The Mass was not completed in time for the ceremony. The circumstances attending the dedication and publication of the work were wordly, commercial, unworthy the dignity of the composer. By the time a portion of the Mass was publicly performed in a theatre as "Three Grand Hymns" (1824), the Mass had grown to such huge proportions, the technical difficulties of performance were so great, that it was not for the church service.

Beethoven was undoubtedly and chiefly inspired in the composition by the poetic and dramatic elements of the text. It might here be said that after the first performance of the "Three Hymns," he was bitterly disappointed at the smallness of the receipts and accused his friends of having cheated him at the box-office. It is wiser to say, with Mr. Paul Bekker, that this extraordinary Mass was a "logical pursuance of the paths struck out in the symphonies . . . the summary of Beethoven's world philosophy." One need not say with this German writer that the symphonies express "the struggles of man towards self-realization."

It has been said that the Kyrie and the Gloria are the only movements that are suitable for ecclesiastical use. Surely the "Agnus Dei" with its dramatic interruption, with its "alarums without," the wild appeal for peace, is not for the church; the same might be said of the colossal "Credo" and the "Benedictus"; yet in the movements just named are the most emotional and impressive pages. It was in the dramatic portions of the text that Beethoven rose to sublime height, to so loftly a flight that singers of earth could not follow him.

Even if they were superhuman, with trumpet voices, they could not prevent many purely scholastic pages from being prosaic, without spiritual significance, without religious emotion. Witness many interminable frugal pages, with endless repetitions, pages in which, as they are written without respect for natural limitations of the voice, must be shrieked; they cannot be sung; and so the effect is one of infinite labor and vain endeavor, not an uplifting of the hearer's soul. Beethoven once said that ecclesiastical music should be for voices alone; he named Palestrina as the great master; but in this Mass among the most beautiful portions of the work are the orchestral introduction to the "Sanctus" and the orchestral prelude to the "Benedictus." They invoke a mood that is not sustained afterwards by the voices; and it is a question whether the orchestral accompaniment to the text. "Et incarnatus est," is not of a finer inspiration than the music for the reciters of the text.

The performance last night reflected great credit on the chorus, admirably prepared by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. These singers well-nigh accomplished the impossible. There was rich tonal sonority, there was an intelligent regard for nuances; there was no faltering even when the burden put upon these unprofessional men and women was almost insupportable. The orchestra was, it is needless to say, eloquent whenever the opportunity was

"MISSA SOLEMNIS" AT SYMPHONY HALL

Beethoven Festival Begun by Choral Concert

The Beethoven Festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in honor of the centenary of the composer's death began last night in Symphony Hall with a performance of his great "Missa Solemnis," in D major, opus 123. The orchestra had the cooperation of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by Dr A. T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

The assisting soloists were; Olive Marshall, soprano; Jeanne Gordon, contralto, Tudor Davies, tenor; and Arthur Middleton, bass. The hall had been sold out many weeks in advance. The great audience listened with reverent attention. At the end there was an ovation for Mr Koussevitzky, Dr Davison, and Mr Woodworth.

In the next seven days all nine of Beethoven's symphonies are to be performed. There is also to be a program of his chamber music and a program including an address by the noted English critic, Ernest Newman, and an ode written for the occasion by S. Foster Damon of Cambridge.

The "Missa Solemnis" will be repeated next Sunday for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members of the Boston Symphony. No city in the entire musical world is paying in this week of commemoration a greater tribute to Beethoven than this Boston Festival.

Five Years to Write

The "Missa Solemnis" took Beethoven five years to write. It is his most austere and noble work, on a grand scale, and exacting so much of both performers and listeners that for an acknowledged masterpiece it is seldom heard. There have been but two previous performances in Boston, by the Cecilia Society in 1897 and at the dedication of Symphony Hall in 1900. To the majority of last night's audience it was unfamiliar.

The performance reflects great credit on all concerned, especially when the almost insuperable vocal difficulties of the work are considered. It is astonishing that a chorus composed of college students should have sung with such musical understanding and so great perfection of technique. The four soloists were adequate for their rather thankless task. Mr Koussevitzky gave his best energies without stint. One might cavil at some details especially of tempi, but the dramatic energy, the imaginative force of his reading was incontestable.

Beethoven wrote at one point in the original manuscript of the "Missa Solemnis" a wish that "what has come from the heart may reach the heart." A listener hearing this music for the first time cannot mistake its utter agonizing sincerity.

This is no mere liturgical music, it is the expression of the emotion at the heart of all religions. Awe, even terror as well as hope and joy are in it. There is no music more sublime than the Credo and the Agnus Dei of the "Missa Solemnis."

Technical Difficulties

Yet one must admit that Beethoven here, as in the finale of the Ninth Symphony and in the last quartets, often fails to express completely the inexpressible. His deafness and his many misfortunes had isolated him. His utterance is that of a man beyond and above ordinary human life. It comes to us with a curious unearthly quality, through media of expression often inadequate. One must strain every nerve to comprehend.

Even the best performers are almost baffled by the technical difficulties. The listener must often recreate imperfectly Beethoven's vision from the imperfect revelation. He wrote with ideal, not actual performers in mind.

One hopes for more frequent performances of the "Missa Solemnis" in future. Like all supreme masterpieces it has something to give the listener which no other work can offer.

Tonight the Boston Symphony will play the first three symphonies of Beethoven, with Mr Koussevitzky conducting, in continuation of the Festival.

P. R.

Mass in D Opens Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened its Beethoven Centenary Festival last night in Symphony Hall with a performance of the Mass in D, in which it was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club; the Radcliffe Choral Society; Olive Marshall, soprano; Jeanne Gordon, contralto; Tudor Davies, tenor; Arthur Middleton, bass; John P. Marshall, organist.

It was the third performance of the Mass in D to be given in Boston, and the first since the opening of Symphony Hall in 1900. The tremendous difficulties of the work are sufficient to account for this long neglect. The more credit to all concerned in this presentation, which was made possible by the labors of Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth in raising the Cambridge choruses from the status of dispensers of sweetmeats to that of musical organizations.

The literature on the Mass in D is even longer than the work itself. A great deal has been written about [illegible] transcendental signi-

PERFORM MASS BY BEETHOVEN

Symphony Orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe Clubs Join in Music

IS OPENING OF GREAT FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and these solo singers: Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton, gave a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D last night in Symphony hall. This was the first concert of the Beethoven festival. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The glee club had been trained by Dr. Davison; the choral society by G. Wallace Woodworth. John P. Marshall was the organist.

This Mass known to many as the Missa Solemnis (or "Missa Solennis") has led certain commentators to write in the Corinthian manner; to indulge in hifalutin. We are told that the music provides us "with a genuine release into the infinite." The same writer asks: "Does it not tap the mysterious reservoir of the beautiful?"

"One forgets the physical nature of his surroundings,"—i.e. in Symphony hall the statues of gods and goddesses, satyrs, dancing fauns—"and is immersed in an ecstatic contemplation of divine verities"; although Count Keyserling is said to phrase it somewhat better: as "the opening of the consciousness to the influences which are awaiting liberation in the innermost depths of the soul, which, when liberated, connect the spirit directly with God."

There are others, as Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who insist that the later works of Beethoven were inspired by his strong, abiding deep faith in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church; but Beethoven, though he was baptized a Catholic and died a Catholic, was negligent in his religious duties during his life and was profoundly impressed by Hindu and Egyptian religious thought. Even Dr. Hermann Deiters, a devout Roman Catholic churchman, in his long analysis of the Mass, points out the departure of the music from some of the dogmas as well as the rubrics of the church.

As a matter of fact Beethoven wrote the Mass for the installation of his friend and patron the Archduke Rudolph as Archbishop of Olmuetz. The Mass was not completed in time for the ceremony. The circumstances attending the dedication and publication of the work were wordly, commercial, unworthy the dignity of the composer. By the time a portion of the Mass was publicly performed in a theatre as "Three Grand Hymns" (1824), the Mass had grown to such huge proportions, the technical difficulties of performance were so great, that it was not for the church service.

Beethoven was undoubtedly and chiefly inspired in the composition by the poetic and dramatic elements of the text. It might here be said that after the first performance of the "Three Hymns," he was bitterly disappointed at the smallness of the receipts and accused his friends of having cheated him at the box-office. It is wiser to say, with Mr. Paul Bekker, that this extraordinary Mass was a "logical pursuance of the paths struck out in the symphonies . . . the summary of Beethoven's world philosophy." One need not say with this German writer that the symphonies express "the struggles of man towards self-realization."

It has been said that the Kyrie and the Gloria are the only movements that are suitable for ecclesiastical use. Surely the "Agnus Dei" with its dramatic interruption, with its "alarums without," the wild appeal for peace, is not for the church; the same might be said of the colossal "Credo" and the "Benedictus"; yet in the movements just named are the most emotional and impressive pages. It was in the dramatic portions of the text that Beethoven rose to sublime height, to so loftly a flight that singers of earth could not follow him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 23 1927

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Boston Beethoven Festival Opens Extensive Program With the 'Missa Solemnis'

BOSTON has reminded us of its high musical traditions by inaugurating the most ambitious celebration of the centenary of Beethoven's death to be held on this side of the Atlantic. Throughout Occidental civilization the event is being observed in some degree wherever high-type music is known. During the coming week the special Beethoven programs of the New York Philharmonic in New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and the Beethoven Association in New York will be reviewed in these columns. Memorial exercises arranged by the Beethoven Week Association will be held at Town Hall under the auspices of a distinguished committee headed by George Eastman of Rochester on Friday.

Olga Samaroff

Two official representatives of the United States Government, Karl Engel, head of the music division of the Library of Congress in Washington, and the noted musicologist, Oscar Sonneck, are in Vienna taking part in the elaborate international celebration held there this week under the auspices of the Austrian Government.

The Friends of Music of New York ushered in this Beethoven year in October with a superb performance of the "Missa Solemnis," the Metropolitan Opera has contributed a fine revival of "Fidelio," Toscanini directed an unforgettable performance of the Ninth Symphony, the London String Quartet has played the entire set of string quartets and the Grosse Fuge, and Katherine Bacon has played the thirty-two piano sonatas. But the Boston Symphony offers the most comprehensive general program of all in holding a festival from March 22 to 29, inclusive, during which the "Missa Solemnis" and all nine symphonies are announced.

In addition the B flat trio will be played by Harold Samuel, James Levey and Warwick Evans. Harold Samuel will play the Piano Sonata Opus 110 and the London String Quartet will play the E minor quartet Opus 59 on March 24. On March 28 Ernest Newman of London will deliver an address, S. Foster Damon will read an ode and the Lenox String Quartet will play the Opus 135.

THE magnitude of this undertaking impelled me to leave Gotham uncriticized—so far as I am concerned—for twenty-four hours and witness the inauguration of the Boston Festival in last night's performance of the colossal "Missa Solemnis."

Paul Bekker writes of this extraordinary work: "Beethoven tears down the walls that divide the church from the world. His church extends as far as his eye can reach. He builds his altar in the center of the world. He tolerates no dogmatic boundaries. 'From the heart—may it reach the heart,' wrote Beethoven of the Kyrie. Herewith he designated the audience he wishes to address: Those whose hearts can receive what his own has felt."

Stony would be the heart that gave no response to the spiritual fervor of the Kyrie and the Gloria of the "Missa Solemnis"—dead the esthetic perceptions which failed to recognize the unearthly beauty of the Benedictus. The "Missa Solemnis" of Beethoven, the B minor mass of Bach, the St. Matthew and St. John Passions of Bach—these are towering peaks in musical literature which reach into other worldly regions hidden from most mortals by the clouds—there where only genius and religious exaltation of the highest type penetrate and form their conceptions of the mysteries of the universe.

A highly interesting feature of last night's performance in Boston was the participation of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Their respective conductors, A. T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, who had trained them in their difficult task, received an ovation at the end of the performance when Mr. Koussewitzky brought them forward to share the applause.

THE fact in itself that young Americans of both sexes can take part in such performances during their college life and do it as well as they did is enormously significant for our cultural life. Barring one moment of notice- uncertainty and an occasional lapse of intonation [illegible] tessitura, the youthful chorus was surprisingly effective and sang with evident understanding. As a matter of fact, it was considerably more effective than the quartet of soloists—Miss Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton—which formed the weakest part of the performance.

Miss Marshall labored earnestly with the difficult soprano part, but as the evening wore on her voice showed the strain due to the prevailingly high register. Jeanne Gordon's rich voice was curiously ineffective. I may be entirely mistaken, but I had the impression she was not very familiar with the music and was afraid to let herself [illegible] Tudor Davies was apparently at ho[illegible] in the tenor part and was the m[illegible] effective of the solo singers. Arth[illegible] Middleton sang with expressiveness, b[illegible] without achieving any very outstandi[illegible] impressiveness.

Mr. Koussewitzky was evidently hea[illegible] and soul in a performance which gav[illegible] me the impression that preoccupatio[illegible] with substance was still too strong t[illegible] admit of a free soaring of the spirit[illegible] Beethoven is himself largely to blame[illegible] for the fact that only the most excep[illegible]tional gifts and circumstances produce a performance that is not earthbound by the sheer weight of the difficulties with which the performers have to contend.

The fingers of one hand are too many to count the great renditions of the "Missa Solemnis" I can remember among many performances I have heard. But the one last night—as indeed the whole plan of the Beethoven Festival—is greatly to the credit of Mr. Koussewitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the City of Boston itself. Symphony Hall held a large and reverent audience.

given. Mr. Burgin played most musically the violin solo in the "Benedictus."

Miss Austral was prevented by a severe cold from taking the solo soprano part. Miss Marshall, who had sung the music in New York; replaced her at short notice. While all the soloists strove valiantly with the difficulties that over a century ago drove to desparation the first quartet—and Mmes. Sontag and Unger were famous for musicianship and vocal skill—it must be said that last night the two men were much more satisfactory in solo work than were their sisters in art; nor in ensemble was there always a just balance.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with a care, an appreciation of text and music, an enthusiasm beyond all praise. His interpretation of the mighty work was an inspiration.

Would it be irreverent to say that this mass as a whole is not a sacred opus, but an ecclesiatstical opera?

There was a great and deeply interested audience. The Mass will be heard next Sunday for the benefit of the pen-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
MAR 23 1927

Symphony Gives Beethoven Concert

Boston, Mar. 23 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, last night gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 150th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony, and in the chapel the Tufts String Quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

PERFORM MASS BY BEETHOVEN

Symphony Orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe Clubs Join in Music

HER MAR 23

IS OPENING OF GREAT FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and these solo singers: Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton, gave a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D last night in Symphony hall. This was the first concert of the Beethoven festival. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The glee club had been trained by Dr. Davison; the choral society by G. Wallace Woodworth. John P. Marshall was the organist.

This Mass known to many as the Missa Solemnis (or "Missa Solennis") has led certain commentators to write in the Corinthian manner; to indulge in hifalutin. We are told that the music provides us "with a genuine release into the infinite." The same writer asks: "Does it not tap the mysterious reservoir of the beautiful?"

"One forgets the physical nature of his surroundings,"—i.e. in Symphony hall the statues of gods and goddesses, satyrs, dancing fauns—"and is immersed in an ecstatic contemplation of divine verities"; although Count Keyserling is said to phrase it somewhat better: as "the opening of the consciousness to the influences which are awaiting liberation in the innermost depths of the soul, which, when liberated, connect the spirit directly with God."

There are others, as Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who insist that the later works of Beethoven were inspired by his strong, abiding deep faith in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church; but Beethoven, though he was baptized a Catholic and died a Catholic, was negligent in his religious duties during his life and was profoundly impressed by Hindu and Egyptian religious thought. Even Dr. Hermann Deiters, a devout Roman Catholic churchman, in his long analysis of the Mass, points out the departure of the music from some of the dogmas as well as the rubrics of the church.

As a matter of fact Beethoven wrote the Mass for the installation of his friend and patron the Archduke Rudolph as Archbishop of Olmuetz. The Mass was not completed in time for the ceremony. The circumstances attending the dedication and publication of the work were wordly, commercial, unworthy the dignity of the composer. By the time a portion of the Mass was publicly performed in a theatre as "Three Grand Hymns" (1824), the Mass had grown to such huge proportions, the technical difficulties of performance were so great, that it was not for the church service.

Beethoven was undoubtedly and chiefly inspired in the composition by the poetic and dramatic elements of the text. It might here be said that after the first performance of the "Three Hymns," he was bitterly disappointed at the smallness of the receipts and accused his friends of having cheated him at the box-office. It is wiser to say, with Mr. Paul Bekker, that this extraordinary Mass was a "logical pursuance of the paths struck out in the symphonies . . . the summary of Beethoven's world philosophy." One need not say with this German writer that the symphonies express "the struggles of man towards self-realization."

It has been said that the Kyrie and the Gloria are the only movements that are suitable for ecclesiastical use. Surely the "Agnus Dei" with its dramatic interruption, with its "alarums without," the wild appeal for peace, is not for the church; the same might be said of the colossal "Credo" and the "Benedictus"; yet in the movements just named are the most emotional and impressive pages. It was in the dramatic portions of the text that Beethoven rose to sublime height, to so loftly a flight that singers of earth could not follow him.

Even if they were superhuman, with trumpet voices, they could not prevent many purely scholastic pages from being prosaic, without spiritual significance, without religious emotion. Witness many interminable frugal pages, with endless repetitions, pages in which, as they are written without respect for natural limitations of the voice, must be shrieked; they cannot be sung; and so the effect is one of infinite labor and vain endeavor, not an uplifting of the hearer's soul. Beethoven once said that ecclesiastical music should be for voices alone; he named Palestrina as the great master; but in this Mass among the most beautiful portions of the work are the orchestral introduction to the "Sanctus" and the orchestral prelude to the "Benedictus." They invoke a mood that is not sustained afterwards by the voices; and it is a question whether the orchestral accompaniment to the text. "Et incarnatus est," is not of a finer inspiration than the music for the reciters of the text.

The performance last night reflected great credit on the chorus, admirably prepared by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. These singers well-nigh accomplished the impossible. There was rich tonal sonority, there was an intelligent regard for nuances; there was no faltering even when the burden put upon these unprofessional men and women was almost insupportable. The orchestra was, it is needless to say, eloquent whenever the opportunity was

"MISSA SOLEMNIS" AT SYMPHONY HALL

Mar 23

Beethoven Festival Begun by Choral Concert

Boston Globe

The Beethoven Festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in honor of the centenary of the composer's death began last night in Symphony Hall with a performance of his great "Missa Solemnis," in D major, opus 123. The orchestra had the cooperation of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by Dr A. T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

The assisting soloists were; Olive Marshall, soprano; Jeanne Gordon, contralto, Tudor Davies, tenor; and Arthur Middleton, bass. The hall had been sold out many weeks in advance. The great audience listened with reverent attention. At the end there was an ovation for Mr Koussevitzky, Dr Davison, and Mr Woodworth.

In the next seven days all nine of Beethoven's symphonies are to be performed. There is also to be a program of his chamber music and a program including an address by the noted English critic, Ernest Newman, and an ode written for the occasion by S. Foster Damon of Cambridge.

The "Missa Solemnis" will be repeated next Sunday for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members of the Boston Symphony. No city in the entire musical world is paying in this week oi commemoration a greater tribute to Beethoven than this Boston Festival.

Five Years to Write

The "Missa Solemnis" took Beethoven five years to write. It is his most austere and noble work, on a grand scale, and exacting so much of both performers and listeners that for an acknowledged masterpiece it is seldom heard. There have been but two previous performances in Boston, by the Cecilia Society in 1897 and at the dedication of Symphony Hall in 1900. To the majority of last night's audience it was unfamiliar.

The performance reflects great credit on all concerned, especially when the almost insuperable vocal difficulties of the work are considered. It is astonishing that a chorus composed of college students should have sung with such musical understanding and so great perfection of technique. The four soloists were adequate for their rather thankless task. Mr Koussevitzky gave his best energies without stint. One might cavil at some details especially of tempi, but the dramatic energy, the imaginative force of his reading was incontestable.

Beethoven wrote at one point in the original manuscript of the "Missa Solemnis" a wish that "what has come from the heart may reach the heart." A listener hearing this music for the first time cannot mistake its utter agonizing sincerity.

This is no mere liturgical music, it is the expression of the emotion at the heart of all religions. Awe, even terror as well as hope and joy are in it. There is no music more sublime than the Credo and the Agnus Dei of the "Missa Solemnis."

Technical Difficulties

Yet one must admit that Beethoven here, as in the finale of the Ninth Symphony and in the last quartets, often fails to express completely the inexpressible. His deafness and his many misfortunes had isolated him. His utterance is that of a man beyond and above ordinary human life. It comes to us with a curious unearthly quality, through media of expression often inadequate. One must strain every nerve to comprehend.

Even the best performers are almost baffled by the technical difficulties. The listener must often recreate imperfectly Beethoven's vision from the imperfect revelation. He wrote with ideal, not actual performers in mind.

One hopes for more frequent performances of the "Missa Solemnis" in future. Like all supreme masterpieces it has something to give the listener which no other work can offer.

Tonight the Boston Symphony will play the first three symphonies of Beethoven, with Mr Koussevitzky conducting, in continuation of the Festival.

P. R.

Mass in D Opens Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened its Beethoven Centenary Festival last night in Symphony Hall with a performance of the Mass in D, in which it was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club; the Radcliffe Choral Society; Olive Marshall, soprano; Jeanne Gordon, contralto; Tudor Davies, tenor; Arthur Middleton, bass; John P. Marshall, organist.

MONITOR

It was the third performance of the Mass in D to be given in Boston, and the first since the opening of Symphony Hall in 1900. The tremendous difficulties of the work are sufficient to account for this long neglect. The more credit to all concerned in this presentation, which was made possible by the labors of Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth in raising the Cambridge choruses from the status of dispensers of sweetmeats to that of musical organizations.

MAR 23

The literature on the Mass in D is even longer than the work itself. A great deal has been written about [illegible] transcendental signi- [illegible] him [illegible] ficance, its expression of the inexpressible. Music generally, of course, expresses that which cannot be said, or cannot be so well said, in words. It can be emotional, descriptive, dramatic. Beyond that, it has a speech, a logic, a range of thought, purely its own. But to what extent can it be said to express abstract concepts? How far is the discovery of such meaning in music subjective? These are profound questions.

Beethoven was deeply religious. But this religion was very personal, and he was influenced by widely divergent creeds. The Mass in D, though it employs the liturgical text, voices his individual devotional fervor. Where it is emotional, as in the orchestral passages, or dramatic, as in the "Dona," it is most impressive. Who shall say whether it has a religious import? Perhaps it is best to regard it as music. As such, it stirs admiration.

The performance last night was dramatic to a degree. Mr. Koussevitzky rode the whirlwind as complete master. The achievement of the choruses was astonishing. How fortunate are the orchestra and the public to have the services of these young men and women, with their fresh voices, their thorough training, their eager responsiveness, their vitality, to sing these incredibly difficult measures. No lagging for them; if they sometimes anticipated the conductor by the fraction of a beat, it was because they were straining at the bit. The soloists deserve praise for their accomplishment of a task calculated to awe the hardiest. The orchestra did its part with its accustomed virtuosity and Mr. Burgin played the solo passages with fine taste.

The Mass will be repeated Sunday for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Tonight the first three symphonies will be played.

124

[illegible] THIRTY-SIX [illegible]

H N[illegible]

[illegible] FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and these solo singers: Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton, gave a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D last night in Symphony hall. This was the first concert of the Beethoven festival. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The glee club had been trained by Dr. Davison; the choral society by G. Wallace Woodworth. John P. Marshall was the organist.

This Mass known to many as the Missa Solemnis (or "Missa Solennis") has led certain commentators to write in the Corinthian manner; to indulge in hifalutin. We are told that the music provides us "with a genuine release into the infinite." The same writer asks: "Does it not tap the mysterious reservoir of the beautiful?"

"One forgets the physical nature of his surroundings,"—i.e. in Symphony hall the statues of gods and goddesses, satyrs, dancing fauns—"and is immersed in an ecstatic contemplation of divine verities"; although Count Keyserling is said to phrase it somewhat better: as "the opening of the consciousness to the influences which are awaiting liberation in the innermost depths of the soul, which, when liberated, connect the spirit directly with God."

There are others, as Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who insist that the later works of Beethoven were inspired by his strong, abiding deep faith in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church; but Beethoven, though he was baptized a Catholic and died a Catholic, was negligent in his religious duties during his life and was profoundly impressed by Hindu and Egyptian religious thought. Even Dr. Hermann Deiters, a devout Roman Catholic churchman, in his long analysis of the Mass, points out the departure of the music from some of the dogmas as well as the rubrics of the church.

As a matter of fact Beethoven wrote the Mass for the installation of his friend and patron the Archduke Rudolph as Archbishop of Olmuetz. The Mass was not completed in time for the ceremony. The circumstances attending the dedication and publication of the work were wordly, commercial, unworthy the dignity of the composer. By the time a portion of the Mass was publicly performed in a theatre as "Three Grand Hymns" (1824), the Mass had grown to such huge proportions, the technical difficulties of performance were so great, that it was not for the church service.

Beethoven was undoubtedly and chiefly inspired in the composition by the poetic and dramatic elements of the text. It might here be said that after the first performance of the "Three Hymns," he was bitterly disappointed at the smallness of the receipts and accused his friends of having cheated him at the box-office. It is wiser to say, with Mr. Paul Bekker, that this extraordinary Mass was a "logical pursuance of the paths struck out in the symphonies . . . the summary of Beethoven's world philosophy." One need not say with this German writer that the symphonies express "the struggles of man towards self-realization."

It has been said that the Kyrie and the Gloria are the only movements that are suitable for ecclesiastical use. Surely the "Agnus Dei" with its dramatic interruption, with its "alarums without," the wild appeal for peace, is not for the church; the same might be said of the colossal "Credo" and the "Benedictus"; yet in the movements just named are the most emotional and impressive pages. It was in the dramatic portions of the text that Beethoven rose to sublime height, to so loftly a flight that singers of earth could

SYMPHONY'S BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

POST MAR 27

"Solemn Mass" Given With Harvard and Radcliffe Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Unheard in Boston since the opening of Symphony Hall 26 years ago, Beethoven's "Solemn Mass" in D made last evening appropriate beginning to the eight-day Festival in which the Symphony Orchestra commemorates the centenary of the composer's death.

CHORUS OF 350 VOICES

From Harvard and Radcliffe came the chorus, 350 strong, to wrestle with and, as it proved, to triumph over one of the most formidable tasks that may confront a body of singers. As performers of Beethoven's taxing parts for the solo quartet Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton were likewise heroic in endeavor and also generally successful in accomplishment, while the orchestra gave abundant indication of its eagerness to comply with Mr. Koussevitzky's recent exhortation to make these centenary concerts its crowning achievement.

Not yet has the world of music as a whole come to an agreement as to the actual and relative merits of Beethoven's Mass, a work, by the way, not so much music for the church-service as a dramatic cantata based on the text of the ritual.

Favorite of Composer

The composer himself esteemed the piece above all else that he wrote, and certain commentators have supported that judgment, but others have found the piece uneven, ranging from utter dullness to sheer sublimity.

Since these latter are overwhelmingly in the majority the present reviewer may safely take his stand with them, freely acknowledging the solemn beauty of the Kyrie, the thrilling exultation of the Gloria, the unearthly beauty of much of the Benedictus with its ecstatic orchestral prelude, and the rare dramatic force of that celebrated and uncanonical page in the Agnus Dei wherein military music accompanies the passionate supplications for peace. As for the rest, it might and it might not gain in significance and appeal upon long and deep acquaintance, but for the present the impressiveness of the passages mentioned was sufficient reward for an evening of music that taxes every listening faculty.

Cheered by Audience

For making possible a performance of this Mass, deserving of at least an occasional hearing in every capital of music, Mr. Koussevitzky as leader in the deed and Dr. Davison of the Harvard Glee Club and Mr. Woodworth of the Radcliffe Choral Society as associates are equally to be congratulated.

With reason did last evening's huge audience cheer when at the end of the concert the conductor led his two colleagues to the front of the stage. And all concerned may take pride in the fact that last evening the chorus sang with apparent ease, with beauty of tone, with precision of attack and above all with a noble and fervent spirit, music whose supposedly superhuman difficulty has long been a byword.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 23 1927

Boston Symphony Gives Beethoven Centenary Concert

First of a Series of Seven Observing Anniversary Presented

Boston, March 22.—(AP.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, tonight gave the first of a series of seven concerts marking the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies will be performed.

The Missa Solennis was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music Hall. The opening of Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Missa Solennis.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon, marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts College in Medford will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the Tufts String Quartet will play the slow movement of Beethoven's Quartet in E Minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
MAR 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS BEETHOVEN

First of a Series of Seven Concerts Given on Composer's Work.

BOSTON, March [illegible] (AP) [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] the direction of Se[illegible] its regular [illegible] the first of a series of seven concert[illegible] marking the 100th anniversary o[illegible] the death of Beethoven. All of the composer's nine symphonies were performed.

The Messa Solenne was chosen for the first concert, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society assisting after a course of training under Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. They will also assist in the performance of the ninth symphony.

In the first season of the orchestra, 1881-82, all the nine symphonies were given in the old Music hall. The opening of the Symphony Hall was marked by a performance of the Messa Solenne.

On Saturday next, at the hour late in the afternoon marking the exact centenary of Beethoven's death, the chimes of Tufts college, in Medford, will sound the choral melody of his ninth symphony and in the chapel the slow movement of Beethoven's the slow movement of Beethove's quartet in E minor. The orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music will mark the centenary with a concert of Beethoven's works on Friday evening.

Ernest Newman, London music critic, will deliver the principal address at a Beethoven memorial meeting in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

CONTINUOUS BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Symphony Plays First, Second, and Third of the Nine

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Continuing the Beethoven Centenary Festival begun Tuesday with a performance of the "Missa Soiemnis," the Symphony Orchestra played last evening at Symphony Hall the masters, First, Second and Third Symphonies, to be followed at intervals during the week by the remainder of the immortal Nine.

GRADES FORCES ON STAGE

Were a symphony concert in regular course to offer the three symphonies of last evening, two of which are admittedly not Beethoven at his symphonic best, there might be grumblings and protest. Yet last evening the programme attracted an audience that all but filled the hall, and whether because of the sentiment of the occasion or of the surpassing excellence of the performances, the concert proved not a wearying, but decidedly an enjoyable and stimulating occasion.

For one thing, Mr. Koussevitzky, with rare tact and ingenuity, graded his orchestral forces in acordance with the chronology and style of the three compositions, performing the Mozartean First Symphony with an orchestra of 50 (37 strings, 13 wind instruments and kettle-drums), adding for the riper but still stylistically immature second 10 strings more, and bringing to the performance of the "Eroica" the full string choir and a double complement of wind.

A Delight to Hear

Heard from this small band and in a beautifully moulded and perspicuous performance the Frst Symphony was a delight to hear, the wind instruments taking on an individuality, color and sonority impossible [illegible] the usual conditions.

The Second Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky had never before led here, and it is to be hoped that his and the orchestra's exceedingly sympathetic performance of this truly charming work will soon be repeated. Mr. Koussevitzky's "Eroica" is, of course, an old story by this time, yet one of which the listener may not tire.

Restores Its Vitality

A fortunate circumstance, indeed, that the Beethoven Centenary should have come when the Boston Symphony Orchestra is led by a conductor so happy in his interpretations of Beethoven as is Mr. Koussevitzky. Without recourse to tricks or distortions he sweeps aside all fettering traditions and permits the music to shine forth as fresh and vital as on the day when it left the composers hands. Mr. Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the true Beethoven, in which the romantic and classic elements have become one and inseparable, a Beethoven that, at least from the "Eroica" onward, is in no sense "dated," but still a living force in music, in or out of a Centenary Festival.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Tonight, the third concert of the Beethoven Centenary Festival will take place in Symphony Hall. The program will be made up of chamber music: Beethoven's Piano Trio, B flat, op. 97 (Messrs. Samuel, Levey and Evans.) Piano sonata, A flat, op. 110 (Harold Samuel). String quartet, E minor, op. 59, No. 2 (The London String Quartet —Messrs. Levey, Petre, Warner and Evans).

The Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be in Beethoven's honor. Friday: Symphonies No. 4 and 5; Saturday, Nos. 6 ("Pastoral") and 7. Then on Sunday comes the repetition of the great Mass in D, for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

HER

No wonder that the Mass in D is seldom performed, so great are its difficulties. Probably one will not again hear in Boston so satisfactory a choral performance as that given by the Harvard Glee Club and the young ladies of Radcliffe.

MAR 24

No doubt one would be stoned in the market place for daring to ask if this Mass is great from beginning to end; for insinuating in the mildest, most timid, hesitating manner, that there are dreary stretches, pages of interest only to the pedagogue and the student of fugue and counterpoint. Take Beethoven's treatment of the section in the "Credo" relating to the crucifixion. Was not the theme too great for even him? As regards religious emotion aroused by music for the Passion, are not pages by the old Italians and the Spaniards more impressive, more devout? Yet one would have thought that Beethoven for this subject would have surpassed all others. He was right when he said that the purest music for the church should be for voices unsupported by orchestra or organ.

Nor need truly "religious" music depend on a sacred text. There is purely instrumental music that expresses the uplifting of the soul, that brings the peace that passeth all understanding. Perhaps no one today would go so far as Sir Thomas Browne: "For even that vulgar and tavern-music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion and a profound contemplation of the first composer. There is something in it of divinity more than the ear discovers; it is an hieroglyphical and shadowed lesson of the whole world, and creatures of God—such a melody to the ear, as the whole world, well-understood, would afford the understanding. In brief, it is a sensible fit of that harmony which intellectually sounds in the ears of God."

There are chorale preludes by Bach written for the organ that are more "religious" in feeling and expression than many pages of his "Passion According to Matthew" or "Passion According to John." The three chorales for the organ by Cesar Franck are more profoundly charged with religious emotion than many pages of his "Beatitudes." No, music is not necessarily "religious" because it is wedded to a Biblical text. There are slow movements in Beethoven's quartets and symphonies that equal, if not surpass, his noblest thoughts in the great mass.

Mr. Ernest Newman, who will deliver an address on Beethoven next Monday night, was born at Liverpool in 1868. It is said that his original intention was to enter the Indian civil service, but ill-health led him into business at his birthplace. He taught music at Midland Institute, Birmingham, in 1903-05. In the latter year he became the music critic for the Manchester Guardian. Since that time he has been known and highly valued as one of the leading European critics. He was, in turn, the critic for the Birmingham Post (1906-19); the Observer (London), 1920; and early in 1920 for the Sunday Times (London), a position that he now adorns. It will be remembered that when the late Henry T. Finck withdrew from the New York Evening [illegible]

Newman came to New York as "guest" critic for that journal. His brilliant articles were a feature of New York musical life that season.

He has written books of great interest and value: "Gluck and the Opera," "Hugo Wolf," "Richard Strauss," "Wagner as Man and Artist," "A Musical Motley" (a collection of delightful essays), "A Musician's Holiday," besides other books. He is also known as a translator and editor of books by other men about music, and as a writer on general subjects. His introduction to a recent reprint of Chorley's "Thirty Years' Recollections" is in itself a study of criticism in the field of music. Deeply read in literature other than that of music, he has a thorough acquaintance with music of all periods and schools. His writings are characterized by independence of opinion, clearness and force in expression, and a wit that sparkles, and, when it is necessary, bites.

Many will welcome the appearance of that admirable violoncellist, Mr. Bedetti, as a solo player at the Symphony concerts next week. He has chosen Lalo's concerto which has not been heard at these concerts for nearly 10 years.

MONDAY Beethoven Festival

The Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, ga[illegible] the second concert of its Beethov[illegible] Centenary Festival in Symphony Hall last night, presenting the first three symphonies. The audie[illegible] though not so large as that draw[illegible] the Mass in D, was even more a[illegible] ciative, applauding so long and h[illegible] ily that the conductor bade the [illegible] to rise after each of the symphon[illegible]

The enthusiasm was thoroughly justified. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations were those of a scholar and an artist bent on paying homage to a great composer. The men in responding to his demands surpassed even their own high standard of performance, as he had exhorted them to do in beginning rehearsals for this festival. Surely these symphonies lived last night as their composer conceived them and as he probably never heard them realized. It would indeed be a caviling reviewer who should try to detect flaws in so incandescent a performance.

The hearing of these three symphonies in a single concert served to brush away several cobwebs. In the first place, it became evident that the composer of the first two symphonies was distinctly Beethoven, and not Haydn or Mozart. Though the influence of the forerunners was as apparent as ever, it was equally clear that nobody but Beethoven could have been the author of the third movement of the First, labeled a Menuetto but really a Scherzo; or of the first movement of the Second. It was also apparent that the Second, if less ingratiating, marks a definite advance over the First, though the step is not so wide as that which carries on to the Third.

For the First, Mr. Koussevitzky had cut down his forces to the orchestra for which the work was written, giving the balance suitable to the composer's ideas. For the Second, he had added to it until the number of instruments was adequate to the presentation of Beethoven's new concepts. For the Third, of course, he used a full orchestra. His instrumentation throughout was thus adapted to the progressive course of his interpretations.

This, however, was merely the preparation of the tools. The work proper was the exposition of the composer's growth, as it were, at first hand. For each of the works in turn was made to sound as if it had just been written, and not as if it were a document to be exhibited on state occasions. The audience was made to feel for itself the effect of the first performances on contemporaries; the growth of the composer's musical stature between the First and Second Symphonies; the naturalness, indeed the inevitableness, of the majesty of the Third—not a leap from one world to another, but the flowering of a plant in whose nurture the listeners had assisted. Without question, this is the way to make manifest the great[illegible]ess of the composer. Fortunat[illegible]ton, fortunate is Beethoven [illegible]rtunat[illegible]music, to have [illegible]ch a conductor and such an orchestra for such an occasion. L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y
MAR 24 1927

Other Music

First Three Symphonies at Beethoven Festival

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 24.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave the second concert of its Beethoven Centenary Festival to an unusually enthusiastic audience which filled Symphony Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the First, Second and Third symphonies.

Those who favor the type of "symphony concert" containing no symphony, which Leopold Stokowski so frequently conducts in Philadelphia and New York and which Mr. Kou[illegible] seldom offered his audiences here, claim that a miscellany of novel short numbers is less taxing to the listener than the orthodox program including a familiar standard symphony.

The behavior of last night's audience would refute them. The applause was enthusiastic. The audience obviously was having a better time during the music than the Friday afternoon subscribers to the regular Boston Symphony series. There was no coughing, no listless rustling of leaves, nor was any woman observed to put her hat on during the finale of the last number. Every one stayed until the end, though the length of the concert was somewhat more than two hours.

PERHAPS the saying "Good music is familiar music," which is a stock text of lecturers on musical appreciation, applies not merely to the musically illiterate, but also to those who have acquired at least a vicarious musical culture by subscribing to a series of costly and fashionable orchestral concerts.

Let us have bigger and better programs. There are times when symphony concerts seem on the verge of becoming an inverted and much abbreviated version of such series as the Boston "Pops," with the emphasis on unfamiliar instead of on familiar trifles.

The stock saying about the first three Beethoven symphonies is, of course, that the first two are in an early and very inferior "first style," while the "Eroica" is a fine specimen of the composer's great "middle period."

Hearing the three symphonies in succession one wondered heretically why Lense and other revered authorities have limited Beethoven "styles" to three only, when he so clearly had a different style for every work. The First and Second symphonies are really fully as distinct from each other as they are from the Third. Nor do the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth seem exactly in the same style as "Eroica," though they were composed in the same "middle period."

IS NOT the true explanation of the difference between the "Eroica" and the two earlier works simply that in the latter Beethoven was deliberately trying to write something conventional and correct enough to secure publication, or, failing that, at least performance? By the time he wrote "Eroica" he had decided to let the originality, the highly personal and, for his day, shocking imagination which he had held in leash in the earlier works manifest itself fully. To any attentive listener this originality is plainly enough foreshadowed in the earlier symphonies, especially in the Second.

Beethoven's respectable musical contemporaries and elders felt the audacity of the First and second symphonies. The latter drove a Paris critic in 1810 to the remark, quoted in Philip Hale's incomparable program notes, that "the composer seems to see doves and crocodiles shut up together." Today one hears the dove plainly enough in the Second symphony, but the crocodile must be sought with the ears of faith, or rather of imagination.

Mr. Koussevitzky's readings of the three symphonies were highly personal and vividly imagined. His tempo was extraordinarily slow in slow movements. He exaggerated, as he so often does, his soft and loud passages, but the concert was never dull, never degenerated into the prosy correctness devoid of inspiration, which Beethoven himself detested above all things.

PERCIVAL ROBERTS.

2ND CONCERT OF BEETHOVEN FETE

Orchestra Plays First Three Symphonies by Great Composer

LARGE AUDIENCE IS APPRECIATIVE

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, gave the second concert of the Beethoven centenary festival last evening in Symphony hall. The program comprised Beethoven's first, second and third symphonies.

Strange to say, the first symphony seemed fresher, more spontaneous, more musical than the second. Played by a small orchestra and beautifully phrased, it led one to believe that certain symphonies by Haydn and Mozart would be greatly benefited if the strings were in like manner reduced and there were no doubling of the wind instruments. Every detail in the first symphony was clearly brought out without undue stress. There was a delightful sense of [illegible]portion, perfect euphony. Mr. Kousmanner; he remembered the year of its birth and rejoiced in the innocence of the child.

It matters not whether some have been able to find hints in this symphony of the master who was to be; whether others have noted the influence of Mozart or of Haydn; nor is it necessary to discuss the question whether Mozart if he had lived would have written in Beethoven's manner. He probably would have remained Mozart, the incomparable, but in the way indicated by his last great symphonies and "The Magic Flute." Speculation of this nature is a harmless amusement. Would Bizet have given to the world a worthy successor to "Carmen"? Would Debussy have written an opera in a broader, more virile style than "Pelleas and Melisande," or would he, as it seemed to his warmest admirers, be satisfied with imitating Debussy? Would Schubert have gained in conciseness and vigor, if he had lived to pursue the studies he planned?

With the exception of the second movement of the second symphony, the work as a whole seemed last night inferior, in interest at least, to the earlier one, though the performance in both cases was admirable in every way. Let us remember that these two symphonies perplexed, disquieted many when the music was first heard. The critics were especially severe in their treatment of the second; some of them found this Symphony in D monstrous; its finale "harsh, savage."

Mr. Koussevitzky's excellent judgment as an interpreter has never been more fully and plainly displayed than in his reading of the three symphonies. He realized first of all that Beethoven was a romanticist. Stendhal pointed out that the "classicist" of today was in his own time a romanticist; hence in his lifetime generally misunderstood, often abused, waiting patiently or impatiently for Time the Avenger to do him justice. Mr. Koussevitzky also realized the fact that Beethoven's music should be played in the romantic manner; that a symphony now respected as a "classic" is not necessarily a smug work to be performed perfunctorily, without fire, without eloquence, without passion. "People talk loosely about this or that dull conductor as one "imbued with the spirit of Beethoven." This being interpreted means that Beethoven is not known by these admirers of dulness. They do not recognize the revolutionary. It would be wiser for them to spend their time conjecturing whether Beethoven had Napoleon in mind when he write the first movement of the "Eroica," Gen. Abercromby killed at the battle of Alexandria when he wrote the Funeral March, and Prometheus when he invented the variations in the Finale.

It would not be surprising if some one hearing an interpretation by Mr. Koussevitzky of a symphony by Beethoven should say, "I do not recognize the music; it seems to me different." For this one was probably accustomed to a falsely traditional interpretation in which mistaken reverence approached obsequiousness. But Beethoven was not a man of staid decorum either in his life or in his music. He was romantic, wildly so at times.

The orchestral performance last night was of the highest order of excellence. The large audience was enthusiastic.

The program tonight is of chamber music: Beethoven's Piano Trio in B flat major, op. 57 (Messrs. Samuel, Levey and Evans, Piano Sonata in A flat, op. 110 (Mr. Samuel); String, quartet, E. minor, op. 59, No. 2 (The London String Quartet).

d 1)

SYMPHONY ONE; SYMPHONY TWO; SYMPHONY THREE

TRANS-MAR 24

SECOND DAY OF THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

Again a Program of Curiosities — The Composer in the Steps of Mozart, Careful and Pleasing—The Composer in Ferment, and More Than Once a Bore — Then the Leap to "The Eroica," Power, Passion and Poignancy

AS YET the Beethoven Festival is not obtrusively chronological. From the Mass of his later years, for ceremonial beginning on Tuesday, the program returned, on Wednesday, to Symphonies of his younger days. Still, however, it proffered curiosities. Four Symphonies one year, four others the next, are no longer rotating rite at Symphony Hall. Conductors, in this new time prefer to choose among them more miscellaneously. They would wreak themselves upon the rewarding Third, Fifth and Seventh; throw in the pastoral Sixth or the sportive Eighth for contrast; play the Fourth just often enough to remind hearers of its existence. Consequently, the First and, especially, the Second have receded from the repertory to the shelves. Mr. Koussevitzky now resurrected both, allotted fifty men to the one—thirty-odd strings, wood-winds and brass in pairs; for the other added ten voices to the reduced violins. Not until "The Eroica" emerged for climax to the concert, did he utilize the full string choir and, according to custom, double reeds, horns and trumpets.

An audience that filled the cheaper places and left but few gaps in the dearer, heard the three symphonies; seemed in no wise to weary at the repetition of a single form. In fact, it applauded with an amusing impartiality. "The Eroica" passes for a masterpiece; certainly Mr. Koussevitzky brings it to life-giving and epical performance. Yet the merely engaging First and the barely tolerable Second were clapped almost as heartily. Evidently, a miscellaneous responsiveness is the word for a Centenary Festival. Possibly we Bostonians are making a new chapter for the book of etiquette in the concert-hall.

Both the early Symphonies profited by the diminished orchestra. The strings were not too numerous for fleet pace and instant transition; sheer weight did not thicken tone or dull the rhythmic beat; the proportion of the contributing choirs returned to normal; in either Symphony, restored to fluency and transparency, every detail ran clear. So handled, the First sounded rather more Mozartean than Beethoven, anno domini, 1800 and in his thirtieth year, may have intended. To hear the first movement was to hark back to Mozart's "Jupiter;" the matter and the manner of the Andante followed the Mozartean model; the vapid Rondo-Finale was worthy of Wolfgang Amadeus when he had one eye on the clock and the other on a job to finish in short order. The Minuet, already reaching out toward a Scherzo, is unmistakable Beethoven. Possibly his hand, and no other in that Vienna, would have written the striding introductory measures to the Rondo aforesaid. Clearly, when he sets to the Minuet, he has a mind and a pen to innovation and idiosyncrasy. He subordinates the dance-tune: courts young vigors and freedoms; stresses with some courage the contrast with the Trio—plainly the rushing, rough-coated Scherzi of maturity already in germ.

For the remainder of this First Symphony, let the roving ear and the comfortable assurance of retrospect do its utmost and its silliest. In every other measure, if it likes, it can discover a fore-tumbling upon it. As abundant, in this 1803, was Beethoven in means—some by no odds derived from the sanctified models. What of the jumble of the introduction or the measures in F-sharp that stick out of the Trio?

Besides, Beethoven is developing lasting idiosyncrasies. Already he has a taste for rude repetitions in the finale and for an interlude, as it nears the end, of songful measures. There is workmanship as well, free-handed and bold, offending the "best people" of Vienna because it generated what in their ears were uncouth sounds. Dr. Spazier, a reviewer "of sound judgment," spoke for them. To quote the learned "programist," he found this Symphony in D major "a gross monster, a pierced dragon which will not die [evidently the Larghetto], and even in losing its blood in the finale wild with rage, still deals vain but furious blows with his tail, stiffened, by the last agony." Lord forgive us! but, has the good man been hearing the Piano Concerto of Aaron Copland? Certainly some of his descendants did and expressed themselves in variations of the ancestral words. . . . Anyhow, Mr. Koussevitzky exercised a pretty wit when he "pointed up" some of these details, distressful to the good taste of 1803. And wit, as everyone knows, is a pearl of great price among the conductors of music.

So to the "Eroica" and to what ten thousand voices are this week calling "the greater Beethoven." Less than two years separated the Second and this Third Symphony; in the history of music there is no superber leap. Yet there he is, "the greater Beethoven," full-panoplied and unmistakable. Bonaparte or no Bonaparte, epic matter fills the first movement—enough to outlast a dozen Napoleons. The heights and the depths of it still go undiminished, the fires within them still burn white and clear. And with what energy is it generated, conducted, surcharged! Beethoven had achieved his free play of tone; to freedom added precision. At last he had mastered his instrument, each choir, each group, sometimes each voice, as individual element in the meeting and parting ensemble. In directed passion of design, he could not outpour his passion of emotion; marshal it, lofty and grave, to full-fraught issue.

The Adagio of the Funeral March is companion-piece equally staleless. Here goes, for the first time since the days of Bach, the poignancy of instrumental song, so inherent in the music that the commonplace contrast of string and wind choirs seem fresh ned to serve it. The funeral trai draws near, the lament ascends; the trai passes, the mourning voices still. Th surface imaginatively yet incidentally within, the quintessence of the emotio divined and imparted—less in classic au erities than in human accents exalte ven in romantic flow and ebb. Alread Beethoven the seer; but with eyes, as ye searching the hearts rather than th visions, of men.

Upon the heels of this Adagio, th Scherzo fulfilled. A little groping and reaps with Beethoven's energy, rushin stamping, jocund; the song of the Tr sings warm and earthy; impetuously turn the darting measures. The "do tored" minuet of the First Symphony h yielded this quasi-Titanic birth. In lat Symphonies Beethoven was to renew a better it. Then it was to vanish fro symphonic music until Bruckner, of a men, recalled it. For by his earth-bo Scherzi, little less than by his heave sent Adagios, do his Symphonies survi It is years since Boston has heard t least or the greatest of them.

A close that is another flare of epic and heroical energy as though from t first movement and the Funeral Marc the dominating passion had overleapt t Scherzo, to sweep through the Fina From the poignancy of Bach to t poignancy of the Funeral March, fr the Fugued Finale of Mozart's Sy phony to these outflinging and spreading variations of the end "Eroica"—the great line of music vancing, if the hearer chooses; but great line also when genius stands to knot the cord. . . . The time come when Mr. Koussevitzky and conducting are a Bostonian memory,

THREE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONIES HEARD

Koussevitzky Conducts Festival Program

The first three Beethoven symphonies filled the program of the second concert of the series arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in honor of the centenary of the composer's death. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were applauded with exceptional warmth last night by a very large audience. The performances were typical of the best work of players and conductor.

It is customary to lump the first and second symphonies together as early works in the first of Beethoven's often mentioned "three styles," and then to draw a sharp line between them and the "Eroica," in which the composer is said to display for the first time his original genius.

Last night, hearing these three works in succession, one was inclined to doubt the absolute validity of this time-honored distinction.

Even in the First Symphony composed in 1800 there are many foreshadowings of the later Beethoven. The Second, composed in 1802, displays with more boldness the individual style which so startled his contemporaries. When it was first played at Leipzig a reviewer thought the finale "bizarre, harsh and savage." When it was heard for the first time in Paris a reviewer complained that Beethoven seemed to see doves and crocodiles shut up together." Is there not some reason to believe that the opinion of contemporaries may be sounder as to the daring and originality of these symphonies than is that of any later commentator. Beethoven so greatly influenced his successors that every trick of style which could be imitated became within a generation a musical commonplace.

Yet the "Eroica" is unquestionably on a grander scale, and more audacious than its predecessors. The supposition that Beethoven up to his 32d year wrote in the vein of Haydn and Mozart and then within two years completely changed his style of composition implies a wilful, merely intellectual attempt at originality on his part like that of some minor present day composers whose sole aim is to astonish their hearers.

Is not it clear from the music of the first three symphonies that Beethoven's style is from the beginning highly personal and original. In the first two he is holding in, trying to write music not wholly unlike other symphonies, no doubt from the common sense motive of wishing to insure the publication and performance of his works.

In the "Eroica" he decides for once to write to please himself, and deliberately defies the musical conventions of his day. There is an apparently authentic anecdote to the effect that he announced his third symphony as in the surprising key of D sharp, instead of its enharmonic key, E flat. He must have anticipated the bewilderment of all respectable and academic musicians at the violent rhythms and previously unheard dissonances.

Nor could a dedication to Napoleon have been agreeable in 1803 to any but French audiences. That he cancelled the original title page bearing Napoleon's name was due not to any wish to conciliate Conservative opinion, but to Bonaparte's assumption of imperial honors, which disgusted Beethoven's Republican sentiments.

In Vienna in those days, it was as disreputable to be a Republican as it is in present day Boston to favor the Bolsheviki. Imagine the scandal a present day Bostonian composer would cause by dedicating a new work to the memory of Lenin, and you will get an inkling of how Beethoven's Vienna would probably have regarded a dedication to Bonaparte. Is it not clear that the "Eroica" represents not so much a sudden development of Beethoven's genius as a decision to go his own way musically.

Tonight the third concert of the festival brings a program of Beethoven chamber music.

P. R.

3D BEETHOVEN CONCERT HELD

Piano Trio Gives Performance in Symphony Hall

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Beethoven Centenary Festival took place last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven's Piano Trio, B flat major, op. 57 (Messrs. Samuel, Levey and Evans). Piano Sonata, A flat major, op. 110 (Mr. Samuel); String Quartet, E minor, op. 59, No. 2 (The London String Quartet).

Either the players were not advantageously placed on the stage or the piano was dominating; whatever the cause, the performance of the trio was disappointing in spite of the individual excellence of the artists. The violin and the violoncello were often inaudible, and naturally there was a lack of balance. Or have certain composers been justified in their belief that piano and strings cannot work together in a trio, that these instruments cannot hold sympathetic relations? Tchaikovsky maintained this theory, and then, when Nicholas Rubinstein died, wrote an interminable trio, endeavoring in one of the movements to portray in tones the mental, physical and moral characteristics of his friend. With all due respect to Beethoven and those who believe in plenary inspiration, it may be hinted, if not shouted from the housetop, that this particular trio should not be ranked among the works of the greater Beethoven; there is too much following of old time formulas; too many pages that are common-place in the invention. When Moschles heard the first performance with Beethoven the pianist, he found many traces of "the grand style" but added that the work lacked clarity and precision. Today "the grand style" is hard to find; while the clarity and the precision are more in evidence than originality of thought and warmth or nobility of expression.

It is the pleasure of the more recent commentators to dwell on the "psychology" of Beethoven's later music. Thus Vincent d'Indy sees in the Sonata, op. 110, the moral sufferings endured by the composer; but Paul Bekker believes that the last sonatas portray the indomitable will of Beethoven. The sonata, played with technical proficiency and aesthetic appreciation by Mr. Samuel, indisputably contains compelling measures; the melodic lamentation is deeply emotional in a manner peculiar to Beethoven; but there are other pages that are dry and uninteresting except to those who think that all the later sonatas are "mystic, wonderful."

It seems impossible that the three Rasoumowsky quartets wer at first a puzzle to even accomplished musicians, who could not believe that Beethoven wrote them seriously; some insisted that the music was of a madman. Perhaps a century from now the lovers and the practicers of music will wonder at the harsh judgments pronounced on certain compositions of today. The quartet chosen by the London String Quartet is charged with the genius of Beethoven; this is revealed not only in the ineffable beauty of the Adagio, it is seen in the other movements. The performance was ideal, in euphony, in exquisite phrasing, in the eloquence of emotion, as well as in the perfection of ensemble.

At the concert this afternoon the fourth and fifth symphonies will be performed.

FULLER PAYS TRIBUTE

In recognition of the Beethoven centennial Gov. Fuller yesterday issued the following statement:

"Little do we today, who have the privilege of listening in rapture to the wonderful music bequeathed to us by the great master, Beethoven, appreciate the adverse conditions under which his genius bloomed. Hard work amid the most difficult circumstances was the lot of this wonderful composer.

"Intense application from infancy to the development of his musical talent —first on the violin, then the clavier, later the organ and the piano—enabled him in later years to bring forth the beautiful melodies which have been the name of Beethoven one to conjure with. How truly the life of Beethoven teaches us that beauty, like life itself, is born of suffering. Its secret is sacrifice.

"His artistic proficiency brought him universal recognition and acclaim. His compositions became known throughout the whole world. Of him it is true that a man is surpassed by his works, for in his works he displayed a mastery which was denied him in what he himself calls his attempt to 'grapple with fate.'

"The Beethoven Centennial will bring to the people of today a clearer understanding of the value of music in our democratic life, as well as a more sympathetic view and appreciation of this great musical genius."

IN SINGLE VOICE; IN TRIPLE VOICE; IN FOUR CONJOINED

CHAMBER-MUSIC IN BEETHOVEN'S HONOR

New Audience and Hampering Concert-Room—A Quartet Subdued, a Trio Ill-Balanced, Only a Piano Full-Sounding—Sonata That Was Pinnacle—Other Numbers Questionable—"The Happy Beethoven"

THERE has been a new audience, thus far, at each concert of the Beethoven Centenary Festival. On Tuesday, for the Mass, it was a notable company assembled from the hierarchies of the town, artistic, musical, professional, social. On Wednesday, for the first three Symphonies, it was the miscellaneous body that intelligently frequents orchestral concerts in Boston. Last evening, for the Trio in B-flat, the Piano-Sonata in A-flat, and the second of the Rasumovsky Quartets, it was an audience in which devotees and practitioners of chamber-music abounded. To right and left, before and behind, were familiar figures from the concerts of "The Flonzaleys" and the concerts at the Public Library; while here, there and everywhere were those that followed the pieces, scores in hand. Their entr'acte conversation further betrayed them. They also had tried over, three by three, the Trio which is Opus 97; had boggled, alone with a piano, through the Sonata which is Opus 110; had bestowed evenings upon a highly tentative practice of the Quartet for Strings which is Number Two of Opus 59. They had come to hear realized what they themselves might only half attain; to pick up "points" along the way; to make the sage comments of fellow-craftsmen in praise or demur. No such audience has sat in a Bostonian concert-room since Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud played through, in a winter, all the Sonatas of Beethoven for piano and violin. It was a company that knew and cherished the arts of chamber-music because it had learned them in personal practice. Add to them the tireless frequenters of "occasions" (like a Beethoven Festival) and both were enough to fill Symphony Hall.

The more the regret that chamber-music does not sound advantageously in that tunnel of a concert-room, long, narrow and high; while, by the memory of previous trials, it carries better when the audience is thin and scattered. For final number, the Londoners played the Quartet in E minor, out of the Rasumovsky three. The English four is long versed in the piece. Familiarity and musicianly skill assure its every measure. Not a shading, like the rising first theme of the opening Allegro; not a stroke, like the repeated cadence in the Finale, goes unheeded. The ear agrees to the Londoners' pace and vibrates to their rhythm. They excel in the balance and euphony of reciprocating voices. Their tone is at one with the subdued, subjective quality of

Some would have harked back to "The Appassionata," as of the Beethoven oftenest present to the general imagination. Others declared for Opus 106 as the epical masterpiece of the composer and the piano. Yet others were for Opus 111, "the last sonata," as pendant to the Mass in evocation of the final Beethoven pent, racked, consumed. The Sonata in A-flat had, however, the advantages of wise compromise. Those that were all for the younger Beethoven could descry him in the musing and static song with which it begins, in the sharp-edged, quick-footed Allegro into which it passes. Those that sought the brooding and the poignant Beethoven of a later day found him in the Adagio, "the song of sorrow," the consoling measures into which, with slip and struggle, both ascend. Even those who remembered the storming Beethoven, lurid across the dark of Opus 111, knew his power, albeit in brighter guise, out of the Finale of the chosen Sonata.

From the beginning of the Adagio, moreover, to the end, speaks the Beethoven who in these last years would find for music a new subjective matter and a new projecting power. The seer broods within; without, the composer half-believes he has achieved the visioned goal. . . . Up the heights of this considerable "argument" rose Mr. Samuel. Imagination and emotion answered to the quiet and mellow concentration of his beginnings; to his keen and scherzo-like vigors; to his depths of tone and wrestling rhythms in the darkened Adagio; to his feeling, beyond a pianist's rhetoric, through the struggle into consolation; to the outspreading horizons of the close. All-Bach if he often will have it so, but not exclusively Bach, should be Mr. Samuel's calling.

With the choice of the Trio and the Quartet there was more room for demur. It is a pretty sentiment, no doubt appropriate to a Centenary Festival, that in both Beethoven wrote as a happy man. Sometimes, however, this fortunate state made him careless of means and not too choice of invention. Neither the Finale of the Quartet in E minor nor of the Trio in B-flat are exactly of the greater, or any other, Beethoven that for a century has endured. Rather, they are of the Beethoven, who, like the rest of us, could take the easiest way, finding the spirit willing and the hand submissive to commonplace. Agreeable tunes intersperse the Trio and pleasurable workmanship dots it. No doubt it was well received in the salons of Beethoven's princely patrons. A Centenary Festival on the amplest scale—only "Fidelio" is missing—is another and more exacting matter.

As for the second Rasumovsky Quartet, the Allegro and the Adagio do speak for the musing and lyric Beethoven, the poet of intimate sensations upon mind and heart, into a song of strings distilling them. Yet the "Russian Theme," in tossing triplets over the Allegretto, and the scampering, whipper-snapper Finale are of a Beethoven workaday and inferior. The first Rasumovsky Quartet is far more characteristic; while, before the second, it is possible to pine for the young freshness of Opus 18 or for the spiritual strife and the seer-like visions of the final five. Possibly there was overmuch of the "happy Beethoven" in the concert of yesterday. To be such was not his normal or his best creative state. Yet up and down the hall, the thumbed and opened scores gave the program

THIRD CONCERT OF BEETHOVEN SERIES

GLOBE MAR 25

London String Quartet and Harold Samuel Heard

The third concert of the Beethoven series, arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to honor the centenary of the composer's death was given last night to an audience of unusual social and musical distinction that left few vacant seats in Symphony Hall. The program included examples of Beethoven's chamber music. The performers were the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel. The applause was polite rather than enthusiastic.

Mr Samuel, an English pianist previously known here by several Bach recitals given at Jordan Hall to small but enthusiastic audiences, was heard to best advantage last night in the Sonata in A flat, opus 110, which Beethoven composed in 1821. No doubt he selected this particular sonata because it contains a fugue, and has therefore some slight affinity with Bach's pieces.

He played it delicately, succeeding best with the quietly lyric portions. But listeners who judged this sonata solely from Mr Samuel's interpretation must have been puzzled by the remark of d'Indy about it, quoted in the program notes. D'Indy believes that this opus 110 bears no dedication, contrary to Beethoven's custom, because this "musical expression of a convulsion in his own life could be dedicated only to himself."

Mr Samuel felt, or at any rate conveyed to his hearers, no dramatic power in the music. He polished its surface smoothly, so far as Beethoven's crabbed piano style would permit. But a placid sentimentality was the only emotion revealed by the performance.

The London String Quartet, a group of four English musicians, has been heard here a number of times in the past few seasons, notably in a cycle of Beethoven quartets at Jordan Hall. They have lately given a similar cycle in New York. Plans for a repetition of the cycle here, announced last Fall, were later abandoned.

Last night the London Quartet was heard in the E minor Quartet, opus 59, No. 2, one of the celebrated set dedicated to Prince Rasumowsky, whose namfie they have immortalized, though he neglected to reward Beethoven for the honor paid him. The London Quartet, like Mr Koussevitzky, is not hampered in the interpretation of Beethoven's music by tradition. They play it as they feel it, and one is left in no doubt as to the genuineness of their liking for Beethoven.

Last night, as on previous occasions, however, one felt that although their performance had spirit, it lacked intensity and subtlety. This quartet excels in the music of such composers as Greig and Tschaikowsky. The players have a kind and degree of imagination better suited to such things than to the noble austerities of Beethoven.

The first number on the program was the great Trio in B flat, opus 97, in which Mr Levey and Mr Evans of the London Quartet played the violin and violoncello parts, and Mr Samuel was the pianist. The performance was disappointingly inadequate.

Mr Samuel did not succeed in the difficult task of preserving in so large a room the proper balance between the piano and the strings. Neither he nor the others seemed thoroughly in sympathy with the music, perhaps because there had not been opportunity for the large number of rehearsals necessary for proper performance on so notable an occasion of so exacting a work.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ST. JOSEPH, MO. NEWS

MAR 25 192

"FLIVVER 10,000,000."

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican.]

"A joyous epic" is the subtle of the symphonic work which Frederick S. Converse, a well-known American composer, has just finished for performance next month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although Henry Ford's name is not mentioned, the theme is unquestionably 100 per cent American, and the work opens with "Dawn in Detroit," the selection of the hour leaving room for a bit of quiet harmony unless the wagons of milk cans have begun to come in. There follows a march of the workers, but in Detroit do workers go to the factory on foot? The composer gets to the heart of his subject with a scene in the automobile factory, the treatment of which is described as "a serio-comic fugue interpersed with machine-like sounds."

It would be hard to write musically of a flivver without free use of "machine-like sounds," and even after the car is finished and delivered there are great possibilities in this direction. The composer might devote an entire movement, or non-movement, to "cranking up in January." He chooses May, however, for what he calls "America's romance," maliciously styled by one listener "the petting scene." At all events it should give a relief from the cacophony without which the life story of a flivver could not be truly told. There is for example that first collision which may only crumple a mudguard, but lacerates the ears of the listener as well as the soul of the proud proprietor of the new and speckless car. Stern veracity also has compelled the composer to carry the history on to a rusty and creaking old age. "Flivver 10,000,000," at the end wheezing and rattling off into the dim distance.

As a burlesque the music should be amusing, and most "program" music contains an element of burlesque. Haydn did not expect his imitations of tigers, elephants and worms in "The Creation" to be taken seriously, and Richard Strauss is broadly comic in his "Sinfonia Domestica." When realism comes in at the door music flies out at the window and it would be a mistake to regard a work written about a flivver as anything but a musical joke. But music has its good jokes, and if the one perpetrated by Mr. Converse is clever enough even musical listeners may forgive the atrocious din involved.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.

MAR 25 1927

Sunday Concert To Be On Works Of Beethoven

A program made up entirely of Beethoven numbers will be presented by Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham at the municipal concert on Sunday and the City of Portland will thus pay its tribute to the memory of the great composer on the occasion of his centennial.

Varied will be the type of compositions presented by Mr. Cronham, and thus the versatility of the composer will be emphasized.

The program will open with the Prometheus overture, an overture to a ballet written by Beethoven in his early days as a composer.

Following this will come Theme and Variations, the slow movement from the Septet for strings and wind which was composed about 1800.

Beethoven's lovely Minuet in G, one of Kreisler's favorite violin selections, will be another of the municipal organist's numbers which will be greatly enjoyed.

Ruins of Athens, a Turkish march, composed as incidental music to a ballet, and dramatic as well as martial in character, will be another of Mr. Cronham's offerings. The finale will be two movements from Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor.

The assisting artist on the municipal program will be Wililam E. Dodge, violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will play Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata for violin and piano. Howard W. Clark, well known pianist will accompany Mr. Dodge.

TRIO, SONATA AND QUARTET

Pat Mar 25

Chamber Music Night at Beethoven Festival

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That the Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall might be broadly comprehensive, room was found in it for a concert of chamber-music that befell last evening, offering the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel as performers, and the Trio, Opus 97, the Piano Sonata, Opus 110, and the String Quartet, Opus 59, No. 2, as programme.

So far as its portion in the Festival was concerned, the course of the orchestra itself was clear. It had only to play the nine symphonies; it could do no better. But a single concert of Beethoven's chamber-music offers so many possibilities that no matter what programme has been decided upon someone would have found a way to better it. This Trio in B-flat major, for example, enjoys a great reputation, even though some who do not believe in the plenary inspiration of the great masters find it for the most part tiresome. Again, there are beautiful passages in the Sonata, Opus 110, but each of the last five sonatas is uneven in interest and this in A-flat them all. The second "Rasoumovsky Quartet" is, of course, an unchallenged masterpiece in its particular field.

The performances last evening were of the high order that this Festival presupposes. No string quartet known here today is more fortunate with Beethoven than is this London Quartet, and if Mr. Samuels is more remarkable as a player of Bach, his acknowledged specialty, than of Beethoven, his performance of the Sonata was broadly conceived and technically finished. As an ensemble pianist he was a bit too incisive, a common fault in those whose province is solo playing. His associates in the Trio, Mr. Levey and Mr. Evans of the Londoners, acquitted themselves nobly. The audience was large and warmly applausive.

Beethoven Centenary

The third concert of the Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall took place last evening, when Harold Samuel, pianist, and the London String Quartet shared a program of chamber music. Mr. Samuel, Mr. James Levey, and Mr. C. Warwick Evans, violinist and violoncellist of the quartet, joined for the B-flat Trio. Mr. Samuel played the A-flat Sonata, Op. 110. The second of the Rasoumowsky Quartets, Op. 59, No. 2, in E minor, occupied the remainder of the program.

MONITOR

Last evening's music was perhaps the most quiet [illegible] of the entire series of concerts. The beauties of the works chosen may hardly be exaggerated, and their performance matched the superb content. For Mr. Samuel and the members of the London String Quartet do more than merely satisfy the standards of chamber music performances. They set new ones. The pianist who has devoted himself to Bach, served Beethoven equally well last evening, playing the sonata and the piano part of the trio with a reverence of approach and an eloquence which "pointed" every beauty inherent in the works.

MAR 25

The most striking aspect of the B-flat Trio seemed the exquisite melodies which flooded the work constantly emerging from the musical texture. The interplay of the three instruments and their smooth euphony of tone were exposition for contrapuntal effectiveness, while each player polished and refined his share of the work. A mood of sustained grace and the fusing ensemble of the instruments made the performance memorable.

Without a doubt, Mr. Samuel possesses what musicians call the "classical" outlook. This involves a manner of approach and a mood of performance rather than any more tangible element of pianism. But elusive as this quality is of description, it is quite unmistakable in performance. The Sonata, as it came from Mr. Samuel's hands, owned plangent tonal quality, coherent structure and a quickly comprehended plan. The Adagio, expressively emotional, and the mounting crescendo of the Fuga each left a clear picture in the thought of the listener, while Mr. Samuel brought the work to a close with a large, swift, upsurging crescendo with never a trace of undue hurrying.

The members of the London String Quartet made an excellent choice of the E minor Quartet. Of course it served to set in relief all their abilities with nicety, but it is also the most favored quartet with a large public. Its performance last evening drew enthusiastic applause, apparently evently divided for the players and for the music. The London Quartet does not court unanimity to the exclusion of individual characteristics. The lilting rhythms, the rise and fall of exquisite nuance have not obscured the four men who make the quartet. Each instrument soars and mounts at will, even through a thoroughly co-ordinated musical plan. A free exchange of musical thought, a quick "give and take" flows between the players. The sum of this method is a sure, spontaneous vitality which more exquisite interpretations may miss. Yet the listener throughout a performance by this quartet feels the togetherness with which its members play.

C. S. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

MAR 25 1927

Other Music

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 25.

A PROGRAM of chamber music, played by the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel, pianist, was given last night at the third concert of the Beethoven centenary festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An audience of unusual musical and social distinction left very few vacant seats in Symphony Hall. The applause, in contrast to the enthusiasm shown at the two previous concerts in the series, was merely polite.

Symphony Hall, which can hold almost 3,000 people, is certainly one of the largest rooms ever used in all musical history for chamber music. The friendly, homelike relation between performers and listeners which the traditional term suggests cannot be attained there.

The quartet sat isolated in the middle of a vast empty stage designed to hold an orchestra of 100 musicians. Even from a seat well to the front, and only about a hundred feet from the four players, one had the illusion of seeing them through the wrong end of a telescope.

If opera glasses had been furnished by the management the proper visual illusion might have satisfied those who, like so many concert-goers, "listen with their eyes." But it is doubtful if even the use of amplifiers could have checked the tendency of the tones to fade and blur before reaching the listening ear.

ONE can only surmise what those in the rear of the hall, almost a full city block away from the stage, saw and heard. Under circumstances so disadvantageous no performers could be expected to do full justice to themselves, or to the chosen masterpieces of Beethoven.

The concert began with the great trio in B flat, opus 97, in which Harold Samuel was the pianist. One instinctively mentions his name before those of the violinist, James Levey, and the cellist, C. Warwick Evans, both of [illegible] and Beethoven full-[illegible] only the piano was plainly audible.

The lid of the concert grand was raised not more than six inches, but its tone overpowered the strings. This failure to maintain the proper tonal balance may not be altogether Mr. Samuel's fault. But one was inclined to blame all three performers for playing as though, reading the notes, they were, because of insufficient rehearsal, not quite certain just what was coming next. The performance of this number, in short, was far from doing justice to its remarkable nobility and beauty.

MR. SAMUEL, known in this country chiefly as a specialist in the music of Bach, chose as an example of Beethoven's piano music the Sonata in A flat, opus 110, and played it with notable polish and delicacy of style. It is curious, however, that a musician able to vitalize Bach's music so well should have made of this sonata merely a desicacted specimen illustrating musical history rather than the intensely human, if occasionally fallible, masterpiece it really is. No feeling except the mildest of lyric sentiment could be detected in his performance.

The London quartet, hampered not a little by the vast and chilling spaces of the great hall, repeated an interpretation of Beethoven's E minor quartet, opus 59, No. 2, already familiar to both New York and Boston. Their playing is commendably spirited, and quite free from academic dullness.

After all, a Boston symphony concert with the orchestra omitted reminds one of the celebrated Irish performance of "Hamlet." The audience would certainly have warmed to a miscellany of Beethoven's overtures and concertos, all of which are omitted from the programs of the festival.

PENFIELD ROBERTS.

MUSIC NEW-VITALIZED, ORCHESTRAL PROWESS, DIVINING CONDUCTOR

TRANS MAR 26

PERFORMANCE AT THE CENTENARY FESTIVAL

Back to Beethoven Before There Were Traditions and Interpretations — Mr. Koussevitzky's Clairvoyance Variously Exemplified—The Fourth as a Romantic Symphony in Spite of the Finale—The Fifth for Power, Yet for a Breathing-Space Lukewarm

MAKING WAY through the Centenary Festival, Mr. Koussevitzky is fortunate in his outlook upon Beethoven's Symphonies. He does not see them as they are—classics of music, standard pieces of the concert-hall, subject of innumerable treatises, weighted with a century of accumulated and often contradictory "tradition," oppressed by reams of "interpretation" and embellishment, heard with prepossessions that in many a hearer at middle age have hardened into prejudices. Rather, and justly, the conductor tries to see the Nine as they were—when they left Beethoven's hand; when the Viennese first heard them; when eastward, westward and northward, they were making stir as the work of a rising composer.

Consider, for example, the First. The commentators, as it is their pleasure to do, have pasted it thick with signboards, foretelling the matter and the manner of the succeeding eight. Between whiles, they have discovered inner meanings, even as one extracts sunshine from cucumbers. Now, if ever there was a quasi-Mozartean music, it is this Symphony of 1800 in C major. There is not a reasonable doubt that Viennese audiences, pardonably unsuspicious of Beethoven's future, heard it as such. It is safe, also, to say that the most attentive and imaginative listener found not an "inner meaning" upon one of the pages. For this First Symphony, unlike others to come, is written "from the outside"—a filling of forms, now and then slightly modified as in the Minuet, with as agreeable matter as the composer could invent, utilize and adorn. Precisely from this point of view, Mr. Koussevitzky plays the music. He reduces his orchestra, as on Wednesday, to eighteenth-century dimensions; bids it to the utmost of fluidity, transparency and grace; is chary of "expression"; seeks and gains the pleasures of patterns in sound, upbuilt and unfolded. So doing, he restores the piece to its original voice, life and quality, while his hearers sit by in delight.

Similarly with the succeeding Symphonies in the progress of the Festival. The Second becomes, at his hands, an experimental, tentative, uncertain music. Here Beethoven is amplifying or polishing technical means; there he is testing whatever matter is fermenting in his head. Now he looks forward; again he turns backward. In the slow movement he is all for the long-drawn charm of instrumental song; in the Finale, he stamps about in the lusthood of youth. Once more, he is writing an external, form-filling music; yet there are discoverable measures in which he is thinking to himself. No wonder that the Viennese of 1803 found such a Symphony baffling and a bore; that, for some of us in 1927, it remains such; that even Mr. Koussevitzky, in his fidelity to the original speech and savor, could not dissipate this ennui.

[illegible] the Third and Beethoven full-mettled, free-handed. He is master of his orchestra; knows technically and imaginatively the scope of his instruments; makes them the instant voice of idea, mood and will. No longer is he filling a form from "the best models"; he is bending and amplifying it to his own thought and purpose. Both now wear heroic proportions; for this Third Symphony is "The Eroica," without regard to any other personage than Ludwig van Beethoven in flesh and blood, teeming with high thoughts and deep, alight with the passion of them, aflame to set them free in music. The tossing impetuosity of the first movement, up-swelling, down-flinging, only to soar again; the darkling splendor, the poignant progress, of the Funeral March; the leaping force of the Scherzo, the fervor of the Trio, the exultant frenzy of the final variations—all are the proof. The ideas and the speech, the emotion and the projection, foreground, background and the moving form between, are one and indivisible. Mr. Koussevitzky seizes upon this miracle in Beethoven's progress; makes every detail contributory to it; enfolds it in a manifold incandescence. Upon our ears, a century and a quarter afterward, the measures stride and smite; live and burn. The process is less a re-creation than a restoration; for there must have been Viennese in that first audience of 1805 upon whom "The Eroica" so sounded even though they did not snatch for copy-paper to record their impressions.

So to the Fourth and the Fifth Symphonies of yesterday afternoon, when the Centenary Festival and the regular Symphony Concerts entered into a brief illicit union, and that self-complaisant audience of Fridays did its homage to Beethoven—in which function it differed not at all in aspect, speech or bearing from its usual courses. It pulled the orchestra to its feet at the end of both the Symphonies; then redoubled its plaudits, according to its habit times out of mind. For is not the orchestra its very own? At the close of the concert, it clapped brashly, even cheered here and there. Yet whether this manifestation was for the great Ludwig among the shades or for the very present Serge, his servant, the wisest might not surely say. At the least, there were few departures before the end of a short concert, which on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, is no small tribute—to whom it may concern.

The Fourth Symphony deserves more frequent performance. No doubt, it requires more rehearsal than the Fifth or the Seventh, pulled for the fiftieth time from the shelf marked "Standard Repertory"; while, if it fails to gratify the conductor's sense of sweep and power, it signally rewards his feeling for finesse and beauty. And if—dear man!—he must have his "effect," may not the veiled crescendo in the first movement suffice him, stripping away the harmonic mists as it mounts and intensifies? (Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished it to the full and without a touch of individual display. Of such are his loyalties to this centenary Beethoven). Moreover, in this Symphony in B-flat, for the first and the only time in the Nine, goes a Beethoven clearly sensuous. Against this side of self-expression he was usually resolute or disdainful, or else within him the impulse was cabin'd, cribbed, confined; wherefore devout men, like Monsieur d'Indy, and right reverend bishops praise him, seemingly unaware that thereby the scope of his music is materially diminished. Sensuous unmistakably is the slow movement—purely and happily sensuous, if the hearer likes—but in lyric loveliness of fragrant and transparent emanation from the stirred senses. Within this Adagio Beethoven writes his romantic poem in tones; chastens it as Schubert could seldom do; gives it a body to which Schumann is usually strange; never lets it clot into the sheer sentiment of that earlier Larghetto.

Akin, too, if the notion is not too far-fetched, seems the introduction to the whole Symphony—a dreamful, wayward music, speaking to itself, in its own beauty finding its being, as iridescent as may be in Beethoven's harmonic and instrumental color. Add the third movement, which is less a leaping and darting Scherzo than a sportive exercise in tonal fantasy. Remember the fitful moods and changing pattern of the first Allegro, and what has Beethoven written in this Opus Sixty but his "Romantic Symphony," sequence at wide remove to the groping Second, pendant to the heroical Third? If only the Finale were other than what it is! No doubt, it teems with "pure joy," "happy gayety" and all the other excuses of the commentators; but in audible musical fact, it is a cheerful, bustling finale of eighteenth-century symphonic practice, newly propelled by Beethoven's ampler energies. Finales to his Symphonies were the fate-sent pitfall. Where, except in "The Eroica," do they stand four-square beside the matter that has gone before? The Finale of the Seventh can sound like loud button-bursting; and in the Finale of the Ninth is that gushful March.

As such romantic music Mr. Koussevitzky released the Fourth Symphony; yet kept it undiminished by his own failing which, with romantic pages, is occasional excess of sentiment. (Again that clairvoyance with Beethoven and loyalty to him that have shone, thus far, through the whole Festival.) He misted the Introduction; while in it the orchestra gave him back a well-nigh perfect phrasing and tonal quality. Under his light hand the first Allegro eddied and flowed, neither flagging nor sagging. The euphony and the transparency of the orchestra through the Adagio exhaled the loveliness of the melody; the harmonies and the instrumental coloring were glamour; the pace and the rhythm grace of motion and beat. In sum, a transfigured music. Everywhere the incidental solo-measures ran like [illegible] besques, and if zestful vigors [illegible] mask that paltry Finale, then Mr. Koussevitzky would have turned the trick.

THIRD CONCERT OF BEETHOVEN SERIES

GLOBE MAR 25

London String Quartet and Harold Samuel Heard

The third concert of the Beethoven series arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to honor the centenary of the composer's death was given last night to an audience of unusual social and musical distinction that left few vacant seats in Symphony Hall. The program included examples of Beethoven's chamber music. The performers were the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel. The applause was polite rather than enthusiastic.

Mr Samuel, an English pianist previously known here by several Bach recitals given at Jordan Hall to small but enthusiastic audiences, was heard to best advantage last night in the Sonata in A flat, opus 110, which Beethoven composed in 1821. No doubt he selected this particular sonata because it contains a fugue, and has therefore some slight affinity with Bach's pieces.

He played it delicately, succeeding best with the quietly lyric portions. But listeners who judged this sonata solely from Mr Samuel's interpretation must have been puzzled by the remark of d'Indy about it, quoted in the program notes. D'Indy believes that this opus 110 bears no dedication, contrary to Beethoven's custom, because this "musical expression of a convulsion in his own life could be dedicated only to himself."

Mr Samuel felt, or at any rate conveyed to his hearers, no dramatic power in the music. He polished its surface smoothly, so far as Beethoven's crabbed piano style would permit. But a placid sentimentality was the only emotion revealed by the performance.

The London String Quartet, a group of four English musicians, has been heard here a number of times in the past few seasons, notably in a cycle of Beethoven quartets at Jordan Hall. They have lately given a similar cycle in New York. Plans for a repetition of the cycle here, announced last Fall, were later abandoned.

Last night the London Quartet was heard in the E minor Quartet, opus 59, No. 2, one of the celebrated set dedicated to Prince Rasumowsky, whose namfie they have immortalized, though he neglected to reward Beethoven for the honor paid him. The London Quartet, like Mr Koussevitzky, is not hampered in the interpretation of Beethoven's music by tradition. They play it as they feel it, and one is left in no doubt as to the genuineness of their liking for Beethoven.

Last night, as on previous occasions, however, one felt that although their performance had spirit, it lacked intensity and subtlety. This quartet excels in the music of such composers as Greig and Tschaikowsky. The players have a kind and degree of imagination better suited to such things than to the noble austerities of Beethoven.

The first number on the program was the great Trio in B flat, opus 97, in which Mr Levey and Mr Evans of the London Quartet played the violin and violoncello parts, and Mr Samuel was the pianist. The performance was disappointingly inadequate.

Mr Samuel did not succeed in the difficult task of preserving in so large a room the proper balance between the piano and the strings. Neither he nor the others seemed thoroughly in sympathy with the music, perhaps because there had not been opportunity for the large number of rehearsals necessary for proper performance on so notable an occasion of so exacting a work.

P. R.

The organ prelude, the Prometheus overture, an overture to a ballet written by Beethoven in his early days as a composer.

Following this will come Theme and Variations, the slow movement from the Septet for strings and wind which was composed about 1800.

Beethoven's lovely Minuet in G, one of Kreisler's favorite violin selections, will be another of the municipal organist's numbers which will be greatly enjoyed.

Ruins of Athens, a Turkish march, composed as incidental music to a ballet, and dramatic as well as martial in character, will be another of Mr. Cronham's offerings. The finale will be two movements from Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor.

The assisting artist on the municipal program will be Wililam E' Dodge, violinist and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will play Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata for violin and piano. Howard W. Clark, well known pianist will accompany Mr. Dodge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS

MAR 25 192

"FLIVVER 10,000,000."

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican.]

"A joyous epic" is the subtle of the symphonic work which Frederick S. Converse, a well-known American composer, has just finished for performance next month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although Henry Ford's name is not mentioned, the theme is unquestionably 100 per cent American, and the work opens with "Dawn in Detroit," the selection of the hour leaving room for a bit of quiet harmony unless the wagons of milk cans have begun to come in. There follows a march of the workers, but in Detroit do workers go to the factory on foot? The composer gets to the heart of his subject with a scene in the automobile factory, the treatment of which is described as "a serio-comic fugue interpersed with machine-like sounds."

It would be hard to write musically of a flivver without free use of "machine-like sounds," and even after the car is finished and delivered there are great possibilities in this direction. The composer might devote an entire movement, or non-movement, to "cranking up in January." He chooses May, however, for what he calls "America's romance," maliciously styled by one listener "the petting scene." At all events it should give a relief from the cacophony without which the life story of a flivver could not be truly told. There is for example that first collision which may only crumple a mudguard, but lacerates the ears of the listener as well as the soul of the proud proprietor of the new and speckless car. Stern veracity also has compelled the composer to carry the history on to a rusty and creaking old age. "Flivver 10,000,000," at the end wheezing and rattling off into the dim distance.

As a burlesque the music should be amusing, and most "program" music contains an element of burlesque. Haydn did not expect his imitations of tigers, elephants and worms in "The Creation" to be taken seriously, and Richard Strauss is broadly comic in his "Sinfonia Domestica." When realism comes in at the door music flies out at the window and it would be a mistake to regard a work written about a flivver as anything but a musical joke. But music has its good jokes, and if the one perpetrated by Mr. Converse is clever enough even musical listeners may forgive the atrocious din involved.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.

MAR 25 1927

Sunday Concert To Be On Works Of Beethoven

A program made up entirely of Beethoven numbers will be presented by Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham at the municipal concert on Sunday and the City of Portland will thus pay its tribute to the memory of the great composer on the occasion of his centennial.

Varied will be the type of compositions presented by Mr. Cronham, and thus the versatility of the composer will be emphasized.

The program will open with

TRIO, SONATA AND QUARTET

Pat March 25

Chamber Music Night at Beethoven Festival

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That the Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall might be broadly comprehensive, room was found in it for a concert of chamber-music that befell last evening, offering the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel as performers, and the Trio, Opus 97, the Piano Sonata, Opus 110, and the String Quartet, Opus 59, No. 2, as programme.

So far as its portion in the Festival was concerned, the course of the orchestra itself was clear. It had only to play the nine symphonies; it could do no better. But a single concert of Beethoven's chamber-music offers so many possibilities that no matter what programme has been decided upon someone would have found a way to better it. This Trio in B-flat major, for example, enjoys a great reputation, even though some who do not believe in the plenary inspiration of the great masters find it for the most part tiresome. Again, there are beautiful passages in the Sonata, Opus 110, but each of the last five sonatas is uneven in interest and this in A-flat them all. The second "Rasoumovsky Quartet" is, of course, an unchallenged masterpiece in its particular field.

The performances last evening were of the high order that this Festival presupposes. No string quartet known here today is more fortunate with Beethoven than is this London Quartet, and if Mr. Samuels is more remarkable as a player of Bach, his acknowledged specialty, than of Beethoven, his performance of the Sonata was broadly conceived and technically finished. As an ensemble pianist he was a bit too incisive, a common fault in those whose province is solo playing. His associates in the Trio, Mr. Levey and Mr. Evans of the Londoners, acquitted themselves nobly. The audience was large and warmly applausive.

Beethoven Centenary

The third concert of the Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall took place last evening, when Harold Samuel, pianist, and the London String Quartet shared a program of chamber music. Mr. Samuel, Mr. James Levey, and Mr. C. Warwick Evans, violinist and violoncellist of the quartet, joined for the B-flat Trio. Mr. Samuel played the A-flat Sonata, Op. 110. The second of the Rasoumowsky Quartets, Op. 59, No. 2, in E minor, ocupied the remainder of the program.

MONITOR

Last evening's music was perhaps the most quiet [illegible] of the entire series of concerts. The beauties of the works chosen may hardly be exaggerated, and their performance matched the superb content. For Mr. Samuel and the members of the London String Quartet do more than merely satisfy the standards of chamber music performances. They set new ones. The pianist who has devoted himself to Bach, served Beethoven equally well last evening, playing the sonata and the piano part of the trio with a reverence of approach and an eloquence which "pointed" every beauty inherent in the works.

MAR 25

The most striking aspect of the B-flat Trio seemed the exquisite melodies which flooded the work, constantly emerging from the musical texture. The interplay of the three instruments and their smooth euphony of tone were exposition for contrapuntal effectiveness, while each player polished and refined his share of the work. A mood of sustained grace and the fusing ensemble of the instruments made the performance memorable.

Without a doubt, Mr. Samuel possesses what musicians call the "classical" outlook. This involves a manner of approach and a mood of performance rather than any more tangible element of pianism. But elusive as this quality is of description, it is quite unmistakable in performance. The Sonata, as it came from Mr. Samuel's hands, owned plangent tonal quality, coherent structure and a quickly comprehended plan. The Adagio, expressively emotional, and the mounting crescendo of the Fuga each left a clear picture in the thought of the listener, while Mr. Samuel brought the work to a close with a large, swift, upsurging crescendo with never a trace of undue hurrying.

The members of the London String Quartet made an excellent choice of the E minor Quartet. Of course it served to set in relief all their abilities with nicety, but it is also the most favored quartet with a large public. Its performance last evening drew enthusiastic applause, apparently evently divided for the players and for the music. The London Quartet does not court unanimity to the exclusion of individual characteristics. The lilting rhythms, the rise and fall of exquisite nuance have not obscured the four men who make the quartet. Each instrument soars and mounts at will, even through a thoroughly co-ordinated musical plan. A free exchange of musical thought, a quick "give and take" flows between the players. The sum of this method is a sure, spontaneous vitality which more exquisite interpretations may miss. Yet the listener throughout a performance by this quartet feels the togetherness with which its members play.

C. S. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

MAR 25 1927

Other Music

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 25.

A PROGRAM of chamber music, played by the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel, pianist, was given last night at the third concert of the Beethoven centenary festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An audience of unusual musical and social distinction left very few vacant seats in Symphony Hall. The applause, in contrast to the enthusiasm shown at the two previous concerts in the series, was merely polite.

Symphony Hall, which can hold almost 3,000 people, is certainly one of the largest rooms ever used in all musical history for chamber music. The friendly, homelike relation between performers and listeners which the traditional term suggests cannot be attained there.

The quartet sat isolated in the middle of a vast empty stage designed to hold an orchestra of 100 musicians. Even from a seat well to the front, and only about a hundred feet from the four players, one had the illusion of seeing them through the wrong end of a telescope.

If opera glasses had been furnished by the management the proper visual illusion might have satisfied those who, like so many concert-goers, "listen with their eyes." But it is doubtful if even the use of amplifiers could have checked the tendency of the tones to fade and blur before reaching the listening ear.

ONE can only surmise what those in the rear of the hall, almost a full city block away from the stage, saw and heard. Under circumstances so disadvantageous no performers could be expected to do full justice to themselves, or to the chosen masterpieces of Beethoven.

The concert began with the great trio in B flat, opus 97, in which Harold Samuel was the pianist. One instinctively mentions his name before those of the violinist, James Levey, and the cellist, C. Warwick Evans, both of [illegible] Much of [illegible] time only the piano was plainly audible.

The lid of the concert grand was raised not more than six inches, but its tone overpowered the strings. This failure to maintain the proper tonal balance may not be altogether Mr. Samuel's fault. But one was inclined to blame all three performers for playing as though, reading the notes, they were, because of insufficient rehearsal, not quite certain just what was coming next. The performance of this number, in short, was far from doing justice to its remarkable nobility and beauty.

MR. SAMUEL, known in this country chiefly as a specialist in the music of Bach, chose as an example of Beethoven's piano music the Sonata in A flat, opus 110, and played it with notable polish and delicacy of style. It is curious, however, that a musician able to vitalize Bach's music so well should have made of this sonata merely a desicacted specimen illustrating musical history rather than the intensely human, if occasionally fallible, masterpiece it really is. No feeling except the mildest of lyric sentiment could be detected in his performance.

The London quartet, hampered not a little by the vast and chilling spaces of the great hall, repeated an interpretation of Beethoven's E minor quartet, opus 59, No. 2, already familiar to both New York and Boston. Their playing is commendably spirited, and quite free from academic dullness.

After all, a Boston symphony concert with the orchestra omitted reminds one of the celebrated Irish performance of "Hamlet." The audience would certainly have warmed to a miscellany of Beethoven's overtures and concertos, all of which are omitted from the programs of the festival.

PENFIELD ROBERTS.

MUSIC NEW-VITALIZED, ORCHESTRAL PROWESS, DIVINING CONDUCTOR

TRANS—MAR 26

PERFORMANCE AT THE CENTENARY FESTIVAL

Back to Beethoven Before There Were Traditions and Interpretations — Mr. Koussevitzky's Clairvoyance Variously Exemplified—The Fourth as a Romantic Symphony in Spite of the Finale—The Fifth for Power, Yet for a Breathing-Space Lukewarm

MAKING WAY through the Centenary Festival, Mr. Koussevitzky is fortunate in his outlook upon Beethoven's Symphonies. He does not see them as they are—classics of music, standard pieces of the concert-hall, subject of innumerable treatises, weighted with a century of accumulated and often contradictory "tradition," oppressed by reams of "interpretation" and embellishment, heard with prepossessions that in many a hearer at middle age have hardened into prejudices. Rather, and justly, the conductor tries to see the Nine as they were—when they left Beethoven's hand; when the Viennese first heard them; when eastward, westward and northward, they were making stir as the work of a rising composer.

Consider, for example, the First. The commentators, as it is their pleasure to do, have pasted it thick with signboards, foretelling the matter and the manner of the succeeding eight. Between whiles, they have discovered inner meanings, even as one extracts sunshine from cucumbers. Now, if ever there was a quasi-Mozartean music, it is this Symphony of 1800 in C major. There is not a reasonable doubt that Viennese audiences, pardonably unsuspicious of Beethoven's future, heard it as such. It is safe, also, to say that the most attentive and imaginative listener found not an "inner meaning" upon one of the pages. For this First Symphony, unlike others to come, is written "from the outside"—a filling of forms, now and then slightly modified as in the Minuet, with as agreeable matter as the composer could invent, utilize and adorn. Precisely from this point of view, Mr. Koussevitzky plays the music. He reduces his orchestra, as on Wednesday, to eighteenth-century dimensions; bids it to the utmost of fluidity, transparency and grace; is chary of "expression"; seeks and gains the pleasures of patterns in sound, upbuilt and unfolded. So doing, he restores the piece to its original voice, life and quality, while his hearers sit by in delight.

Similarly with the succeeding Symphonies in the progress of the Festival. The Second becomes, at his hands, an experimental, tentative, uncertain music. Here Beethoven is amplifying or polishing technical means; there he is testing whatever matter is fermenting in his head. Now he looks forward; again he turns backward. In the slow movement he is all for the long-drawn charm of instrumental song; in the Finale, he stamps about in the lusthood of youth. Once more, he is writing an external, form-filling music: yet there are discoverable measures in which he is thinking to himself. No wonder that the Viennese of 1803 found such a Symphony baffling and a bore; that, for some of us in 1927, it remains such: that even Mr. Koussevitzky, in his fidelity to the original speech and savor, could not dissipate this ennui.

[illegible] the third and Beethoven full-mettled, free-handed. He is master of his orchestra; knows technically and imaginatively the scope of his instruments; makes them the instant voice of idea, mood and will. No longer is he filling a form from "the best models"; he is bending and amplifying it to his own thought and purpose. Both now wear heroic proportions; for this Third Symphony is "The Eroica," without regard to any other personage than Ludwig van Beethoven in flesh and blood, teeming with high thoughts and deep, alight with the passion of them, aflame to set them free in music. The tossing impetuosity of the first movement, up-swelling, down-flinging, only to soar again; the darkling splendor, the poignant progress, of the Funeral March; the leaping force of the Scherzo, the fervor of the Trio, the exultant frenzy of the final variations—all are the proof. The ideas and the speech, the emotion and the projection, foreground, background and the moving form between, are one and indivisible. Mr. Koussevitzky seizes upon this miracle in Beethoven's progress; makes every detail contributory to it; enfolds it in a manifold incandescence. Upon our ears, a century and a quarter afterward, the measures stride and smite; live and burn. The process is less a re-creation than a restoration; for there must have been Viennese in that first audience of 1805 upon whom "The Eroica" so sounded even though they did not snatch for copy-paper to record their impressions.

So to the Fourth and the Fifth Symphonies of yesterday afternoon, when the Centenary Festival and the regular Symphony Concerts entered into a brief illicit union, and that self-complaisant audience of Fridays did its homage to Beethoven—in which function it differed not at all in aspect, speech or bearing from its usual courses. It pulled the orchestra to its feet at the end of both the Symphonies; then redoubled its plaudits, according to its habit times out of mind. For is not the orchestra its very own? At the close of the concert, it clapped brashly, even cheered here and there. Yet whether this manifestation was for the great Ludwig among the shades or for the very present Serge, his servant, the wisest might not surely say. At the least, there were few departures before the end of a short concert, which on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, is no small tribute—to whom it may concern.

The Fourth Symphony deserves more frequent performance. No doubt, it requires more rehearsal than the Fifth or the Seventh, pulled for the fiftieth time from the shelf marked "Standard Repertory"; while, if it fails to gratify the conductor's sense of sweep and power, it signally rewards his feeling for finesse and beauty. And if—dear man!—he must have his "effect," may not the veiled crescendo in the first movement suffice him, stripping away the harmonic mists as it mounts and intensifies? (Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished it to the full and without a touch of individual display. Of such are his loyalties to this centenary Beethoven). Moreover, in this Symphony in B-flat, for the first and the only time in the Nine, goes a Beethoven clearly sensuous. Against this side of self-expression he was usually resolute or disdainful, or else within him the impulse was cabin'd, cribbed, confined; wherefore devout men, like Monsieur d'Indy, and right reverend bishops praise him, seemingly unaware that thereby the scope of his music is materially diminished. Sensuous unmistakably is the slow movement—purely and happily sensuous, if the hearer likes—but in lyric loveliness of fragrant and transparent emanation from the stirred senses. Within this Adagio Beethoven writes his romantic poem in tones; chastens it as Schubert could seldom do; gives it a body to which Schumann is usually strange; never lets it clot into the sheer sentiment of that earlier Larghetto.

Akin, too, if the notion is not too far-fetched, seems the introduction to the whole Symphony—a dreamful, wayward music, speaking to itself, in its own beauty finding its being, as irid scent as may be in Beethoven's harmonic and instrumental color. Add the third movement, which is less a leaping and darting Scherzo than a sportive exercise in tonal fantasy. Remember the fitful moods and changing pattern of the first Allegro, and what has Beethoven written in this Opus Sixty but his "Romantic Symphony," sequence at wide remove to the forgoing Second, pendant to the heroical Third? If only the Finale were other than what it is! No doubt, it teems with "pure joy," "happy gayety" and all the other excuses of the commentators; but in audible musical fact, it is a cheerful, bustling finale of eighteenth-century symphonic practice, newly propelled by Beethoven's ampler energies. Finales to his Symphonies were the fate-sent pitfall. Where, except in "The Eroica," do they stand four-square beside the matter that has gone before? The Finale of the Seventh can sound like loud button-bursting and in the Finale of the Ninth is that gushful March.

As such romantic music Mr. Koussevitzky released the Fourth Symphony; yet kept it undiminished by his own failing which, with romantic pages, is occasional excess of sentiment. (Again that clairvoyance with Beethoven and loyalty to him that have shone, thus far, through the whole Festival.) He misted the Introduction; while in it the orchestra gave him back a well-nigh perfect phrasing and tonal quality. Under his light hand the first Allegro eddied and flowed, neither flagging nor sagging. The euphony and the transparency of the orchestra through the Adagio exhaled the loveliness of the melody; the harmonies and the instrumental coloring were glamour; the pace and the rhythm grace of motion and beat. In sum, a transfigured music. Everywhere the incidental solo-measures ran like arabesques, and if zestful vigors [illegible] mask that paltry Finale, then Mr. Koussevitzky would have turned the trick.

To the full, moreover, the conductor did that saving service to the Finale of the succeeding Fifth. Easily the reiterated fanfares may become blatant, as though the frenzied Beethoven would have horns, trumpets and trombones burst their cheeks. As easily, the striding, plunging, soaring progress may exceed into a mere welter of infuriated sound. Mr. Koussevitzky spared no energies, checked no ardors; but into the whole infused a triumphal and magnificent exultation. Beethoven saved from himself: but elsewhere in the Symphony—the Andante aside—Beethoven renewing himself; while the conductor spurred the vasty deed. For the superb attributes of the first movement and the Scherzo of the Fifth are concentration and suspense. Nowhere else in his symphonic music, and in equally brief space, has Beethoven so affirmed and intensified his floods and energies of power as in this first Allegro of a Titan (so Wagner phrased it) wrestling with the fates. Nowhere else, not even in the longer Allegro of the Ninth, has he directed the struggle with such recurring and deep-seated suspense. It is less the wild frenzy than the heroic grandeur of epical conflict—the eternal challenge by the sons of men ever answered. Through it conductor and orchestra (as the Viking inscription ran) "smote with their swords" of rhythm, tone, pace, phrase and climax.

Though no audience will half-believe it, the up-swingings and the down-fallings of this battle, the return upon return of the indomitable mood, are a hundredfold more suspensive and possessing than that crafty, if inspired, transition from shadowed Scherzo to sun-drenched Finale. (Craftily, too, did Mr. Koussevitzky shape, stay and speed it.) In it is suspense enough; but it falls far below the vast vicissitude of the beginning. The earlier beat of the Scherzo as of blows that would rive the oppression all around, well-nigh renews, in far shorter compass, the power of the Allegro. Yet, in spite of the compression of the Fifth, Beethoven still falls short of a symphony unflawed and undiminished. He declines to compress the slow movement he seems even to walk around it and survey it, contemplatively, admiringly Narcissus-like. No doubt it has "a profoundly sad simplicity"; is "rest after conflict"; is everything else that the glibbering "interpreters" say. It is also curiously redolent of that Victorian and clerical Beethoven who was exalted as sentimental "uplifter." Our twentieth century may agree to the adjective—with a grimace; but not to the noun. It has gone out of the fashion. In or out of this Andante con moto there is no "kick" left in it.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 261927

Other Music

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston Symphony gives Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies

Boston, March 26.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra continued its Beethoven Centenary festical by performing the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies at the twentieth concert in the Friday subscription series. Only the 400 "rush seats" in the second balcony were available to non-subscribers.

The appearance yesterday afternoon in the vicinity of the present reviewer's seats of an unwonted number of strange faces indicated that Beethoven is about as popular with the most fashionable and socially exclusive of Boston audiences as Wagner is said to be with the Monday night subscribers to the Metropolitan Opera. Tickets obviously had been copiously bestowed upon relatives and friends.

DURING the performance of the Fourth Symphony many in the audience, as a discreet rustling of the leaves indicated, were engaged in reading Philip Hale's learned and amusing program notes, and the various advertisements of fashionable commodities interspersed among them.

The apathy of the audience apparently reacted on players and conductor, resulting in a performance distinctly below the customary high standards of the Boston Symphony.

Even Beethoven's most fervent admirers must, if they are honest, confess that this B Flat Major Symphony is less enthralling than the other eight symphonies.

Its relative lack of melodic inspiration, rather than its harking back to the earlier maner of the Second Symphony, is the real reason why neither in Beethoven's day nor in our own has the Fourth Symphony been a popular success.

THE Fifth Symphony, written, curiously enough, at the same period of Beethoven's life, has, of course, proved his most universally beloved work, and the most popular of all symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded by dint of heroic efforts which took the form of unusual imperious gestures and verbal exhortations to the players, in extorting from an orchestra weary from a week of constant rehearsal and two arduous concerts, a performance of the C Minor Symphony intensely dramatic and compelling. But he mopped his brow at frequent intervals during the music.

His reading of the C Minor Symphony is highly personal. Beethoven's metronome mark, and the indication "Andante con moto" do not deter Koussevitzky from making of the slow movement a soulful adagio. He seeks to increase the thrill of the famous transition passage from scherzo to finale by prolonging its duration. The unusual retard at this point defeats its own end, however. With the finale he is, on the other hand, more successful than any other conductor to be heard hereabouts. He exaggerates forte into triple fortissimo, and piano into quadruple pianissimo, as he often does. It may be added that his interpretation of this symphony has not varied in any notable particular at any of the half

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 261927

TWO BEETHOVEN WORKS ON RADIO

Pastorale and Seventh Symphonies Offered by Boston Organization—Legion Orchestra Now Regular Feature on WBZ

For the close of Beethoven week the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast this evening over WBZ the "Pastorale" and the seventh symphony of the great composer. The concert starts at 8.10.

Just prior to the concert, Prof John Patten Marshall will discuss the "Pastorale" and with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will illustrate the themes of each movement This symphony, which was described on the program of the first performance in Vienna in 1808, as "a symphony entitled 'Recollections of Life in the Country,'" has four movements. The first movement expresses "joyful sensations on arriving in the country," the second "scene by the brook," the third "a happy gathering of the peasants," and the fourth "a thunderstorm and hymn of thanksgiving after the storm." The third movement includes Beethoven's humorous picture of the village band, with the bass player who presumably could play only three notes on the instrument.

During the intermission Prof Marshall will take a part of the time for some remarks on Ludwig van Beethoven and his music, and will then discuss and illustrate the various movements of the Seventh symphony, which follows the intermission.

The complete program of tonight's symphony program follows:—

Symphony No 6 in F major, opus 68.
"Pastorale" ..... Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro ma non troppo.
Scene by the brookside; Andante molto moto.
Jolly gathering of country folk; Allegro, in tempo d'allegro; thunderstorm, tempest; allegro.
"Shepherd's Song," gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm; Allegretto.
Symphony No 7, in A major, opus 92, Beethoven
Poco sostenuto, vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto, assai meno presto, tempo prime.
Allegro con brio.

Legion Orchestra Now Regular

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
CHICAGO, ILL.
MAR 261927

TWO OF BEETHOVEN'S BEST SYMPHONIES ON PROGRAM

Two of Beethoven's best-known symphonies, the famous sixth symphony, popularly known as the "Pastorale Symphony," and the seventh symphony, will be heard from stations WBZ, Springfield; WBZA, Boston and KDKA, east Pittsburgh, tonight.

The music will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Kousevitzky. Just prior to the concert Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the "Pastorale" and with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will illustrate the themes of each movement.

SYMPHONY IN 20TH CONCERT

Fourth in Series of the Centenary Festival of Beethoven

FOURTH AND FIFTH SYMPHONIES GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. (The concert was the fourth in the series of the Beethoven Centenary Festival.) The program comprised the fourth and fifth symphonies.

Little can be said of the symphonies themselves that has not been said and well said from the time that Berlioz wrote his eloquent words of wonder and praise. The old theory that the fourth was inspired by Beethoven's love for Therese Brunsvik; that he was betrothed to her, which made happiness the keynote to the music; has been disproved, if it ever was accepted by students of Beethoven's life. As a matter of fact nothing is known about the "origin" of the music. A German commentator has recently spoken of "indecisiveness of mood" as "part of the imaginative scheme of the whole work"; he even sees in the Adagio "the stimulus of some tense emotion such as inspired the love-letter, whether aroused by the "Immortal," or some other, Beloved. Is it not enough to hear the serene, nobly emotional Adagio without vain speculation as to why Beethoven was so deeply moved? Nor is it necessary to see Berlioz's archangel Michael, who by the way, was the warlike leader of the angelic hosts, sighing and overcome by melancholy, as "he contemplated the worlds from the threshold of the empyrean." One might ask why should Michael grow melancholy at the glorious sight? Nor can Beethoven's Adagio be justly characterized as melancholy.

Concerning the interpretation of the two symphonies by Mr. Koussevitzky and concerning the orchestral performance, there can be nothing but words of praise. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky has introduced to us a Beethoven with a strange face, strange gestures, strange speech. He has not dressed him in clothes of his own invention, but has shown us the man as he lived and wrote; without standing in front of him. He has allowed Beethoven to have his say, without conjectures as to how he composed, or how he should have composed. He has interpreted these symphonies with such insight into Beethoven's inherently romantic nature, with such musical understanding, poetry, force, authority that it is not extravagant to say that there has been this week a revelation of Beethoven to the heathen that have sat in darkness. No wonder that the great audience was deeply moved; that its emotion at the end of the concert found vent in enthusiastic tokens of approbation.

As for the fifth symphony itself, what words can be said of its composer more fitting than those of De Quincey's apostrophe to Shakespeare: "O mighty poet! Thy works are not as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature, like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like frost and snow, rain and dew, hail-storm and thunder, which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith that in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert, but that, the farther we press in our discoveries, the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had nothing but accident!

The program tonight will comprise the sixth and seventh symphonies.

The program announced for the concerts of next week is as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Lalo, Concerto, D minor, for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti), Prokofieff, Classical Symphony. Honegger, "Pacific 231," orchestral movement.

SYMPHONY IN BEETHOVEN PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

The regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Symphony concerts of this week were joined with the Beethoven Centenary Festival now nearing completion at Symphony Hall. For that reason two separate programs were arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At yesterday's concert the fourth and fifth symphonies were played; tonight the orchestra will render the sixth and seventh.

Koussevitzky

One rarely hears the fourth symphony nowadays, and it is a pity, judging from the sound of it at yesterday's performance. The first movement has genuine inspiration, though it is not the Beethoven of the "Eroica." The second move-

MORE BEETHOVEN AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourth, Fifth Symphonies Fill Program

The concerts in the Boston Symphony's regular subscription series become this week part of the orchestra's Beethoven Centenary Festival. Yesterday afternoon the Friday subscribers heard the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies.

Tonight, against all precedents, the program will be different, comprising the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies. Thus the Saturday subscribers are denied the Fifth and the Friday subscribers miss the Seventh Symphony, a circumstance at which some are aggrieved. Subscribers to the Beethoven series miss all four unless, as in most cases is probably true, they are subscribers also to one of the regular series.

The Fourth and Fifth Symphonies occupied Beethoven at the same time. It appears, in fact, that he left off work on the Fifth to compose the Fourth, and later completed the C minor. The two works are so utterly different in style that this seems almost incredible. One of them has proved the most popular of all symphonies. The other, except for Beethoven's reputation, would probably never be performed now.

Full Orchestra

The B flat major Symphony is akin rather to the Second than to the rest of the nine. It lacks the dramatic intensity of the "Eroica" and the Fifth. Beethoven here writes lyrically. Only the breadth and sweep of the design, and what for the time was an occasional bit of daring harmony or rhythmic clash differentiate this Fourth Symphony from Beethoven's earlier work.

It was played yesterday by the full orchestra, though one felt that the number of players might well in this instance have been reduced as Mr Koussevitzky wisely did in the First and Second Symphonies Wednesday. Beethoven was here writing with the usual orchestra of his younger days in mind, which was hardly more than half as numerous as the Boston Symphony.

Mr Koussevitzky and the players were not quite at their best in the Fourth Symphony. This has been an arduous week for them, and no doubt the rehearsals have been devoted chiefly to other and far more exacting works. The balance of tone was not preserved between strings and the rest of the orchestra. The strings at times were not quite together, producing a tone blurred and roughened. Chords were attacked without the necessary absolute certainty.

The Fifth Symphony, thanks to great exertions on the conductor's part, went with the necessary energy and rhythmic urge. The players seemed diposed to reel off the thrice familiar music perfunctorily, but Mr Koussevitzky with obvious effort imposed his conception of the music no them.

Very Slow Pace

His reading of this masterpiece has already been more than once discussed in Globe reviews. It is unlike those of other conductors, particularly in the very slow pace of the slow movement, which Beethoven marked "andante con moto," and in the lengthening of the celebrated transition from scherzo to finale.

Mr Koussevitzky takes his own way with the masterpieces, regardless of tradition, heedless of the most explicit directions of the greatest of composers. In so doing he unquestionably succeeds in vitalizing the music. Very seldom are his readings dull or perfunctory. But one has heard great masterpieces vitalized, born anew for the 20th-century hearer in performances where every direction of the composer was sedulously followed.

The program for the next pair of subscription concerts, as now announced, includes Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," and Bach's "Fourth Brandenburg Concerto," both previously played this season, as well as Lalo's cello concerto for Mr Bedetti, and Honegger's "Pasific 231." P. R.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, did not seem to warrant the extravagant praise lavished upon it by Berlioz.

The scherzo, with its suggestions of "Egmont," and the finale, taken at a breathless clip by Mr. Koussevitsky, were charming. The performance of the whole work was as nearly perfect as we can imagine it. The conductor understood thoroughly what he wanted, and he wanted the right things! Moreover, his orchestra played with marvelous precision and ease. That was why the last movement, though played apparently faster than the indicated tempo, sounded so beautiful.

With the fifth symphony, Mr. Koussevitsky took his now familiar course. His is an "unorthodox" interpretation, off the beaten path of tradition.

Boston's Beet

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in the midst of its Beethoven Centenary Festival which opened Tuesday evening with the Mass in D. The last previous Boston performance of this Mass was 27 years ago, on the opening of Symphony Hall, with Mr. Gerlick leading. Wednesday evening the firs

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 261927

Two Beethoven Symphonies for Radio Broadcast

Boston Symphony Honors Memory of Famous Composer in Broadcast Through Three Stations.

This evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky is to be broadcast through three stations of the Westinghouse company, WBZ in Springfield, WBZA in Boston, and KDKA in East Pittsburg, through the courtesy of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston. Two of Beethoven's best-known symphonies are to be performed, the famous Sixth Symphony familiarly known as the "Pastorale Symphony," and the Seventh Symphony.

Just prior to the concert, Prof. John Patton Marshall will discuss the "Pastorale," and with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will illustrate the themes of each movement. This symphony, which was described on the program of the first preference in Vienna in 1808 as "a symphony entitled 'Recollections of Life in the Country,'" has four movements. The first movement expresses "joyful sensations on arriving in the country," the second, "scene by the brook," the third, "a happy gathering of the peasants," and the fourth "a thunderstorm and hymn of thanksgiving after the storm." The third movement includes Beethoven's humorous picture of the village band, with the bass player who presumably could play only three notes on the instrument.

During the intermission Prof. Marshall will take a part of the time for some remarks on Ludwig van Beethoven and his music, and will then discuss and illustrate the various movements of the Seventh Symphony, which follows the intermission.

The complete program of tonight's symphony program follows:

Symphony No. 6, in F major, Op. 68, "Pastorale." Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro ma non troppo
Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
Jolly Gathering of country folk: Allegro! in tempo d'allegro; Thunderstorm; tempest; allegro.
Shepherd's Song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.
Intermission.
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92, Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto: assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.

three symphonies were performed, and on Thursday evening the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel presented the Piano Trio op. 97, the Quartet op. 59, No. 2, and the Sonata op. 110. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky's led the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, and tonight, instead of the usual repetition of the Friday program, the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies will be played.

The "Missa Solemnis" will be repeated tomorrow for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Monday evening there will be commemorative exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, the London critic, and the reading of an Ode to Beethoven by S. Foster Damon of Cambridge, Mass. The Lenox String Quartet will play the last Quartet, and Mr. Koussevitzky will make some concluding remarks. The final program, on Tuesday evening, will consist of the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies.

The performance of the Mass in D had of course been looked forward to as the outstanding event of the festival. The great difficulties which had prevented its performance in Boston for so many years had been taken fully into account. The Harvard Glee Club, under Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, had been rehearsing their parts for the last year. Their 300 massed voices, added to the full strength of the orchestra, produced an impressive body of sound. The soloists were Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton. Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant reading was dramatic rather than devotional. The performance was extraordinarily finished. Where such a choral task is to be done, by all means let it be entrusted to such eager young singers as these; but be sure that such leaders as Messrs. Davison and Woodworth train them. They will assist also in the Ninth Symphony.

oven Festival

The performers in the chamber music concert acquitted themselves with the distinction to be expected of them, but the highest moments of the festival thus far have been in the orchestral concerts. It is worthy of record that the applause that has followed each symphony has been so warm that the conductor has shared

To the full, moreover, the conductor did that saving service to the Finale of the succeeding Fifth. Easily the reiterated fanfares may become blatant, as though the frenzied Beethoven would have horns, trumpets and trombones burst their cheeks. As easily, the striding, plunging, soaring progress may exceed into a mere welter of infuriated sound. Mr. Koussevitzky spared no energies, checked no ardors; but into the whole infused a triumphal and magnificent exultation. Beethoven saved from himself; but elsewhere in the Symphony—the Andante aside—Beethoven renewing himself; while the conductor spurred the vasty deed. For the superb attributes of the first movement and the Scherzo of the Fifth are concentration and suspense. Nowhere else in his symphonic music, and in equally brief space, has Beethoven so affirmed and intensified his floods and energies of power as in this first Allegro of a Titan (so Wagner phrased it) wrestling with the fates. Nowhere else, not even in the longer Allegro of the Ninth, has he directed the struggle with such recurring and deep-seated suspense. It is less the wild frenzy than the heroic grandeur of epical conflict—the eternal challenge by the sons of men ever answered. Through it conductor and orchestra (as the Viking inscription ran) "smote with their swords" of rhythm, tone, pace, phrase and climax.

Though no audience will half-believe it, the up-swingings and the down-fallings of this battle, the return upon return of the indomitable mood, are a hundredfold more suspensive and possessing than that crafty, if inspired, transition from shadowed Scherzo to sun-drenched Finale. (Craftily, too, did Mr. Koussevitzky shape, stay and speed it.) In it is suspense enough; but it falls far below the vast vicissitude of the beginning. The earlier beat of the Scherzo as of blows that would rive the oppression all around, well-nigh renews, in far shorter compass, the power of the Allegro. Yet, in spite of the compression of the Fifth, Beethoven still falls short of a symphony unflawed and undiminished. He declines to compress the slow movement as he seems even to walk around it and survey it, contemplatively, admiringly Narcissus-like. No doubt it has "a profoundly sad simplicity"; is "rest after conflict"; is everything else that the gibbering "interpreters" say. It is also curiously redolent of that Victorian and clerical Beethoven who was exalted as sentimental "uplifter." Our twentieth century may agree to the adjective—with a grimace; but not to the noun. It has gone out of the fashion. In or out of this Andante con moto there is no "kick" left in it.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

MAR 261927

Other Music

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston Symphony gives Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies

Boston, March 26.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra continued its Beethoven Centenary festical by performing the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies at the twentieth concert in the Friday subscription series. Only the 400 "rush seats" in the second balcony were available to non-subscribers.

The appearance yesterday afternoon in the vicinity of the present reviewer's seats of an unwonted number of strange faces indicated that Beethoven is about as popular with the most fashionable and socially exclusive of Boston audiences as Wagner is said to be with the Monday night subscribers to the Metropolitan Opera. Tickets obviously had been copiously bestowed upon relatives and friends.

DURING the performance of the Fourth Symphony many in the audience, as a discreet rustling of the leaves indicated, were engaged in reading Philip Hale's learned and amusing program notes, and the various advertisements of fashionable commodities interspersed among them.

The apathy of the audience apparently reacted on players and conductor, resulting in a performance distinctly below the customary high standards of the Boston Symphony.

Even Beethoven's most fervent admirers must, if they are honest, confess that this B Flat Major Symphony is less enthralling than the other eight symphonies.

Its relative lack of melodic inspiration, rather than its harking back to the earlier maner of the Second Symphony, is the real reason why neither in Beethoven's day nor in our own has the Fourth Symphony been a popular success.

THE Fifth Symphony, written, curiously enough, at the same period of Beethoven's life, has, of course, proved his most universally beloved work, and the most popular of all symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded by dint of heroic efforts which took the form of unusual imperious gestures and verbal exhortations to the players, in extorting from an orchestra weary from a week of constant rehearsal and two arduous concerts, a performance of the C Minor symphony intensely dramatic and compelling. But he mopped his brow at frequent intervals during the music.

His reading of the C Minor Symphony is highly personal. Beethoven's metronome mark, and the indication "Andante con moto" do not deter Koussevitzky from making of the slow movement a soulful adagio. He seeks to increase the thrill of the famous transition passage from scherzo to finale by prolonging its duration. The unusual retard at this point defeats its own end, however. With the finale he is, on the other hand, more successful than any other conductor to be heard hereabouts. He exaggerates forte into triple fortissimo, and piano into quadruple pianissimo, as he often does. It may be added that his interpretation of this symphony has not varied in any notable particular at any of the half

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 261927

TWO BEETHOVEN WORKS ON RADIO

Pastorale and Seventh Symphonies Offered by Boston Organization—Legion Orchestra Now Regular Feature on WBZ

For the close of Beethoven week the Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast this evening over WBZ the "Pastorale" and the seventh symphony of the great composer. The concert starts at 8.10.

Just prior to the concert, Prof John Patten Marshall will discuss the "Pastorale" and with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will illustrate the themes of each movement. This symphony, which was described on the program of the first performance in Vienna in 1808, as "a symphony entitled 'Recollections of Life in the Country,'" has four movements. The first movement expresses "joyful sensations on arriving in the country," the second "scene by the brook," the third "a happy gathering of the peasants," and the fourth "a thunderstorm and hymn of thanksgiving after the storm." The third movement includes Beethoven's humorous picture of the village band, with the bass player who presumably could play only three notes on the instrument.

During the intermission Prof Marshall will take a part of the time for some remarks on Ludwig van Beethoven and his music, and will then discuss and illustrate the various movements of the Seventh symphony, which follows the intermission.

The complete program of tonight's symphony program follows:—

Symphony No 6 in F major, opus 68.
"Pastorale" ..... Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro ma non troppo.
Scene by the brookside; Andante molto moto.
Jolly gathering of country folk; Allegro, in tempo d'allegro; thunderstorm, tempest; allegro.
"Shepherd's Song," gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm; Allegretto.
Symphony No 7, in A major, opus 92. Beethoven
Poco sostenuto, vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto, assai meno presto, tempo prime.
Allegro con brio.

Legion Orchestra Now Regular

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
CHICAGO, ILL.

MAR 261927

TWO OF BEETHOVEN'S BEST SYMPHONIES ON PROGRAM

Two of Beethoven's best-known symphonies, the famous sixth symphony, popularly known as the "Pastorale Symphony," and the seventh symphony, will be heard from stations WBZ, Springfield; WBZA, Boston and KDKA, east Pittsburgh, tonight.

The music will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Kousevitzky. Just prior to the concert Prof. John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the "Pastorale" and with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will illustrate the themes of each movement.

SYMPHONY IN 20TH CONCERT

Fourth in Series of the Centenary Festival of Beethoven

HER MAR 26

FOURTH AND FIFTH SYMPHONIES GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. (The concert was the fourth in the series of the Beethoven Centenary Festival.) The program comprised the fourth and fifth symphonies.

Little can be said of the symphonies themselves that has not been said and well said from the time that Berlioz wrote his eloquent words of wonder and praise. The old theory that the fourth was inspired by Beethoven's love for Therese Brunsvik; that he was betrothed to her, which made happiness the keynote to the music; has been disproved, if it ever was accepted by students of Beethoven's life. As a matter of fact, nothing is known about the "origin" of the music. A German commentator has recently spoken of "independence of mood" as "part of the imaginative scheme of the whole work"; he even sees in the Adagio "the stimulus of some tense emotion such as inspired the love-letter, whether aroused by the "Immortal," or some other, beloved. Is it not enough to hear the serene, nobly emotional Adagio without vain speculation as to why Beethoven was so deeply moved? Nor is it necessary to see Berlioz's archangel Michael, who by the way, was the warlike leader of the angelic hosts, sighing and overcome by melancholy, as "the contemplated the worlds from the threshold of the empyream." One might ask, why should Michael grow melancholy at the glorious sight? Nor can Beethoven's Adagio be justly characterized as melancholy.

Concerning the interpretation of the two symphonies by Mr. Koussevitzky and concerning the orchestral performance, there can be nothing but words of praise. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky has introduced to us a Beethoven with a strange face, strange gestures, strange speech. He has not dressed him in clothes of his own invention, but has shown us the man as he lived and wrote; without standing in front of him. He has allowed Beethoven to have his say, without conjectures as to how he composed, or how he should have composed. He has interpreted these symphonies with such insight into Beethoven's inherently romantic nature, with such musical understanding, poetry, force, authority that it is not extravagant to say that there has been this week a revelation of Beethoven to the heathen that have sat in darkness. No wonder that the great audience was deeply moved; that its emotion at the end of the concert found vent in enthusiastic tokens of approbation.

As for the fifth symphony itself, what words can be said of its composer more fitting than those of De Quincey's apostrophe to Shakespeare: "O mighty poet! Thy works are not as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature, like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like frost and snow, rain and dew, hail-storm and thunder, which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith than in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert, but that, the farther we press in our discoveries, the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had nothing but accident!

The program tonight will comprise the sixth and seventh symphonies.

The program announced for the concerts of next week is as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Lalo, Concerto, D minor, for violoncello (Mr. Bedetti), Prokofieff, Classical Symphony. Honegger, "Pacific 231," orchestral movement.

SYMPHONY IN BEETHOVEN PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

The regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Symphony concerts of this week were joined with the Beethoven Centenary Festival now nearing completion at Symphony Hall. For that reason two separate programs were arranged by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At yesterday's concert the fourth and fifth symphonies were played; tonight the orchestra will render the sixth and seventh.

Koussevitzky

One rarely hears the fourth symphony nowadays, and it is a pity, judging from the sound of it at yesterday's performance. The first movement has genuine inspiration, though it is not the Beethoven of the "Eroica." The second move-

MORE BEETHOVEN AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourth, Fifth Symphonies Fill Program

Globe Mar 26

The concerts in the Boston Symphony's regular subscription series become this week part of the orchestra's Beethoven Centenary Festival. Yesterday afternoon the Friday subscribers heard the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies.

Tonight, against all precedents, the program will be different, comprising the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies. Thus the Saturday subscribers are denied the Fifth and the Friday subscribers miss the Seventh Symphony, a circumstance at which some are aggrieved. Subscribers to the Beethoven series miss all four unless, as in most cases is probably true, they are subscribers also to one of the regular series.

The Fourth and Fifth Symphonies occupied Beethoven at the same time. It appears, in fact, that he left off work on the Fifth to compose the Fourth, and later completed the C minor. The two works are so utterly different in style that this seems almost incredible. One of them has proved the most popular of all symphonies. The other, except for Beethoven's reputation, would probably never be performed now.

Full Orchestra

The B flat major Symphony is akin rather to the Second than to the rest of the nine. It lacks the dramatic intensity of the "Eroica" and the Fifth. Beethoven here writes lyrically. Only the breadth and sweep of the design, and what for the time was an occasional bit of daring harmony or rhythmic clash differentiate this Fourth Symphony from Beethoven's earlier work.

It was played yesterday by the full orchestra, though one felt that the number of players might well in this instance have been reduced as Mr Koussevitzky wisely did in the First and Second Symphonies Wednesday. Beethoven was here writing with the usual orchestra of his younger days in mind, which was hardly more than half as numerous as the Boston Symphony.

Mr Koussevitzky and the players were not quite at their best in the Fourth Symphony. This has been an arduous week for them, and no doubt the rehearsals have been devoted chiefly to other and far more exacting works. The balance of tone was not preserved between strings and the rest of the orchestra. The strings at times were not quite together, producing a tone blurred and roughened. Chords were attacked without the necessary absolute certainty.

The Fifth Symphony, thanks to great exertions on the conductor's part, went with the necessary energy and rhythmic urge. The players seemed diposed to reel off the thrice familiar music perfunctorily, but Mr Koussevitzky with obvious effort imposed his conception of the music no them.

Very Slow Pace

His reading of this masterpiece has already been more than once discussed in Globe reviews. It is unlike those of other conductors, particularly in the very slow pace of the slow movement, which Beethoven marked "andante con moto," and in the lengthening of the celebrated transition from scherzo to finale.

Mr Koussevitzky takes his own way with the masterpieces, regardless of tradition, heedless of the most explicit directions of the greatest of composers. In so doing he unquestionably succeeds in vitalizing the music. Very seldom are his readings dull or perfunctory. But one has heard great masterpieces vitalized, born anew for the 20th-century hearer in performances where every direction of the composer was sedulously followed.

The program for the next pair of subscription concerts, as now announced, includes Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," and Bach's "Fourth Brandenburg Concerto," both previously played this season, as well as Lalo's cello concerto for Mr Bedetti, and Honegger's "Pasific 231." P. R.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, did not seem to warrant the extravagant praise lavished upon it by Berlioz.

The scherzo, with its suggestions of "Egmont," and the finale, taken at a breathless clip by Mr. Koussevitsky, were charming. The performance of the whole work was as nearly perfect as we can imagine it. The conductor understood thoroughly what he wanted, and he wanted the right things! Moreover, his orchestra played with marvelous precision and ease. That was why the last movement, though played apparently faster than the indicated tempo, sounded so beautiful.

With the fifth symphony, Mr. Koussevitsky took his now familiar course. His is an "unorthodox" interpretation, off the beaten path of tradition.

Boston's Beet

Monitor Sat

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in the midst of its Beethoven Centenary Festival which opened Tuesday evening with the Mass in D. The last previous Boston performance of this Mass was 27 years ago, on the opening of Symphony Hall, with Mr. Gerlick leading. Wednesday evening the first

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MAR 261927

Two Beethoven Symphonies for Radio Broadcast

Boston Symphony Honors Memory of Famous Composer in Broadcast Through Three Stations.

This evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky is to be broadcast through three stations of the Westinghouse company, WBZ in Springfield, WBZA in Boston, and KDKA in East Pittsburg, through the courtesy of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston. Two of Beethoven's best-known symphonies are to be performed, the famous Sixth Symphony familiarly known as the "Pastorale Symphony," and the Seventh Symphony.

Just prior to the concert, Prof. John Patton Marshall will discuss the "Pastorale," and with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will illustrate the themes of each movement. This symphony, which was described on the program of the first preference in Vienna in 1808 as "a symphony entitled 'Recollections of Life in the Country,'" has four movements. The first movement expresses "joyful sensations on arriving in the country," the second, "scene by the brook," the third, "a happy gathering of the peasants," and the fourth "a thunderstorm and hymn of thanksgiving after the storm." The third movement includes Beethoven's humorous picture of the village band, with the bass player who presumably could play only three notes on the instrument.

During the intermission Prof. Marshall will take a part of the time for some remarks on Ludwig van Beethoven and his music, and will then discuss and illustrate the various movements of the Seventh Symphony, which follows the intermission.

The complete program of tonight's symphony program follows:

Symphony No. 6, in F major, Op. 68, "Pastorale." Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro ma non troppo
Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
Jolly Gathering of country folk: Allegro! in tempo d'allegro; Thunderstorm; tempest; allegro.
Shepherd's Song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.
Intermission.
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 93. Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.

three symphonies were performed, and on Thursday evening the London String Quartet and Harold Samuel presented the Piano Trio op. 97, the Quartet op. 59, No. 2, and the Sonata op. 110. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky's led the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, and tonight, instead of the usual repetition of the Friday program, the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies will be played.

The "Missa Solemnis" will be repeated tomorrow for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Monday evening there will be commemorative exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, the London critic, and the reading of an Ode to Beethoven by S. Foster Damon of Cambridge, Mass. The Lenox String Quartet will play the last Quartet, and Mr. Koussevitzky will make some concluding remarks. The final program, on Tuesday evening, will consist of the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies.

The performance of the Mass in D had of course been looked forward to as the outstanding event of the festival. The great difficulties which had prevented its performance in Boston for so many years had been taken fully into account. The Harvard Glee Club, under Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, had been rehearsing their parts for the last year. Their 300 massed voices, added to the full strength of the orchestra, produced an impressive body of sound. The soloists were Olive Marshall, Jeanne Gordon, Tudor Davies and Arthur Middleton. Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant reading was dramatic rather than devotional. The performance was extraordinarily finished. Where such a choral task is to be done, by all means let it be entrusted to such eager young singers as these; but be sure that such leaders as Messrs. Davison and Woodworth train them. They will assist also in the Ninth Symphony.

oven Festival

Mar 26

The performers in the chamber music concert acquitted themselves with the distinction to be expected of them, but the highest moments of the festival thus far have been in the orchestral concerts. It is worthy of record that the applause that has followed each symphony has been so warm that the conductor has shared

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ENSION FUND CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

ADV MAR 28

By MOSES SM

Beethoven's Mass in D, which opened the remarkable Beethoven festival at Symphony Hall last Tuesday evening and which previously had gone unheard in Boston for twenty-seven years, was repeated before another capacity audience yesterday afternoon. The performance was for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The size of the house and its great enthusiasm were further tribute to the genius of the tone-artist who died one hundred years ago.

The second rendition of the Mass proved, above all, the necessity of having the great choral masterpieces given more often A classic is no a classic for the listener until he is familiar with it. Almost every concert-goer recalls the experience of his first hearing an acknowledged masterpiece and his likely disappointment with it.

The fault in that case is not necessarily the listener's. Let him hear the work again and again, and almost invariably he comes to love it. The present writer is no exception. He was greatly surprised on Tuesday night when he heard the Mass for the first time. The work did not seem to warrant its being rated one of the greatest of all musical treasures.

The repetition on yesterday afternoon forced a revision of this impression. Beauties that escaped the ear at first, became obvious. The grandeur of many sections of the score produced a feeling of exaltation. Not yet apparent was the unity of the work. Perhaps that will come with further hearing, which, let us hope, will not be 27 years from now.

Hub Music Hero

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who has borne the brunt of the Beethoven festival concerts, which will close at Symphony Hall on Tuesday night with a performance of the famous choral symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 27 1927

April 6, Last Concert of Boston Symphony

THE second and last appearance for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on April 6. Director Serge Koussevitzky, it is understood, has had sent to him all of the programs of the season's orchestral events, and while the program for the forthcoming concert has not been announced it is safe to say that there will be no repetition of numbers heard here recently.

Several events this year were almost duplicates of concerts by other orchestras, and Mr. Koussevitzky is determined that this will not be the case with him for the closing concert.

The only other appearance of the Boston Orchestra this season produced the most favorable comment and made evident that this splendid organization has gotten back to the standard that characterized it in pre-war days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
MAR 27 1927

American Writes Flivver Symphony

THE ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prologue is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr. Converse passes to the hero. It is born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

TWO BEETHOVEN WORKS GIVEN

HER MAR 27

Sixth and Seventh Symphonies Are Conducted by Koussevitzky

On March 26, 1827, about 5 o'clock of the afternoon there was a heavy thunder clap in Vienna and a flash of lightning illuminated the death chamber of Beethoven. He opened his eyes, clenched his fist, then letting his hand fall to the bed, as Huettenbranner, who was then by his side, tells the story, "the genius of the great master of tones fled from this world of delusion into the realm of truth."

And on March 26, 1927, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, performed at its 20th evening concert the sixth and seventh symphonies. This concert was the fifth in the series of the Beethoven centenary festival; the "Pastoral," one of Beethoven's most popular works, the seventh, which, characterized by Wagner as the "Apotheosis of the Dance," might be more fitly called the apotheosis of rhythm. Of the two symphonies the seventh is indisputably the greater work in structure and in eloquence, yet it was well on this anniversary day that the two should have been heard, the one after the other, for they are in strong contrast.

The "Pastoral" often suffers from perfunctory treatment at the hands of a conductor, who is over sentimental, so that the first movement, "cheerful impression awakened by arrival in the country," taken at too slow a pace, provokes anything but cheerful impression in the mind of the hearer. As for the second movement, "Scene by the brook," it reminds one of the brook sung by Tennyson. And there are some who object to the ornithological measures, while others eagerly anticipate the imitations of the feathered fowls.

As for the seventh, here one finds Beethoven intoxicated with Dionysiac joy, in the finale shouting madly and throwing his hat in air.

The performance was masterly; enthusiasm was at its height.

This afternoon the recent perform-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1927

The final concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 8. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. The program has not yet been announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
MAR 27 1927

Final Concert of the Boston Orchestra Her

The final concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy, conductor is announced for the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 8. The program has not as yet been published.

MUSIC
MONITOR MAR 29

Exercises Held in Memory of Beethoven

Commemorative exercises were held in Symphony Hall last night as the sixth event in the Beethoven Centenary Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, presided. Ernest Newman, the distinguished London critic, gave an address. S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, read his Ode to Beethoven. The Lenox String Quartet played the last Quartet, op. 135. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, spoke briefly in conclusion.

The proceedings were in every particular worthy of the occasion. The platform was decorated with the admirable simplicity of taste which is characteristic of Symphony Hall. A bust of Beethoven surmounted the door in the rear of the stage. Garlands and tapestries hung on the walls. The principal participants sat at a long table draped with a red cloth. They included Judge Cabot; Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, whose husband founded and was for many years the sustainer of the orchestra; Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky; Mr. Newman, Mr. Damon, and Dr. Archibald T. Davison, director of the Harvard Glee Club. At the sides were grouped members of the board of trustees and distinguished Boston musicians. The members of the orchestra sat in the rear.

After a brass quartet had played one of Beethoven's "Equali," with the audience standing, Judge Cabot paid a tribute to those who had made the festival a success, and in particular to the memory of Major Higginson. He then introduced Mr. Newman.

Mr. Newman, in a scholarly address which carefully avoided fulsomeness, presented a well-argued estimate of Beethoven's genius. Apart from the composer's historical importance, Mr. Newman considered that he was significant for his attempt to express ethical and humanitarian concepts through his music. In his middle period he achieved perfect balance between his thought and his art. In his final period, his thought had grown beyond his art, and he posed problems which have not yet been answered. Mr. Newman believed that if Beethoven had survived another 10 years he might have carried music to lengths now not imagined. As it is, he said, no composer has yet been able to build higher on the structure which Beethoven left. The composer is still growing as succeeding generations study his works, the speaker said; and he believed that after another century Beethoven still would present baffling problems to criticism.

Mr. Koussevitzky was tumultuously greeted, with everybody standing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 29 1927

A TRIBUTE TO BEETHOVEN.

Ernest Newman Finds Him Greatest In His Ethics.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 28.—Ernest Newman, English critic, gave an appealing interpretation of Beethoven in Symphony Hall tonight, in an address which marked the climax of the centenary festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Newman gave due attention to Beethoven as the interpreter of a great transition in civilization, but he insisted that his genius would live because he wrote into his music the elements of ethics, of humanitarianism, of philosophy, and above all the high moral impulses.

"It has to be admitted," said the speaker, "that in his weaker moments Beethoven did not always find a music as great as his moral impulses. But when he did find it, the effect was incomparably beyond that of any music ever written."

On this failure to find at all times the proper forms for the turmoil in his mind, Mr. Newman continued, is based the present reaction against Beethoven. The real friends of Beethoven, Mr. Newman said, have never ignored this criticism, nor will they ignore it in meeting the present sizable reaction, but he predicted that appreciation of Beethoven would keep pace with man's appreciation of musical values, and that in the year 2027, on the two hundredth anniversary of his death, he would still be the "most intriguing, the most baffling problem in all musical criticism."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y
MAR 29 1927

Other Music

Ernest Newman Addresses Beethoven Celebration in Boston

Boston, March 29.

THE Beethoven centenary festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was continued last evening in Symphony Hall by commemorative exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, an ode by S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, a performance of the last work Beethoven lived to complete, the string quartet in F major, Opus 135, played by the Lenox Quartet, and concluding remarks by Serge Koussevitzky, who had not hitherto ventured to speak in public in Boston.

The stage of the hall, especially decorated for the occasion with greenery and a bust of Beethoven, was filled by what the program described as "an assembly of guests, trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The principal guests, including the speakers of the evening, were seated at a long table in the middle of the stage. The trustees and the other guests were in two groups at either side. The members of the orchestra were clustered across the rear. Judge Frederick P. V. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, presided.

Mr. Newman, who had come from London especially to deliver last night's address, spoke in a voice easily audible all over the hall. Readers of the EVENING POST are familiar with the clarity, ease and point of his written style. His address had the same qualities. It was full of illuminating comment on Beethoven and his music, and quite free from the turgid rhetoric and labored eloquence one has learned to dread from speakers on such occasions as last night's.

"THE two great enemies of truth are patriotism and centenaries," began Mr. Newman. After admitting the existence of a reaction against Beethoven he quoted Stravinsky as having said, "I cannot endure Beethoven's music. It is too philosophical."

Mr. Newman then argued that this reaction, the arguments for which, as he said, are admirably stated in Mr. Sonneck's article in the March American Mercury, merely proves that Beethoven is still very much alive.

To Mr. Newman the personality of Beethoven is even more significant than his great influence on the course of musical history.

"Beethoven died at least ten years too soon. Had he lived, there would have been another great period in his work, the culmination toward which the music of the third of the three periods noted by Lenz in Beethoven's work was clearly moving."

He cited the fact that no later composer has been able to build on the foundation laid by Beethoven in the last quartets, the last piano sonatas, the "Missa Solemnis" and the Ninth Symphony as the clearest proof of the supremely personal utterance of the composer. The address was heard with attention by a crowded hall and very warmly applauded.

MR. Koussevitzky began his brief remarks by saying: "It is easier for me to conduct the nine symphonies than it is to say to you nine words in English." The audience, which had risen to its feet in greeting, settled back to listen with close attention to the conductor's explanation that he had conceived the idea of the Beethoven festival, and to hear him thank trustees, management, players, chorus and audience for the enthusiastic cooperation which has made its success possible.

The music of the evening consisted of one of Beethoven's "Equale" for trombones, played at the beginning of the exercises with the audience standing, and the Quartet, Opus 135, intelligently and unassumingly performed by the Lenox String Quartet.

Mr. Damon's ode proved to be well turned and metrically conventional, expressing, not without eloquence and imagination, the proper sentiments for the occasion.

PENFIELD ROBERTS.

IN COMMEMORATION OF BEETHOVEN

Mar 29

Ernest Newman Addresses Festival Audience

Boston Globe

Commemorative exercises in honor of the centenary of Beethoven's death were held at Symphony Hall last evening as part of the festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The noted English critic, Ernest Newman, who had come especially for this occasion all the way from London, delivered an address. S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, read an ode. The Lenox String Quartet played the last quartet of Beethoven opus 135, the final work of his life.

Mr Koussevitzky made a brief speech, in English, the first public address he has attempted in America. The stage was filled by what the program described as "an assembly of guests, trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." There was a very large and interested audience. Judge Frederick P. Cabot presided.

Mr Newman spoke without notes in a clear voice which carried all over the hall. Mr Koussevitzky subsequently described the principal speech of the evening as "an unequaled contribution to Beethoven literature." This was the partial verdict of a friend, which Mr Newman would no doubt be himself the first to contradict. But the speech was full of interesting and illuminating ideas about Beethoven, simply stated, with a clarity and pungency of wording happily remote from the turgid rhetoric too many speakers deem appropriate for such ceremonial occasions as last night's.

Proves His Vitality

Mr Newman began by observing that "The two great enemies of truth are patriotism and centenaries." It must, however, in fairness, be admitted that "Beethoven had his faults, frequent and great ones." These have brought about a reaction against him, the arguments for which "are admirably stated in Mr Sonneck's article in the March American Mercury."

"Stravinsky once told a friend of mine," said Mr Newman, "that he could not bear Beethoven's music. It was too philosophical."

"This reaction against Beethoven, which is not a new thing, merely proves his vitality. He is still alive," continued Mr Newman.

"The two factors in the production of any great work of art are the man and the moment. The personal significance of Beethoven is even greater than his influence on the course of musical history. Beethoven died at least 10 years too soon. If he had lived there would have been a fourth and supreme period in his creative achievement. Even the work of his third period is so far beyond anything possible to any other man that no subsequent composer has ever been able to build on the foundation he there laid."

Mr Damon's ode proved to be in smooth and well turned verses, a graceful and not too lengthy tribute to Beethoven. He read it without ostentation.

The musical part of the program included at the opening of the exercises one of Beethoven's "Equali" for four trombones, during which the audience was asked to stand, and the last quartet, well played by the Lenox Quartet.

"Maj Higginson's Wisdom"

Among the principal guests, seated at a table in the center of the stage, in the place of honor between Judge Cabot and Mr Koussevitzky, was Mrs Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra. It was significant that the only one of the presiding officer's references in his introductory remarks which was applauded by the audience was to "Maj Higginson's great vision without which there could have been no Boston Symphony." Here the audience broke in with unusually prolonged and heartfelt handclapping.

Mr Koussevitzky began his brief concluding remarks by saying, "It is easier for me to conduct the whole Ninth Symphony than to say nine words in English to you." The audience, which had risen to its feet to greet the conductor, listened eagerly while he explained that the original idea of this Beethoven Festival was his, and that he was deeply gratified by the splendid cooperation from the Trustees, orchestra, management, chorus and audience which has made its successful accomplishment possible.

Mr Koussevitzky's [illegible] Player[illegible] for fectly intelligible, t[illegible]ley Cup Scheduled with an accent, stumbles over a [illegible] for Tonight

If a solem[illegible] with spee[illegible] needed

tenary scarce with g than w

BOTH TEAMS CONFIDENT

Chicago Hopes to Get Jump Tonight in Game on Neutral Ice

Special to the Transcript:

New York, March 29—The Boston Bruins come today to the start of the fiercest hockey struggle in all Stanley Cup history, international in aspect, with the Canadian and American teams ready to start eliminating until two of the six now in the field remain to battle in the world series of hockey next week.

The Bruins are here in New York to meet the Chicago Black Hawks in the first round game of the American division playoff on Madison Square Garden

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ENSION FUND CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

ADV By MOSES SM MAR 28

Beethoven's Mass in D, which opened the remarkable Beethoven festival at Symphony Hall last Tuesday evening and which previously had gone unheard in Boston for twenty-seven years, was repeated before another capacity audience yesterday afternoon. The performance was for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The size of the house and its great enthusiasm were further tribute to the genius of the tone-artist who died one hundred years ago.

The second rendition of the Mass proved, above all, the necessity of having the great choral masterpieces given more often A classic is no a classic for the listener until h is familiar with it. Almost very concert-goer recalls the experience of his first hearing an acknowledged masterpiece and his likely disappointment with it.

The fault in that case is not necessarily the listener's. Let him hear the work again and again, and almost invariably he comes to love it The present writer is no exception He was greatly surprised on Tuesnight when he heard the Mass for the first time. The work did not seem to warrant its being rated one of the greatest of all musical treasures.

The repetition on yesterday afternoon forced a revision of this impression. Beauties that escaped the ear at first, became obvious. The grandeur of many sections of the score produced a feeling of exaltation. Not yet apparent was the unity of the work. Perhaps that will come with further hearing, which, let us hope, will not be 27 years from now.

Hub Music Hero

ADV

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who has borne the brunt of the Beethoven festival concerts, which will close at Symphony Hall on Tuesday night with a performance of the famous choral symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 27 1927

April 6, Last Concert of Boston Symphony

THE second and last appearance for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on April 6. Director Serge Koussevitzky, it is understood, has had sent to him all of the programs of the season's orchestral events, and while the program for the forthcoming concert has not been announced it is safe to say that there will be no repetition of numbers heard here recently.

Several events this year were almost duplicates of concerts by other orchestras, and Mr. Koussevitzky is determined that this will not be the case with him for the closing concert.

The only other appearance of the Boston Orchestra this season produced the most favorable comment and made evident that this splendid organization has gotten back to the standard that characterized it in pre-war days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
MAR 27 1927

American Writes Flivver Symphony

THE ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prologue is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue intersperse with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, M Converse passes to the hero. It born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," the sound of trumpets and smoothly runs along the roads Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

TWO BEETHOVEN WORKS GIVE

HER MAR 2

Sixth and Seventh Symphonies Are Conducted by Koussevitzky

On March 26, 1827, about 5 o'clo of the afternoon there was a hea thunder clap in Vienna and a flash lightning illuminated the death cham ber of Beethoven. He opened his eye clenched his fist, then letting his ha fall to the bed, as Huettenbranner, wh was then by his side, tells the story "the genius of the great master tones fled from this world of delusio into the realm of truth."

And on March 26, 1927, the Bosto Symphony orchestra, conducted by M Koussevitzky, performed at its 20t evening concert the sixth and seventh symphonies. This concert was the fifth in the series of the Beethoven cen tenary festival; the "Pastoral," one o Beethoven's most popular works, the seventh, which, characterized by Wag ner as the "Apotheosis of the Dance," might be more fitly called the apotheosis of rhythm. Of the two symphonies the seventh is indisputably the greater work in structure and in eloquence, yet it was well on this anniversary day that the two should have been heard, the one after the other, for they are in strong contrast.

The "Pastoral" often suffers from perfunctory treatment at the hands of a conductor, who is over sentimental, so that the first movement, "cheerful impression awakened by arrival in the country," taken at too slow a pace, provokes anything but cheerful impression in the mind of the hearer. As for the second movement, "Scene by the brook," it reminds one of the brook sung by Tennyson. And there are some who object to the ornithological measures, while others eagerly anticipate the imitations of the feathered fowls.

As for the seventh, here one finds Beethoven intoxicated with Dionysiac joy, in the finale shouting madly and throwing his hat in air.

The performance was masterly; enthusiasm was at its height.

This afternoon the recent perform-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1927

The final concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 8. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. The program has not yet been announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
MAR 27 1927

Final Concert of the Boston Orchestra Her

The final concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy, conductor is announced for the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 8. The program has not as yet been published.

MUSIC
MONITOR MAR 29

Exercises Held in Memory of Beethoven

Commemorative exercises were held in Symphony Hall last night as the sixth event in the Beethoven Centenary Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, presided. Ernest Newman, the distinguished London critic, gave an address. S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, read his Ode to Beethoven. The Lenox String Quartet played the last Quartet, op. 135. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, spoke briefly in conclusion.

The proceedings were in every particular worthy of the occasion. The platform was decorated with the admirable simplicity of taste which is characteristic of Symphony Hall. A bust of Beethoven surmounted the door in the rear of the stage. Garlands and tapestries hung on the walls. The principal participants sat at a long table draped with a red cloth. They included Judge Cabot; Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, whose husband founded and was for many years the sustainer of the orchestra; Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky; Mr. Newman, Mr. Damon, and Dr. Archibald T. Davison, director of the Harvard Glee Club. At the sides were grouped members of the board of trustees and distinguished Boston musicians. The members of the orchestra sat in the rear.

After a brass quartet had played one of Beethoven's "Equali," with the audience standing, Judge Cabot paid a tribute to those who had made the festival a success, and in particular to the memory of Major Higginson. He then introduced Mr. Newman.

Mr. Newman, in a scholarly address which carefully avoided fulsomeness, presented a well-argued estimate of Beethoven's genius. Apart from the composer's historical importance, Mr. Newman considered that he was significant for his attempt to express ethical and humanitarian concepts through his music. In his middle period he achieved perfect balance between his thought and his art. In his final period, his thought had grown beyond his art, and he posed problems which have not yet been answered. Mr. Newman believed that if Beethoven had survived another 10 years he might have carried music to lengths now not imagined. As it is, he said, no composer has yet been able to build higher on the structure which Beethoven left. The composer is still growing as succeeding generations study his works, the speaker said; and he believed that after another century Beethoven still would present baffling problems to criticism.

Mr. Koussevitzky was tumultuously greeted, with everybody standing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 29 1927

A TRIBUTE TO BEETHOVEN.

Ernest Newman Finds Him Greatest in His Ethics.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 28.—Ernest Newman, English critic, gave an appealing interpretation of Beethoven in Symphony Hall tonight, in an address which marked the climax of the centenary festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Newman gave due attention to Beethoven as the interpreter of a great transition in civilization, but he insisted that his genius would live because he wrote into his music the elements of ethics, of humanitarianism, of philosophy, and above all the high moral impulses.

"It has to be admitted," said the speaker, "that in his weaker moments Beethoven did not always find a music as great as his moral impulses. But when he did find it, the effect was incomparably beyond that of any music ever written."

On this failure to find at all times the proper forms for the turmoil in his mind, Mr. Newman continued, is based the present reaction against Beethoven. The real friends of Beethoven, Mr. Newman said, have never ignored this criticism, nor will they ignore it in meeting the present sizable reaction, but he predicted that appreciation of Beethoven would keep pace with man's appreciation of musical values, and that in the year 2027, on the two hundredth anniversary of his death, he would still be the "most intriguing, the most baffling problem in all musical criticism."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y
MAR 29 1927

Other Music

Ernest Newman Addresses Beethoven Celebration in Boston

Boston, March 29.

THE Beethoven centenary festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was continued last evening in Symphony Hall by commemorative exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, an ode by S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, a performance of the last work Beethoven lived to complete, the string quartet in F major, Opus 135, played by the Lenox Quartet, and concluding remarks by Serge Koussevitzky, who had not hitherto ventured to speak in public in Boston.

The stage of the hall, especially decorated for the occasion with greenery and a bust of Beethoven, was filled by what the program described as "an assembly of guests, trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The principal guests, including the speakers of the evening, were seated at a long table in the middle of the stage. The trustees and the other guests were in two groups at either side. The members of the orchestra were clustered across the rear. Judge Frederick P. V. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, presided.

Mr. Newman, who had come from London especially to deliver last night's address, spoke in a voice easily audible all over the hall. Readers of the EVENING POST are familiar with the clarity, ease and point of his written style. His address had the same qualities. It was full of illuminating comment on Beethoven and his music, and quite free from the turgid rhetoric and labored eloquence one has learned to dread from speakers on such occasions as last night's.

"THE two great enemies of truth are patriotism and centenaries," began Mr. Newman. After admitting the existence of a reaction against Beethoven he quoted Stravinsky as having said, "I cannot endure Beethoven's music. It is too philosophical."

Mr. Newman then argued that this reaction, the arguments for which, as he said, are admirably stated in Mr. Sonneck's article in the March American Mercury, merely proves that Beethoven is still very much alive.

To Mr. Newman the personality of Beethoven is even more significant than his great influence on the course of musical history.

"Beethoven died at least ten years too soon. Had he lived, there would have been another great period in his work, the culmination toward which the music of the third of the three periods noted by Lenz in Beethoven's work was clearly moving."

He cited the fact that no later composer has been able to build on the foundation laid by Beethoven in the last quartets, the last piano sonatas, the "Missa Solemnis" and the Ninth Symphony as the clearest proof of the supremely personal utterance of the composer. The address was heard with attention by a crowded hall and very warmly applauded.

MR. Koussevitzky began his brief remarks by saying: "It is easier for me to conduct the nine symphonies than it is to say to you nine words in English." The audience, which had risen to its feet in greeting, settled back to listen with close attention to the conductor's explanation that he had conceived the idea of the Beethoven festival, and to hear him thank trustees, management, players, chorus and audience for the enthusiastic cooperation which has made its success possible.

The music of the evening consisted of one of Beethoven's "Equale" for trombones, played at the beginning of the exercises with the audience standing, and the Quartet, Opus 135, intelligently and unassumingly performed by the Lenox String Quartet.

Mr. Damon's ode proved to be well turned and metrically conventional, expressing, not without eloquence and imagination, the proper sentiments for the occasion.

PENFIELD ROBERTS.

IN COMMEMORATION OF BEETHOVEN

Mar 29

Ernest Newman Addresses Festival Audience

Boston Globe

Commemorative exercises in honor of the centenary of Beethoven's death were held at Symphony Hall last evening as part of the festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The noted English critic, Ernest Newman, who had come especially for this occasion all the way from London, delivered an address. S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, read an ode. The Lenox String Quartet played the last quartet of Beethoven opus 135, the final work of his life.

Mr Koussevitzky made a brief speech, in English, the first public address he has attempted in America. The stage was filled by what the program described as "an assembly of guests, trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." There was a very large and interested audience. Judge Frederick P. Cabot presided.

Mr Newman spoke without notes in a clear voice which carried all over the hall. Mr Koussevitzky subsequently described the principal speech of the evening as "an unequaled contribution to Beethoven literature." This was the partial verdict of a friend, which Mr Newman would no doubt be himself the first to contradict. But the speech was full of interesting and illuminating ideas about Beethoven, simply stated, with a clarity and pungency of wording happily remote from the turgid rhetoric too many speakers deem appropriate for such ceremonial occasions as last night's.

Proves His Vitality

Mr Newman began by observing that "The two great enemies of truth are patriotism and centenaries." It must, however, in fairness, be admitted that "Beethoven had his faults, frequent and great ones." These have brought about a reaction against him, the arguments for which "are admirably stated in Mr Sonneck's article in the March American Mercury."

"Stravinsky once told a friend of mine," said Mr Newman, "that he could not bear Beethoven's music. It was too philosophical."

"This reaction against Beethoven, which is not a new thing, merely proves his vitality. He is still alive," continued Mr Newman.

"The two factors in the production of any great work of art are the man and the moment. The personal significance of Beethoven is even greater than his influence on the course of musical history. Beethoven died at least 10 years too soon. If he had lived there would have been a fourth and supreme period in his creative achievement. Even the work of his third period is so far beyond anything possible to any other man that no subsequent composer has ever been able to build on the foundation he there laid."

Mr Damon's ode proved to be in smooth and well turned verses, a graceful and not too lengthy tribute to Beethoven. He read it without ostentation.

The musical part of the program included at the opening of the exercises one of Beethoven's "Equali" for four trombones, during which the audience was asked to stand, and the last quartet, well played by the Lenox Quartet.

"Maj Higginson's Wisdom"

Among the principal guests, seated at a table in the center of the stage, in the place of honor between Judge Cabot and Mr Koussevitzky, was Mrs Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra. It was significant that the only one of the presiding officer's references in his introductory remarks which was applauded by the audience was to "Maj Higginson's great vision without which there could have been no Boston Symphony." Here the audience broke in with unusually prolonged and heartfelt handclapping.

Mr Koussevitzky began his brief concluding remarks by saying, "It is easier for me to conduct the whole Ninth Symphony than to say nine words in English to you." The audience, which had risen to its feet to greet the conductor, listened eagerly while he explained that the original idea of this Beethoven Festival was his, and that he was deeply gratified by the splendid cooperation from the Trustees, orchestra, management, chorus and audience which has made its successful accomplishment possible.

'Mr Koussevitzky's [illegible] for fectly intelligible, [illegible] with an accent. [illegible] stumbles over a [illegible]

If a solem[illegible] with spec[illegible] needed [illegible] tenary [illegible] scarce[illegible] with g[illegible] than [illegible]

[illegible] Player[illegible] for [illegible]ley Cup Scheduled for Tonight

BOTH TEAMS CONFIDENT

Chicago Hopes to Get Jump Tonight in Game on Neutral Ice

Special to the Transcript:

New York, March 29—The Boston Bruins come today to the start of the fiercest hockey struggle in all Stanley Cup history, international in aspect, with the Canadian and American teams ready to start eliminating until two of the six now in the field remain to battle in the world series of hockey next week.

The Bruins are here in New York to meet the Chicago Black Hawks in the first round game of the American division playoff on Madison Square Garden [illegible]

[illegible] w[illegible] to wi[illegible]e [illegible] come [illegible]ton[illegible]'s [illegible] a

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ENSION FUND CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

ADV MAR 28

By MOSES SM

Beethoven's Mass in D, which opened the remarkable Beethoven festival at Symphony Hall last Tuesday evening and which previously had gone unheard in Boston for twenty-seven years, was repeated before another capacity audience yesterday afternoon. The performance was for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The size of the house and its great enthusiasm were further tribute to the genius of the tone-artist who died one hundred years ago.

The second rendition of the Mass proved, above all, the necessity of having the great choral masterpieces given more often A classic is no a classic for the listener until he is familiar with it. Almost every concert-goer recalls the experience of his first hearing an acknowledged masterpiece and his likely disappointment with it.

The fault in that case is not necessarily the listener's. Let him hear the work again and again, and almost invariably he comes to love it. The present writer is no exception. He was greatly surprised on Tuesnight when he heard the Mass for the first time. The work did not seem to warrant its being rated one of the greatest of all musical treasures.

The repetition on yesterday afternoon forced a revision of this impression. Beauties that escaped the ear at first, became obvious. The grandeur of many sections of the score produced a feeling of exaltation. Not yet apparent was the unity of the work. Perhaps that will come with further hearing, which, let us hope, will not be 27 years from now.

Hub Music Hero

ERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who has borne the brunt of the Beethoven festival concerts, which will close at Symphony Hall on Tuesday night with a performance of the famous choral symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 27 1927

April 6, Last Concert of Boston Symphony

THE second and last appearance for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to take place at the Lyric on April 6. Director Serge Koussevitzky, it is understood, has had sent to him all of the programs of the season's orchestral events, and while the program for the forthcoming concert has not been announced it is safe to say that there will be no repetition of numbers heard here recently.

Several events this year were almost duplicates of concerts by other orchestras, and Mr. Koussevitzky is determined that this will not be the case with him for the closing concert.

The only other appearance of the Boston Orchestra this season produced the most favorable comment and made evident that this splendid organization has gotten back to the standard that characterized it in pre-war days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMERICAN
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
MAR 27 1927

American Writes Flivver Symphony

THE ultra modern in musical composition is represented in a symphonic cycle just completed by Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory of Music, in which a characteristic American product is portrayed and followed on its way through the United States.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the title of the piece, with the subtitle "A Joyous Epic." Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received it for performance next month at the symphony concerts.

In the composition the opening prologue is "Dawn in Detroit" and next comes a scene "March of the Workers," cheerfully making their way to well-rewarded toil; then a scene in the Ford factory, a serio-comic fugue interspersed with machine-like sounds.

Having thus set the scene, Mr Converse passes to the hero. It is born, this "Flivver 10,000,000," to the sound of trumpets and it smoothly runs along the roads. Then the ultra of ultra-modernism is introduced in what musical critics have wantonly named "the petting scene." Mr. Converse, however, modestly calls it "America's romance." It takes place on a night in May by the roadside and is humorously crossed by a tune whistled offstage in quite another key.

Then "Flivver 10,000,000" resumes its way on the road. Fate assails it in a collision, but with many a creak and strain it rights itself in strict accordance with the habit of the species and vanishes, still wheezing, into the dim and dimmer distance.

TWO BEETHOVEN WORKS GIVEN

HER MAR 27

Sixth and Seventh Symphonies Are Conducted by Koussevitzky

On March 26, 1827, about 5 o'clock of the afternoon there was a heavy thunder clap in Vienna and a flash of lightning illuminated the death chamber of Beethoven. He opened his eyes, clenched his fist, then letting his hand fall to the bed, as Huettenbranner, who was then by his side, tells the story, "the genius of the great master of tones fled from this world of delusion into the realm of truth."

And on March 26, 1927, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, performed at its 20th evening concert the sixth and seventh symphonies. This concert was the fifth in the series of the Beethoven centenary festival; the "Pastoral," one of Beethoven's most popular works, the seventh, which, characterized by Wagner as the "Apotheosis of the Dance," might be more fitly called the apotheosis of rhythm. Of the two symphonies the seventh is indisputably the greater work in structure and in eloquence, yet it was well on this anniversary day that the two should have been heard, the one after the other, for they are in strong contrast.

The "Pastoral" often suffers from perfunctory treatment at the hands of a conductor, who is over sentimental, so that the first movement, "cheerful impression awakened by arrival in the country," taken at too slow a pace, provokes anything but cheerful impression in the mind of the hearer. As for the second movement, "Scene by the brook," it reminds one of the brook sung by Tennyson. And there are some who object to the ornithological measures, while others eagerly anticipate the imitations of the feathered fowls.

As for the seventh, here one finds Beethoven intoxicated with Dionysiac joy, in the finale shouting madly and throwing his hat in air.

The performance was masterly; enthusiasm was at its height.

This afternoon the recent performance in D will be

THIS CLIPPING FRO
BROOKLYN, N.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1927

The final concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 8. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. The program has not yet been announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
MAR 27 1927

Final Concert of the Boston Orchestra Her

The final concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy, conductor is announced for the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 8. The program has not as yet been published.

MUSIC
MONITOR MAR 29

Exercises Held in Memory of Beethoven

Commemorative exercises were held in Symphony Hall last night as the sixth event in the Beethoven Centenary Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, presided. Ernest Newman, the distinguished London critic, gave an address. S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, read his Ode to Beethoven. The Lenox String Quartet played the last Quartet, op. 135. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, spoke briefly in conclusion.

The proceedings were in every particular worthy of the occasion. The platform was decorated with the admirable simplicity of taste which is characteristic of Symphony Hall. A bust of Beethoven surmounted the door in the rear of the stage. Garlands and tapestries hung on the walls. The principal participants sat at a long table draped with a red cloth. They included Judge Cabot; Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, whose husband founded and was for many years the sustainer of the orchestra; Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky; Mr. Newman, Mr. Damon, and Dr. Archibald T. Davison, director of the Harvard Glee Club. At the sides were grouped members of the board of trustees and distinguished Boston musicians. The members of the orchestra sat in the rear.

After a brass quartet had played one of Beethoven's "Equali," with the audience standing, Judge Cabot paid a tribute to those who had made the festival a success, and in particular to the memory of Major Higginson. He then introduced Mr. Newman.

Mr. Newman, in a scholarly address which carefully avoided fulsomeness, presented a well-argued estimate of Beethoven's genius. Apart from the composer's historical importance, Mr. Newman considered that he was significant for his attempt to express ethical and humanitarian concepts through his music. In his middle period he achieved perfect balance between his thought and his art. In his final period, his thought had grown beyond his art, and he posed problems which have not yet been answered. Mr. Newman believed that if Beethoven had survived another 10 years he might have carried music to lengths now not imagined. As it is, he said, no composer has yet been able to build higher on the structure which Beethoven left. The composer is still growing as succeeding generations study his works, the speaker said; and he believed that after another century Beethoven still would present baffling problems to criticism.

Mr. Koussevitzky was tumultuously greeted, with everybody standing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAR 29 1927

sym-
pro-

A TRIBUTE TO BEETHOVEN.

Ernest Newman Finds Him Greatest in His Ethics.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 28.—Ernest Newman, English critic, gave an appealing interpretation of Beethoven in Symphony Hall tonight, in an address which marked the climax of the centenary festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Newman gave due attention to Beethoven as the interpreter of a great transition in civilization, but he insisted that his genius would live because he wrote into his music the elements of ethics, of humanitarianism, of philosophy, and above all the high moral impulses.

"It has to be admitted," said the speaker, "that in his weaker moments Beethoven did not always find a music as great as his moral impulses. But when he did find it, the effect was incomparably beyond that of any music ever written."

On this failure to find at all times the proper forms for the turmoil in his mind, Mr. Newman continued, is based the present reaction against Beethoven. The real friends of Beethoven, Mr. Newman said, have never ignored this criticism, nor will they ignore it in meeting the present sizable reaction, but he predicted that appreciation of Beethoven would keep pace with man's appreciation of musical values, and that in the year 2027, on the two hundredth anniversary of his death, he would still be the "most intriguing, the most baffling problem in all musical criticism."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y
MAR 29 1927

Other Music

Ernest Newman Addresses Beethoven Celebration in Boston

Boston, March 29.

THE Beethoven centenary festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was continued last evening in Symphony Hall by commemorative exercises, including an address by Ernest Newman, an ode by S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, a performance of the last work Beethoven lived to complete, the string quartet in F major, Opus 135, played by the Lenox Quartet, and concluding remarks by Serge Koussevitzky, who had not hitherto ventured to speak in public in Boston.

The stage of the hall, especially decorated for the occasion with greenery and a bust of Beethoven, was filled by what the program described as "an assembly of guests, trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The principal guests, including the speakers of the evening, were seated at a long table in the middle of the stage. The trustees and the other guests were in two groups at either side. The members of the orchestra were clustered across the rear. Judge Frederick P. V. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, presided.

Mr. Newman, who had come from London especially to deliver last night's address, spoke in a voice easily audible all over the hall. Readers of the EVENING POST are familiar with the clarity, ease and point of his written style. His address had the same qualities. It was full of illuminating comment on Beethoven and his music, and quite free from the turgid rhetoric and labored eloquence one has learned to dread from speakers on such occasions as last night's.

"THE two great enemies of truth are patriotism and centenaries," began Mr. Newman. After admitting the existence of a reaction against Beethoven he quoted Stravinsky as having said, "I cannot endure Beethoven's music. It is too philosophical."

Mr. Newman then argued that this reaction, the arguments for which, as he said, are admirably stated in Mr. Sonneck's article in the March American Mercury, merely proves that Beethoven is still very much alive.

To Mr. Newman the personality of Beethoven is even more significant than his great influence on the course of musical history.

"Beethoven died at least ten years too soon. Had he lived, there would have been another great period in his work, the culmination toward which the music of the third of the three periods noted by Lenz in Beethoven's work was clearly moving."

He cited the fact that no later composer has been able to build on the foundation laid by Beethoven in the last quartets, the last piano sonatas, the "Missa Solemnis" and the Ninth Symphony as the clearest proof of the supremely personal utterance of the composer. The address was heard with attention by a crowded hall and very warmly applauded.

MR. Koussevitzky began his brief remarks by saying: "It is easier for me to conduct the nine symphonies than it is to say to you nine words in English." The audience, which had risen to its feet in greeting, settled back to listen with close attention to the conductor's explanation that he had conceived the idea of the Beethoven festival, and to hear him thank trustees, management, players, chorus and audience for the enthusiastic cooperation which has made its success possible.

The music of the evening consisted of one of Beethoven's "Equale" for trombones, played at the beginning of the exercises with the audience standing, and the Quartet, Opus 135, intelligently and unassumingly performed by the Lenox String Quartet.

Mr. Damon's ode proved to be well turned and metrically conventional, expressing, not without eloquence and imagination, the proper sentiments for the occasion.

PENFIELD ROBERTS.

IN COMMEMORATION OF BEETHOVEN

Mar 29

Ernest Newman Addresses Festival Audience

Boston Globe

Commemorative exercises in honor of the centenary of Beethoven's death were held at Symphony Hall last evening as part of the festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The noted English critic, Ernest Newman, who had come especially for this occasion all the way from London, delivered an address. S. Foster Damon, president of the New England Poetry Club, read an ode. The Lenox String Quartet played the last quartet of Beethoven opus 135, the final work of his life.

Mr Koussevitzky made a brief speech, in English, the first public address he has attempted in America. The stage was filled by what the program described as "an assembly of guests, trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." There was a very large and interested audience. Judge Frederick P. Cabot presided.

Mr Newman spoke without notes in a clear voice which carried all over the hall. Mr Koussevitzky subsequently described the principal speech of the evening as "an unequaled contribution to Beethoven literature." This was the partial verdict of a friend, which Mr Newman would no doubt be himself the first to contradict. But the speech was full of interesting and illuminating ideas about Beethoven, simply stated, with a clarity and pungency of wording happily remote from the turgid rhetoric too many speakers deem appropriate for such ceremonial occasions as last night's.

Proves His Vitality

Mr Newman began by observing that "The two great enemies of truth are patriotism and centenaries." It must, however, in fairness, be admitted that "Beethoven had his faults, frequent and great ones." These have brought about a reaction against him, the arguments for which "are admirably stated in Mr Sonneck's article in the March American Mercury."

"Stravinsky once told a friend of mine," said Mr Newman, "that he could not bear Beethoven's music. It was too philosophical."

"This reaction against Beethoven, which is not a new thing, merely proves his vitality. He is still alive," continued Mr Newman.

"The two factors in the production of any great work of art are the man and the moment. The personal significance of Beethoven is even greater than his influence on the course of musical history. Beethoven died at least 10 years too soon. If he had lived there would have been a fourth and supreme period in his creative achievement. Even the work of his third period is so far beyond anything possible to any other man that no subsequent composer has ever been able to build on the foundation he there laid."

Mr Damon's ode proved to be in smooth and well turned verses, a graceful and not too lengthy tribute to Beethoven. He read it without ostentation.

The musical part of the program included at the opening of the exercises one of Beethoven's "Equali" for four trombones, during which the audience was asked to stand, and the last quartet, well played by the Lenox Quartet.

"Maj Higginson's Wisdom"

Among the principal guests, seated at a table in the center of the stage, in the place of honor between Judge Cabot and Mr Koussevitzky, was Mrs Higginson, widow of the founder of the orchestra. It was significant that the only one of the presiding officer's references in his introductory remarks which was applauded by the audience was to "Maj Higginson's great vision without which there could have been no Boston Symphony." Here the audience broke in with unusually prolonged and heartfelt handclapping.

Mr Koussevitzky began his brief concluding remarks by saying, "It is easier for me to conduct the whole Ninth Symphony than to say nine words in English to you." The audience, which had risen to its feet to greet the conductor, listened eagerly while he explained that the original idea of this Beethoven Festival was his, and that he was deeply gratified by the splendid cooperation from the Trustees, orchestra, management, chorus and audience which has made its successful accomplishment possible.

Mr Koussevitzky's English is perfectly intelligible, though he speaks with an accent, and occasionally stumbles over a phrase.

If a solemn ceremonial exercise with speech making and an ode were needed to add point to the great centenary tribute to Beethoven it could scarcely have been carried out with greater dignity and [illegible] than was last night's.

INTERLUDE OF CH. MUSIC
MAR 29
Fashion—Spokes-
Quartet Well-Triumphant

Special to [illegible]ipt:

New York, March 29—The Boston Bruins come today to the start of the fiercest hockey struggle in all Stanley Cup history, international in aspect, with the Canadian and American teams ready to start eliminating until two of the six now in the field remain to battle in the world series of hockey next week.

The Bruins are here in New York to meet the Chicago Black Hawks in the first round game of the American division playoff on Madison Square Garden [illegible]

BEETHOVEN EXERCISES IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

In a centenary festival of Beethoven the music's the thing, and the music has, indeed, been the thing at Symphony Hall for the past week, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra and guest artists have been performing the most pretentious series of programs in America. But last night's program found what little music there was sandwiched between the parts of commemorative exercises, a tribute in words to Beethoven's genius.

After the members of the orchestra, trustees and guests had gathered on the stage, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, opened the evening's program with brief remarks. Then he introduced Ernest Newman, leading English music critic, who came from London especially for the occasion.

Mr. Newman gave an address on Beethoven. His words were refreshing in their unhackneyed character, in the light that they threw upon the acuteness of the speaker. Instead of allowing his address to become purely formal, he played around the subject, touching lightly yet often brilliantly, on various phases of Beethoven's music and character that are not often emphasized.

S. Foster Damon, a young poet and instructor at Harvard, read an original ode, "Beethoven," which also was written for the occasion. The only music of the evening, with the exception of a few brief bars at the opening, was then rendered—Beethoven's last composition, the quartet in F major, Opus 135, played by the Lenox String Quartet. The program closed with remarks by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Great as had been the enthusiasm of the audience when Judge Cabot alluded to the founder of the orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, it was as nothing compared with the tremendous applause that greeted Mr. Koussevitzky. Obviously affected, the brilliant conductor confined himself to thanking everyone concerned in the festival, and to referring to Beethoven as the "greatest genius of all countries."

GLOBE MAR 27

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" Next Year?

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was given last Tuesday in Boston for the first time since 1900. The performance, which will be repeated this afternoon, introduced to almost everyone who heard it one of the unquestioned great masterpieces. The occasion for this revival is, of course, the centenary of Beethoven's death, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating by a magnificent series of festival performances.

Must Boston wait another 27 years, after this afternoon, for an opportunity to hear the "Missa Solemnis?" Cannot we establish a tradition that this work, the Brahms Requiem, and Bach's "St Matthew Passion" are to be heard in rotation?

This would mean that at least once in three years Boston heard Beethoven's tremendous work, and that in every season one great choral work was given by the Boston Symphony and the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe, so superbly trained by Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth.

It took a year of rehearsal to prepare the chorus for the "Missa Solemnis." The orchestra, and the solo singers must also have had to prepare music both extremely exacting and unfamiliar. Another performance next season, or even the season after, would require less arduous labor to prepare. It would mean for many of the participants simply recalling familiar music, and grappling with difficulties already conquered.

We have already had the Brahms Requiem, the Ninth Symphony, and now the "Missa Solemnis" from the Boston Symphony and the Harvard Glee Club. If a Bach work, either the "Matthew Passion," the Passion According to St John, or the great B Minor Mass is added to the current repertory and the items already in it are kept there by frequent performances the public appetite for great and austere choral works will grow. Good music is proverbially, familiar music.

There are, of course, many other choral works which Boston ought to hear. But are not the advantages of sticking to a group of three, or at any rate not more than five masterpieces greater under existing circumstances than the disadvantages.

Many people complain loudly because Handel's "Messiah" is given every year, while his other choral works are neglected. But the popularity of Handel, his place in the hearts of American audiences would have been impossible without these repetitions of a single work. It would not have served the same purpose to give a different Handel oratorio every year till the supply ran out and repetition became necessary.

Choral concerts are infrequent here, compared to orchestral concerts. The choruses are composed of amateur singers. Neither they nor their audiences can do full justice to a great and exacting choral work without frequent reptitions of it. Let us hear the "Missa Solemnis" again next year, or at latest the year following.

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's great Beethoven Centenary Festival, described by Mme Olga Samaroff in the New York Evening Post as the most notable tribute being paid in America to his memory will end Tuesday night. It has been a series of concerts to be remembered. The great audiences, the enthusiasm, the remarkable quality of the performances are all tributes to the undying genius of Beethoven.

Particularly notable is the singing of the chorus of college students from Harvard and Radcliffe, which no other amateur chorus in America could surpass. To Mr Davison and his admirable assistant Mr Woodworth immense credit should be given.

Ernest Newman, the noted English critic who has come from London to deliver the commemorative address tomorrow night, is the author of a number of learned but eminently readable books on musical topics, which are among the best in English. He was in 1905 music critic for the Manchester Guardian and after that until 1919 for the Birmingham Post. Since 1920 he has written musical articles in the London Sunday Times and the Observer. Two seasons ago he acted as guest critic for the New York Evening Post.

S. Foster Damon, the Cambridge poet who will read an ode at the commemorative exercises to Beethoven, was graduated from Harvard in 1914. He is the author of a book on Blake, and of numerous verses.

THE WORD OF PRAISE: SPEECHFUL CEREMONY, HONORING BEETHOVEN

AMBER-

crimson stuff gold-bordered Behind it was a row of chairs, subsequently occupied by the President of the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, Judge Cabot; the venerable widow of the founder and first "sustainer," Mrs Henry Lee Higginson; the conductor, Mr Koussevitzky, and Mrs. Koussevitzky, the speaker of the evening, Mr. Ernest Newman, reviewer of opera and concert for the Sunday Times of London and essayist about music in general and in particular; Mr. S. Foster Damon, odist of the occasion and instructor in English at Harvard College.

To right and left of these seats of honor, chairs in crescent awaited the trustees and their guests—representatives of the elder generation long associated with the orchestra, like Mr. Henry M. Rogers and the learned archæologist of the program-books; coadjutors in present and past undertakings, like the invaluable Dr. Davison of Harvard and his assistant, Mr. Woodworth; resident composers, like Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Converse; resident practitioners of music or of kindred arts, like Mr. Goodrich or Professor Spalding. Behind, under the organ, in widespreading rows were to sit the present members of the orchestra. Most remarkable of all, parquet and balconies disclosed few vacant seats. Even to hear words about music, rather than the music itself will the Bostonians flock—when the musician is Beethoven dead a hundred years and a day.

At eight o'clock and thirty-five minutes—rare unpunctuality in that prompt concert-room—the doors at the back of the stage opened, and Judge Cabot with Mrs. Higginson on his arm led the defile. Contrary to the expectation of certain incorrigible souls, no strains from Beethoven accompanied them, since neither the Turkish March from the incidental music to "The Ruins of Athens," nor the quick march bisecting the first act of "Fidelio," is exactly suited to ceremonial occasions. Instead, the entrance of the company was prolonged and appreciably helter-skelter. When all had taken their places, Judge Cabot, as presiding officer, bade the audience rise while four trombones [illegible] stage, sou[illegible] one of the Equali that Beethoven wrote in 1812 to oblige the kapellmeister of the cathedral at Linz, desiring them for funereal usage. Rearranged for men's chorus, two of them were heard at Beethoven's own funeral where—as last evening at Symphony Hall—"the solemnious tones floated upward through the silent

The introductory ceremonies thus completed, Judge C[illegible] half [illegible] trustees briefly [illegible] ar[illegible] An early men[illegible]

BEETHOVEN SURVEYED: COMPOSER'S PROGRESS, HIS TIME AND OURS

TRANS-MAR 29

ERNEST NEWMAN'S CENTENARY ADDRESS

A Great Figure Recalled in His Day and Outpouring Its Spirit—The Personality Rather Than the Historical Relation—The Mental and the Moral as Well as the Musical Influence—Forward to 2027

ELSEWHERE in these columns is some account of the "commemorative exercises" with which the Beethoven Centenary Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra proceeded last evening at Symphony Hall. The chief item in those "exercises" was the address of Mr. Ernest Newman, the eminent reviewer of music in London, essayist about it for the world at large. Here follows his discourse in running summary:

Placements

Mr. Newman began, of course, with the centenary celebration of which he was no inconspicuous part. With a pleasing touch of irony he deprecated such occasions as, like patriotism, inimical to the whole truth about the illustrious figure so honored. Fortunately there was a timely antidote—a clear and current reaction. A strong case, he admitted, had been, and could be, made against Beethoven as composer. It could also be enforced with a neat wit. Mr. Sonneck had put it ably in an article in The American Mercury. Stravinsky had hinted it when he asserted his distaste for Beethoven by reason of the composer's philosophy. In this debate, concluded Mr. Newman, is proof of the enduring vitality of Beethoven, of his measure as a continuing personality, rather than as a passing historical figure. It is a whimsey, proper to Mr. Newman's years and musical faiths, to think poorly of the modernists. He said as much when his discourse touched upon Stravinsky. A ripple of applause answered him. Little suspect those clappers what manuscripts, accepted, now lie upon Mr. Koussevitzky's table.

Beethoven, proceeded Mr. Newman, taking fresh cue, was often mistakenly regarded as the continuator of Mozart; whereas had not Mozart died untimely, they would have been virtual contemporaries. Thereupon, he enlarged upon a speculation already thrice-familiar to readers of his articles—the possible reactions of Mozart to the overtures, symphonies and chamber-pieces of Beethoven, one upon another. As Mr. Newman more than hinted, Mozart might have failed to adapt himself to the new musical conditions and the new musical times thus engendered, so fallen rearward and diminshed. By this parallel, Mr. Newman would exalt the place of Beethoven as the creator of a new music, when a new music by numberless scattered impulses, was due. Beethoven summed, concentrated and released them. There is need in our troubled musical time of a composer to do like office.

Hour and Man

The great and inexhaustible quality of Beethoven's mind—pursued Mr. Newman—was its inexhaustible logic; while his musical day was ripe for such function. To the fugal form, dominating an earlier music, had succeeded the sonata-form, already become an efficient instrument for composition, plentiful in opportunities for contrast. Beethoven amplified and enriched it, pouring into it new ideas. From this process, the symphony, the chamber-sonata, the string quartet—as we understand all three—were born. From Beethoven's dramatic overtures—"Egmont," "Coriolan" and the like—sprang the symphonic poem. Program-music owed much to him. To a symphonic movement, he mated words and the way was cleared for Liszt of the "Faust" or the "Dante" symphonies.

Beethoven's music, said Mr. Newman, again shifting his point of view, depends upon extra-musical influences,—the workings of a moral, philosophic, noble mind in the medium of tones. No doubt, Beethoven sometimes fell short in accomplishment of his high purpose, being in like case with Wordsworth, that uneven moralist and poet. No doubt, there was in these days an anti-moral reaction to Beethoven's music, again exemplified in the sayings of Mr. Sonneck. Yet it was no new thing. The Latin races were ingrained with mistrust of a mixture of metaphysics, morals and music. Neither Debussy nor Verdi responded to the Finale of the Choral Symphony. Their time, however, was not Beethoven's. He lived in an age of idealism and humanitarianism; absorbed its spirit; would impart it in his music. Sometimes he succeeded; again he failed. In either fortune, he was the voice of a new time and a new spirit—the man of and for the moment. The plain people were intruding into the aristocratic domain of music. The public concert was giving them entrance. The age of patrons was vanishing. True, Beethoven wrote music for them and profited from them; yet by them he was not constrained. Bach, Handel, Haydn are unthinkable without their wigs. Beethoven's short-cropped locks blew in the wind. These predecessors produced prolifically; Beethoven, in comparison, scantily. For a new time a new music drawn "from wells of deeper depth."

Periods and Progress

Mr. Newman then passed to the "three periods" into which it is the practice of scholars to divide the musical activities of Beethoven: first, the years in which he followed the courses of Mozart and Haydn, filling forms from the outside; second, the years in which he mated equally form and substance, ends and means; third, the years in which he struggled with the musical expression of the difficult matter alight within him. By these tokens Beethoven was the first composer who really grew as a man. For, in Mr. Newman's interesting opinion, Bach or Palestrina or Mozart was the identic man at the end of his life and work that he had been at the beginning. The gulf that separates the Brandenburg Concertos from the Mass in B-minor, or "La Finta Giardiniera" from "Figaro's Wedding" was an artistic, not a mental, progress; whereas Beethoven waxed in the logic of his great mind and in those unconscious or subconscious processes by which not a little of his music was produced. (On the press is Mr. Newman's impending book, "The Unconscious Beethoven.")

Thereby, in degree, Mr. Newman would explain Beethoven's concentration through years at a particular species of music. Between 1802 and 1811, he applied himself to orchestral composition; from 1814 to 1823, sonatas for piano engrossed him; from 1823 onward, he wreaked himself upon the Mass, the Chorai Symphony, the Last Quartets; while through the work of these latter days ran clear that subconscious or unconscious process by which Beethoven hardly knew what he actually brought to birth. . . . Every composer (pursued Mr. Newman) tends to repeat formulas and devices using them over and over again. In melody and harmony Beethoven teemed with them. The essence of change in a composer expressing himself and his mental development, was the achievement of new forms and new matter in which to embed these devices.

The Final Years

Again turning a sharp corner, Mr. Newman pictured Beethoven as a young man of no likable character, devoured by a self-esteem which yet was part and parcel of his outflinging energies. Deafness and other physical fates crept upon him, compelling concentration upon his music. Deafness, in particular, drove him in upon himself. Otherwise there would have been no such Beethoven as we know now. Yet with time the ingrained harshness softened into the peculiar pathos, the dumb piteousness, of Beethoven's last years. The slow movements of the last six piano-sonatas are the witness, and one by one Mr. Newman cited them as token of the change in Beethoven's moral and intellectual tissue in these final days. Too many, he averred have painted a fancy picture of this last Beethoven—now as a seer, again as an Ajax defying the lightning.

From this distortion a standardized Beethoven of the final period has emerged—unwarrantable by the facts of that time. Again he was working his way toward the same point of accomplishment in other forms that he had attained in the Fifth Symphony, wherein each movement is the complement of the other three. For out of the disharmony of Beethoven's life emerged the harmony of his music. From the tortured dispair of the will written at Heiligenstadt in the autumn of 1802 upsprung the heroic energy of the first movement of the Third Symphony. A few years later, in the Fifth Symphony, Beethoven achieved the completeness of every element. In the Last Quartets, over the warring elements of his own nature he pursued the same goal, seeking once and again a little more than music could say; thereby failing for the while in his purpose. Nor did Beethoven set to these tasks in detachment and withdrawal from the world, as one who is at the close of a career. Rather he died too young from that fatal cold, when ten

Continued on Following Page

Beethoven Festival Closes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, brought its Beethoven Centenary Festival to a triumphant conclusion in Symphony Hall last night with performances of the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. In the last movement of the Ninth, the orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, Nevada Van der Veer, contralto, Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass.

MONITOR

Conductor, orchestra and singers were on their mettle, and memorable performances resulted. Mr. Koussevitzky revealed last night his best qualities as an interpreter, his poetic imagination, his emotional power, his dramatic feeling, his sense of style. The "Little Symphony" was set forth in all its Mozartean charm and gayety, yet the conductor did not forget that the composer labeled the first movement "con brio" as well as "vivace." Precisely the element that [illegible] differentiates Beethoven [illegible] his lighter moods from Mozart was brought out here. And with what precision and suppleness the players turned every phrase, painted in every shading, at the behest of the leader.

MAR 30

But of course the heights and depths were touched with the Ninth. One felt the justice of Mr. Newman's assertion the other night that Beethoven in his last works attained to altitudes that no successor has been able to use as foundation for further building. The mysterious introduction, the Gargantuan Presto, the harrowing beauty of the slow movement, engrave on our consciousness the profundity of the composer's thought, the nobility of his aspiration. More so, in the opinion of one listener at least, than the final movement, which in spite of its splendor seems a futile attempt to reduce to words that which already has been revealed.

The eloquence of the performance roused the audience to rare enthusiasm. At the close Mr. Koussevitzky, Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth and the soloists were recalled [illegible] and chorus and orchestra were called on to share the applause. To handclapping were added "Bravo's" and cheers. When has Symphony Hall witnessed such a manifestation at a musical performance? It was a fitting expression of gratitude to everybody, from the conductor down, who has helped to pay the tribute of the last week to the memory of Beethoven.

L. A. S.

BEETHOVEN HONORED AT EXERCISES

POST MAR 27

Koussevitzky Makes His First Speech in English

130

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was marked enthusiasm at Symphony Hall last evening, when Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in making the opening address at the commemorative exercises of the Beethoven Centenary Festival, referred to Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra.

ENTHUSIASM FOR CONDUCTOR

There was enthusiasm when Ernest Newman, who had crossed the ocean to be present on this occasion, had finished his scholarly dissertation on Beethoven; again when S. Foster Damon had read his ode, "Beethoven," and once more when the Lenox Quartet played the composer's last work, the Quartet in F Major. But most of all was there enthusiasm when Serge Koussevitzky, making his first address in the English language, rose to add his word of tribute to the composer and of acknowledgment to all those who have contributed to making the festival a success.

Altogether unusual was the aspect presented by the stage of Symphony Hall last evening. A bust of Beethoven surmounted the floor at the rear, the walls were hung with rugs and the floor covered with them, while across the centre stretched a long table draped in red.

Orchestra as Auditors

Ranged along the rear of the stage were the members of the orchestra—without their instruments. At the centre table sat Mrs. Higginson, Judge Cabot, the conductor and Mrs. Koussevitzky, Dr. Davison, Mr. Newman and Mr. Damon. At each side were seated prominent musicians of the city, trustees of the orchestra, and other dignitaries.

Ranking high among English-speaking authorities on music, Mr. Newman last evening vouchsafed a searching analysis of Beethoven's place in music and of the character and the development of his compositions. Beethoven, he assured us, is not a dead issue in music, but a very present one. In 1970, when occurs the bicentenary of his birth, and in 2027, when will come the second centenary of his death, he will still remain a problem, a theme of fertile and illuminating discussion. And, referring to the performances lately given by our "great orchestra and great conductor," Mr. Newman pertinently stressed the point that Beethoven's music keeps pace with the times, and that we have thus heard in Boston performances such as Beethoven himself could not have imagined, that surpass the performances of Wagner's day as they had in turn surpassed those of Mendelssohn's!

Nine Words Harder

More poetic, less analytical, but in its way as eloquent, was Mr. Damon's tribute. From the Lenox Quartet there came a beautifully finished performance of the piece which, as Mr. Newman suggested, indicated that Beethoven's fourth period, had he lived to realize it, might have been the cheerfullest, the lightest-hearted of them all.

And when Mr. Koussevitzky, facing the great audience that rose to greet him, by way of preface said clearly though not without an accent, that it was far easier to conduct nine symphonies of Beethoven than to pronounce correctly nine words of English, he "brought down the house."

BEETHOVEN EXERCISES IN ADV SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

In a centenary festival of Beethoven the music's the thing, and the music has, indeed, been the thing at Symphony Hall for the past week, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra and guest artists have been performing the most pretentious series of programs in America. But last night's program found what little music there was sandwiched between the parts of commemorative exercises, a tribute in words to Beethoven's genius.

After the members of the orchestra, trustees and guests had gathered on the stage, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, opened the evening's program with brief remarks. Then he introduced Ernest Newman, leading English music critic, who came from London especially for the occasion. Mr. Newman gave an address on Beethoven. His words were refreshing in their unhackneyed character, in the light that they threw upon the acuteness of the speaker. Instead of allowing his address to become purely formal, he played around the subject, touching lightly, yet often brilliantly, on various phases of Beethoven's music and character that are not often emphasized.

S. Foster Damon, a young poet and instructor at Harvard, read an original ode, "Beethoven," which also was written for the occasion. The only music of the evening, with the exception of a few brief bars at the opening, was then rendered—Beethoven's last composition, the quartet in F major, Opus 135, played by the Lenox String Quartet. The program closed with remarks by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

Great as had been the enthusiasm of the audience when Judge Cabot alluded to the founder of the orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, it was as nothing compared with the tremendous applause that greeted Mr. Koussevitzky. Obviously affected, the brilliant conductor confined himself to thanking everyone concerned in the festival, and to referring to Beethoven as the "great est genius of all countries."

GLOBE MAR 27

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" Next Year?

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was given last Tuesday in Boston for the first time since 1900. The performance, which will be repeated this afternoon, introduced to almost everyone who heard it one of the unquestioned great masterpieces. The occasion for this revival is, of course, the centenary of Beethoven's death, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is celebrating by a magnificent series of festival performances.

Must Boston wait another 27 years, after this afternoon, for an opportunity to hear the "Missa Solemnis?" Cannot we establish a tradition that this work, the Brahms Requiem, and Bach's "St Matthew Passion" are to be heard in rotation?

This would mean that at least once in three years Boston heard Beethoven's tremendous work, and that in every season one great choral work was given by the Boston Symphony and the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe, so superbly trained by Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth.

It took a year of rehearsal to prepare the chorus for the "Missa Solemnis." The orchestra, and the solo singers must also have had to prepare music both extremely exacting and unfamiliar. Another performance next season, or even the season after, would require less arduous labor to prepare. It would mean for many of the participants simply recalling familiar music, and grappling with difficulties already conquered.

We have already had the Brahms Requiem, the Ninth Symphony, and now the "Missa Solemnis" from the Boston Symphony and the Harvard Glee Club. If a Bach work, either the "Matthew Passion," the Passion According to St John, or the great B Minor Mass is added to the current repertory and the items already in it are kept there by frequent performances the public appetite for great and austere choral works will grow. Good music is proverbially, familiar music.

There are, of course, many other choral works which Boston ought to hear. But are not the advantages of sticking to a group of three, or at any rate not more than five masterpieces greater under existing circumstances than the disadvantages.

Many people complain loudly because Handel's "Messiah" is given every year, while his other choral works are neglected. But the popularity of Handel, his place in the hearts of American audiences would have been impossible without these repetitions of a single work. It would not have served the same purpose to give a different Handel oratorio every year till the supply ran out and repetition became necessary.

Choral concerts are infrequent here compared to orchestral concerts. The choruses are composed of amateur singers. Neither they nor their audiences can do full justice to a great and exacting choral work without frequent reptitions of it. Let us hear the "Missa Solemnis" again next year, or at latest the year following.

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's great Beethoven Centenary Festival, described by Mme Olga Samaroff in the New York Evening Post as the most notable tribute being paid in America to his memory will end Tuesday night. It has been a series of concerts to be remembered. The great audiences, the enthusiasm, the remarkable quality of the performances are all tributes to the undying genius of Beethoven.

Particularly notable is the singing of the chorus of college students from Harvard and Radcliffe, which no other amateur chorus in America could surpass. To Mr Davison and his admirable assistant Mr Woodworth immense credit should be given.

Ernest Newman, the noted English critic who has come from London to deliver the commemorative address tomorrow night, is the author of a number of learned but eminently readable books on musical topics, which are among the best in English. He was in 1905 music critic for the Manchester Guardian and after that until 1919 for the Birmingham Post. Since 1920 he has written musical articles in the London Sunday Times and the Observer. Two seasons ago he acted as guest critic for the New York Evening Post.

S. Foster Damon, the Cambridge poet who will read an ode at the commemorative exercises to Beethoven, was graduated from Harvard in 1914. He is the author of a book on Blake, and of numerous verses.

THE WORD OF PRAISE: SPEECHFUL CEREMONY, HONORING BEETHOVEN

AMBER-

...crimson stuff gold-bordered. Behind it was a row of chairs, subsequently occupied by the President of the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, Judge Cabot; the venerable widow of the founder and first "sustainer," Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson; the conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, and Mrs. Koussevitzky; the speaker of the evening, Mr. Ernest Newman, reviewer of opera and concerts for the Sunday Times of London and essayist about music in general and in particular; Mr. S. Foster Damon, odist of the occasion and instructor in English at Harvard College.

To right and left of these seats of honor, chairs in crescent awaited the trustees and their guests—representatives of the elder generation long associated with the orchestra, like Mr. Henry M. Rogers and the learned archæologist of the program-books; coadjutors in present and past undertakings, like the invaluable Dr. Davison of Harvard and his assistant, Mr. Woodworth; resident composers, like Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Converse; resident practitioners of music or of kindred arts, like Mr. Goodrich or Professor Spalding. Behind, under the organ, in widespreading rows were to sit the present members of the orchestra. Most remarkable of all, parquet and balconies disclosed few vacant seats. Even to hear words about music, rather than the music itself, will the Bostonians flock—when the musician is Beethoven dead a hundred years and a day.

At eight o'clock and thirty-five minutes—rare unpunctuality in that prompt concert-room—the doors at the back of the stage opened, and Judge Cabot with Mrs. Higginson on his arm led the defile. Contrary to the expectation of certain incorrigible souls, no strains from Beethoven accompanied them, since neither the Turkish March from the incidental music to "The Ruins of Athens," nor the quick march bisecting the first act of "Fidelio," is exactly suited to ceremonial occasions. Instead, the entrance of the company was prolonged and appreciably helter-skelter. When all had taken their places, Judge Cabot, as presiding officer, bade the audience rise while four trombones [illegible] stage, sou[illegible] one of the Equali that Beethoven wrote in 1812 to oblige the kapellmeister of the cathedral at Linz, desiring them for funereal usage. Rearranged for men's chorus, two of them were heard at Beethoven's own funeral where—as last evening at Symphony Hall—"the solemn tones floated upward through the silent [illegible]

The introductory ceremonies thus completed, Judge Cabot, [illegible] half [illegible] trustees briefly [illegible] An early mem[illegible]

BEETHOVEN SURVEYED: COMPOSER'S PROGRESS, HIS TIME AND OURS

TRANS-MAR 29

ERNEST NEWMAN'S CENTENARY ADDRESS

A Great Figure Recalled in His Day and Outpouring Its Spirit—The Personality Rather Than the Historical Relation—The Mental and the Moral as Well as the Musical Influence—Forward to 2027

ELSEWHERE in these columns is some account of the "commemorative exercises" with which the Beethoven Centenary Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra proceeded last evening at Symphony Hall. The chief item in those "exercises" was the address of Mr. Ernest Newman, the eminent reviewer of music in London, essayist about it for the world at large. Here follows his discourse in running summary:

Placements

Mr. Newman began, of course, with the centenary celebration of which he was no inconspicuous part. With a pleasing touch of irony he deprecated such occasions as, like patriotism, inimical to the whole truth about the illustrious figure so honored. Fortunately there was a timely antidote—a clear and current reaction. A strong case, he admitted, had been, and could be, made against Beethoven as composer. It could also be enforced with a neat wit. Mr. Sonneck had put it ably in an article in The American Mercury. Stravinsky had hinted it when he asserted his distaste for Beethoven by reason of the composer's philosophy. In this debate, concluded Mr. Newman, is proof of the enduring vitality of Beethoven, of his measure as a continuing personality, rather than as a passing historical figure. It is a whimsey, proper to Mr. Newman's years and musical faiths, to think poorly of the modernists. He said as much when his discourse touched upon Stravinsky. A ripple of applause answered him. Little suspect those clappers what manuscripts, accepted, now lie upon Mr. Koussevitzky's table.

Beethoven, proceeded Mr. Newman, taking fresh cue, was often mistakenly regarded as the continuator of Mozart; whereas had not Mozart died untimely, they would have been virtual contemporaries. Thereupon, he enlarged upon a speculation already thrice-familiar to readers of his articles—the possible reactions of Mozart to the overtures, symphonies and chamber-pieces of Beethoven, one upon another. As Mr. Newman more than hinted, Mozart might have failed to adapt himself to the new musical conditions and the new musical times thus engendered, so fallen rearward and diminshed. By this parallel, Mr. Newman would exalt the place of Beethoven as the creator of a new music, when a new music by numberless scattered impulses, was due. Beethoven summed, concentrated and released them. There is need in our troubled musical time of a composer to do like office.

Hour and Man

The great and inexhaustible quality of [illegible]ethoven's mind—pursued Mr. Newman [illegible]was its inexhaustible logic; while his [illegible]usical day was ripe for such function. [illegible]he fugal form, dominating an earlier [illegible]ic, had succeeded the sonata-form, [illegible]eady become an efficient instrument [illegible]ck composition, plentiful in opportunities for contrast. Beethoven am[illegible]ed and enriched it, pouring into it [illegible]nd ideas. From this process, the symphony, the chamber-sonata, the string [illegible]adtet—as we understand all three—[illegible] born. From Beethoven's dra[illegible] overtures—"Egmont," "Coriolan" [illegible] in the like—sprang the symphonic [illegible]os. Program-music owed much to [illegible]ers To a symphonic movement, he [illegible]es- words and the way was cleared [illegible]oth szt of the "Faust" or the "Dante" [illegible]am onies.

[illegible]ep-hoven's music, said Mr. Newman, [illegible]ore shifting his point of view, depends [illegible]eat extra-musical influences,—the work[illegible] a moral, philosophic, noble mind [illegible] medium of tones. No doubt, Beet[illegible]was sometimes fell short in accomplish[illegible]ook of his high purpose, being in like [illegible]next with Wordsworth, that uneven [illegible]hts- t and poet. No doubt, there was [illegible]Ma-e days an anti-moral reaction to [illegible]New-ren's music, again exemplified in [illegible]ucedings of Mr. Sonneck. Yet it was [illegible] as thing. The Latin races were in[illegible]oney with mistrust of a mixture of [illegible]xer-sics, morals and music. Neither Debussy nor Verdi responded to the Finale of the Choral Symphony. Their time, however, was not Beethoven's. He lived in an age of idealism and humanitarianism; absorbed its spirit; would impart it in his music. Sometimes he succeeded; again he failed. In either fortune, he was the voice of a new time and a new spirit—the man of and for the moment. The plain people were intruding into the aristocratic domain of music. The public concert was giving them entrance. The age of patrons was vanishing. True, Beethoven wrote music for them and profited from them; yet by them he was not constrained. Bach, Handel, Haydn are unthinkable without their wigs. Beethoven's short-cropped locks blew in the wind. These predecessors produced prolifically; Beethoven, in comparison, scantily. For a new time a new music drawn "from wells of deeper depth."

Periods and Progress

Mr. Newman then passed to the "three periods" into which it is the practice of scholars to divide the musical activities of Beethoven: first, the years in which he followed the courses of Mozart and Haydn, filling forms from the outside; second, the years in which he mated equally form and substance, ends and means; third, the years in which he struggled with the musical expression of the difficult matter alight within him. By these tokens Beethoven was the first composer who really grew as a man. For, in Mr. Newman's interesting opinion, Bach or Palestrina or Mozart was the identic man at the end of his life and work that he had been at the beginning. The gulf that separates the Brandenburg Concertos from the Mass in B-minor, or "La Finta Giardiniera" from "Figaro's Wedding" was an artistic, not a mental, progress; whereas Beethoven waxed in the logic of his great mind and in those unconscious or subconscious processes by which not a little of his music was produced. (On the press is Mr. Newman's impending book, "The Unconscious Beethoven.")

Thereby, in degree, Mr. Newman would explain Beethoven's concentration through years at a particular species of music. Between 1802 and 1811, he applied himself to orchestral composition; from 1814 to 1823, sonatas for piano engrossed him; from 1823 onward, he wreaked himself upon the Mass, the Chorai Symphony, the Last Quartets; while through the work of these latter days ran clear that subconscious or unconscious process by which Beethoven hardly knew what he actually brought to birth. . . . Every composer (pursued Mr. Newman) tends to repeat formulas and devices using them over and over again. In melody and harmony Beethoven teemed with them. The essence of change in a composer expressing himself and his mental development, was the achievement of new forms and new matter in which to embed these devices.

The Final Years

Again turning a sharp corner, Mr. Newman pictured Beethoven as a young man of no likable character, devoured by a self-esteem which yet was part and parcel of his outflinging energies. Deafness and other physical fates crept upon him, compelling concentration upon his music. Deafness, in particular, drove him in upon himself. Otherwise there would have been no such Beethoven as we know now. Yet with time the ingrained harshness softened into the peculiar pathos, the dumb piteousness, of Beethoven's last years. The slow movements of the last six piano-sonatas are the witness, and one by one Mr. Newman cited them as token of the change in Beethoven's moral and intellectual tissue in these final days. Too many, he averred have painted a fancy picture of this last Beethoven—now as a seer, again as an Ajax defying the lightning.

From this distortion a standardized Beethoven of the final period has emerged—unwarrantable by the facts of that time. Again he was working his way toward the same point of accomplishment in other forms that he had attained in the Fifth Symphony, wherein each movement is the complement of the other three. For out of the disharmony of Beethoven's life emerged the harmony of his music. From the tortured dispair of the will written at Heiligenstadt in the autumn of 1802 upsprung the heroic energy of the first movement of the Third Symphony. A few years later, in the Fifth Symphony, Beethoven achieved the completeness of every element. In the Last Quartets, over the warring elements of his own nature he pursued the same goal, seeking once and again a little more than music could say; thereby failing for the while in his purpose. Nor did Beethoven set to these tasks in detachment and withdrawal from the world, as one who is at the close of a career. Rather he died too young from that fatal cold, when ten [illegible] differentiates Beethoven [illegible] his lighter moods from Mozart was brought out here. And with what precision and suppleness the players turned every phrase, painted in every shading, at the behest of the leader.

Continued on Following Page

But of course the heights and depths were touched with the Ninth. One felt the justice of Mr. Newman's assertion the other night that Beethoven in his last works attained to altitudes that no successor has been able to use as foundation for further building. The mysterious introduction, the Gargantuan Presto, the harrowing beauty of the slow movement, engrave on our consciousness the profundity of the composer's thought, the nobility of his aspiration. More so, in the opinion of one listener at least, than the final movement, which in spite of its splendor seems a futile attempt to reduce to words that which already has been revealed.

The eloquence of the performance roused the audience to rare enthusiasm. At the close Mr. Koussevitzky, Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth and the soloists were recalled again [illegible]

Beethoven Festival Closes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, brought its Beethoven Centenary Festival to a triumphant conclusion in Symphony Hall last night with performances of the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. In the last movement of the Ninth, the orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, Nevada Van der Veer, contralto, Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass.

MONITOR

Conductor, orchestra and singers were on their mettle, and memorable performances resulted. Mr. Koussevitzky revealed last night his best qualities as an interpreter, his poetic imagination, his emotional power, his dramatic feeling, his sense of style. The "Little Symphony" was set forth in all its Mozartean charm and gayety, yet the conductor did not forget that the composer labeled the first movement "con brio" as well as "vivace." Precisely the element

BEETHOVEN HONORED AT EXERCISES

POST MAR 27

Koussevitzky Makes His First Speech in English

130

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was marked enthusiasm at Symphony Hall last evening, when Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in making the opening address at the commemorative exercises of the Beethoven Centenary Festival, referred to Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra.

ENTHUSIASM FOR CONDUCTOR

There was enthusiasm when Ernest Newman, who had crossed the ocean to be present on this occasion, had finished his scholarly dissertation on Beethoven; again when S. Foster Damon had read his ode, "Beethoven," and once more when the Lenox Quartet played the composer's last work, the Quartet in F Major. But most of all was there enthusiasm when Serge Koussevitzky, making his first address in the English language, rose to add his word of tribute to the composer and of acknowledgment to all those who have contributed to making the festival a success.

Altogether unusual was the aspect presented by the stage of Symphony Hall last evening. A bust of Beethoven surmounted the floor at the rear, the walls were hung with rugs and the floor covered with them, while across the centre stretched a long table draped in red.

Orchestra as Auditors

Ranged along the rear of the stage were the members of the orchestra without their instruments. At the centre table sat Mrs. Higginson, Judge Cabot, the conductor and Mrs. Koussevitzky, Dr. Davison, Mr. Newman and Mr. Damon. At each side were seated prominent musicians of the city, trustees of the orchestra, and other dignitaries.

Ranking high among English-speaking authorities on music, Mr. Newman last evening vouchsafed a searching analysis of Beethoven's place in music and of the character and the development of his compositions. Beethoven, he assured us, is not a dead issue in music, but a very present one. In 1970, when occurs the bicentenary of his birth, and in 2027, when will come the second centenary of his death, he will still remain a problem, a theme for fertile and illuminating discussion. And, referring to the performances lately given by our "great orchestra and great conductor," Mr. Newman pertinently stressed the point that Beethoven's music keeps pace with the times, and that we have thus heard in Boston performances such as Beethoven himself could not have imagined, that surpass the performances of Wagner's day as they had in turn surpassed those of Mendelssohn's!

Nine Words Harder

More poetic, less analytical, but in its way as eloquent, was Mr. Damon's tribute. From the Lenox Quartet there came a beautifully finished performance of the piece which, as Mr. Newman suggested, indicated that Beethoven's fourth period, had he lived to realize it, might have been the cheerfullest, the lightest-hearted of them all.

And when Mr. Koussevitzky, facing the great audience that rose to greet him, by way of preface said clearly though not without an accent, that it was far easier to conduct nine symphonies of Beethoven than to pronounce correctly nine words of English, he "brought down the house."

[illegible] again and again, and chorus and orchestra were called on to share the applause. To handclapping were added "Bravo's" and cheers. When has Symphony Hall witnessed such a manifestation at a musical performance? It was a fitting expression of gratitude to everybody, from the conductor down, who has helped to pay the tribute of the last week to the memory of Beethoven.

L. A. S.

MAR 30

ENDS BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL HERE

HER MAR 31

Symphony Orchestra and Singers Give Two Symphonies

By PHILIP HALE

A performance of Beethoven's 8th and 9th symphonies by the Boston Symphony Orchestra assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and a quartet composed of Jeannette Freeland, Nevada Van Der Vere, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton, ended last night in Symphony hall the Beethoven centenary festival.

Whenever the 9th symphony is heard, the question inevitably comes up whether Beethoven would not have been wiser, if the symphony would not be a more complete work of art, if he had written a purely instrumental finale. The question also arises, Of what nature would the 10th symphony have been; for he purposed to write a tenth.

He had in mind two symphonies when he was composing the 9th. He thought of one "in an old mode," based on "We praise thee, O God—Alleluia," with an Adagio suggested by a Greek myth, and an Allegro portraying the Festival of Bacchus. This was to be a "Symphonie Allemanda," differing from the one ordered by the Philharmonic Society of London. But from a late year in the 18th century he was possessed with the idea of setting music to Schiller's Ode to Joy. He thought of a finale in fugal form. He also meditated a finale "With Turkish music" and a vocal chorus.

The result of these various purposes and plans was the 9th Symphony as it now stands. The first movement and the gigantic, demoniacal Scherzo remain; the "Cantique ecclesiastique" designed for the other symphony became the present slow movement; Bacchus was thrown overboard, at least by name, though many pages of the Ode to Joy have a Bacchic exultation and frenzy.

And so we have a hybrid work in that the Finale has no logical connection with the preceding movements. For this reason, and on account of the almost impossible task set for the singers, even fervent worshipers of Beethoven have wished that this Finale were for instruments only. It is stated by some contemporaries of Beethoven that he was not wholly satisfied with the vocal Finale; that he thought of writing a new one, possibly a huge fugue, for instruments.

Whatever may be thought of the Finale, which contains certain sublime pages that only Beethoven could have written, the movements preceding are beyond praise and blame. Never was he more inspired in thought and in expression. The movements of the 5th Symphony are more closely knit together, one the inveitable continuation in mood and in emotionally dramatic expression of the one preceding, the whole a portrayal of a mighty struggle as that of Jacob wrestling with the angel, until the victory is trumpeted in triumphant song; but in the first and third movements of the 9th Beethoven is even more the master of the sublime and the beautiful, while the fiery energy of the Scherzo, a Scherzo dreamed of by John Davidson in his strange poem, is unique in the whole of musical literature.

The performance of this symphony and that of the eighth brought a glorious end to the festival. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was poetically dramatic, vital throughout, by reason of his choice of tempi, his keen sense of rhythmic values, his command of significant nuances, his enthusiasm, which inspired orchestra, chorus and audience and did not turn into the wildness of sensational extravagance.

Seldom, if ever is heard a more impressive choral performance. Chorus and quartet, for once, were not dismayed by the reckless disregard shown by Beethoven for vocal limitations. No wonder that at the end of the concert the audience that filled the great hall, not content with customary tokens of appreciation and approbation, remained to cheer.

END FESTIVAL WITH NINTH

POST MAR 30

High Praise Given to Orchestra and Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In a blaze of tonal glory, choral and orchestral, followed by a veritable riot of cheering and applause, the Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall came last evening to an inspiring conclusion, a fitting termination, with a performance of the "Ninth Symphony."

As curtain-raiser to the epochal Ninth had come the concise, high-spirited "Eighth Symphony" in a revealing performance, in which the highest lights were the beautifully euphonious ticktocking woodwinds of the Allegretto Scherzando and the assembled wind instruments of the Trio of the Minuet.

Then to the Ninth; the vasty opening Allegro; the tumultuous Scherzo, as irresistible as an avalanche; the long-drawn, heart-felt song of the Adagio; the joy-drunk delirium of the choral Finais, shouting its elation to the skies.

As in previous performances of the Ninth, the chorus last evening came from the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, and as before Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth; who had trained them, received at the close the ... of ac-

...eir meed ...

..., the visiting English ... and critic, at the close ...ening's performance gladly consented to add for the benefit of the Post readers a few words of personal comment.

"Magnificent" and "superb" were the first of these words, and he went on to say: "I cannot imagine anything finer than the performances I have heard this past week, particularly of the lighter things. I have heard Mr. Koussevitzky conduct the Ninth Symphony in England, but the orchestral performance was not nearly so finished as this." He added expression of regret that he had not heard the Boston orchestra, in its present estate, in some modern music as well. And to the direct question as to whether it ...

AFTER THE FESTIVAL

BOSTON'S Beethoven Music Festival swept to its glorious finale last night with the victorious chorales of the 9th Symphony. What a tremendous week it has been! Not within the memory of the living have music lovers been so prodigally given of the sustained depth and splendor of a creative genius. This heroic friend of man, his suffering, his struggles, his adversities, his unappeasable hunger for liberation, and his triumphant, giant strides along the highways of immortality, have all been reviewed—and renewed, night after night, from the gangling beginnings to the imperishable climax.

To M Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who conceived the idea of this Centenary festival for New England, and to his associates in orchestra and chorus in the unbelievably difficult enterprise, the thanks of the entire community are due. Enthusiasm wedded to high and painstaking technical skill bore such progeny of excellence durin these many concerts as rejoice th hearts of all lovers of beauty.

And now, with the visitation ended what is to happen to the impetus thus given to music in these parts? Is it to be permitted to perish in diminishing ripples of public interest? Or is it to be kept, as the treasure it is; put to work, in all possible practical directions; made a new opportunity by many that they may push on with exploration and curiosity into the fields this Festival has disclosed, perhaps for the first time, to their wondering surprise? For one solid week thousands of persons, lay and professionally minded with regard to music, have lived with a towering human hero who gave of his heart and soul to add this portion to human happiness. It is conceivable that the event may be forgotten soon by some who paid little attention. It is inconceivable that it shall ever be forgotten by those who really dwelt in it. But recollection is not enough.

Of what use is it to meet such a friend? Begin by recapitulating what has happened. First of all, the life story of one who labored in the creative rhythms of human experience has been reopened to all. No tale of fiction surpasses the bleak realities of that career, the wealth of obstacles it faced, the inspiring surge of its triumph. Is not this a clew free to the taker? What, then, was the experience of others of these great heroic human friends? The invitation to search is clear enough.

Next the fact is borne in upon one that this man dwelt with questions that occupy the attention, at some time, of every last one of us, in all epochs: the problem of intellectual honesty; the meaning of human freedom; the instruction of suffering and sacrifice; the conquest of tolerance; the triumph of a spiritual brotherhood that reaches beyond all creeds to the living core of beauty. What one shall do with that lesson rests entirely with himself: his own mind, his own heart, his own spirit.

There has been stirred also a prodigious educational effort. Not by the courageous labors of those directly concerned with the concerts at Symphony Hall alone. In hundreds of communities and scores of schools as well. To a great many this Centenary festival has been seen as an opportunity for special new attempts. In several instances community music clubs have found in it impetus to organization. Programs have been worked out and given. School children have participated in the celebration. Over the radio and by other means interested audiences have been found; people, often, who knew little of music technically, have discovered to their delight that they can enjoy the music. Their interest and those efforts were well continued and fostered. They can be only by hard work in schools, community clubs, orchestras and choral societies.

The Beethoven Festival is over. But the Easter Festival awaits voice, instrument, thought and enterprise—just beyond the threshold, with plenty of time available to prepare for it.

"Good taste" is a word that often frightens many. It should no longer. Events like this festival conspire to aid us all. Culture—the true culture—is nothing more than a result of deliberate effort to build one's tastes in fine things. Well, here is the long-awaited nudge. We do not sing enough. It is time we began. We do not seek loveliness enough. Here is ample excuse for quickening the hunt. We do not dwell frequently enough with the heroes of creative human effort, those who speak with the brush, the chisel, the poem, the novel, in the builder's dream, the composer's scores. Here is an opportunity to begin again. Here too is a promise that it will be a fascinating experience.

Uncle Dudley.

AT CULMINATION AND CLOSE ARRIVE RITES TO BEETHOVEN'S FAME

TRANS—MAR 30

THE CHORAL SYMPHONY CROWNS THE WHOLE

For Prelude "The Little Eighth," Debateably Played—A Light or a Robust Music?—The Ninth in a Performance Outdoing Bostonian Precedent—From First Movement to Finale Full and Passioned Revelation

CONDUCTORS, nowadays, will not have it "a little Symphony. Beethoven—it is reasonably certain—called it such, though in what terms of comparison is not so clear. The tradition is that he was speaking of the Seventh; that, beside it, the Eighth was "The Little Symphony in F." Here in Boston Dr. Muck took the composer at his word and made the music sound as light, gay and miniature as might be. The present conducting generation is of a different mind. Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Society of New York played it in Symphony Hall last October, and the performance was robust. Outside the ticking Allegretto, Mr. Koussevitzky agrees with them. Last evening it was the turn of the Eighth at the Centenary Festival. For it the conductor arrayed nearly all his forces—strings en masse, doubled woodwinds in consequence; only horns and trumpets in modicum. With gusto he took the first movement, full-throated and salient. He broadened the periods and mellowed the accents of the third until it sounded like an ancient but stoutened minuet, touched here and there with parody For him the Finale was a burst of high spirits, full-tilt and lusty. Only upon the Allegretto did he lay the light hand and loose the lyric vein, as of a Beethoven still smiling, but pensive withal. The whole effect was instant and pleasurable—the more since the orchestra was at the top of its bent, plastic, resilient, on nervous "edge." Beethoven might be writing "a little symphony" of his own gayety, but his high spirits were exceedingly hearty—less the lyric interlude—and his laughter ...

...dience was bound to ... and the audience clapped out its ...ure. Free hand, full voice, lively ...nper make easy approaches.

None the less, fancy and even remembrance would run away to another version of the Eighth Symphony, quite as plausible and engrossing. Does it really need sixty-odd strings and quartets of wood-winds? Might it not have sounded in truer character had Mr. Koussevitzky returned to the orchestra of the Second? For what is Beethoven himself doing but harking back to the simplicities? The structure of the Eighth is clear as the day; the workmanship transparent; the moods unclouded. The third movement recedes toward the Minuet and, with a grimace, amplifies it. The Finale is a Finale of Mozart or Haydn, propelled by a more vigorous temperament and a more personal will. The first movement is a form filled with a wealth of fancy, craftsmanship and high spirits. It is as though Beethoven, instead of striking out for himself through the Third, the Fifth and the Seventh Symphonies, had followed the courses of the First, the Second and the Sixth into a full and final flowering of the eighteenth-century model, with lyric offshoots. No listener is recalling the Beethoven of the later Symphonies as he hears the Allegretto of the Eighth. He is reminded of the First and the Second, now fulfilled by a mind and spirit ripened, a hand grown more artful. The conventional Mozartean adjectives are the becoming festoons.

As likely as not the numeral before and the date after this "Little Symphony" mislead conductors and beguile audiences. They will have it work of Beethoven's middle maturity along with the Fifth and the Seventh. They forget that there also is the light and gracious Pastoral staring them in the face, or rather in the ear; while a composer as moody as Beethoven might well take the pleasure of a dip into old courses, especially if they suited other impulses within. It is quite possible to make out a case for the robust methods of Messrs. Mengelberg and Koussevitzky—and also for the lighter ways of Dr. Muck. Pirandello's title, "Right You Are, If You Think You Are" is more than label to a pseudo-metaphysical comedy It has a plain application to "the scores of the masters."

For most of us, besides, recollection of the "little" Eighth slipped down the wind, once Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had begun the Ninth as climax ...f the Centenary Festival; climax also ...o the symphonic Beethoven as the rest of time may, or may not, cherish him. Passing in review the preceding movements, before he sets to the Choral Finale, he himself gives cue. Pass in review, then, before we listeners set to the climactic Ninth its eight predecessors—the First, which is Symphony of imitation; the Second, which is Symphony of experiment; the Third, which is Symphony of powers unleashed, upon heroical moods and matters fastening; the Fourth, which is excursion into romantical fields; the Fifth, which is epical conflict of man with destiny for his freedoms; the Sixth, which is detour into gentle pleasures and amusing conventions; the Seventh, which is outpouring of the glories of rhythm and of music as mounting motion; the Eighth, which is jeu d'esprit of a gay and sportive hour. The Symphony of action and of the fates of living is exhausted in the Third and the Fifth; the Symphony of distraction in the Fourth, the Sixth and the Eighth; the Symphony of riot and rage, in the nobler sense, in the Seventh. There remains, for one, the Symphony of contemplation and transport, and in the Ninth Beethoven, resuming the great line from Fifth and Seventh, achieves it. There was a Tenth in process and progress. Almost on his death-bed Beethoven was reaching for his note-books. They yield the barest and faintest of clews.

The first three movements of the Ninth are as though Beethoven had taken himself upon a high mountain; thence looked down upon the ways, the passions, the lives, of men. (More probably, he was searching and wringing his own experienced, visioning, not untortured heart.) As sonorities—to use the modernist word—the first movement of the Ninth passions the ear. A vast tonal fabric unfolds, outspreads, gathers into full circle—all by its own impulsion. Within and through it flows instrumental melody in changeful flood; while upon the surface each voice does its office. There are heights of power—in bursts—depths of swift and sudden brooding. Beethoven, however, has other concerns than trumpet tongued sonorities and far-flung patterns. Behold in tones the destinies, desires and fates of man as one, now withdrawn above the mêlée, might contemplate them. It is Beethoven, at his own peculiar art of tone-picturing—the tone-picturing of abstractions.

The Scherzo ensues—of jostling phrases, hurtling periods, rhythms that cut and clash, leaps downward, leaps upward, inthrust and interlude of simple song, soon crowded and choked away. Above, the sage watches. Shall man save and soothe himself by incessant action? He toys with vanities; embraces phantoms; nor shall a halt in the simplicities aught avail him. . . . The Adagio, and Beethoven foretells and excels the slow movements of the Last Quartets—in splendor of far-flung and deep-set line from theme to theme exfoliating and sustained; in riches of instrumental song from a treasury inexhaustible; in glowing gesture pulsing and surcharged from the matter within; in quintessence of the brooding beauty, the stilled passion, of musical sound. The sage in contemplation would find the salvation of men. Is it in such compassion? No. Is it in fortitude? No. In the desperation of doing? No.

Like the gusty winds upon a mountain-top, blows across the beginning of the Finale this review of all that has gone before—to the No and No and No again of the rejecting basses. Then, of a sudden—and who that has walked mountain-ridges does not know the sensation, here, and here only, conveyed in music?—the ...

sounds through the orchestra. The instruments bear it as far as they may. A single voice proclaims it to other voices. Through mood upon mood, into passion after passion, the chorus bears it. By all means have it that Beethoven is expressing the idealism, the humanitarianism of his time, the aspirations next of kin; that—good honest fellow!—he believes in democracy, brotherhood, a universal affection, other will-o'-the-wisps long vanished.

Agree that the accomplishment of the finale is uneven; that from the sublime beauty of the choral adagio it can fall away into the banalities of the march-movement; that to voices that would crack open heaven with their rejoicing frenzies Beethoven can add only the piccolo, the cymbals, the big drum, of this immanent earth, routined in a concert-room. Agreed, admitted, acknowledged. Yet here abides the mightiest pæan that music has yet achieved, the culmination of the symphony of all symphonies. There cannot be one that hears who does not for the while put off this mortal coil, striding the universe—himself a god of joy.

The execution of this Ninth Symphony passed all expectation. It is a three-year diversion in Boston to quarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky's pace and accents and shadings, his readings in general, his "interpretations" in particular. There can be no demur to his version of the Choral Symphony, because within it the great voice and the great spirit of Beethoven at symphonic culmination live, move and have their being. The heroical, the epical, that which is far-flung and vast and high and deep may pierce Mr. Koussevitzky, goad and extend him beyond himself. Upon him the Ninth Symphony, like the Third or the Seventh, works this illumination and possession. The orchestra wrought in his image—with the certainty that is way to freedom; with life-giving ardor, with the manifold voice of a music multi-tongued. The mounting power, the darkling splendor of the first movement, the rhythmic lightnings of the second; the beauty deep-imbrued of the third; the transport of the fourth sounded in equal measure.

The quartet of singers—Mmes. Vreeland and van der Veer, Messrs. Stratton and Patton—proclaimed the music, not waded through it. The chorus caught the passion of the hour and heated its every means incandescent. No height, ... leap, no frenzy of Beethoven daunted ...em. In their stride they took it and ... was conquered. Upon these youth of ...arvard and Radcliffe Dr. Davison has ...ought the final miracle of choral song. ...e has made skill and surety, understanding and free will, the instrument ... power, the means to revelation; the ...ay to transport. . . . The audience ...ngered long to clap. The youth of the ...niversity, at sight of Dr. Davison, added ...so cheers. . . . In the full tide of a ... regular season" at Symphony Hall and ...e academic courses of Cambridge, the ...ymphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee ...lub, the Radcliffe Choral Society, have ...ccomplished large, exacting and con...entrated adventure, Mr. Koussevitzky ...nd Dr. Davison leaders in the deed. An ...dventure—by all odds that was the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
CHICAGO, ILL.
MAR 30 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAR 30 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final concert appearance this season at Poli's Theater Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' course and will also close for the season the series of concerts offered by the manager. Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky has not forwarded his program, but it is understood that he is preparing a repertoire of selections ...to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 31 ...

expected.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final local appearance of the musical season at Poli's on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 4:30 o'clock, as the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course. Mr. Koussevitzky has not yet forwarded his program, but it is understood to be composed of selections new to Washington. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, 1300 G ... N. W.

ENDS BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL HERE

HER MAR 31

Symphony Orchestra and Singers Give Two Symphonies

By PHILIP HALE

A performance of Beethoven's 8th and 9th symphonies by the Boston Symphony Orchestra assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and a quartet composed of Jeannette Freeland, Nevada Van Der Vere, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton, ended last night in Symphony hall the Beethoven centenary festival.

Whenever the 9th symphony is heard, the question inevitably comes up whether Beethoven would not have been wiser, if the symphony would not be a more complete work of art, if he had written a purely instrumental finale. The question also arises, Of what nature would the 10th symphony have been; for he purposed to write a tenth.

He had in mind two symphonies when he was composing the 9th. He thought of one "in an old mode," based on "We praise thee, O God—Alleluia," with an Adagio suggested by a Greek myth, and an Allegro portraying the Festival of Bacchus. This was to be a "Symphonie Allemanda," differing from the one ordered by the Philharmonic Society of London. But from a late year in the 18th century he was possessed with the idea of setting music to Schiller's Ode to Joy. He thought of a finale in fugal form. He also meditated a finale "With Turkish music" and a vocal chorus.

The result of these various purposes and plans was the 9th Symphony as it now stands. The first movement and the gigantic, demoniacal Scherzo remain; the "Cantique ecclesiastique" designed for the other symphony became the present slow movement; Bacchus was thrown overboard, at least by name, though many pages of the Ode to Joy have a Bacchic exultation and frenzy.

And so we have a hybrid work in that the Finale has no logical connection with the preceding movements. For this reason, and on account of the almost impossible task set for the singers, even fervent worshipers of Beethoven have wished that this Finale were for instruments only. It is stated by some contemporaries of Beethoven that he was not wholly satisfied with the vocal Finale; that he thought of writing a new one, possibly a huge fugue, for instruments.

Whatever may be thought of the Finale, which contains certain sublime pages that only Beethoven could have written, the movements preceding are beyond praise and blame. Never was he more inspired in thought and in expression. The movements of the 5th Symphony are more closely knit together, one the inveitable continuation in mood and in emotionally dramatic expression of the one preceding, the whole a portrayal of a mighty struggle as that of Jacob wrestling with the angel, until the victory is trumpeted in triumphant song; but in the first and third movements of the 9th Beethoven is even more the master of the sublime and the beautiful, while the fiery energy of the Scherzo, a Scherzo dreamed of by John Davidson in his strange poem, is unique in the whole of musical literature.

The performance of this symphony and that of the eighth brought a glorious end to the festival. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was poetically dramatic, vital throughout, by reason of his choice of tempi, his keen sense of rhythmic values, his command of significant nuances, his enthusiasm, which inspired orchestra, chorus and audience and did not turn into the wildness of sensational extravagance.

Seldom, if ever is heard a more impressive choral performance. Chorus and quartet, for once, were not dismayed by the reckless disregard shown by Beethoven for vocal limitations. No wonder that at the end of the concert the audience that filled the great hall, not content with customary tokens of appreciation and approbation, remained to cheer.

END FESTIVAL WITH NINTH

POST MAR 30

High Praise Given to Orchestra and Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In a blaze of tonal glory, choral and orchestral, followed by a veritable riot of cheering and applause, the Beethoven Centenary Festival at Symphony Hall came last evening to an inspiring conclusion, a fitting termination, with a performance of the "Ninth Symphony."

As curtain-raiser to the epochal Ninth had come the concise, high-spirited "Eighth Symphony" in a revealing performance, in which the highest lights were the beautifully euphonious ticktocking woodwinds of the Allegretto Scherzando and the assembled wind instruments of the Trio of the Minuet.

Then to the Ninth; the vasty opening Allegro; the tumultuous Scherzo, as irresistible as an avalanche; the long-drawn, heart-felt song of the Adagio; the joy-drunk delirium of the choral Finals, shouting its elation to the skies.

As in previous performances of the Ninth, the chorus last evening came from the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, and as before Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who had trained them, [illegible] at the close the [illegible] of ac-

[illegible] the visiting English [illegible] and critic, at the close [illegible]ating's performance gladly consented to add for the benefit of the Post readers a few words of personal comment.

"Magnificent" and "superb" were the first of these words, and he went on to say: "I cannot imagine anything finer than the performances I have heard this past week, particularly of the lighter things. I have heard Mr. Koussevitzky conduct the Ninth Symphony in England, but the orchestral performance was not nearly so finished as this." He added expression of regret that he had not heard the Boston orchestra, in its present estate, in some modern music as well. And to the direct question as to whether it [illegible] it for him.

AFTER THE FESTIVAL

CLOSE MAR 30

BOSTON'S Beethoven Music Festival swept to its glorious finale last night with the victorious chorales of the 9th Symphony. What a tremendous week it has been! Not within the memory of the living have music lovers been so prodigally given of the sustained depth and splendor of a creative genius. This heroic friend of man, his suffering, his struggles, his adversities, his unappeasable hunger for liberation, and his triumphant, giant strides along the highways of immortality, have all been reviewed—and renewed, night after night, from the gangling beginnings to the imperishable climax.

To M Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who conceived the idea of this Centenary festival for New England, and to his associates in orchestra and chorus in the unbelievably difficult enterprise, the thanks of the entire community are due. Enthusiasm wedded to high and painstaking technical skill bore such progeny of excellence durin these many concerts as rejoice th hearts of all lovers of beauty.

And now, with the visitation ended what is to happen to the impetus thus given to music in these parts? Is it to be permitted to perish in diminishing ripples of public interest? Or is it to be kept, as the treasure it is; put to work, in all possible practical directions; made a new opportunity by many that they may push on with exploration and curiosity into the fields this Festival has disclosed, perhaps for the first time, to their wondering surprise? For one solid week thousands of persons, lay and professionally minded with regard to music, have lived with a towering human hero who gave of his heart and soul to add this portion to human happiness. It is conceivable that the event may be forgotten soon by some who paid little attention. It is inconceivable that it shall ever be forgotten by those who really dwelt in it. But recollection is not enough.

Of what use is it to meet such a friend? Begin by recapitulating what has happened. First of all, the life story of one who labored in the creative rhythms of human experience has been reopened to all. No tale of fiction surpasses the bleak realities of that career, the wealth of obstacles it faced, the inspiring surge of its triumph. Is not this a clew free to the taker? What, then, was the experience of others of these great heroic human friends? The invitation to search is clear enough.

Next the fact is borne in upon one that this man dwelt with questions that occupy the attention, at some time, of every last one of us, in all epochs: the problem of intellectual honesty; the meaning of human freedom; the instruction of suffering and sacrifice; the conquest of tolerance; the triumph of a spiritual brotherhood that reaches beyond all creeds to the living core of beauty. What one shall do with that lesson rests entirely with himself: his own mind, his own heart, his own spirit.

There has been stirred also a prodigious educational effort. Not by the courageous labors of those directly concerned with the concerts at Symphony Hall alone. In hundreds of communities and scores of schools as well. To a great many this Centenary festival has been seen as an opportunity for special new attempts. In several instances community music clubs have found in it impetus to organization. Programs have been worked out and given. School children have participated in the celebration. Over the radio and by other means interested audiences have been found; people, often, who knew little of music technically, have discovered to their delight that they can enjoy fine music. Their interest and those efforts were well continued and fostered. They can be only by hard work in schools, community clubs, orchestras and choral societies.

The Beethoven Festival is over. But the Easter Festival awaits voice, instrument, thought and enterprise—just beyond the threshold, with plenty of time available to prepare for it.

"Good taste" is a word that often frightens many. It should no longer. Events like this festival conspire to aid us all. Culture—the true culture—is nothing more than a result of deliberate effort to build one's tastes in fine things. Well, here is the long-awaited nudge. We do not sing enough. It is time we began. We do not seek loveliness enough. Here is ample excuse for quickening the hunt. We do not dwell frequently enough with the heroes of creative human effort, those who speak with the brush, the chisel, the poem, the novel, in the builder's dream, the composer's scores. Here is an opportunity to begin again. Here too is a promise that it will be a fascinating experience.

Uncle Dudley.

AT CULMINATION AND CLOSE ARRIVE RITES TO BEETHOVEN'S FAME

TRANS MAR 30

THE CHORAL SYMPHONY CROWNS THE WHOLE

For Prelude "The Little Eighth," Debatably Played—A Light or a Robust Music?—The Ninth in a Performance Outdoing Bostonian Precedent—From First Movement to Finale Full and Passioned Revelation

CONDUCTORS, nowadays, will not have it "a little Sympnony. Beethoven—it is reasonably certain—called it such, though in what terms of comparison is not so clear. The tradition is that he was speaking of the Seventh; that, beside it, the Eighth was "The Little Symphony in F." Here in Boston Dr. Muck took the composer at his word and made the music sound as light, gay and miniature as might be. The present conducting generation is of a different mind. Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Society of New York played it in Symphony Hall last October, and the performance was robust. Outside the ticking Allegretto, Mr. Koussevitzky agrees with them. Last evening it was the turn of the Eighth at the Centenary Festival. For it the conductor arrayed nearly all his forces—strings en masse, doubled woodwinds in consequence; only horns and trumpets in modicum. With gusto he took the first movement, full-throated and salient. He broadened the periods and mellowed the accents of the third until it sounded like an ancient but stoutened minuet, touched here and there with parody For him the Finale was a burst of high spirits, full-tilt and lusty. Only upon the Allegretto did he lay the light hand and loose the lyric vein, as of a Beethoven still smiling, but pensive withal. The whole effect was instant and pleasurable—the more since the orchestra was at the top of its bent, plastic, resilient, on nervous "edge." Beethoven might be writing "a little symphony" of his own gayety, but his high spirits were exceedingly hearty—less the lyric interlude—and his laughter [illegible] and the audience clapped out its [illegible]. First hand, full voice, lively [illegible] make easy approaches.

None the less, fancy and even remembrance would run away to another version of the Eighth Symphony, quite as plausible and engrossing. Does it really need sixty-odd strings and quartets of wood-winds? Might it not have sounded in truer character had Mr. Koussevitzky returned to the orchestra of the Second? For what is Beethoven himself doing but harking back to the simplicities? The structure of the Eighth is clear as the day; the workmanship transparent; the moods unclouded. The third movement recedes toward the Minuet and, with a grimace, amplifies it. The Finale is a Finale of Mozart or Haydn, propelled by a more vigorous temperament and a more personal will. The first movement is a form filled with a wealth of fancy, craftsmanship and high spirits. It is as though Beethoven, instead of striking out for himself through the Third, the Fifth and the Seventh Symphonies, had followed the courses of the First, the Second and the Sixth into a full and final flowering of the eighteenth-century model, with lyric offshoots. No listener is recalling the Beethoven of the later Symphonies as he hears the Allegretto of the Eighth. He is reminded of the First and the Second, now fulfilled by a mind and spirit ripened, a hand grown more artful. The conventional Mozartean adjectives are the becoming festoons.

As likely as not the numeral before and the date after this "Little Symphony" mislead conductors and beguile audiences. They will have it work of Beethoven's middle maturity along with the Fifth and the Seventh. They forget that there also is the light and gracious Pastoral staring them in the face, or rather in the ear; while a composer as moody as Beethoven might well take the pleasure of a dip into old courses, especially if they suited other impulses within. It is quite possible to make out a case for the robust methods of Messrs. Mengelberg and Koussevitzky—and also for the lighter ways of Dr. Muck. Pirandello's title, "Right You Are, If You Think You Are" is more than label to a pseudo-metaphysical comedy It has a plain application to "the scores of the masters."

For most of us besides, recollection of the "little" Eighth slipped down the wind, once Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had begun the Ninth as climax [illegible] of the Centenary Festival [illegible] to the symphonic Beethove[illegible] of time may, or may not, [illegible] Passing in review the prece[illegible] ments, before he sets to the [illegible] nale, he himself gives cue. [illegible] view, then, before we listeners [illegible] climactic Ninth its eight prede[illegible] the First, which is Symphony [illegible] tion; the Second, which is Symp[illegible] experiment; the Third, which i[illegible] phony of powers unleashed, [illegible] heroical moods and matters faste[illegible] the Fourth, which is excursion int[illegible] mantical fields; the Fifth, which is [illegible] cal conflict of man with destiny for [illegible] freedoms; the Sixth, which is detour i[illegible] gentle pleasures and amusing conv[illegible] tions; the Seventh, which is outpour[illegible] ing of the glories of rhythm and of music as mounting motion; the Eighth, which [illegible]s jeu d'esprit of a gay and sportive hour. The Symphony of action and of the fates of living is exhausted in the Third and the Fifth; the Symphony of distraction in the Fourth, the Sixth and the Eighth; the Symphony of riot and rage, in the nobler sense, in the Seventh. There remains, for one, the Symphony of contemplation and transport, and in the Ninth Beethoven, resuming the great line from Fifth and Seventh, achieves it. There was a Tenth in process and progress. Almost on his death-bed Beethoven was reaching for his note-books. They yield the barest and faintest of clews.

The first three movements of the Ninth are as though Beethoven had taken himself upon a high mountain; thence looked down upon the ways, the passions, the lives, of men. (More probably, he was searching and wringing his own experienced, visioning, not untortured heart.) As sonorities—to use the modernist word—the first movement of the Ninth passions the ear. A vast tonal fabric unfolds, outspreads, gathers into full circle—all by its own impulsion. Within and through it flows instrumental melody in changeful flood; while upon the surface each voice does its office. There are heights of power—in bursts—depths of swift and sudden brooding. Beethoven, however, has other concerns than trumpet tongued sonorities and far-flung patterns. Behold in tones the destinies, desires and fates of man as one, now withdrawn above the mêlée, might contemplate them. It is Beethoven, at his own peculiar art of tone-picturing—the tone-picturing of abstractions.

The Scherzo ensues—of jostling phrases, hurtling periods, rnythms that cut and clash, leaps downward, leaps upward, in-thrust and interlude of simple song, soon crowded and choked away. Above, the sage watches. Shall man save and soothe himself by incessant action? He toys with vanities; embraces phantoms; nor shall a halt in the simplicities aught avail him. . . . The Adagio, and Beethoven foretells and excels the slow movements of the Last Quartets—in splendor of far-flung and deep-set line from theme to theme exfoliating and sustained; in riches of instrumental song from a treasury inexhaustible; in glowing vesture pulsing and surcharged from the matter within; in quintessence of the brooding beauty, the stilled passion, of musical sound. The sage in contemplation would find the salvation of men. Is it in such compassion? No. Is it in fortitude? No. In the desperation of doing? No.

Like the gusty winds upon a mountain-top, blows across the beginning of the Finale this review of all that has gone before—to the No and No and No again of the rejecting basses. Then, of a sudden—and who that has walked mountain-ridges does not know the sensation, here and here only, conveyed in music?—[illegible] sounds through the orchestra. The instruments bear it as far as they may. A single voice proclaims it to other voices. Through mood upon mood, into passion after passion, the chorus bears it. By all means have it that Beethoven is expressing the idealism, the humanitarianism of his time, the aspirations next of kin; that—good honest fellow!—he believes in democracy, brotherhood, a universal affection, other will-o'-the-wisps long vanished.

Agree that the accomplishment of the finale is uneven; that from the sublime beauty of the choral adagio it can fall away into the banalities of the march-movement; that to voices that would crack open heaven with their rejoicing frenzies Beethoven can add only the piccolo, the cymbals, the big drum, of this immanent earth, routined in a concert-room. Agreed. admitted, acknowledged. Yet here abides the mightiest pæan that music has yet achieved, the culmination of the symphony of all symphonies. There cannot be one that hears who does not for the while put off this mortal coil, striding the universe—himself a god of joy.

The execution of this Ninth Symphony passed all expectation. It is a three-year diversion in Boston to quarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky's pace and accents and shadings, his readings in general, his "interpretations" in particular. There can be no demur to his version of the Choral Symphony, because within it the great voice and the great spirit of Beethoven at symphonic culmination live, move and have their being. The heroical, the epical, that which is far-flung and vast and high and deep may pierce Mr. Koussevitzky, goad and extend him beyond himself. Upon him the Ninth Symphony, like the Third or the Seventh, works this illumination and possession. The orchestra wrought in his image—with the certainty that is way to freedom; with life-giving ardor, with the manifold voice of a music multi-tongued. The mounting power, the darkling splendor of the first movement; the rhythmic lightnings of the second; the beauty deep-imbrued of the third; the transport of the fourth sounded in equal measure.

The quartet of singers—Mmes. Vreeland and van der Veer, Messrs. Stratton and Patton—proclaimed the music, not waded through it. The chorus caught the passion of the hour and heated its every means incandescent. No height, no leap, no frenzy of Beethoven daunted them. In their stride they took it and it was conquered. Upon these youth of Harvard and Radcliffe Dr. Davison has wrought the final miracle of choral song. He has made skill and surety, understanding and free will, the instrument to power, the means to revelation; the way to transport. . . . The audience lingered long to clap. The youth of the University, at sight of Dr. Davison, added also cheers. . . . In the full tide of a "regular season" at Symphony Hall and the academic courses of Cambridge, the Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, have accomplished large, exacting and concentrated adventure, Mr. Koussevitzky and Dr. Davison leaders in the deed. An adventure—by all odds that was the thrill of it.

H. T. P.

MAR 30 1927

[illegible]MPHONY TUESDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final concert appearance this season at Poli's Theater Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Artists' course and will also close for the season the series of concerts offered by the manager. Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky has not forwarded hsi program, but it is understood that he is preparing a repertoire of selections entirely new to Washington.

[illegible]TON, D. C.

MAR 31 1927

expected.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final local appearance of the musical season at Poli's on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 4:30 o'clock, as the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course. Mr. Koussevitzky has not yet forwarded his program, but it is understood to be composed of selections new to Washington. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Concert Bureau, 1300 G St. N. W.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 30 1927

Other Music

...th Symphony Ends Boston's Beethoven Festival

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 30.

THE Beethoven Centenary Festiva... arranged by the Boston Sym... phony Orchestra ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. In the latte... work the orchestra had the co-opera...

...tion of the Harvard Glee Club, train... by Dr. A. T. Davison, and the Radcli... Choral Society, trained by G. Walla... Woodworth. The assisting soloists we... Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Neva... Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stra... ton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. T... hall had been sold out weeks in a... vance. The audience applauded wi... spontaneous enthusiasm.

It is customary to speak slighting... of the Eighth as "The Little Symphony... and to regard it as a work less im... portant than the Ninth, or th... "Eroica," and the other great sym... phonies of Beethoven. But this is t... ignore its imperishable beauty and t... forget that in the Eighth Beethoven... succeeded perfectly in what he at... tempted. If the greatness of a piec... of music depended on its length, it... loudness and the number of perform... ers required, the symphonies of Mahle... would excel those of Mozart.

Ernest Newman in his commemora... tive address Monday night reminded... his hearers that Mozart and Bee... thoven were really contemporaries, since Mozart, had he lived to the age... Wagner attained and Verdi far ex... ceeded, would have outlived Beethoven. Is not the true comparison of the Eighth Symphony rather with Mozart's "Jupiter" and G minor than with Beethoven's orchestral masterpieces?

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY Monday night sought, unwisely as it seemed, to lend the first movement of the Eighth something of the grandeur and sonority of Beethoven's other great first movements. But to the remaining movements he rightly brought a quasi-Mozartian grace and tenderness. The orchestra played with a fineness of tonal quality and a precision of nuances which recalled the days of its supreme heights under Dr. Muck.

Musicians are unanimous about the superb, unflagging display of genius in the instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading failed to convey the extraordinary perfection and unity of form in the first movement, which he conceives episodically. It is not within his manifold powers as an interpreter to bring to the finale of the Ninth Symphony the peculiar mystic awe that is its distinctive emotional quality. But for the rest his reading had superb dramatic intensity and compelling emotional energy.

Those who find the choral finale disappointing after what has gone before, as not a few musicians do, would not have been converted by Monday night's performance. The chorus of college students sang with an intelligence and feeling that were beyond praise. The four soloists, however, proved sadly inadequate. They did not even manage to sing the notes correctly and were frequently off pitch.

ONE wondered why Mme. Van Der Veer, who in the "Missa Solemnis" on Sunday had done so well in music seemingly quite as exacting, should have been relatively ineffective on Monday night. Yet, despite all drawbacks, one was deeply moved by the finale and more firmly convinced than ever that this movement, whatever its detractors may say, is the true culmination for the gigantic work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's grandiose scheme has now been triumphantly carried out. Thanks to him Boston has paid a tribute to the memory of Beethoven greater than that offered his centenary by any other American city. One who has listened thankfully to the Beethoven festival leaves it under the in-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 31 1927

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final concert appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's theater on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course and will also close for the season the series of concerts offered by that manager during the past winter. Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky has not forwarded his program, but it is understood that he is preparing a repertoire of selections entirely new to Washington. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, 1300 G street northwest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 30 1927

MUB THRILLED BY BEETHOVEN

Audience That Bulges Boston Auditorium Hears Final Centenary Program.

By CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.
(Staff Correspondent The Detroit News.)

BOSTON, March 30.—If there is in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that which thrills, then was the ecstacy released in the superb production Tuesday evening which closed the eight-day Beethoven centenary festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final audience fairly bulged the building and although the Eighth Symphony, which opened the program, won loyal applause, it was the climactic Ninth which liberated tumultuous enthusiasm and gave to the festival a fitting finale of memorable proportions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has certainly been brought to its old time position of authority, for not even a festival devotion could have produced that firm unanimity, rich tone and fluent expression which translated these works, phrase by phrase, into terms of human understanding. The entire orchestral part of the Ninth was worth traveling many times the distance between Detroit and Boston to hear. Mr. Koussevitzky, a dramatic spirit always, fairly hurled the orchestra in challenge at the choirs and it is only fair to say that they seized the invitation and made Schiller's ode something more than a tolerated climax to a great composer's aspirations.

The Harvard Glee Club, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose conductor is G. Wallace Woodworth, are superlative organizations, finely balanced, well disciplined and full voiced. There was lacking almost all of that shrillness which Beethoven made next to inevitable; there was present a dignity which spelled grandeur and to meet which the orchestra swept along an irresistible urging significance.

The soloists, known to Detroit, were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. All adequate and, in the great moments, something more.

When the last word had been flung to the heavens of the poem which had haunted Beethoven all his life, there was a pause while the audience sensed the winging spirit of the vanishing chord. Then, with its great burst of applause it honored the executants of a wonderful program and signalled the fulfillment of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 2-1927

Hosts to the Ernest Newmans.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman of London. The other guests included Mr. and Mrs. William J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

Mr. Newman is music critic of The London Sunday Times. He came to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
APR 2-1927

British Music Critic Guest at Luncheon

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the Hotel St. Regis in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman is music critic of the London Sunday Times and came to this country to lecture on Beethoven under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirty-two guests included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 2-1927

The program for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert for this week is to be broadcast through WBZ, WBZA and KDKA.

Two of the numbers scheduled for to-night's concert have already been presented once this season, but because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious Concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Professor John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Professor Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the Classical Symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony.

The complete program follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major for violin, two flutes, and string orchestra ..... Bach
I Allegro
II Andante
III Presto

Concerto for violoncello and orchestra ..... Lalo
I Prelude: Allegro maestoso
II Intermezzo
III Introduction: Rondo

Classical Symphony, Op. 25 Prokofieff
I Allegro
II Larghetto
III Gavotte
IV Finale

"Pacific 231" Orchestral Movement .. .. Honegger

Jean Bedetti, soloist

There will be an intermission after the Lalo Concerto.

10:00—Leo Reisman and the Brunswick orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
APR 2-1927

Boston Symphony Will Repeat Two Numbers Tonight

Broadcast Through WBZ to Include Prokofieff and Bach Compositions; Lala Concerto Scheduled.

This evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will feature the radio broadcasts of stations WBZ and KDKA, will include two selections previously broadcast and repeated as the result of insistent requests.

The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof. John Patten Marshall will spea kof the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece. Prof. Marshall will be assisted by Nicholas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal theme from this symphony.

The complete program for tonight's concert follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, ... Bach
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, ... Lalo
Intermission.
Classical Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff
"Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement, Honegger

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 1-1927

THOUGH the current musical season is nearing the end, with several of the most important series of concerts added to history, a number of significant events are still to take place, the foremost, of course, being the opera on April 18, 19, 20 and 21, and the final concert by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra on April 24. To the more immediate performances belong the recital which Harold Samuels, the English pianist, will give at Newcomer Hall, Maryland School for the Blind, in Overlea, next Sunday afternoon, and the second of the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky next Wednesday evening at the Lyric.

Of lesser importance, though making distinct contributions to the sum of musical activities here, are the various lenten church services, of which a number are scheduled during the next week, and which will serve an excellent purpose in acquainting the public with the religious music of consequence.

THE second appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the occasion for an unusual program, one of the numbers being by a composer who has done a great deal of work writing, but has figured in the offerings here only very infrequently, if at all. It has been Mr. Koussevitzky's aim in making up his list of works to put on those not given by other orchestral organizations, so that the visit of the Bostonians may be characterized by novelty not less than by excellence of material. He had a complete list of compositions played by the other orchestras sent to him as a guide to avoiding repetition. The program next Wednesday evening will be extraordinary in that it will include two symphonies. In honor of the Beethoven centenary, the First Symphony by this composer will be played, with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony as the other one chosen.

The novelty will be a suite by Albert Roussel, whose name is hardly known except among musicians of extensive activity. Roussel is a Frenchman, who was born in Tourcoing in 1869, and who at first took up a naval career, but began devoting himself to music when 25 years of age, recognizing his true vocation during cruises under Eastern skies. From them he brought back, like Baudelaire, a passion for the sea and sunlands which prevades all of his music. He is declared to be as original as Paul Dukas, yet the product of contradictory influences, such as those of Debussy and d'Indy. He is a poet, his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 2-1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS BACH AND NONEGGER

Brandenburg Concerts and Locomotive Theme to Be Repeated — Bedetti 'Cello Soloist

Two of the numbers scheduled for the Boston Symphony orchestra's broadcast this evening have already been presented this season. But because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the classical symphony No 25 of Serge Frokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of a group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Prof Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slenimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Frokofieff, the composer. Mr Slenimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony. Programs:—

SPRINGFIELD, WBZ (333-900)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
APR 3-1927
132

One hundred and twentyfive men of the Harvard Glee Club last Tuesday evening assisted in probably the greatest Beethoven celebration ever to take place throughout the civilized world, when it sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony. The Radcliffe Choral Society also assisted and the soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The orchestra played the Ninth Symphony, preceded by the Eighth Symphony. The audience filled the great Symphony Hall and hundreds were turned away.

This is one of the greatest tasks ever set the fine singing body of Harvard, under Dr. Davison's direction.

"Concerning the young singers," the Boston Herald critic, Philip Hale, writes: "These singers well nigh accomplished the impossible. There was rich tonal sonority; there was an intelligent regard for nuances; there was no faltering even when the burden put upon these unprofessional men and women was almost insupportable."

Dr. Davison, who brings the Harvard men to sing in the Statler ballroom on Tuesday, April 19th, gets his full share of approval from the Boston Transcript for the enormous success of this choral orchestral concert.

"It is the high fortune of Dr. Davison to inspirit his choirs, to lift them above themselves," writes H. T. Parker, the Transcrip critic. "Doing such things as this, these student-singers have learned something of the reason for living, and zest of it; of the pleasures of the arts and the rewards for the practice of them."

The Buffalo concert is under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
APR 2-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston. The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tchaikovsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also will include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Last Boston Symphony Concert On Wednesday

Two Symphonies Will Be Included On Program Koussevitzky Has Arranged.

The last concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven centenary his first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 30 1927

Other Music

Ninth Symphony Ends Boston's Beethoven Festival

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 30.

THE Beethoven Centenary Festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. In the latter work the orchestra had the co-operation of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by Dr. A. T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The assisting soloists were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. The hall had been sold out weeks in advance. The audience applauded with spontaneous enthusiasm.

It is customary to speak slightingly of the Eighth as "The Little Symphony" and to regard it as a work less important than the Ninth, or the "Eroica," and the other great symphonies of Beethoven. But this is to ignore its imperishable beauty and to forget that in the Eighth Beethoven succeeded perfectly in what he attempted. If the greatness of a piece of music depended on its length, its loudness and the number of performers required, the symphonies of Mahler would excel those of Mozart.

Ernest Newman in his commemorative address Monday night reminded his hearers that Mozart and Beethoven were really contemporaries, since Mozart, had he lived to the age Wagner attained and Verdi far exceeded, would have outlived Beethoven. Is not the true comparison of the Eighth Symphony rather with Mozart's "Jupiter" and G minor than with Beethoven's orchestral masterpieces?

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY Monday night sought, unwisely as it seemed, to lend the first movement of the Eighth something of the grandeur and sonority of Beethoven's other great first movements. But to the remaining movements he rightly brought a quasi-Mozartian grace and tenderness. The orchestra played with a fineness of tonal quality and a precision of nuances which recalled the days of its supreme heights under Dr. Muck.

Musicians are unanimous about the superb, unflagging display of genius in the instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading failed to convey the extraordinary perfection and unity of form in the first movement, which he conceives episodically. It is not within his manifold powers as an interpreter to bring to the finale of the Ninth Symphony the peculiar mystic awe that is its distinctive emotional quality. But for the rest his reading had superb dramatic intensity and compelling emotional energy.

Those who find the choral finale disappointing after what has gone before, as not a few musicians do, would not have been converted by Monday night's performance. The chorus of college students sang with an intelligence and feeling that were beyond praise. The four soloists, however, proved sadly inadequate. They did not even manage to sing the notes correctly and were frequently off pitch.

ONE wondered why Mme. Van Der Veer, who in the "Missa Solemnis" on Sunday had done so well in music seemingly quite as exacting, should have been relatively ineffective on Monday night. Yet, despite all drawbacks, one was deeply moved by the finale and more firmly convinced than ever that this movement, whatever its detractors may say, is the true culmination for the gigantic work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's grandiose scheme has now been triumphantly carried out. Thanks to him Boston has paid a tribute to the memory of Beethoven greater than that offered his centenary by any other American city. One who has listened thankfully to the Beethoven festival leaves it under the in-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 31 1927

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final concert appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's theater on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course and will also close for the season the series of concerts offered by that manager during the past winter. Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky has not forwarded his program, but it is understood that he is preparing a repertoire of selections entirely new to Washington. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, 1100 G street northwest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 30 1927

BOSTON THRILLED BY BEETHOVEN

Audience That Bulges Boston Auditorium Hears Final Centenary Program.

By CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.
(Staff Correspondent The Detroit News.)

BOSTON, March 30.—If there is in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that which thrills, then was the ecstacy released in the superb production Tuesday evening which closed the eight-day Beethoven centenary festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final audience fairly bulged the building and although the Eighth Symphony, which opened the program, won loyal applause, it was the climactic Ninth which liberated tumultuous enthusiasm and gave to the festival a fitting finale of memorable proportions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has certainly been brought to its old time position of authority, for not even a festival devotion could have produced that firm unanimity, rich tone and fluent expression which translated these works, phrase by phrase, into terms of human understanding. The entire orchestral part of the Ninth was worth traveling many times the distance between Detroit and Boston to hear. Mr. Koussevitzky, a dramatic spirit always, fairly hurled the orchestra in challenge at the choirs and it is only fair to say that they seized the invitation and made Schiller's ode something more than a tolerated climax to a great composer's aspirations.

The Harvard Glee Club, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose conductor is G. Wallace Woodworth, are superlative organizations, finely balanced, well disciplined and full voiced. There was lacking almost all of that shrillness which Beethoven made next to inevitable; there was present a dignity which spelled grandeur and to meet which the orchestra swept along an irresistible urging significance.

The soloists, known to Detroit, were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. All adequate and, in the great moments, something more.

When the last word had been flung to the heavens of the poem which had haunted Beethoven all his life, there was a pause while the audience sensed the winging spirit of the vanishing chord. Then, with its great burst of applause it honored the executants of a wonderful program and signalled the fulfillment of a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 2-1927

Hosts to the Ernest Newmans.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman of London. The other guests included Mr. and Mrs. William J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

Mr. Newman is music critic of The London Sunday Times. He came to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
APR 2-1927

British Music Critic Guest at Luncheon

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the Hotel St. Regis in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman is music critic of the London Sunday Times and came to this country to lecture on Beethoven under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirty-two guests included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 2-1927

The program for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert for this week is to be broadcast through WBZ, WBZA and KDKA.

Two of the numbers scheduled for to-night's concert have already been presented once this season, but because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious Concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Professor John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Professor Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the Classical Symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony.

The complete program follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major for violin, two flutes, and string orchestra ..... Bach
I Allegro
II Andante
III Presto

Concerto for violoncello and orchestra .....Lalo
I Prelude: Allegro maestoso
II Intermezzo
III Introduction: Rondo

Classical Symphony, Op. 25 Prokofieff
I Allegro
II Larghetto
III Gavotte
IV Finale

"Pacific 231" Orchestral Movement .....Honegger

Jean Bedetti, soloist

There will be an intermission after the Lalo Concerto.

10:00—Leo Reisman and the Brunswick orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
APR 2-1927

Boston Symphony Will Repeat Two Numbers Tonight

Broadcast Through WBZ to Include Prokofieff and Bach Compositions; Lala Concerto Scheduled.

This evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will feature the radio broadcasts of stations WBZ and KDKA, will include two selections previously broadcast and repeated as the result of insistent requests.

The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof. John Patten Marshall will spea kof the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece. Prof. Marshall will be assisted by Nicholas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal theme from this symphony.

The complete program for tonight's concert follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, Bach
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, Lalo
Intermission.
Classical Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofioff
"Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement, Honegger

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 1-1927

THOUGH the current musical season is nearing the end, with several of the most important series of concerts added to history, a number of significant events are still to take place, the foremost, of course, being the opera on April 18, 19, 20 and 21, and the final concert by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra on April 24. To the more immediate performances belong the recital which Harold Samuels, the English pianist, will give at Newcomer Hall, Maryland School for the Blind, in Overlea, next Sunday afternoon, and the second of the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky next Wednesday evening at the Lyric.

Of lesser importance, though making distinct contributions to the sum of musical activities here, are the various lenten church services, of which a number are scheduled during the next week, and which will serve an excellent purpose in acquainting the public with the religious music of consequence.

THE second appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the occasion for an unusual program, one of the numbers being by a composer who has done a great deal of work writing, but has figured in the offerings here only very infrequently, if at all. It has been Mr. Koussevitzky's aim in making up his list of works to put on those not given by other orchestral organizations, so that the visit of the Bostonians may be characterized by novelty not less than by excellence of material. He had a complete list of compositions played by the other orchestras sent to him as a guide to avoiding repetition. The program next Wednesday evening will be extraordinary in that it will include two symphonies. In honor of the Beethoven centenary, the First Symphony by this composer will be played, with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony as the other one chosen.

The novelty will be a suite by Albert Roussel, whose name is hardly known except among musicians of extensive activity. Roussel is a Frenchman, who was born in Tourcoing in 1869, and who at first took up a naval career, but began devoting himself to music when 25 years of age, recognizing his true vocation during cruises under Eastern skies. From them he brought back, like Baudelaire, a passion for the sea and sunlands which prevades all of his music. He is declared to be as original as Paul Dukas, yet the product of contradictory influences, such as those of Debussy and d'Indy. He is a poet, his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 2-1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS BACH AND NONEGGER

Brandenburg Concerts and Locomotive Theme to Be Repeated — Bedetti 'Cello Soloist

Two of the numbers scheduled for the Boston Symphony orchestra's broadcast this evening have already been presented this season. But because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the classical symphony No 25 of Serge Frokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of a group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Prof Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slenimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Frokofieff, the composer. Mr Slenimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony. Programs:—

SPRINGFIELD, WBZ (333-900)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
APR 3-1927

One hundred and twentyfive men of the Harvard Glee Club last Tuesday evening assisted in probably the greatest Beethoven celebration ever to take place throughout the civilized world, when it sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony. The Radcliffe Choral Society also assisted and the soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The orchestra played the Ninth Symphony, preceded by the Eighth Symphony. The audience filled the great Symphony Hall and hundreds were turned away.

This is one of the greatest tasks ever set the fine singing body of Harvard, under Dr. Davison's direction.

"Concerning the young singers," the Boston Herald critic, Philip Hale, writes: "These singers well nigh accomplished the impossible. There was rich tonal sonority; there was an intelligent regard for nuances; there was no faltering even when the burden put upon these unprofessional men and women was almost insupportable."

Dr. Davison, who brings the Harvard men to sing in the Statler ballroom on Tuesday, April 19th, gets his full share of approval from the Boston Transcript for the enormous success of this choral orchestral concert.

"It is the high fortune of Dr. Davison to inspirit his choirs, to lift them above themselves," writes H. T. Parker, the Transcrip critic. "Doing such things as this, these student-singers have learned something of the reason for living, and zest of it; of the pleasures of the arts and the rewards for the practice of them."

The Buffalo concert is under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
APR 2-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston. The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tchaikovsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also will include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Last Boston Symphony Concert On Wednesday

Two Symphonies Will Be Included On Program Koussevitzky Has Arranged.

The last concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven centenary his first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 30 1927

Other Music

Ninth Symphony Ends Boston's Beethoven Festival

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 30.

THE Beethoven Centenary Festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. In the latter work the orchestra had the co-operation of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by Dr. A. T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The assisting soloists were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. The hall had been sold out weeks in advance. The audience applauded with spontaneous enthusiasm.

It is customary to speak slightingly of the Eighth as "The Little Symphony" and to regard it as a work less important than the Ninth, or the "Eroica," and the other great symphonies of Beethoven. But this is to ignore its imperishable beauty and to forget that in the Eighth Beethoven succeeded perfectly in what he attempted. If the greatness of a piece of music depended on its length, its loudness and the number of performers required, the symphonies of Mahler would excel those of Mozart.

Ernest Newman in his commemorative address Monday night reminded his hearers that Mozart and Beethoven were really contemporaries since Mozart, had he lived to the age Wagner attained and Verdi far exceeded, would have outlived Beethoven. Is not the true comparison of the Eighth Symphony rather with Mozart's "Jupiter" and G minor than with Beethoven's orchestral masterpieces?

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY Monday night sought, unwisely as it seemed, to lend the first movement of the Eighth something of the grandeur and sonority of Beethoven's other great first movements. But to the remaining movements he rightly brought a quasi-Mozartian grace and tenderness. The orchestra played with a fineness of tonal quality and a precision of nuances which recalled the days of its supreme heights under Dr. Muck.

Musicians are unanimous about the superb, unflagging display of genius in the instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading failed to convey the extraordinary perfection and unity of form in the first movement, which he conceives episodically. It is not within his manifold powers as an interpreter to bring to the finale of the Ninth Symphony the peculiar mystic awe that is its distinctive emotional quality. But for the rest his reading had superb dramatic intensity and compelling emotional energy.

Those who find the choral finale disappointing after what has gone before, as not a few musicians do, would not have been converted by Monday night's performance. The chorus of college students sang with an intelligence and feeling that were beyond praise. The four soloists, however, proved sadly inadequate. They did not even manage to sing the notes correctly and were frequently off pitch.

ONE wondered why Mme. Van Der Veer, who in the "Missa Solemnis" on Sunday had done so well in music seemingly quite as exacting, should have been relatively ineffective on Monday night. Yet, despite all drawbacks, one was deeply moved by the finale and more firmly convinced than ever that this movement, whatever its detractors may say, is the true culmination for the gigantic work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's grandiose scheme has now been triumphantly carried out. Thanks to him Boston has paid a tribute to the memory of Beethoven greater than that offered his centenary by any other American city. One who has listened thankfully to the Beethoven festival leaves it under the in- hoven's genius.

ROBERTS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 31 1927

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final concert appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's theater on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course and will also close for the season the series of concerts offered by that manager during the past winter. Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky has not forwarded his program, but it is understood that he is preparing a repertoire of selections entirely new to Washington. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, 1300 G street northwest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 30 1927

HUB THRILLED BY BEETHOVEN

Audience That Bulges Boston Auditorium Hears Final Centenary Program.

CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.
(Correspondent The Detroit News.)

BOSTON, March 30.—If there is in ...hoven's Ninth Symphony that ...h thrills, then was the ecstacy ...sed in the superb production ...day evening which closed the ...t-day Beethoven centenary festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final audience fairly bulged ... building and although the ...th Symphony, which opened the ...gram, won loyal applause, it was ... climactic Ninth which liberated ...ultuous enthusiasm and gave to ... festival a fitting finale of memo... proportions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ... certainly been brought to its ... time position of authority, for ... even a festival devotion could ... produced that firm unanimity, ... tone and fluent expression ...ich translated these works, ...rase by phrase, into terms of hu... understanding. The entire or...estral part of the Ninth was worth ...aveling many times the distance ...tween Detroit and Boston to hear. ...r. Koussevitzky, a dramatic spirit ...always, fairly hurled the orchestra ...n challenge at the choirs and it is ... only fair to say that they seized the ...invitation and made Schiller's ode ...something more than a tolerated ...climax to a great composer's aspirations.

The Harvard Glee Club, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose conductor is G. Wallace Woodworth, are superlative organizations, finely balanced, well disciplined and full voiced. There was lacking almost all of that shrillness which Beethoven made next to inevitable; there was present a dignity which spelled grandeur and to meet which the orchestra swept along an irresistible urging significance.

The soloists, known to Detroit, were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. All adequate and, in the great moments, something more.

When the last word had been flung to the heavens of the poem which had haunted Beethoven all his life, there was a pause while the audience sensed the winging spirit of the vanishing chord. Then, with its great burst of applause it honored the executants of a wonderful program and signalled the fulfillment of a ...

...IPPING FROM
...T. TIMES
APR 2-1927

Hosts to the Ernest Newmans.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman of London. The other guests included Mr. and Mrs. William J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

Mr. Newman is music critic of The London Sunday Times. He came to this country on March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

British Music Critic Guest at Luncheon

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the Hotel St. Regis in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman is music critic of the London Sunday Times and came to this country to lecture on Beethoven under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirty-two guests included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 2-1927

The program for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert for this week is to be broadcast through WBZ, WBZA and KDKA.

Two of the numbers scheduled for to-night's concert have already been presented once this season, but because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious Concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Professor John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Professor Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the Classical Symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony.

The complete program follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major for violin, two flutes, and string orchestra ..... Bach
I Allegro
II Andante
III Presto

Concerto for violoncello and orchestra .....Lalo
I Prelude: Allegro maestoso
II Intermezzo
III Introduction: Rondo

Classical Symphony, Op. 25 Prokofieff
I Allegro
II Larghetto
III Gavotte
IV Finale

"Pacific 231" Orchestral Movement .....Honegger

Jean Bedetti, soloist

There will be an intermission after the Lalo Concerto.

10:00—Leo Reisman and the Brunswick orchestra.
10:30—Knickerbocker club.
11:00—Weather reports; missing persons.

APR 2-1927

Boston Symphony Will Repeat Two Numbers Tonight

Broadcast Through WBZ to Include Prokofieff and Bach Compositions; Lala Concerto Scheduled.

This evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will feature the radio broadcasts of stations WBZ and KDKA, will include two selections previously broadcast and repeated as the result of insistent requests.

The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof. John Patten Marshall will spea kof the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece. Prof. Marshall will be assisted by Nicholas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal theme from this symphony.

The complete program for tonight's concert follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Bach
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, Lalo
Intermission.
Classical Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofioff
"Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement, Honegger

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 1-1927

THOUGH the current musical season is nearing the end, with several of the most important series of concerts added to history, a number of significant events are still to take place, the foremost, of course, being the opera on April 18, 19, 20 and 21, and the final concert by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra on April 24. To the more immediate performances belong the recital which Harold Samuels, the English pianist, will give at Newcomer Hall, Maryland School for the Blind, in Overlea, next Sunday afternoon, and the second of the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky next Wednesday evening at the Lyric.

Of lesser importance, though making distinct contributions to the sum of musical activities here, are the various lenten church services, of which a number are scheduled during the next week, and which will serve an excellent purpose in acquainting the public with the religious music of consequence.

THE second appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the occasion for an unusual program, one of the numbers being by a composer who has done a great deal of work writing, but has figured in the offerings here only very infrequently, if at all. It has been Mr. Koussevitzky's aim in making up his list of works to put on those not given by other orchestral organizations, so that the visit of the Bostonians may be characterized by novelty not less than by excellence of material. He had a complete list of compositions played by the other orchestras sent to him as a guide to avoiding repetition. The program next Wednesday evening will be extraordinary in that it will include two symphonies. In honor of the Beethoven centenary, the First Symphony by this composer will be played, with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony as the other one chosen.

The novelty will be a suite by Albert Roussel, whose name is hardly known except among musicians of extensive activity. Roussel is a Frenchman, who was born in Tourcoing in 1869, and who at first took up a naval career, but began devoting himself to music when 25 years of age, recognizing his true vocation during cruises under Eastern skies. From them he brought back, like Baudelaire, a passion for the sea and sunlands which prevades all of his music. He is declared to be as original ...s Paul Dukas, yet the product of con...radictory influences, such as those of ...ebussy and d'Indy. He is a poet, ... works echoing the sounds of nature, ... his temperament is called sensuou...

...R 2-1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS BACH AND NONEGGER

Brandenburg Concerts and Locomotive Theme to Be Repeated — Bedetti 'Cello Soloist

Two of the numbers scheduled for the Boston Symphony orchestra's broadcast this evening have already been presented this season. But because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the classical symphony No 25 of Serge Frokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of a group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Prof Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slenimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Frokofieff, the composer. Mr Slenimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony. Programs:—

SPRINGFIELD, WBZ, (333-900)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
APR 3-1927

One hundred and twentyfive men of the Harvard Glee Club last Tuesday evening assisted in probably the greatest Beethoven celebration ever to take place throughout the civilized world, when it sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony. The Radcliffe Choral Society also assisted and the soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The orchestra played the Ninth Symphony, preceded by the Eighth Symphony. The audience filled the great Symphony Hall and hundreds were turned away.

This is one of the greatest tasks ever set the fine singing body of Harvard, under Dr. Davison's direction.

"Concerning the young singers," the Boston Herald critic, Philip Hale, writes: "These singers well nigh accomplished the impossible. There was rich tonal sonority; there was an intelligent regard for nuances; there was no faltering even when the burden put upon these unprofessional men and women was almost insupportable."

Dr. Davison, who brings the Harvard men to sing in the Statler ballroom on Tuesday, April 19th, gets his full share of approval from the Boston Transcript for the enormous success of this choral orchestral concert.

"It is the high fortune of Dr. Davison to inspirit his choirs, to lift them above themselves," writes H. T. Parker, the Transcrip critic. "Doing such things as this, these student-singers have learned something of the reason for living, and zest of it; of the pleasures of the arts and ... rewards for the practice of them."

The Buffalo concert is under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
APR 2-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston. The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tchaikovsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also will include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Last Boston Symphony Concert On Wednesday

Two Symphonies Will Be Included On Program Koussevitsky Has Arranged.

The last concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven centenary his first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
MAR 30 1927

Other Music

Ninth Symphony Ends Boston's Beethoven Festival

Special Dispatch to the Evening Post

Boston, March 30.

THE Beethoven Centenary Festival arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. In the latter work the orchestra had the co-operation of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by Dr. A. T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The assisting soloists were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. The hall had been sold out weeks in advance. The audience applauded with spontaneous enthusiasm.

It is customary to speak slightingly of the Eighth as "The Little Symphony" and to regard it as a work less important than the Ninth, or the "Eroica," and the other great symphonies of Beethoven. But this is to ignore its imperishable beauty and to forget that in the Eighth Beethoven succeeded perfectly in what he attempted. If the greatness of a piece of music depended on its length, its loudness and the number of performers required, the symphonies of Mahler would excel those of Mozart.

Ernest Newman in his commemorative address Monday night reminded his hearers that Mozart and Beethoven were really contemporaries since Mozart, had he lived to the age Wagner attained and Verdi far exceeded, would have outlived Beethoven. Is not the true comparison of the Eighth Symphony rather with Mozart's "Jupiter" and G minor than with Beethoven's orchestral masterpieces?

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY Monday night sought, unwisely as it seemed, to lend the first movement of the Eighth something of the grandeur and sonority of Beethoven's other great first movements. But to the remaining movements he rightly brought a quasi-Mozartian grace and tenderness. The orchestra played with a fineness of tonal quality and a precision of nuances which recalled the days of its supreme heights under Dr. Muck.

Musicians are unanimous about the superb, unflagging display of genius in the instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading failed to convey the extraordinary perfection and unity of form in the first movement, which he conceives episodically. It is not within his manifold powers as an interpreter to bring to the finale of the Ninth Symphony the peculiar mystic awe that is its distinctive emotional quality. But for the rest his reading had superb dramatic intensity and compelling emotional energy.

Those who find the choral finale disappointing after what has gone before, as not a few musicians do, would not have been converted by Monday night's performance. The chorus of college students sang with an intelligence and feeling that were beyond praise. The four soloists, however, proved sadly inadequate. They did not even manage to sing the notes correctly and were frequently off pitch.

ONE wondered why Mme. Van Der Veer, who in the "Missa Solemnis" on Sunday had done so well in music seemingly quite as exacting, should have been relatively ineffective on Monday night. Yet, despite all drawbacks, one was deeply moved by the finale and more firmly convinced than ever that this movement, whatever its detractors may say, is the true culmination for the gigantic work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's grandiose scheme has now been triumphantly carried out. Thanks to him Boston has paid a tribute to the memory of Beethoven greater than that offered his centenary by any other American city. One who has listened thankfully to the Beethoven festival leaves it under the impression of Beethoven's genius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 31 1927

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final concert appearance of the 1926-27 musical season in Washington at Poli's theater on Tuesday afternoon, April 5, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be the last concert in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's artists' course and will also close for the season the series of concerts offered by that manager during the past winter. Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky has not forwarded his program, but it is understood that he is preparing a repertoire of selections entirely new to Washington. Seats are now on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau, 1300 G street northwest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 30 1927

BOSTON THRILLED BY BEETHOVEN

Audience That Bulges Boston Auditorium Hears Final Centenary Program.

By CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.
(Staff Correspondent The Detroit News.)

BOSTON, March 30.—If there is in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that which thrills, then was the ecstacy released in the superb production Tuesday evening which closed the eight-day Beethoven centenary festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final audience fairly bulged the building and although the Eighth Symphony, which opened the program, won loyal applause, it was the climactic Ninth which liberated tumultuous enthusiasm and gave to the festival a fitting finale of memorable proportions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has certainly been brought to its present position of authority, for even a festival devotion could not have produced that firm unanimity, that tone and fluent expression which translated these works, phrase by phrase, into terms of human understanding. The entire orchestral part of the Ninth was worth traveling many times the distance between Detroit and Boston to hear. Mr. Koussevitzky, a dramatic spirit always, fairly hurled the orchestra in challenge at the choirs and it is only fair to say that they seized the invitation and made Schiller's ode something more than a tolerated climax to a great composer's aspirations.

The Harvard Glee Club, conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, whose conductor is G. Wallace Woodworth, are superlative organizations, finely balanced, well disciplined and full voiced. There was lacking almost all of that shrillness which Beethoven made next to inevitable; there was present a dignity which spelled grandeur and to meet which the orchestra swept along an irresistible urging significance.

The soloists, known to Detroit, were Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. All adequate and, in the great moments, something more.

When the last word had been flung to the heavens of the poem which had haunted Beethoven all his life, there was a pause while the audience sensed the winging spirit of the vanishing chord. Then, with its great burst of applause it honored the executants of a wonderful program and signalled the fulfillment of a very great festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
APR 2-1927

Hosts to the Ernest Newmans.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman of London. The other guests included Mr. and Mrs. William J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

Mr. Newman is music critic of The London Sunday Times. He came to this country on March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

British Music Critic Guest at Luncheon

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon yesterday at the Hotel St. Regis in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman is music critic of the London Sunday Times and came to this country to lecture on Beethoven under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirty-two guests included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Ganz, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, A. Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 2-1927

The program for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert for this week is to be broadcast through WBZ, WBZA and KDKA.

Two of the numbers scheduled for to-night's concert have already been presented once this season, but because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious Concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Professor John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece and the "Group of Six." Professor Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the Classical Symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony.

The complete program follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major for violin, two flutes, and string orchestra ..... Bach
I Allegro
II Andante
III Presto

Concerto for violoncello and orchestra ..... Lalo
I Prelude: Allegro maestoso
II Intermezzo
III Introduction: Rondo

Classical Symphony, Op. 25 Prokofieff
I Allegro
II Larghetto
III Gavotte
IV Finale

"Pacific 231" Orchestral Movement .. Honegger

Jean Bedetti, soloist

There will be an intermission after the Lalo Concerto.

10:00—Leo Reisman and the Brunswick orchestra.
10:30—Knickerbocker club.
11:00—Weather reports; missing persons.

APR 2-1927

Boston Symphony Will Repeat Two Numbers Tonight

Broadcast Through WBZ to Include Prokofieff and Bach Compositions; Lala Concerto Scheduled.

This evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will feature the radio broadcasts of stations WBZ and KDKA, will include two selections previously broadcast and repeated as the result of insistent requests.

The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the Classical Symphony No. 25 of Serge Prokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of the group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof. John Patten Marshall will spea kof the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honegger's piece. Prof. Marshall will be assisted by Nicholas Slonimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Prokofieff, the composer. Mr. Slonimsky will also play the principal theme from this symphony.

The complete program for tonight's concert follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and string orchestra. Bach

Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, Lalo

Intermission.

Classical Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff

"Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement, Honegger

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 1-1927

THOUGH the current musical season is nearing the end, with several of the most important series of concerts added to history, a number of significant events are still to take place, the foremost, of course, being the opera on April 18, 19, 20 and 21, and the final concert by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra on April 24. To the more immediate performances belong the recital which Harold Samuels, the English pianist, will give at Newcomer Hall, Maryland School for the Blind, in Overlea, next Sunday afternoon, and the second of the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Kousesvitzky next Wednesday evening at the Lyric.

Of lesser importance, though making distinct contributions to the sum of musical activities here, are the various lenten church services, of which a number are scheduled during the next week, and which will serve an excellent purpose in acquainting the public with the religious music of consequence.

THE second appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the occasion for an unusual program, one of the numbers being by a composer who has done a great deal of work writing, but has figured in the offerings here only very infrequently, if at all. It has been Mr. Koussevitzky's aim in making up his list of works to put on those not given by other orchestral organizations, so that the visit of the Bostonians may be characterized by novelty not less than by excellence of material. He had a complete list of compositions played by the other orchestras sent to him as a guide to avoiding repetition. The program next Wednesday evening will be extraordinary in that it will include two symphonies. In honor of the Beethoven centenary, the First Symphony by this composer will be played, with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony as the other one chosen.

The novelty will be a suite by Albert Roussel, whose name is hardly known except among musicians of extensive activity. Roussel is a Frenchman, who was born in Tourcoing in 1869, and who at first took up a naval career, but began devoting himself to music when 25 years of age, recognizing his true vocation during cruises under Eastern skies. From them he brought back, like Baudelaire, a passion for the sea and sunlands which prevades all of his music. He is declared to be as original as Paul Dukas, yet the product of contradictory influences, such as those of Debussy and d'Indy. He is a poet, his works echoing the sounds of nature, his temperament is called sensuous.

THE

APR 2-1927

SYMPHONY OFFERS BACH AND NONEGGER

Brandenburg Concerts and Locomotive Theme to Be Repeated — Bedetti 'Cello Soloist

Two of the numbers scheduled for the Boston Symphony orchestra's broadcast this evening have already been presented this season. But because of the very great response received at the time of their presentation, it was felt that the audience would enjoy hearing them again. The first of these is the Brandenburg Concerto No 4, of Johann Sebastian Bach, scored for violin, two flutes and stringed orchestra, and the other is the classical symphony No 25 of Serge Frokofieff.

The soloist for the evening is Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will be heard in the melodious concerto for orchestra and violoncello by the composer, Lalo. The last number on the program is Honegger's "orchestral movement," Pacific 231, which has already been played at Boston Symphony concerts, and is one of the most sensational compositions of the modern French school. Honegger, who is now living in Paris, is one of a group of young composers known as the "Group of Six." In his commentaries on his work he stated that he had always had a passionate love for locomotives, and in this piece he has tried to express, not the noise of an engine, but "the visual impression and physical sensation" of it.

Before the concert Prof John Patten Marshall will speak of the numbers by Bach and Lalo, and during the intermission he will discuss Honagger's piece and the "Group of Six." Prof Marshall will be assisted by Nicolas Slenimsky, pianist, who will tell the radio audience some interesting facts concerning the classical symphony, recently given him by his friend, Frokofieff, the composer. Mr Slenimsky will also play the principal themes from this symphony. Programs:—

SPRINGFIELD, WBZ (333-900)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
APR 3-1927

132

One hundred and twentyfive men of the Harvard Glee Club last Tuesday evening assisted in probably the greatest Beethoven celebration ever to take place throughout the civilized world, when it sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony. The Radcliffe Choral Society also assisted and the soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton. The orchestra played the Ninth Symphony, preceded by the Eighth Symphony. The audience filled the great Symphony Hall and hundreds were turned away.

This is one of the greatest tasks ever set the fine singing body of Harvard, under Dr. Davison's direction.

"Concerning the young singers," the Boston Herald critic, Philip Hale, writes: "These singers well nigh accomplished the impossible. There was rich tonal sonority; there was an intelligent regard for nuances; there was no faltering even when the burden put upon these unprofessional men and women was almost insupportable."

Dr. Davison, who brings the Harvard men to sing in the Statler ballroom on Tuesday, April 19th, gets his full share of approval from the Boston Transcript for the enormous success of this choral orchestral concert.

"It is the high fortune of Dr. Davison to inspirit his choirs, to lift them above themselves," writes H. T. Parker, the Transcrip critic. "Doing such things as this, these student-singers have learned something of the reason for living, and zest of it; of the pleasures of the arts and the rewards for the practice of them."

The Buffalo concert is under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
APR 2-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston. The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tchaikovsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also will include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Last Boston Symphony Concert On Wednesday

Two Symphonies Will Be Included On Program Koussevitzky Has Arranged.

The last concert to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven centenary his first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

APR 3 1927

ALFRED HERTZ CONCLUDES THE 12TH YEAR OF HIS SYMPHONIC LEADERSHIP IN SAN FRANCISCO

By REDFERN MASON

IT is more than a dozen years since Alfred Hertz came to San Francisco and today he is in the way of becoming one of our local divinities. That kindly visage of his, which Albert Durer might have etched, is as much a sign and symbol of San Francisco today as old Sam Brannan's was in the days of the Argonauts. He is the tutelary divinity of music, the arch genius of the Symphony, the urbane prophet of that not very distant time when the City by the Golden Gate will hold its head up artistically as Munich and Milan do today.

It was a good thought of John Rothschild to bring him here. That was in the days after the great fair of 1915. We had heard Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony and a sort of divine discontent had come into our souls, making us utterly dissatisfied with the compromise that had passed for a symphony orchestra in earlier days. Mr. Hertz happened to be in Los Angeles, conducting Horatio Parker's "Fairyland" and Mr. Rothschild asked me whether I thought he was the right man for San Francisco. "Get him, if you can," I said, "and thank God if you can get him."

And it was done, with the result that today we have in San Francisco a symphony orchestra which would be adjudged great if this were Berlin or Vienna, New York or London, Rome or Paris.

Californians Inc. and our Chamber of Commerce may not recognize the fact at its full worth; but a fact it is that the Symphony is San Francisco's greatest advertisement. People talk of the San Francisco Symphony wherever music is valued. It has carried our fame to the uttermost parts of the earth.

How Alfred Hertz gradually welded the instrumental phalanx into a homogeneous and magnificently efficient musical organism is the tale of years of indefatigable and unceasing labor. If you want proof of that, watch him at rehearsals. He fulfills description of Thomas Carlyle; he is "a trip-hammer with an Aeolian attachment," a toiler with the soul of a genius. No laboring man works harder than he does. That is his nature and he is true to it whether he directs the orchestra, plays chess, or drives his auto. Whatever he does, he does with all his might. To him may be applied the Bible saying: "Show me the man that is diligent in business: he shall stand before kings." And before kings Alfred Hertz does stand. He stands before that multitude of San Franciscans which, though uncrowned, nevertheless exercises a kingly office and, by its nod determines the fate of the pontiffs of music.

To gauge Alfred Hertz's value in terms which will carry weight in the mind of the man of business, it may be said that, if every man and woman in San Francisco worked as hard and as zealously as he does, this city would speedily double its wealth.

Yet, it is hardly in terms of wealth that Mr. Hertz's contribution to the welfare of the community is to be estimated. He is above all an educator, using the word in the same sense that it is applied to Dr. Campbell of the University of California or to Stephen Marr Gwinn of the public school system of San Francisco.

Like some poet of the Greeks, some inspired bard of the Gael, he diffuses through the art of music the culture of many peoples. To him we owe a higher appreciation of the glory that is Mozart, the grandeur that is Beethoven. Under the spell of his magic wand we enter into the spirit of the myths of the Germanic peoples, told as he alone can tell them, through the pages of Wagner. And he is no chauvinist, no propagandist of a narrow musical cult. So long as a score is good, he cares not a jot whether the composer be French or German, Muscovite or Italian, English or American. American music indeed he likes to foster; but it must come up to the standard of symphonic dignity, or he will none of it.

Born in a foreign land, Alfred Hertz is an American because he wishes to be an American. He defied German amour propre by giving "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan Opera, at a time when certain narrow-minded folk in the Fatherland wanted to keep it as their exclusive possession. Hertz was wiser; he knew that that great work was the property of all mankind.

All that he has he gives and his is an encyclopaedic culture. His knowledge is various in the realm of music as was that of Goldsmith's schoolmaster in the realm of books. In his attitude of giving there is something sacerdotal. Hertz is a priest and in his hands he holds the seals of a triumphant beauty which, more than any other gift that God has vouchsafed to humanity, rids man of the inhibitions of fear and servility and presents his brow to the stars.

And it is not by learning alone that he has won his place as one having authority in the community. Hertz works by kindness. That genial smile of his, his wit, the jovial goodfellowship of the man are forces that, backed by his transparent sincerity, overcome all opposition. Old Noll Goldsmith comes in apropos.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was at fault.

True, he could not have accomplished the work he has done, if he had not had the hearty co-operation of men as earnest and single-purposed as himself. I have already referred to Mr. Rothschild. That modest gentleman has been a tower of strength to the orchestra. Then there is William Sproule, who devoted the rare leisure moments of a busy life to the task of giving to the public entertainment which should elevate and refresh as well as distract. And finally, there is John D. McKee, the prop and support of the Symphony during eight long years of difficulty.

Mr. McKee has resigned his office, but not his sympathy and, in his leavetaking, he has enriched Symphony and public with the stimulus of a great purpose. Mr. McKee offers $50,000 towards the upbuilding of an endowment fund. Given a million dollars and the Symphony will no longer have annually to come before the public and beg, almost shamefaced, for the privilege of being allowed to live.

With the echoes of the Ninth Symphony still in their ears, the people of San Francisco, especially those who are of great means, ought to commune with their souls and ask themselves the question whether there is anything better they can do with their money than to place the Symphony in a position of assured perpetuity.

In the life drama of every great there are, as Alphonse Sarcey said of the drama of the stage, certain "scenes a faire," certain things which need to be done, if the play is to round out to a satisfactory conclusion. San Francisco owes it to its own self esteem to place the Symphony on a permanent basis. Like the public schools it cannot be made to pay in the business meaning of the word. One wonders who will be the Maecenas to earn the gratitude of the community by emulating the example set by Mr. McKee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

S. KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, April 15—the final

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUN
APR 3 -1927

Another orchestra completing its season is the Sunday Symphonic Society, which gives its last concert of its fourth season at 12:30 to-day in the Hampden Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its last New York visit of the season this week, with Thursday night and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy. A suite by Roussel, on Thursday, and the first local hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's Amy Lowell, on Saturday, will be heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra ends its New York season with the concert of April 12, closing, as usual, with its orchestra transcription of the Bach Passacaglia.

The Young Men's Symphony Orchestra, founded by the late Alfred Seligman, will complete its twenty-fifth season with its annual Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon. Paul Henneberg will conduct a program of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Wagner's aria, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
Standard Union
APR 3 - 1927

Season's Last Concert by Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music Friday Night.

The season's concluding concert in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will be given at the Academy of Music Friday night at 8:15 o'clock. The program will be repeated at the matinee performance in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 P. M.

Symphony No. 1, in C.....Beethoven
Violin concerto.....Glazounoff
Richard Burgin.
Symphony No. 5, in E minor....Tchaikovsky

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes.....Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell.....Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231.....Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor....Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony Plays Final Concert

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras. Those who have during the season heard major works offered twice within the same week will appreciate Mr. Koussevitzky's stand in the matter.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven Centenary Beethoven's first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other symphonic work to be played by Mr. Koussevitzky's splendid band of musicians.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXAMINER
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
APR 3 - 1927

L. A. MUSICAL BODY FACES PROBLEM

THE problem involved in selecting a new conductor for the Philharmonic Orchestra brings the public to a realization of the vital place which the orchestra fills in the life of the community.

The future of the orchestra, and also of music in Southern California, will be affected by the choice of the new conductor.

An interesting contribution to the discussion of possible candidates comes from D. Rudhyar, the composer who won the William Andrews Clark prize for orchestral composition in 1922. Rudhyar is also a member of the International Board of Pro-Musica and of the International Composers' Guild.

"The musical needs of Los Angeles are peculiar. We have a growing music public, thanks to the splendid pioneer work of the orchestra. We are not yet sufficiently mature musically to support an orchestra without depending on the generosity of individuals. What we need is a conductor who can stimulate a broader public support. A man who has a dynamic personality can enthuse the public, he can translate music into terms of life, take it out of the museum class of culture. The ideal leader will be a man who understands America's curiosity in the new, who appreciates our need for modern ideas and who can still vitalize the classics and bring them to us with no pedagogic dryness.

"It would be unfortunate were a conductor limited to a foreign tradition to be selected. There could be no communication between him and the large public.

"It might be well for the first year or two to divide the season in half, as is being done with the New York Philharmonic, engaging two different directors. Were this done it might be possible to obtain the conductors of the New York Philharmonic for the portion of the season they are not engaged there.

"Among the men who would be ideally suited to our needs are Stokowski, a man of rich personality and breadth of interest, or Pierre Monteux, formerly with the Boston Symphony, or Ernest Kindler, soloist at last Sunday's concert, or Eugene Goossens."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-Polis—Tuesday

THIS CLIP
HER WASHINC
APR 3

SERGE VITZKY unusually for the fir this year Symphon

THIS CLI
N. Y. TE
APR

The Boston Sy and Serge Koussevi last visit to New and play in Carne day evening and April 7 and 9.

On Thursday e will open the con Symphony of Bee with Tschaikovsk phony. He will a F by Albert R French composer this orchestra, and performance when cently introduced The symphony a formance will be th kovsky. The progra Bachs Fourth Bran for Two Flutes an also include a new Buringame Hill,

N. Y. TELE
APR 3

Engaged for s Koussevitzky's p Nielsen's Ninth Symphony in The Hun on March 29, Nevada Van der Veer assumed the contralto role in the same composer's Missa Solemnis, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 during Boston's Beethoven Festival Week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Mr. and Mrs. Br... Sa...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

T Boston Symphony Orchestra and Ser Koussevitzky will pay their last vis to New York this season and play in arnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

nursday evening Koussevitzky will on the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and close it with chaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He ill also play a suite in F by Albert oussel which the French composer rote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikowsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," will also be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concludes its season of New York concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. For Thursday evening Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged the following program:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Roussel.....Suite for Orchestra
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphony

On Saturday afternoon the following works will be played:

Bach...Brandenburg Concerto in G major
Hill.....“Lilacs,” After Amy Lowell
Honegger.....“Pacific 231”
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symphony

Edward Burlingame Hill's orchestral poem, “Lilacs,” receives its first New York performance on this occasion.

APR 3 1927

ALFRED HERTZ CONCLUDES THE 12TH YEAR OF HIS SYMPHONIC LEADERSHIP IN SAN FRANCISCO

By REDFERN MASON

IT is more than a dozen years since Alfred Hertz came to San Francisco and today he is in the way of becoming one of our local divinities. That kindly visage of his, which Albert Durer might have etched, is as much a sign and symbol of San Francisco today as old Sam Brannan's was in the days of the Argonauts. He is the tutelary divinity of music, the arch genius of the Symphony, the urbane prophet of that not very distant time when the City by the Golden Gate will hold its head up artistically as Munich and Milan do today.

It was a good thought of John Rothschild to bring him here. That was in the days after the great fair of 1915. We had heard Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony and a sort of divine discontent had come into our souls, making us utterly dissatisfied with the compromise that had passed for a symphony orchestra in earlier days. Mr. Hertz happened to be in Los Angeles, conducting Horatio Parker's "Fairyland" and Mr. Rothschild asked me whether I thought he was the right man for San Francisco. "Get him, if you can," I said, "and thank God if you can get him."

And it was done, with the result that today we have in San Francisco a symphony orchestra which would be adjudged great if this were Berlin or Vienna, New York or London, Rome or Paris.

Californians Inc. and our Chamber of Commerce may not recognize the fact at its full worth; but a fact it is that the Symphony is San Francisco's greatest advertisement. People talk of the San Francisco Symphony wherever music is valued. It has carried our fame to the uttermost parts of the earth.

How Alfred Hertz gradually welded the instrumental phalanx into a homogeneous and magnificently efficient musical organism is the tale of years of indefatigable and unceasing labor. If you want proof of that, watch him at rehearsals. He fulfills description of Thomas Carlyle; he is "a trip-hammer with an Aeolian attachment," a toiler with the soul of a genius. No laboring man works harder than he does. That is his nature and he is true to it whether he directs the orchestra, plays chess, or drives his auto. Whatever he does, he does with all his might. To him may be applied the Bible saying: "Show me the man that is diligent in business: he shall stand before kings." And before kings Alfred Hertz does stand. He stands before that multitude of San Franciscans which, though uncrowned, nevertheless exercises a kingly office and, by its nod determines the fate of the pontiffs of music.

To gauge Alfred Hertz's value in terms which will carry weight in the mind of the man of business, it may be said that, if every man and woman in San Francisco worked as hard and as zealously as he does, this city would speedily double its wealth.

Yet, it is hardly in terms of wealth that Mr. Hertz's contribution to the welfare of the community is to be estimated. He is above all an educator, using the word in the same sense that it is applied to Dr. Campbell of the University of California or to Stephen Marr Gwinn of the public school system of San Francisco.

Like some poet of the Greeks, some inspired bard of the Gael, he diffuses through the art of music the culture of many peoples. To him we owe a higher appreciation of the glory that is Mozart, the grandeur that is Beethoven. Under the spell of his magic wand we enter into the spirit of the myths of the Germanic peoples, told as he alone can tell them, through the pages of Wagner. And he is no chauvinist, no propagandist of a narrow musical cult. So long as a score is good, he cares not a jot whether the composer be French or German, Muscovite or Italian, English or American. American music indeed he likes to foster; but it must come up to the standard of symphonic dignity, or he will none of it.

Born in a foreign land, Alfred Hertz is an American because he wishes to be an American. He defied German amour propre by giving "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan Opera, at a time when certain narrow-minded folk in the Fatherland wanted to keep it as their exclusive possession. Hertz was wiser; he knew that that great work was the property of all mankind.

All that he has he gives and his is an encyclopaedic culture. His knowledge is various in the realm of music as was that of Goldsmith's schoolmaster in the realm of books. In his attitude of giving there is something sacerdotal. Hertz is a priest and in his hands he holds the seals of a triumphant beauty which, more than any other gift that God has vouchsafed to humanity, rids man of the inhibitions of fear and servility and presents his brow to the stars.

And it is not by learning alone that he has won his place as one having authority in the community. Hertz works by kindness. That genial smile of his, his wit, the jovial goodfellowship of the man are forces that, backed by his transparent sincerity, overcome all opposition. Old Noll Goldsmith comes in apropos.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was at fault.

True, he could not have accomplished the work he has done, if he had not had the hearty co-operation of men as earnest and single-purposed as himself. I have already referred to Mr. Rothschild. That modest gentleman has been a tower of strength to the orchestra. Then there is William Sproule, who devoted the rare leisure moments of a busy life to the task of giving to the public entertainment which should elevate and refresh as well as distract. And finally, there is John D. McKee, the prop and support of the Symphony during eight long years of difficulty.

Mr. McKee has resigned his office, but not his sympathy and, in his leavetaking, he has enriched Symphony and public with the stimulus of a great purpose. Mr. McKee offers $50,000 towards the upbuilding of an endowment fund. Given a million dollars and the Symphony will no longer have annually to come before the public and beg, almost shamefaced, for the privilege of being allowed to live.

With the echoes of the Ninth Symphony still in their ears, the people of San Francisco, especially those who are of great means, ought to commune with their souls and ask themselves the question whether there is anything better they can do with their money than to place the Symphony in a position of assured perpetuity.

In the life drama of every great there are, as Alphonse Sarcey said of the drama of the stage, certain "scenes a faire," certain things which need to be done, if the play is to round out to a satisfactory conclusion. San Francisco owes it to its own self esteem to place the Symphony on a permanent basis. Like the public schools it cannot be made to pay in the business meaning of the word. One wonders who will be the Maecenas to earn the gratitude of the community by emulating the example set by Mr. McKee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

S. KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, April 15—the final

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1927

Another orchestra completing its season is the Sunday Symphonic Society, which gives its last concert of its fourth season at 12:30 to-day in the Hampden Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its last New York visit of the season this week, with Thursday night and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy. A suite by Roussel, on Thursday, and the first local hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's Amy Lowell, on Saturday, will be heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra ends its New York season with the concert of April 12, closing, as usual, with its orchestra transcription of the Bach Passacaglia.

The Young Men's Symphony Orchestra, founded by the late Alfred Seligman, will complete its twenty-fifth season with its annual Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon. Paul Henneberg will conduct a program of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Wagner's aria, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
Standard Union
APR 3 - 1927

Season's Last Concert by Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music Friday Night.

The season's concluding concert in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 P. M.

Symphony No. 1, in C.....Beethoven
Violin concerto.....Glazounoff
Richard Burgin.
Symphony No. 5, in E minor....Tchaikovsky

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes.....Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231.....Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor....Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony Plays Final Concert

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson - Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras. Those who have during the season heard major works offered twice within the same week will appreciate Mr. Koussevitzky's stand in the matter.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven Centenary Beethoven's first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other symphonic work to be played by Mr. Koussevitzky's splendid band of musicians.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXAMINER
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
APR 3 - 1927

L. A. MUSICAL BODY FACES PROBLEM

THE problem involved in selecting a new conductor for the Philharmonic Orchestra brings the public to a realization of the vital place which the orchestra fills in the life of the community.

The future of the orchestra, and also of music in Southern California, will be affected by the choice of the new conductor.

An interesting contribution to the discussion of possible candidates comes from D. Rudhyar, the composer who won the William Andrews Clark prize for orchestral composition in 1922. Rudhyar is also a member of the International Board of Pro-Musica and of the International Composers' Guild.

"The musical needs of Los Angeles are peculiar. We have a growing music public, thanks to the splendid pioneer work of the orchestra. We are not yet sufficiently mature musically to support an orchestra without depending on the generosity of individuals. What we need is a conductor who can stimulate a broader public support. A man who has a dynamic personality can enthuse the public, he can translate music into terms of life, take it out of the museum class of culture. The ideal leader will be a man who understands America's curiosity in the new, who appreciates our need for modern ideas and who can still vitalize the classics and bring them to us with no pedagogic dryness.

"It would be unfortunate were a conductor limited to a foreign tradition to be selected. There could be no communication between him and the large public.

"It might be well for the first year or two to divide the season in half, as is being done with the New York Philharmonic, engaging two different directors. Were this done it might be possible to obtain the conductors of the New York Philharmonic for the portion of the season they are not engaged there.

"Among the men who would be ideally suited to our needs are Stokowski, a man of rich personality and breadth of interest, or Pierre Monteux, formerly with the Boston Symphony, or Ernest Kindler, soloist at last Sunday's concert, or Eugene Goossens."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-Polis—Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Alt[illegible], Bu[illegible], Sa[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and close it with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a suite in F by Albert Roussel which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikowsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," will also be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra concludes its season of New York concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. For Thursday evening Mr. Koussewietsky has arranged the following program:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Roussel.....Suite for Orchestra
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphony

On Saturday afternoon the following works will be played:

Bach...Brandenburg Concerto in G major
Hill.....“Lilacs,” After Amy Lowell
Honegger.....“Pacific 231”
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symphony

Edward Burlingame Hill's orchestral poem, “Lilacs,” receives its first New York performance on this occasion.

APR 3 1927

ALFRED HERTZ CONCLUDES THE 12TH YEAR OF HIS SYMPHONIC LEADERSHIP IN SAN FRANCISCO

By REDFERN MASON

IT is more than a dozen years since Alfred Hertz came to San Francisco and today he is in the way of becoming one of our local divinities. That kindly visage of his, which Albert Durer might have etched, is as much a sign and symbol of San Francisco today as old Sam Brannan's was in the days of the Argonauts. He is the tutelary divinity of music, the arch genius of the Symphony, the urbane prophet of that not very distant time when the City by the Golden Gate will hold its head up artistically as Munich and Milan do today.

It was a good thought of John Rothschild to bring him here. That was in the days after the great fair of 1915. We had heard Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony and a sort of divine discontent had come into our souls, making us utterly dissatisfied with the compromise that had passed for a symphony orchestra in earlier days. Mr. Hertz happened to be in Los Angeles, conducting Horatio Parker's "Fairyland" and Mr. Rothschild asked me whether I thought he was the right man for San Francisco. "Get him, if you can," I said, "and thank God if you can get him."

And it was done, with the result that today we have in San Francisco a symphony orchestra which would be adjudged great if this were Berlin or Vienna, New York or London, Rome or Paris.

Californians Inc. and our Chamber of Commerce may not recognize the fact at its full worth; but a fact it is that the Symphony is San Francisco's greatest advertisement. People talk of the San Francisco Symphony wherever music is valued. It has carried our fame to the uttermost parts of the earth.

How Alfred Hertz gradually welded the instrumental phalanx into a homogeneous and magnificently efficient musical organism is the tale of years of indefatigable and unceasing labor. If you want proof of that, watch him at rehearsals. He fulfills description of Thomas Carlyle; he is "a trip-hammer with an Aeolian attachment," a toiler with the soul of a genius. No laboring man works harder than he does. That is his nature and he is true to it whether he directs the orchestra, plays chess, or drives his auto. Whatever he does, he does with all his might. To him may be applied the Bible saying: "Show me the man that is diligent in business: he shall stand before kings." And before kings Alfred Hertz does stand. He stands before that multitude of San Franciscans which, though uncrowned, nevertheless exercises a kingly office and, by its nod determines the fate of the pontiffs of music.

To gauge Alfred Hertz's value in terms which will carry weight in the mind of the man of business, it may be said that, if every man and woman in San Francisco worked as hard and as zealously as he does, this city would speedily double its wealth.

Yet, it is hardly in terms of wealth that Mr. Hertz's contribution to the welfare of the community is to be estimated. He is above all an educator, using the word in the same sense that it is applied to Dr. Campbell of the University of California or to Stephen Marr Gwinn of the public school system of San Francisco.

Like some poet of the Greeks, some inspired bard of the Gael, he diffuses through the art of music the culture of many peoples. To him we owe a higher appreciation of the glory that is Mozart, the grandeur that is Beethoven. Under the spell of his magic wand we enter into the spirit of the myths of the Germanic peoples, told as he alone can tell them, through the pages of Wagner. And he is no chauvinist, no propagandist of a narrow musical cult. So long as a score is good, he cares not a jot whether the composer be French or German, Muscovite or Italian, English or American. American music indeed he likes to foster; but it must come up to the standard of symphonic dignity, or he will none of it.

Born in a foreign land, Alfred Hertz is an American because he wishes to be an American. He defied German amour propre by giving "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan Opera, at a time when certain narrow-minded folk in the Fatherland wanted to keep it as their exclusive possession. Hertz was wiser; he knew that that great work was the property of all mankind.

All that he has he gives and his is an encyclopaedic culture. His knowledge is various in the realm of music as was that of Goldsmith's schoolmaster in the realm of books. In his attitude of giving there is something sacerdotal. Hertz is a priest and in his hands he holds the seals of a triumphant beauty which, more than any other gift that God has vouchsafed to humanity, rids man of the inhibitions of fear and servility and presents his brow to the stars.

And it is not by learning alone that he has won his place as one having authority in the community. Hertz works by kindness. That genial smile of his, his wit, the jovial goodfellowship of the man are forces that, backed by his transparent sincerity, overcome all opposition. Old Noll Goldsmith comes in apropos.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was at fault.

True, he could not have accomplished the work he has done, if he had not had the hearty co-operation of men as earnest and single-purposed as himself. I have already referred to Mr. Rothschild. That modest gentleman has been a tower of strength to the orchestra. Then there is William Sproule, who devoted the rare leisure moments of a busy life to the task of giving to the public entertainment which should elevate and refresh as well as distract. And finally, there is John D. McKee, the prop and support of the Symphony during eight long years of difficulty.

Mr. McKee has resigned his office, but not his sympathy and, in his leavetaking, he has enriched Symphony and public with the stimulus of a great purpose. Mr. McKee offers $50,000 towards the upbuilding of an endowment fund. Given a million dollars and the Symphony will no longer have annually to come before the public and beg, almost shamefaced, for the privilege of being allowed to live.

With the echoes of the Ninth Symphony still in their ears, the people of San Francisco, especially those who are of great means, ought to commune with their souls and ask themselves the question whether there is anything better they can do with their money than to place the Symphony in a position of assured perpetuity.

In the life drama of every great there are, as Alphonse Sarcey said of the drama of the stage, certain "scenes a faire," certain things which need to be done, if the play is to round out to a satisfactory conclusion. San Francisco owes it to its own self esteem to place the Symphony on a permanent basis. Like the public schools it cannot be made to pay in the business meaning of the word. One wonders who will be the Maecenas to earn the gratitude of the community by emulating the example set by Mr. McKee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

S. KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, April 15—the final

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUN
APR 3 -1927

Another orchestra completing its season is the Sunday Symphonic Society, which gives its last concert of its fourth season at 12:30 to-day in the Hampden Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its last New York visit of the season this week, with Thursday night and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy. A suite by Roussel, on Thursday, and the first local hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's Amy Lowell, on Saturday, will be heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra ends its New York season with the concert of April 12, closing, as usual, with its orchestra transcription of the Bach Passacaglia.

The Young Men's Symphony Orchestra, founded by the late Alfred Seligman, will complete its twenty-fifth season with its annual Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon. Paul Henneberg will conduct a program of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Wagner's aria, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," with Gabrielle Claus, soprano, as soloist; the Cloister Scene from Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow" series and Weber's Jubilee Overture. Miss Claus will also sing a group of songs with piano accompaniment.

* * *

The season's ... in the Brooklyn series by the ... Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held on Friday evening. The programme includes Beethoven's First and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphonies. Richard Buryin, concertmaster of the orchestra, is soloist in the Glazounov violin concerto.

Symphony No. ...

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes ..... Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231 ..... Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor... Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony Plays Final Concert

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson - Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras. Those who have during the season heard major works offered twice within the same week will appreciate Mr. Koussevitzky's stand in the matter.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven Centenary Beethoven's first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other symphonic work to be played by Mr. Koussevitzky's splendid band of musicians.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXAMINER
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
APR 3 - 1927

L. A. MUSICAL BODY FACES PROBLEM

THE problem involved in selecting a new conductor for the Philharmonic Orchestra brings the public to a realization of the vital place which the orchestra fills in the life of the community.

The future of the orchestra, and also of music in Southern California, will be affected by the choice of the new conductor.

An interesting contribution to the discussion of possible candidates comes from D. Rudhyar, the composer who won the William Andrews Clark prize for orchestral composition in 1922. Rudhyar is also a member of the International Board of Pro-Musica and of the International Composers' Guild.

"The musical needs of Los Angeles are peculiar. We have a growing music public, thanks to the splendid pioneer work of the orchestra. We are not yet sufficiently mature musically to support an orchestra without depending on the generosity of individuals. What we need is a conductor who can stimulate a broader public support. A man who has a dynamic personality can enthuse the public, he can translate music into terms of life, take it out of the museum class of culture. The ideal leader will be a man who understands America's curiosity in the new, who appreciates our need for modern ideas and who can still vitalize the classics and bring them to us with no pedagogic dryness.

"It would be unfortunate were a conductor limited to a foreign tradition to be selected. There could be no communication between him and the large public.

"It might be well for the first year or two to divide the season in half, as is being done with the New York Philharmonic, engaging two different directors. Were this done it might be possible to obtain the conductors of the New York Philharmonic for the portion of the season they are not engaged there.

"Among the men who would be ideally suited to our needs are Stokowski, a man of rich personality and breadth of interest, or Pierre Monteux, formerly with the Boston Symphony, or Ernest Kindler, soloist at last Sunday's concert, or Eugene Goossens."

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-
Polis – Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM HER...
WASHING...
APR 3

SERGE VITZKY unusually for the fir this year
Symphon...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TE...
APR

The Boston Sy... and Serge Koussevi... last visit to New ...
and play in Carnegi... day evening and Saturday afternoon, April 7 and 9.

On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra, and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikovsky. The program will open with Bachs Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for Two Flutes and Violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Buringame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, ... for Orchestra," inspired by the ...

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
APR 3 - 1927

Engaged for some time past for ... Koussevitzky's performance of Beet... hoven's Ninth Symphony in The Hub on March 29, Nevada Van der Veer assumed the contralto role in the same composer's Missa Solemnis, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 during Boston's Beethoven Festival Week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3 - 1927

T Boston Symphony Orchestra ... Ser Koussevitzky will pay their last vis... to New York this season and play ... Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

...ursday evening Koussevitzky will ... on the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and close it with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a suite in F by Albert Roussel which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikowsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific ..." will also be played.

...position, but ... ch a way or seeing ... king effects are ob... ed for commercial ... Weir.

By HELEN AP...

...enten lull has occ... e well into April, ...ming, as it does, ... month, the Arc... and lastly the even... moderns, to say n...

APR 3 1927

ALFRED HERTZ CONCLUDES THE 12TH YEAR OF HIS SYMPHONIC LEADERSHIP IN SAN FRANCISCO

By REDFERN MASON

IT is more than a dozen years since Alfred Hertz came to San Francisco and today he is in the way of becoming one of our local divinities. That kindly visage of his, which Albert Durer might have etched, is as much a sign and symbol of San Francisco today as old Sam Brannan's was in the days of the Argonauts. He is the tutelary divinity of music, the arch genius of the Symphony, the urbane prophet of that not very distant time when the City by the Golden Gate will hold its head up artistically as Munich and Milan do today.

It was a good thought of John Rothschild to bring him here. That was in the days after the great fair of 1915. We had heard Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony and a sort of divine discontent had come into our souls, making us utterly dissatisfied with the compromise that had passed for a symphony orchestra in earlier days. Mr. Hertz happened to be in Los Angeles, conducting Horatio Parker's "Fairyland" and Mr. Rothschild asked me whether I thought he was the right man for San Francisco. "Get him, if you can," I said, "and thank God if you can get him."

And it was done, with the result that today we have in San Francisco a symphony orchestra which would be adjudged great if this were Berlin or Vienna, New York or London, Rome or Paris.

Californians Inc. and our Chamber of Commerce may not recognize the fact at its full worth; but a fact it is that the Symphony is San Francisco's greatest advertisement. People talk of the San Francisco Symphony wherever music is valued. It has carried our fame to the uttermost parts of the earth.

How Alfred Hertz gradually welded the instrumental phalanx into a homogeneous and magnificently efficient musical organism is the tale of years of indefatigable and unceasing labor. If you want proof of that, watch him at rehearsals. He fulfills description of Thomas Carlyle; he is "a trip-hammer with an Aeolian attachment," a toiler with the soul of a genius. No laboring man works harder than he does. That is his nature and he is true to it whether he directs the orchestra, plays chess, or drives his auto. Whatever he does, he does with all his might. To him may be applied the Bible saying: "Show me the man that is diligent in business: he shall stand before kings." And before kings Alfred Hertz does stand. He stands before that multitude of San Franciscans which, though uncrowned, nevertheless exercises a kingly office and, by its nod determines the fate of the pontiffs of music.

To gauge Alfred Hertz's value in terms which will carry weight in the mind of the man of business, it may be said that, if every man and woman in San Francisco worked as hard and as zealously as he does, this city would speedily double its wealth.

Yet, it is hardly in terms of wealth that Mr. Hertz's contribution to the welfare of the community is to be estimated. He is above all an educator, using the word in the same sense that it is applied to Dr. Campbell of the University of California or to Stephen Marr Gwinn of the public school system of San Francisco.

Like some poet of the Greeks, some inspired bard of the Gael, he diffuses through the art of music the culture of many peoples. To him we owe a higher appreciation of the glory that is Mozart, the grandeur that is Beethoven. Under the spell of his magic wand we enter into the spirit of the myths of the Germanic peoples, told as he alone can tell them, through the pages of Wagner. And he is no chauvinist, no propagandist of a narrow musical cult. So long as a score is good, he cares not a jot whether the composer be French or German, Muscovite or Italian, English or American. American music indeed he likes to foster; but it must come up to the standard of symphonic dignity, or he will none of it.

Born in a foreign land, Alfred Hertz is an American because he wishes to be an American. He defied German amour propre by giving "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan Opera, at a time when certain narrow-minded folk in the Fatherland wanted to keep it as their exclusive possession. Hertz was wiser; he knew that that great work was the property of all mankind.

All that he has he gives and his is an encyclopaedic culture. His knowledge is various in the realm of music as was that of Goldsmith's schoolmaster in the realm of books. In his attitude of giving there is something sacerdotal. Hertz is a priest and in his hands he holds the seals of a triumphant beauty which, more than any other gift that God has vouchsafed to humanity, rids man of the inhibitions of fear and servility and presents his brow to the stars.

And it is not by learning alone that he has won his place as one having authority in the community. Hertz works by kindness. That genial smile of his, his wit, the jovial goodfellowship of the man are forces that, backed by his transparent sincerity, overcome all opposition. Old Noll Goldsmith comes in apropos.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was at fault.

True, he could not have accomplished the work he has done, if he had not had the hearty co-operation of men as earnest and single-purposed as himself. I have already referred to Mr. Rothschild. That modest gentleman has been a tower of strength to the orchestra. Then there is William Sproule, who devoted the rare leisure moments of a busy life to the task of giving to the public entertainment which should elevate and refresh as well as distract. And finally, there is John D. McKee, the prop and support of the Symphony during eight long years of difficulty.

Mr. McKee has resigned his office, but not his sympathy and, in his leavetaking, he has enriched Symphony and public with the stimulus of a great purpose. Mr. McKee offers $50,000 towards the upbuilding of an endowment fund. Given a million dollars and the Symphony will no longer have annually to come before the public and beg, almost shamefaced, for the privilege of being allowed to live.

With the echoes of the Ninth Symphony still in their ears, the people of San Francisco, especially those who are of great means, ought to commune with their souls and ask themselves the question whether there is anything better they can do with their money than to place the Symphony in a position of assured perpetuity.

In the life drama of every great there are, as Alphonse Sarcey said of the drama of the stage, certain "scenes a faire," certain things which need to be done, if the play is to round out to a satisfactory conclusion. San Francisco owes it to its own self esteem to place the Symphony on a permanent basis. Like the public schools it cannot be made to pay in the business meaning of the word. One wonders who will be the Maecenas to earn the gratitude of the community by emulating the example set by Mr. McKee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

S. KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, April 15—the final

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1927

Another orchestra completing its season is the Sunday Symphonic Society, which gives its last concert of its fourth season at 12:30 to-day in the Hampden Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its last New York visit of the season this week, with Thursday night and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy. A suite by Roussel, on Thursday, and the first local hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's Amy Lowell, on Saturday, will be heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra ends its New York season with the concert of April 12, closing, as usual, with its orchestra transcription of the Bach Passacaglia.

The Young Men's Symphony Orchestra, founded by the late Alfred Seligman, will complete its twenty-fifth season with its annual Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon. Paul Henneberg will conduct a program of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Wagner's aria, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," with Gabrielle Claus, soprano, as soloist; the Cloister Scene from Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow" series and Weber's Jubilee Overture. Miss Claus will also sing a group of songs with piano accompaniment.

* * *

The season's concerts in the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held on Friday evening. The programme includes Beethoven's First and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphonies. Richard Buryin, concertmaster of the orchestra, is soloist in the Glazounov violin concerto.

Symphony No. 5.

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes ..... Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231 ..... Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.... Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony Plays Final Concert

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson - Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras. Those who have during the season heard major works offered twice within the same week will appreciate Mr. Koussevitzky's stand in the matter.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven Centenary Beethoven's first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other symphonic work to be played by Mr. Koussevitzky's splendid band of musicians.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXAMINER
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
APR 3 - 1927

L. A. MUSICAL BODY FACES PROBLEM

THE problem involved in selecting a new conductor for the Philharmonic Orchestra brings the public to a realization of the vital place which the orchestra fills in the life of the community.

The future of the orchestra, and also of music in Southern California, will be affected by the choice of the new conductor.

An interesting contribution to the discussion of possible candidates comes from D. Rudhyar, the composer who won the William Andrews Clark prize for orchestral composition in 1922. Rudhyar is also a member of the International Board of Pro-Musica and of the International Composers' Guild.

"The musical needs of Los Angeles are peculiar. We have a growing music public, thanks to the splendid pioneer work of the orchestra. We are not yet sufficiently mature musically to support an orchestra without depending on the generosity of individuals. What we need is a conductor who can stimulate a broader public support. A man who has a dynamic personality can enthuse the public, he can translate music into terms of life, take it out of the museum class of culture. The ideal leader will be a man who understands America's curiosity in the new, who appreciates our need for modern ideas and who can still vitalize the classics and bring them to us with no pedagogic dryness.

"It would be unfortunate were a conductor limited to a foreign tradition to be selected. There could be no communication between him and the large public.

"It might be well for the first year or two to divide the season in half, as is being done with the New York Philharmonic, engaging two different directors. Were this done it might be possible to obtain the conductors of the New York Philharmonic for the portion of the season they are not engaged there.

"Among the men who would be ideally suited to our needs are Stokowski, a man of rich personality and breadth of interest, or Pierre Monteux, formerly with the Boston Symphony, or Ernest Kindler, soloist at last Sunday's concert, or Eugene Goossens."

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

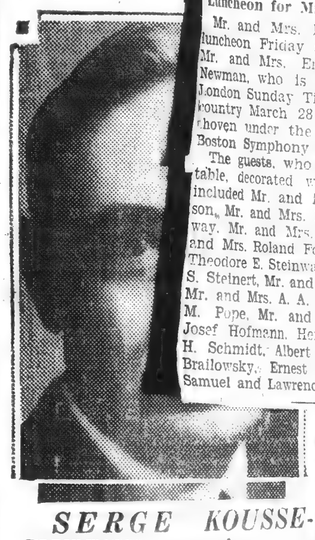
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-
Polis – Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3 - 1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Albert Morris Bagby, Brailowsky, Ernest Schelling, Harold Samuel and Lawrence Gilman.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY promises an unusually good program for the final appearance this year of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
APR 3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 7 and 9.

On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra, and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikovsky. The program will open with Bachs Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for Two Flutes and Violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Buringame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honeggers Orchestral Movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

ngaged for some time past for Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in The Hub on March 29, Nevada Van der Veer assumed the contralto role in the same composer's Missa Solemnis, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 during Boston's Beethoven Festival Week.

APR 3 1927

ALFRED HERTZ CONCLUDES THE 12TH YEAR OF HIS SYMPHONIC LEADERSHIP IN SAN FRANCISCO

By REDFERN MASON

IT is more than a dozen years since Alfred Hertz came to San Francisco and today he is in the way of becoming one of our local divinities. That kindly visage of his, which Albert Durer might have etched, is as much a sign and symbol of San Francisco today as old Sam Brannan's was in the days of the Argonauts. He is the tutelary divinity of music, the arch genius of the Symphony, the urbane prophet of that not very distant time when the City by the Golden Gate will hold its head up artistically as Munich and Milan do today.

It was a good thought of John Rothschild to bring him here. That was in the days after the great fair of 1915. We had heard Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony and a sort of divine discontent had come into our souls, making us utterly dissatisfied with the compromise that had passed for a symphony orchestra in earlier days. Mr. Hertz happened to be in Los Angeles, conducting Horatio Parker's "Fairyland" and Mr. Rothschild asked me whether I thought he was the right man for San Francisco. "Get him, if you can," I said, "and thank God if you can get him."

And it was done, with the result that today we have in San Francisco a symphony orchestra which would be adjudged great if this were Berlin or Vienna, New York or London, Rome or Paris.

Californians Inc. and our Chamber of Commerce may not recognize the fact at its full worth; but a fact it is that the Symphony is San Francisco's greatest advertisement. People talk of the San Francisco Symphony wherever music is valued. It has carried our fame to the uttermost parts of the earth.

How Alfred Hertz gradually welded the instrumental phalanx into a homogeneous and magnificently efficient musical organism is the tale of years of indefatigable and unceasing labor. If you want proof of that, watch him at rehearsals. He fulfills description of Thomas Carlyle; he is "a trip-hammer with an Aeolian attachment," a toiler with the soul of a genius. No laboring man works harder than he does. That is his nature and he is true to it whether he directs the orchestra, plays chess, or drives his auto. Whatever he does, he does with all his might. To him may be applied the Bible saying: "Show me the man that is diligent in business: he shall stand before kings." And before kings Alfred Hertz does stand. He stands before that multitude of San Franciscans which, though uncrowned, nevertheless exercises a kingly office and, by its nod determines the fate of the pontiffs of music.

To gauge Alfred Hertz's value in terms which will carry weight in the mind of the man of business, it may be said that, if every man and woman in San Francisco worked as hard and as zealously as he does, this city would speedily double its wealth.

Yet, it is hardly in terms of wealth that Mr. Hertz's contribution to the welfare of the community is to be estimated. He is above all an educator, using the word in the same sense that it is applied to Dr. Campbell of the University of California or to Stephen Marr Gwinn of the public school system of San Francisco.

Like some poet of the Greeks, some inspired bard of the Gael, he diffuses through the art of music the culture of many peoples. To him we owe a higher appreciation of the glory that is Mozart, the grandeur that is Beethoven. Under the spell of his magic wand we enter into the spirit of the myths of the Germanic peoples, told as he alone can tell them, through the pages of Wagner. And he is no chauvinist, no propagandist of a narrow musical cult. So long as a score is good, he cares not a jot whether the composer be French or German, Muscovite or Italian, English or American. American music indeed he likes to foster; but it must come up to the standard of symphonic dignity, or he will none of it.

Born in a foreign land, Alfred Hertz is an American because he wishes to be an American. He defied German amour propre by giving "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan Opera, at a time when certain narrow-minded folk in the Fatherland wanted to keep it as their exclusive possession. Hertz was wiser; he knew that that great work was the property of all mankind.

All that he has he gives and his is an encyclopaedic culture. His knowledge is various in the realm of music as was that of Goldsmith's schoolmaster in the realm of books. In his attitude of giving there is something sacerdotal. Hertz is a priest and in his hands he holds the seals of a triumphant beauty which, more than any other gift that God has vouchsafed to humanity, rids man of the inhibitions of fear and servility and presents his brow to the stars.

And it is not by learning alone that he has won his place as one having authority in the community. Hertz works by kindness. That genial smile of his, his wit, the jovial goodfellowship of the man are forces that, backed by his transparent sincerity, overcome all opposition. Old Noll Goldsmith comes in apropos.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was at fault.

True, he could not have accomplished the work he has done, if he had not had the hearty co-operation of men as earnest and single-purposed as himself. I have already referred to Mr. Rothschild. That modest gentleman has been a tower of strength to the orchestra. Then there is William Sproule, who devoted the rare leisure moments of a busy life to the task of giving to the public entertainment which should elevate and refresh as well as distract. And finally, there is John D. McKee, the prop and support of the Symphony during eight long years of difficulty.

Mr. McKee has resigned his office, but not his sympathy and, in his leavetaking, he has enriched Symphony and public with the stimulus of a great purpose. Mr. McKee offers $50,000 towards the upbuilding of an endowment fund. Given a million dollars and the Symphony will no longer have annually to come before the public and beg, almost shamefaced, for the privilege of being allowed to live.

With the echoes of the Ninth Symphony still in their ears, the people of San Francisco, especially those who are of great means, ought to commune with their souls and ask themselves the question whether there is anything better they can do with their money than to place the Symphony in a position of assured perpetuity.

In the life drama of every great there are, as Alphonse Sarcey said of the drama of the stage, certain "scenes a faire," certain things which need to be done, if the play is to round out to a satisfactory conclusion. San Francisco owes it to its own self esteem to place the Symphony on a permanent basis. Like the public schools it cannot be made to pay in the business meaning of the word. One wonders who will be the Maecenas to earn the gratitude of the community by emulating the example set by Mr. McKee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

S. KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, April 15—the final

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUN
APR 3 -1927

Another orchestra completing its season is the Sunday Symphonic Society, which gives its last concert of its fourth season at 12:30 to-day in the Hampden Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its last New York visit of the season this week, with Thursday night and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy. A suite by Roussel, on Thursday, and the first local hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's Amy Lowell, on Saturday, will be heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra ends its New York season with the concert of April 12, closing, as usual, with its orchestra transcription of the Bach Passacaglia.

The Young Men's Symphony Orchestra, founded by the late Alfred Seligman, will complete its twenty-fifth season with its annual Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon. Paul Henneberg will conduct a program of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Wagner's aria, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," with Gabrielle Claus, soprano, as soloist; the Cloister Scene from Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow" series and Weber's Jubilee Overture. Miss Claus will also sing a group of songs with piano accompaniment.

* * *

The season's ... in the Brooklyn series by the ... Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held on Friday evening. The programme includes Beethoven's First and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphonies. Richard Buryin, concertmaster of the orchestra, is soloist in the Glazounov violin concerto.

Symphony No. ...

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes ..... Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231 ..... Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.... Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony Plays Final Concert

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson - Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras. Those who have during the season heard major works offered twice within the same week will appreciate Mr. Koussevitzky's stand in the matter.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven Centenary Beethoven's first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other symphonic work to be played by Mr. Koussevitzky's splendid band of musicians.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXAMINER
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
APR 3 - 1927

L. A. MUSICAL BODY FACES PROBLEM

THE problem involved in selecting a new conductor for the Philharmonic Orchestra brings the public to a realization of the vital place which the orchestra fills in the life of the community.

The future of the orchestra, and also of music in Southern California, will be affected by the choice of the new conductor.

An interesting contribution to the discussion of possible candidates comes from D. Rudhyar, the composer who won the William Andrews Clark prize for orchestral composition in 1922. Rudhyar is also a member of the International Board of Pro-Musica and of the International Composers' Guild.

"The musical needs of Los Angeles are peculiar. We have a growing music public, thanks to the splendid pioneer work of the orchestra. We are not yet sufficiently mature musically to support an orchestra without depending on the generosity of individuals. What we need is a conductor who can stimulate a broader public support. A man who has a dynamic personality can enthuse the public, he can translate music into terms of life, take it out of the museum class of culture. The ideal leader will be a man who understands America's curiosity in the new, who appreciates our need for modern ideas and who can still vitalize the classics and bring them to us with no pedagogic dryness.

"It would be unfortunate were a conductor limited to a foreign tradition to be selected. There could be no communication between him and the large public.

"It might be well for the first year or two to divide the season in half, as is being done with the New York Philharmonic, engaging two different directors. Were this done it might be possible to obtain the conductors of the New York Philharmonic for the portion of the season they are not engaged there.

"Among the men who would be ideally suited to our needs are Stokowski, a man of rich personality and breadth of interest, o Pierre Monteux, formerly with th Boston Symphony, or Ernest Kindler, soloist at last Sunday's concert or Eugene Goossens."

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-
Polis – Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY promises an unusually good program for the final appearance this year of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
APR ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 7 and 9.

On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra, and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikovsky. The program will open with Bachs Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for Two Flutes and Violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Buringame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honeggers Orchestral Movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

...ngaged for some time past for Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in The Hub on March 29, Nevada Van der Veer assumed the contralto role in the same composer's Missa Solemnis, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 during Boston's Beethoven Festival Week.

APR 3 192

ALFRED HERTZ CONCLUDES THE 12TH YEAR OF HIS SYMPHONIC LEADERSHIP IN SAN FRANCISCO

By REDFERN MASON

IT is more than a dozen years since Alfred Hertz came to San Francisco and today he is in the way of becoming one of our local divinities. That kindly visage of his, which Albert Durer might have etched, is as much a sign and symbol of San Francisco today as old Sam Brannan's was in the days of the Argonauts. He is the tutelary divinity of music, the arch genius of the Symphony, the urbane prophet of that not very distant time when the City by the Golden Gate will hold its head up artistically as Munich and Milan do today.

It was a good thought of John Rothschild to bring him here. That was in the days after the great fair of 1915. We had heard Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony, and a sort of divine discontent had come into our souls, making us utterly dissatisfied with the compromise that had passed for a symphony orchestra in earlier days. Mr. Hertz happened to be in Los Angeles, conducting Horatio Parker's "Fairyland" and Mr. Rothschild asked me whether I thought he was the right man for San Francisco. "Get him, if you can," I said, "and thank God if you can get him."

And it was done, with the result that today we have in San Francisco a symphony orchestra which would be adjudged great if this were Berlin or Vienna, New York or London, Rome or Paris.

Californians Inc. and our Chamber of Commerce may not recognize the fact at its full worth; but a fact it is that the Symphony is San Francisco's greatest advertisement. People talk of the San Francisco Symphony wherever music is valued. It has carried our fame to the uttermost parts of the earth.

How Alfred Hertz gradually welded the instrumental phalanx into a homogeneous and magnificently efficient musical organism is the tale of years of indefatigable and unceasing labor. If you want proof of that, watch him at rehearsals. He fulfills description of Thomas Carlyle; he is "a trip-hammer with an Aeolian attachment," a toiler with the soul of a genius. No laboring man works harder than he does. That is his nature and he is true to it whether he directs the orchestra, plays chess, or drives his auto. Whatever he does, he does with all his might. To him may be applied the Bible saying: "Show me the man that is diligent in business: he shall stand before kings." And before kings Alfred Hertz does stand. He stands before that multitude of San Franciscans which, though uncrowned, nevertheless exercises a kingly office and, by its nod determines the fate of the pontiffs of music.

To gauge Alfred Hertz's value in terms which will carry weight in the mind of the man of business, it may be said that, if every man and woman in San Francisco worked as hard and as zealously as he does, this city would speedily double its wealth.

Yet, it is hardly in terms of wealth that Mr. Hertz's contribution to the welfare of the community is to be estimated. He is above all an educator, using the word in the same sense that it is applied to Dr. Campbell of the University of California or to Stephen Marr Gwinn of the public school system of San Francisco.

Like some poet of the Greeks, some inspired bard of the Gael, he diffuses through the art of music the culture of many peoples. To him we owe a higher appreciation of the glory that is Mozart, the grandeur that is Beethoven. Under the spell of his magic wand we enter into the spirit of the myths of the Germanic peoples, told as he alone can tell them, through the pages of Wagner. And he is no chauvinist, no propagandist of a narrow musical cult. So long as a score is good, he cares not a jot whether the composer be French or German, Muscovite or Italian, English or American. American music indeed he likes to foster; but it must come up to the standard of symphonic dignity, or he will none of it.

Born in a foreign land, Alfred Hertz is an American because he wishes to be an American. He defied German amour propre by giving "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan Opera, at a time when certain narrow-minded folk in the Fatherland wanted to keep it as their exclusive possession. Hertz was wiser; he knew that that great work was the property of all mankind.

All that he has he gives and his is an encyclopaedic culture. His knowledge is various in the realm of music as was that of Goldsmith's schoolmaster in the realm of books. In his attitude of giving there is something sacerdotal. Hertz is a priest and in his hands he holds the seals of a triumphant beauty which, more than any other gift that God has vouchsafed to humanity, rids man of the inhibitions of fear and servility and presents his brow to the stars.

And it is not by learning alone that he has won his place as one having authority in the community. Hertz works by kindness. That genial smile of his, his wit, the jovial goodfellowship of the man are forces that, backed by his transparent sincerity, overcome all opposition. Old Noll Goldsmith comes in apropos.

Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was at fault.

True, he could not have accomplished the work he has done, if he had not had the hearty co-operation of men as earnest and single-purposed as himself. I have already referred to Mr. Rothschild. That modest gentleman has been a tower of strength to the orchestra. Then there is William Sproule, who devoted the rare leisure moments of a busy life to the task of giving to the public entertainment which should elevate and refresh as well as distract. And finally, there is John D. McKee, the prop and support of the Symphony during eight long years of difficulty.

Mr. McKee has resigned his office, but not his sympathy and, in his leavetaking, he has enriched Symphony and public with the stimulus of a great purpose. Mr. McKee offers $50,000 towards the upbuilding of an endowment fund. Given a million dollars and the Symphony will no longer have annually to come before the public and beg, almost shamefaced, for the privilege of being allowed to live.

With the echoes of the Ninth Symphony still in their ears, the people of San Francisco, especially those who are of great means, ought to commune with their souls and ask themselves the question whether there is anything better they can do with their money than to place the Symphony in a position of assured perpetuity.

In the life drama of every great there are, as Alphonse Sarcey said of the drama of the stage, certain "scenes a faire," certain things which need to be done, if the play is to round out to a satisfactory conclusion. San Francisco owes it to its own self esteem to place the Symphony on a permanent basis. Like the public schools it cannot be made to pay in the business meaning of the word. One wonders who will be the Maecenas to earn the gratitude of the community by emulating the example set by Mr. McKee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

S. KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Poli's Tuesday afternoon, April 15—the final performance this season.

APR 3 -1927

Another orchestra completing its season is the Sunday Symphonic Society, which gives its last concert of its fourth season at 12:30 to-day in the Hampden Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, pays its last New York visit of the season this week, with Thursday night and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy. A suite by Roussel, on Thursday, and the first local hearing of Edward Burlingame Hill's Amy Lowell, on Saturday, will be heard for the first time in New York. The Philadelphia Orchestra ends its New York season with the concert of April 12, closing, as usual, with its orchestra transcription of the Bach Passacaglia.

The Young Men's Symphony Orchestra, founded by the late Alfred Seligman, will complete its twenty-fifth season with its annual Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon. Paul Henneberg will conduct a program of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Wagner's aria, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," with Gabrielle Claus, soprano, as soloist; the Cloister Scene from Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrow" series and Weber's Jubilee Overture. Miss Claus will also sing a group of songs with piano accompaniment.

* * *

The season's [illegible] in the Brooklyn series by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held on Friday evening. The programme includes Beethoven's First and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphonies. Richard Buryin, concertmaster of the orchestra, is soloist in the Glazounov violin concerto.

Symphony No. [illegible]

SATURDAY.

Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes ..... Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231 ..... Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.... Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 3-1927

Boston Symphony Plays Final Concert

THE last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson - Greene. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, direct the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras. Those who have during the season heard major works offered twice within the same week will appreciate Mr. Koussevitzky's stand in the matter.

The Boston program on Wednesday will be unusual in that two symphonies will be played. In honor of the Beethoven Centenary Beethoven's first symphony will be played. The fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the other symphonic work to be played by Mr. Koussevitzky's splendid band of musicians.

A suite by Roussel will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EXAMINER
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
APR 3 - 1927

L. A. MUSICAL BODY FACES PROBLEM

THE problem involved in selecting a new conductor for the Philharmonic Orchestra brings the public to a realization of the vital place which the orchestra fills in the life of the community.

The future of the orchestra, and also of music in Southern California, will be affected by the choice of the new conductor.

An interesting contribution to the discussion of possible candidates comes from D. Rudhyar, the composer who won the William Andrews Clark prize for orchestral composition in 1922. Rudhyar is also a member of the International Board of Pro-Musica and of the International Composers' Guild.

"The musical needs of Los Angeles are peculiar. We have a growing music public, thanks to the splendid pioneer work of the orchestra. We are not yet sufficiently mature musically to support an orchestra without depending on the generosity of individuals. What we need is a conductor who can stimulate a broader public support. A man who has a dynamic personality can enthuse the public, he can translate music into terms of life, take it out of the museum class of culture. The ideal leader will be a man who understands America's curiosity in the new, who appreciates our need for modern ideas and who can still vitalize the classics and bring them to us with no pedagogic dryness.

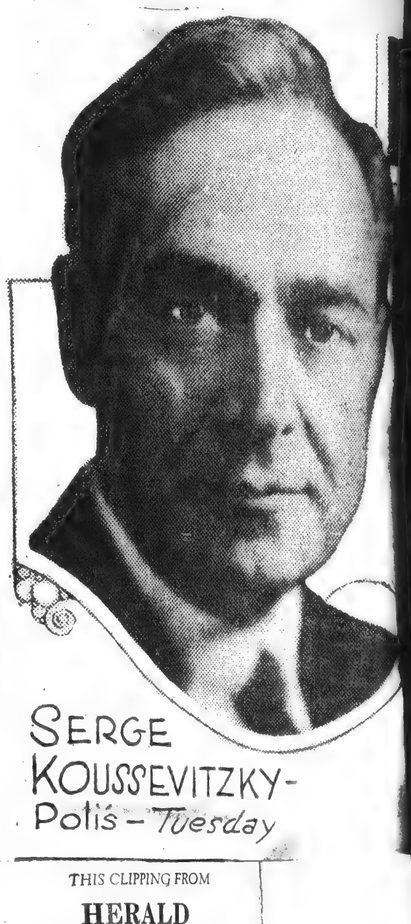
"It would be unfortunate were a conductor limited to a foreign tradition to be selected. There could be no communication between him and the large public.

"It might be well for the first year or two to divide the season in half, as is being done with the New York Philharmonic, engaging two different directors. Were this done it might be possible to obtain the conductors of the New York Philharmonic for the portion of the season they are not engaged there.

"Among the men who would be ideally suited to our needs are Stokowski, a man of rich personality and breadth of interest, [illegible] Pierre Monteux, formerly with the Boston Symphony, or Ernest Kindler, soloist at last Sunday's concert or Eugene Goossens."

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY-
Poli's—Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 3-1927

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY promises an unusually good program for the final appearance this year of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
APR [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 7 and 9.

On Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven and close it with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a Suite in F by Albert Roussel, which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra, and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikovsky. The program will open with Bachs Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for Two Flutes and Violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Buringame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honeggers Orchestral Movement, "Pacific 231," will also be played.

[illegible]ngaged for some time past for Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in The Hub on March 29, Nevada Van der Veer assumed the contralto role in the same composer's Missa Solemnis, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 during Boston's Beethoven Festival Week.

TIGHT BINDING

134

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
APR 3-1927

ERGE OUSSEVITZKYrs — Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
APR 3-1927

Last Concert Here of The Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their last concert of the season here Friday evening, in the Academy of Music.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, the noted concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard in the violin concerto of Glazounov. Koussevitzky will pay a tribute to Beethoven in his centennial season by opening the program with the master's First Symphony. For a close for the concert and the season, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe choral society and the Harvard Glee club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the "Missa Solemnis" and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman of the London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 26 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul [illegible] Schmidt, Al[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last vis to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and close it with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a suite in F by Albert Roussel which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikowsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral [illegible] "Pacific 231," will also be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orche[illegible] concludes its season of N[illegible] York concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturd[illegible] afternoon of this week. For Thurs[illegible] day evening Mr. Koussewietzky ha[illegible] arranged the following program:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Roussel.....Suite for Orchestra
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphon

On Saturday afternoon the fo[illegible] lowing works will be played:

Bach...Brandenburg Concerto in G ma[illegible]
Hill.....Lilacs," After Amy Lo[illegible]
Honegger.....Pacific
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symph[illegible]

Edward Burlingame Hill's orc[illegible] ral poem, "Lilacs," receives its New York performance on thi[illegible] occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

Serge Koussewitsky has arranged the following program for the last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday evening:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Glazounow.....Violin Concerto
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symphony

Soloist in the Glazounow Concerto will be Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m. Soloist, Richard Buogin, violinist (concertmaster of the orchestra).

Symphony No. 1, in C.....Beethoven
Violin Concerto.....Glazounoff
Mr. Burgin
Symphony No. 5, in E minor...Tchaikovsky

Saturday

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall 2:30 p. m.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes.....Bac[illegible]
Lilacs, poem for orchestra, after Amy ...H[illegible]
...York

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
APR 4-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony's program Tuesday, at 4:30, in Poli's, will include: Symphony No. 1 in C major, 21; Adagio molto; Allegro con o; Andante cantabile con moto; enuetto; Allegro molto e vivace; o, Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto vivace (Beethoven), "Lilacs" Poem Orchestra (After Amy Lowell) ll); Symphony No. 5, in E minor, 64; Andante, Andante cantabile, n alcuna licenza; Valse (Allegro moderato); Finale (Andante maestoso, allegro vivace) (Tchaikovsky), and Ride of the Valkyries" (Wagner).

Seats are on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's bureau in Droop's, Thirteenth and G Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
APR 5-1927

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SINGS HERE APRIL 16

Boston Symphony Leader Calls Chorus Best Trained He Ever Heard

The Harvard Glee Club, described by Serge Koussevitzky leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as "the best trained chorus I ever heard in any country in the world," will open its annual Easter concert tour with an engagement in Elks Auditorium, this city, Saturday evening, April 16, at 8:30 o'clock. Tickets went on public sale at Thomas F. Peirce & Son, Westminster and Dorrance streets, yesterday morning.

The concert here is being held under the auspices of the Harvard Club of Rhode Island. Raymond G. Williams, 238 Grosvenor building, is managing the affair.

Action of the club in selecting Providence as the starting point for its spring trip that will include New York and the Middle West, makes this city the first, except for Boston itself, to enjoy a concert since the return of Dr. Archibald T. Davison as conductor of the organization.

The program of the Providence concert follows:

"Fair Harvard;" "Darest Thou Now, O Soul," Williams; "O Vos Omnes," Vittoria; "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring," Bach; "An Easter Hallelujah," Vulpius; "Hark All Ye Lovely Saints," Weekes; two choruses and ballet from "Orpheus," Gluck; "Glorious Apollo," Webbe; "O Isis and Osiris," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart; four choruses from "Patience," Sullivan; two folk songs, "The Turtle Dove," arranged by Williams, "Swansea Town," arranged by Holst; "The Hundred Pipers," Scottish folk song; "How Beautiful Are the Feet," from "The Messiah," Handel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

RENARD, GREAT PIANIST, PLAYS HERE TONIGHT

Rosita Renard, "comparable to Novaes," "has a technique which might easily make Paderewski turn green with envy."

Renard, Chilean pianist, plays here at 8:30 tonight at the Pan American Union, in one of its highly important concerts of Latin American music.

She has played with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Orchestra, and others this season. Her coming emphasizes the growing importance of these concerts that are given under the auspices of the Pan American Union, to bring—in that revealing language of music—the several Americas into closer friendship.

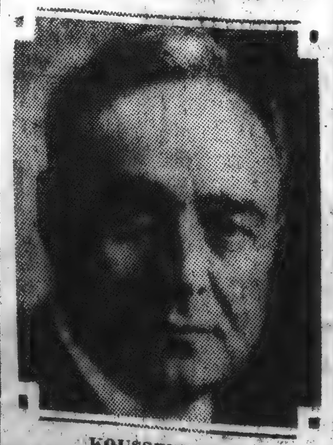
Another point about Rosita Renard that is important is the part her government took in her musical education. These Latins, no matter where we find them, East or West, do value the arts as an integral part of good living and good thinking!

After playing before the President of Chile, Miss Renard was given a five-year scholarship for study in Europe, at the expense of the Chilean government. In New York, recently, though she has toured this and other countries more than once, she was spoken of as one of the piano sensations of the season.

So to the Pan American Union, tonight about our fine [illegible] Captain

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

Symphony



KOUSSEVITZKY
NOTED CONDUCTOR of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who [illegible] these players in their final concert here of the season an today, at 4:30, at Poli's. The concert closes the Wilson-Greene "Artists' Course."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

A GREAT orchestra with a remarkable conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play at Poli's at 4:30 p. m. today presenting the last orchestra concert of the season. Two seasons of work under Koussevitzky's leadership have enabled the orchestra to attain heights exceeding the most liberal expectations, and its name continues to be associated with perfection in symphonic performance. The orchestra brings with it 108 musicians who will present the following program:

"First Symphony in C Major, Opus 21," Beethoven
"Lilacs," tone poem for orchestra, Opus 33 (after Amy Lowell) Edward Burlingame Hill
"Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner
"Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, Opus 64," Tschaikowsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 6-1927

MUSIC

—By Jessie MacBride—

KOUSSEVITZKY A VAN DYCK IN PAINTING SYMPHONIES

Two symphonies in a single program, and at opposite poles of musical emotion, were brought to Washington by that aristocrat of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky, with the rare Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater.

Beethoven-Tschaikowsky, with between a novelty of ultra-modern orchestration and also the bounding strains of Wagner's ever-dramatic "Ride of the Valkyries" to link or separate them.

Koussevitzky, with the orchestra he has restored to its olden glory, might be compared to a Van Dyck, whose technique has painted lace as no other of the peers of the paintbrush has done. Such was his Beethoven, the first symphony abounding in joy with a detail of interwoven parts so finely drawn, so colored in short episodes of vagrant whim, that the painter's parallel still holds good because of the clarity and the esprit that entered into the lovely music that had moments of Mozartian beauty, moments that might have been tossed about by a perfectly orchestrated Gilbert and Sullivan humor. Yet it was all Beethoven of the early period, when life was gay and humor rugged.

Koussevitzky, in his own native Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony, is eloquent in solemnity, is elegant in the beauty of a waltz, but he is no so intense or sad or broad in rhythmic sway as we often feel Tschaikowsky. His emotion is refined always, not so tempestuously fundamental as that which surges beneath so much of Russian music.

But that is a matter of taste. It may be that the Russian "Valse" and the Beethoven "Menuetto" were so exquisite in detail of feathery tone that they, as perfect miniatures, transcended the immensities.

The orchestra played with joyous clarity, clear-cut, vibrant in dynamics of each subtle phrase. Though just what held back the thunder of Wagner's "Ride," making it less exciting than is usual, may have been a difference of accent, but Brunhilde's beloved Gran did not gallop with as huge bounds over his opal clouds of tone.

The novelty, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," after a poem by Amy Lowell, brought us an American who has created an exotic land around his New England lilac tree. Mr. Hill uses the ultra French tonalities and opens with true atmosphere of dissonant flute to soft harp that fairly tingles in overtones and that promises much. He rather over-works his phrases, however, with too much repeating, and two themes are rather obvious, though set in the dissonance of sophisticated ultra modulations. His rocking rhythm in a boat song is charming. There are fine moments of orchestration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 6-1927

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., April 5.—[Special.]—Mrs. Coolidge occupied the presidential box this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She had with her Justice and Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone and her secretary, Miss Mary Randolph.

Mrs. James Couzens, wife of the senator from Michigan, who returned a few days ago from the south, departed this evening, accompanied by her second daughter, Miss Margo Couzens, to spend a fortnight in their home in Detroit.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert B. Dewey of Chicago have come up from the south and have taken an apartment at the Mayflower for the spring season.

Mrs. James R. Mann, widow of the representative from Chicago, who has made her home at The Highlands for eighteen years, has gone to 2400 16th street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 6-1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert Of Season Tonight — Dr. J. Fred Wolle, Conductor Of Bach Choir At Bethlehem, To Give Recital.

THE closing concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place tonight at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of this fine organization, has gone outside of the beaten track and put two symphonies on the program, one of them Beethoven's First in C major, opus 21, and the other Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor, opus 36.

The only other number to be given is the Suite in F major by Roussel, a French composer, who has been heard of in this country very little, but who has to his credit quite a list of works. The Beethoven and the Tschaikowsky numbers are familiar to concert-goers, while the Roussel opus does not appear to have been given here before, offering the element of novelty to whatever other attractions it may possess. Roussel is said to spring into full being in his Divertissement, for piano and wood wind instruments, composed in 1906 which is said to foreshadow Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," the work being called marvelous. He employs a contrapuntal technique of very original style, and is declared to have worked for some years unrestricted by any scruple for tonal construction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 6-1927

Glad There Is To Be Something New In The Way Of A Musical Program.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: I note with satisfaction the following comment about the forthcoming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr. Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras."

A splendid idea! We have been served with the same pieces of music on so many occasions this season that one would incline to the belief that the orchestra leaders studied the list of works already played for the express purpose

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 7-1927

Early Beethoven Work And Suite By Roussel Present Study In Contrasts As They Are Given By Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Lyric last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, assumed the form of a study in contrasts, with the First Beethoven Symphony as one end of the line and a Suite by Roussel, a modern French composer, as the other.

The Beethoven work was presented with greatly reduced orchestra, as be[illegible] ed the limited instrumental resource[illegible] the time when the work was written[illegible] the ten double-basses carried by th[illegible] ganization, only five appeared in th[illegible] mber, with all but four of the brass[illegible] litted, and with a number of the vi[illegible] s, violas and cellos also absent; [illegible] t the ensemble had a greatly reduc[illegible] e volume, according with the plac[illegible] ene and quietly emotional charact[illegible] the music, which shows Beethov[illegible] ll very much under the influence [illegible] aydn and Mozart, though many ch[illegible] aeristic touches appear here and the[illegible] The interpretation of the sympho[illegible] held to the character of the opus, w[illegible] ine shadings, delicate nuances [illegible] daintily molded phrases. With the [illegible] pression of the later Beethoven str[illegible] upon the audience, this work appe[illegible] rather lacking in color, despite the[illegible] casional bursts of power and the abr[illegible] nesses which foreshadow the later [illegible] thoven when he came fully into [illegible] own. The performance, however, [illegible] fully and minutely reflected the atmosphere of the opus and revealed a phase of the composer's development of the highest historical interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 6-1927

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led that organization in a varied program that built up to an exceptionally inspiring finale in the second and last concert to be given here this season by this orchestra yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater. A large and unusually distinguished audience, led by Mrs. Coolidge and her party in the presidential box, and including in its midst Speaker Nicholas Longworth, who is almost as noted for his patronage and personal musical interests as for his political activities, and many leading musicians of the Capital gathered in spite of the continued depressing weather to hear this concert.

Beethoven was again given the place of honor, his first symphony being the opening number. It is a lovely work and was well played. The minuet was especially charming with its touch of Mozartian color and finesse, while the finale was most impressive.

Second came an American's work not previously heard in Washington, if memory serves correctly. The work was Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," called a poem for orchestra "after Amy Lowell." It rather suggested the modern French school in its pretty pictorialness and slightly sophisticated dissonances. The fragrance and quality of the flowers suggested in the title are pleasingly set forth and a nice convincing storm is worked up during the course of events, but there does not seem to be anything very vital in this music. It paled into complete insignificance before the vigor and richness of Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," which was excellently presented, the brasses never swamping the strings and each phrase set forth with clean-cut, authentic delineation. The orchestra as well as Mr. Koussevitzky well deserved the ovation that brought them to their feet in acknowledgment at its conclusion.

However, it was left to Mr. Koussevitzky's great countryman, Tschaikowsky, to offer the pinnacle of the afternoon's inspiration when his great "Fifth Symphony in E Minor," opus 64, was played in a manner in which it has rarely been heard in Washington. The poignancy and intangible genius that develop in the second movement and swell into the glory of the finale never were more authentically set forth. The first movement, the andante, was skillfully brought to the logical color level of the second movement and, again, the waltz movement, the third, led inevitably into the exact mood for the resolution in the finale. The strings were in perfect accord and the whole symphony left a wonderful memory to carry over until next season. Again and again Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra had to bow their recognition of the applause that rained enthusiastically from the audience. H. F.

THIS CL[illegible]PING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
APR 6-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting, gave its last concert for this season at Poli's yesterday afternoon to a well filled house. Beethoven's First Symphony, the opening number, was payed delicately and intelligently. Debussy once said he hoped Beethoven heard the parts he left out between the parts he wrote, for the First Symphony is scored for only 12 wind instruments beside the kettledrums and strings, so that it sounds very light, especially when compared with Wagner and Tschaikowsky numbers on the same program.

Burlingame Hill's orchestral poem inspired by Amy Lowell's "Lilacs" is very charming, sufficiently impressionistic to be called modern, too melodic to be experimental, colorful and expressive with one haunting little theme that flits restlessly throughout the "lilacs" themselves.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" was not as tumultuous as we expect those vigorous ladies to be. It was more like the way French orchestras play Wagner.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was beautifully played, the Andante with its alluring rhythm The lovely Andante Cantabile with its song of passionate resignation, the graceful fluttering Valse movement, and the last martial Andante Maesto, at first reminiscent of Wagner's "Pilgrims' Chorus" and working up to a fine climax in an old Russian hymn.

Koussevitzky was recalled many times and generously shared his honors with his men. The concert was given under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.—FLORENCE HYDE.

Moderate priced apartments in desir-

TIGHT BINDING

SHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

ERGE OUSSEVITZKYois — Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Al[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and close it with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a suite in F by Albert Roussel which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikowsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral [illegible]. "Pacific 231," will also be [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] concludes its season of [illegible] York concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturd[illegible] afternoon of this week. For Thurs[illegible] day evening Mr. Koussewietsky ha[illegible] arranged the following program:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Roussel.....Suite for Orchestra
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphon[illegible]

On Saturday afternoon the fo[illegible] lowing works will be played:

Bach...Brandenburg Concerto in G ma[illegible]
Hill.....“Lilacs,” After Amy Lo[illegible]
Honegger.....“Pacific [illegible]
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symph[illegible]

Edward Burlingame Hill's orc[illegible] tral poem, “Lilacs,” receives its New York performance on this [illegible] sion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
APR 3-1927

Last Concert Here of The Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their last concert of the season here Friday evening, in the Academy of Music.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, the noted concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard in the violin concerto of Glazounov. Koussevitzky will pay a tribute to Beethoven in his centennial season by opening the program with the master's First Symphony. As a close for the concert and the season, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony hall, Boston, on March 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. In the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral society and the Harvard Glee club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the “Missa Solemnis” and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman of the London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

Serge Koussewitsky has arranged the following program for the last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday evening:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Glazounow.....Violin Concerto
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symphony
Soloist in the Glazounow Concerto will be Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m. Soloist, Richard Buegin, violinist (concertmaster of the orchestra).

Symphony No. 1, in C.....Beethoven
Violin concerto.....Glazounoff
Mr. Burgin
Symphony No. 5, in E minor...Tchaikovsky

Saturday

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall 2:[illegible]

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 for violin [illegible] flutes.....Bac[illegible]
Lilacs, poem for orchestra, after Amy [illegible].....H[illegible]
[illegible] York

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
APR 4-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony's program Tuesday, at 4:30, in Poli's will include: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21: Adagio molto; Allegro con brio; Andante cantabile con moto; Menuetto; Allegro molto e vivace; Adagio, Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto vivace (Beethoven), “Lilacs” Poem for Orchestra (After Amy Lowell) (Hill); Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64; Andante, Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza; Valse (Allegro moderato); Finale (Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace) (Tchaikovsky), and “Ride of the Valkyries” (Wagner). Seats are on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's bureau in Droop's, Thirteenth and G Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
APR 5-1927

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SINGS HERE APRIL 16

Boston Symphony Leader Calls Chorus Best Trained He Ever Heard

The Harvard Glee Club, described by Serge Koussevitzky leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as “the best trained chorus I ever heard in any country in the world,” will open its annual Easter concert tour with an engagement in Elks Auditorium, this city, Saturday evening, April 16, at 8:30 o'clock. Tickets went on public sale at Thomas F. Peirce & Son, Westminster and Dorrance streets, yesterday morning.

The concert here is being held under the auspices of the Harvard Club of Rhode Island. Raymond G. Williams, 238 Grosvenor building, is managing the affair.

Action of the club in selecting Providence as the starting point for its spring trip that will include New York and the Middle West, makes this city the first, except for Boston itself, to enjoy a concert since the return of Dr. Archibald T. Davison as conductor of the organization.

The program of the Providence concert follows:

“Fair Harvard:” “Darest Thou Now, O Soul,” Williams; “O Vos Omnes,” Vittoria; “Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring,” Bach; “An Easter Hallelujah,” Vulpius; “Hark All Ye Lovely Saints,” Weekes; two choruses and ballet from “Orpheus,” Gluck; “Glorious Apollo,” Webbe; “O Isis and Osiris,” from “The Magic Flute,” Mozart; four choruses from “Patience,” Sullivan; two folk songs, “The Turtle Dove,” arranged by Williams, “Swansea Town,” arranged by Holst; “The Hundred Pipers,” Scottish folk song; “How Beautiful Are the Feet,” from “The Messiah,” Handel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

RENARD, GREAT PIANIST, PLAYS HERE TONIGHT

Rosita Renard, “comparable to Novaes,” “has a technique which might easily make Paderewski turn green with envy.”

Renard, Chilean pianist, plays here at 8:30 tonight at the Pan American Union, in one of its high y important concerts of Latin American music.

She has played with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Orchestra, and others this season. Her coming emphasizes the growing importance of these concerts that are given under the auspices of the Pan American Union, to bring—in that revealing language of music—the several Americas into closer friendship.

Another point about Rosita Renard that is important is the part her government took in her musical education. These Latins, no matter where we find them, East or West, do value the arts as an integral part of good living and good thinking!

After playing before the President o. Chile, Miss Renard was given a five-year scholarship for study in Europe, at the expense of the Chilean government. In New York, recently, though she has toured this and other countries more than once, she was spoken of as one of the piano sensations of the season.

So to the Pan American Union, [illegible] thought about our fine [illegible] Captain

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

Symphony

KOUSSEVITZKY

NOTED CONDUCTOR of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who leads these players in their final concert here of the season on today, at 4:30, at Poli's. The concert closes the Wilson-Greene “Artists' Course.”

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

A GREAT orchestra with a remarkable conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play at Poli's at 4:30 p. m. today presenting the last orchestra concert of the season. Two seasons of work under Koussevitzky's leadership have enabled the orchestra to attain heights exceeding the most liberal expectations, and its name continues to be associated with perfection in symphonic performance. The orchestra brings with it 108 musicians who will present the following program:

“First Symphony in C Major, Opus 21,” Beethoven
“Lilacs,” tone poem for orchestra, Opus 33 (after Amy Lowell) Edward Burlingame Hill
“Ride of the Valkyries” .....Wagner
“Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, Opus 64,” Tschaikowsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 6-1927

MUSIC

—By Jessie MacBride—

KOUSSEVITZKY A VAN DYCK IN PAINTING SYMPHONIES

Two symphonies in a single program, and at opposite poles of musical emotion, were brought to Washington by that aristocrat of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky, with the rare Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater.

Beethoven-Tschaikowsky, with between a novelty of ultra-modern orchestration and also the bounding strains of Wagner's ever-dramatic “Ride of the Valkyries” to link or separate them.

Koussevitzky, with the orchestra he has restored to its olden glory, might be compared to a Van Dyck, whose technique has painted lace as no other of the peers of the paint-brush has done. Such was his Beethoven, the first symphony abounding in joy with a detail of interwoven parts so finely drawn, so colored in short episodes of vagrant whim, that the painter's parallel still holds good because of the clarity and the esprit that entered into the lovely music that had moments of Mozartian beauty, moments that might have been tossed about by a perfectly orchestrated Gilbert and Sullivan humor. Yet it was all Beethoven of the early period, when life was gay and humor rugged.

Koussevitzky, in his own native Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony, is eloquent in solemnity, is elegant in the beauty of a waltz, but he is not so intense or sad or broad in rhythmic sway as we often feel Tschaikowsky. His emotion is refined always, not so tempestuously fundamental as that which surges beneath so much of Russian music.

But that is a matter of taste. It may be that the Russian “Valse” and the Beethoven “Menuetto” were so exquisite in detail of feathery tone that they, as perfect miniatures, transcended the immensities.

The orchestra played with joyous clarity, clear-cut, vibrant in dynamics of each subtle phrase. Though just what held back the thunder of Wagner's “Ride,” making it less exciting than is usual may have been a difference of accent, but Brunhilde's beloved Grani did not gallop with as huge bounds over his opal clouds of tone.

The novelty, Edward Burlingame Hill's “Lilacs,” after a poem by Amy Lowell, brought us an American who has created an exotic land around his New England lilac tree. Mr. Hill uses the ultra French tonalities and opens with true atmosphere of dissonant flute to soft harp that fairly tingles in overtones and that promises much. He rather over-works his phrases, however, with too much repeating, and two themes are rather obvious, though set in the dissonance of sophisticated ultra modulations. His rocking rhythm in a boat song is charming. There are fine moments of orchestration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 6-1927

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., April 5.—[Special.]—Mrs. Coolidge occupied the presidential box this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She had with her Justice and Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone and her secretary, Miss Mary Randolph.

Mrs. James Couzens, wife of the senator from Michigan, who returned a few days ago from the south, departed this evening, accompanied by her second daughter, Miss Margo Couzens, to spend a fortnight in their home in Detroit.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert B. Dewey of Chicago have come up from the south and have taken an apartment at the Mayflower for the spring season.

Mrs. James R. Mann, widow of the representative from Chicago, who has made her home at The Highlands for eighteen years, has gone to 2400 16th

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 6-1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert Of Season Tonight — Dr. J. Fred Wolle, Conductor Of Bach Choir At Bethlehem, To Give Recital.

THE closing concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place tonight at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of this fine organization, has gone outside of the beaten track and put two symphonies on the program, one of them Beethoven's First in C major, opus 21, and the other Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor, opus 36.

The only other number to be given is the Suite in F major by Roussel, a French composer, who has been heard of in this country very little, but who has to his credit quite a list of works. The Beethoven and the Tschaikowsky numbers are familiar to concert-goers, while the Roussel opus does not appear to have been given here before, offering the element of novelty to whatever other attractions it may possess. Roussel is said to spring into full being in his Divertissement, for piano and wood wind instruments, composed in 1906, which is said to foreshadow Stravinsky's “Sacre du Printemps,” the work being called marvelous. He employs a contrapuntal technique of very original style, and is declared to have worked for some years unrestricted by any scruple for tonal construction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 6-1927

Glad There Is To Be Something New In The Way Of A Musical Program.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: I note with satisfaction the following comment about the forthcoming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: “In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr. Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras.”

A splendid idea! We have been served with the same pieces of music on so many occasions this season that one would incline to the belief that the orchestra leaders studied the list of works already played for the express purpose of [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 7-1927

Early Beethoven Work And Suite By Roussel Present Study In Contrasts As They Are Given By Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Lyric last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its regular conductor, assumed the form of a study in contrasts, with the First Beethoven Symphony as one end of the line and a Suite by Roussel, a modern French composer, as the other.

The Beethoven work was presented with greatly reduced orchestra, as be[illegible] ed the limited instrumental resource[illegible] the time when the work was written[illegible] the ten double-basses carried by th[illegible] ganization, only five appeared in th[illegible] mber, with all but four of the brass [illegible] itted, and with a number of the vi[illegible] s, violas and cellos also absent; [illegible] at the ensemble had a greatly reduc[illegible] he volume, according with the plac[illegible] ene and quietly emotional charact[illegible] the music, which shows Beethov[illegible] ll very much under the influence [illegible] aydn and Mozart, though many ch[illegible] aceristic touches appear here and the[illegible]

The interpretation of the sympho[illegible] held to the character of the opus, w[illegible] fine shadings, delicate nuances a[illegible] daintily molded phrases. With the [illegible] pression of the later Beethoven str[illegible] upon the audience, this work app[illegible] rather lacking in color, despite the [illegible] casional bursts of power and the abr[illegible] nesses which foreshadow the later [illegible] thoven when he came fully into [illegible] own. The performance, however, [illegible] fully and minutely reflected the atmosphere of the opus and revealed a phase of the composer's development of the highest historical interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 6-1927

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led that organization in a varied program that built up to an exceptionally inspiring finale in the second and last concert to be given here this season by this orchestra yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater. A large and unusually distinguished audience, led by Mrs. Coolidge and her party in the presidential box, and including in its midst Speaker Nicholas Longworth, who is almost as noted for his patronage and personal musical interests as for his political activities, and many leading musicians of the Capital gathered in spite of the continued depressing weather to hear this concert.

Beethoven was again given the place of honor, his first symphony being the opening number. It is a lovely work and was well played. The minuet was especially charming with its touch of Mozartian color and finesse, while the finale was most impressive.

Second came an American's work not previously heard in Washington, if memory serves correctly. The work was Edward Burlingame Hill's “Lilacs,” called a poem for orchestra “after Amy Lowell.” It rather suggested the modern French school in its pretty pictorialness and slightly sophisticated dissonances. The fragrance and quality of the flowers suggested in the title are pleasingly set forth and a nice convincing storm is worked up during the course of events, but there does not seem to be anything very vital in this music. It paled into complete insignificance before the vigor and richness of Wagner's “Ride of the Valkyries,” which was excellently presented, the brasses never swamping the strings and each phrase set forth with clean-cut, authentic delineation. The orchestra as well as Mr. Koussevitzky well deserved the ovation that brought them to their feet in acknowledgment at its conclusion.

However, it was left to Mr. Koussevitzky's great countryman, Tschaikowsky, to offer the pinnacle of the afternoon's inspiration when his great “Fifth Symphony in E Minor,” opus 64, was played in a manner in which it has rarely been heard in Washington. The poignancy and intangible genius that develop in the second movement and swell into the glory of the finale never were more authentically set forth. The first movement, the andante, was skillfully brought to the logical color level of the second movement and, again, the waltz movement, the third, led inevitably into the exact mood for the resolution in the finale. The strings were in perfect accord and the whole symphony left a wonderful memory to carry over until next season. Again and again Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra had to bow their recognition of the applause that rained enthusiastically from the audience. H. F.

THIS CL[illegible]PING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
APR 6-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting, gave its last concert for this season at Poli's yesterday afternoon to a well filled house. Beethoven's First Symphony, the opening number, was payed delicately and intelligently. Debussy once said he hoped Beethoven heard the parts he left out between the parts he wrote, for the First Symphony is scored for only 12 wind instruments beside the kettledrums and strings, so that it sounds very light, especially when compared with Wagner and Tschaikowsky numbers on the same program.

Burlingame Hill's orchestral poem inspired by Amy Lowell's “Lilacs” is very charming, sufficiently impressionistic to be called modern, too melodic to be experimental, colorful and expressive with one haunting little theme that flits restlessly throughout the “lilacs” themselves.

Wagner's “Ride of the Valkyries” was not as tumultuous as we expect those vigorous ladies to be. It was more like the way French orchestras play Wagner.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was beautifully played, the Andante with its alluring rhythm. The lovely Andante Cantabile with its song of passionate resignation, the graceful fluttering Valse movement, and the last martial Andante Maesto, at first reminiscent of Wagner's “Pilgrims' Chorus” and working up to a fine climax in an old Russian hymn.

Koussevitzky was recalled many times and generously shared his honors with his men. The concert was given under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.—FLORENCE HYDE.

Moderate priced apartments in desir-

B4

TIGHT BINDING

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 3-1927

ERGE OUSSEVITZKY-ts — Tuesday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

Luncheon for Mr. and Mrs. Newman

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Urchs gave a luncheon Friday at the St. Regis for Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newman. Mr. Newman, who is music critic of the London Sunday Times, arrived in this country March 28 to lecture on Beethoven under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The guests, who were seated at one table, decorated with spring flowers, included Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Steinway, Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolf Gans, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Knopf, Mrs. Edgar M. Pope, Mr. and Mrs. A. Steinert, Josef Hofmann, Herbert Peyser, Paul H. Schmidt, Alb[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 3-1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky will pay their last visit to New York this season and play in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Thursday evening Koussevitzky will open the concert with the First Symphony of Beethoven, and close it with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He will also play a suite in F by Albert Roussel which the French composer wrote especially for this orchestra and which had its first performance when Koussevitzky recently introduced it to Boston.

The symphony at the matinee performance will be the Fifth of Tschaikowsky. The program will open with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto for two flutes and violin solo, and also include a new score by Edward Burlingame Hill, entitled "Lilacs, Poem for Orchestra," inspired by the verses of Amy Lowell. Honegger's orchestral [illegible], "Pacific 231," will also be [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony Orche[illegible] concludes its season of N[illegible] York concerts at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturd[illegible] afternoon of this week. For Thurs[illegible] day evening Mr. Koussw[illegible]tzky ha[illegible] arranged the following program:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Roussel.....Suite for Orchestra
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphony

On Saturday afternoon the fo[illegible] lowing works will be played:

Bach...Brandenburg Concerto in G ma[illegible]
Hill.....“Lilacs,” After Amy Lo[illegible]
Honegger.....“Pacific [illegible]
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symph[illegible]

Edward Burlingame Hill's orc[illegible] tral poem, “Lilacs,” receives its New York performance on this [illegible] casion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
APR 3-1927

Last Concert Here of The Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their last concert of the season here Friday evening, in the Academy of Music.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, the noted concertmaster of the orchestra, will be heard in the violin concerto of Glazounov. Koussevitzky will pay a tribute to Beethoven in his centennial season by opening the program with the master's First Symphony. As a close for the concert and the season, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 3-1927

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will observe the Beethoven centenary at Symphony hall, Boston, on March 22, 24, 25, 26, 28 and 29, by playing all of the composer's nine symphonies. To the Ninth Symphony the orchestra will combine forces with the Radcliffe Choral society and the Harvard Glee club, led by Dr. Archibald Davison. They will also take part in the “Missa Solemnis” and the Great Mass. Ernest Newman of the London Sunday Times is coming especially to America to pay a verbal tribute to the genius of Beethoven. Quartets will be performed by the London String quartet and the Lenox String quartet.

The following artists will take part: Walter Gieseking, Florence Austral, Jeanne Gordon, Jeanette Vreeland, Tudor Davies, Nevada van der Veer, Arthur Middleton, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3-1927

Serge Koussewitsky has arranged the following program for the last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday evening:

Beethoven.....First Symphony
Glazounow.....Violin Concerto
Tschaikowsky.....Fifth Symphony

Soloist in the Glazounow Concerto will be Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m. Soloist, Richard Burgin, violinist (concertmaster of the orchestra).

Symphony No. 1, in C.....Beethoven
Violin Concerto.....Glazounoff
Mr. Burgin
Symphony No. 5, in E minor..Tchaikovsky

Saturday

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall 2:30 p. m.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 for violin and two flutes.....Bach
Lilacs, poem for orchestra, after Amy Lowell.....Hill
First time in New York
Pacific 231.....Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E minor..Tchaikovsky

[illegible]-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony's program Tuesday, at 4:30, in Poli's will include: Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21; Adagio molto: Allegro con brio; Andante cantabile con moto; Menuetto; Allegro molto e vivace; Adagio, Finale; Adagio, Allegro molto vivace (Beethoven). “Lilacs” Poem for Orchestra (After Amy Lowell) (Hill); Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64; Andante, Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza; Valse (Allegro moderato); Finale (Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace) (Tchaikovsky), and “Ride of the Valkyries” (Wagner).

Seats are on sale at Mrs. Wilson-Greene's bureau in Droop's, Thirteenth and G Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
APR 5-1927

HARVARD GLEE CLUB SINGS HERE APRIL 16

Boston Symphony Leader Calls Chorus Best Trained He Ever Heard

The Harvard Glee Club, described by Serge Koussevitzky leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as “the best trained chorus I ever heard in any country in the world,” will open its annual Easter concert tour with an engagement in Elks Auditorium, this city, Saturday evening, April 16, at 8:30 o'clock. Tickets went on public sale at Thomas F. Peirce & Son, Westminster and Dorrance streets, yesterday morning.

The concert here is being held under the auspices of the Harvard Club of Rhode Island. Raymond G. Williams, 238 Grosvenor building, is managing the affair.

Action of the club in selecting Providence as the starting point for its spring trip that will include New York and the Middle West, makes this city the first, except for Boston itself, to enjoy a concert since the return of Dr. Archibald T. Davison as conductor of the organization.

The program of the Providence concert follows:

“Fair Harvard:” “Darest Thou Now, O Soul,” Williams; “O Vos Omnes,” Vittoria; “Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring,” Bach; “An Easter Hallelujah,” Vulpius; “Hark All Ye Lovely Saints,” Weekes; two choruses and ballet from “Orpheus,” Gluck; “Glorious Apollo,” Webbe; “O Isis and Osiris,” from “The Magic Flute,” Mozart; four choruses from “Patience,” Sullivan; two folk songs, “The Turtle Dove,” arranged by Williams, “Swansea Town,” arranged by Holst; “The Hundred Pipers,” Scottish folk song; “How Beautiful Are the Feet,” from “The Messiah,” Handel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

RENARD, GREAT PIANIST, PLAYS HERE TONIGHT

Rosita Renard, “comparable to Novaes,” “has a technique which might easily make Paderewski turn green with envy.”

Renard, Chilean pianist, plays here at 8:30 tonight at the Pan American Union, in one of its highly important concerts of Latin American music.

She has played with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Orchestra, and others this season. Her coming emphasizes the growing importance of these concerts that are given under the auspices of the Pan American Union, to bring—in that revealing language of music—the several Americas into closer friendship.

Another point about Rosita Renard that is important is the part her government took in her musical education. These Latins, no matter where we find them, East or West, do value the arts as an integral part of good living and good thinking.

After playing before the President of Chile, Miss Renard was given a five-year scholarship for study in Europe at the expense of the Chilean government. In New York, recently, though she has toured this and other countries more than once, she was spoken of as one of the piano sensations of the season.

So to the Pan American Union, that has brought about our fine “Service Orchestra,” with Captain Stannard of the Army Band and Lieutenant Benter of the Navy Band conductors, we owe this privilege of finding ourselves in the current of world events in music.

KOUSSEVITZKY
NOTED CONDUCTOR of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who leads these players in their final concert here of the season on today, at 4:30, at Poli's. The concert closes the Wilson-Greene “Artists' Course.”

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 5-1927

A GREAT orchestra with a remarkable conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play at Poli's at 4:30 p. m. today presenting the last orchestra concert of the season. Two seasons of work under Koussevitzky's leadership have enabled the orchestra to attain heights exceeding the most liberal expectations, and its name continues to be associated with perfection in symphonic performance. The orchestra brings with it 108 musicians who will present the following program:

“First Symphony in C Major, Opus 21,” Beethoven
“Lilacs,” tone poem for orchestra, Opus 33 (after Amy Lowell) Edward Burlingame Hill
“Ride of the Valkyries” .....Wagner
“Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, Opus 64,” Tschaikowski

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
APR 6-1927

MUSIC

—By Jessie MacBride—

KOUSSEVITZKY A VAN DYCK IN PAINTING SYMPHONIES

Two symphonies in a single program, and at opposite poles of musical emotion, were brought to Washington by that aristocrat of the baton, Serge Koussevitzky, with the rare Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater.

Beethoven-Tschaikowsky, with between a novelty of ultra-modern orchestration and also the bounding strains of Wagner's ever-dramatic “Ride of the Valkyries” to link or separate them.

Koussevitzky, with the orchestra he has restored to its olden glory, might be compared to a Van Dyck, whose technique has painted lace as no other of the peers of the paintbrush has done. Such was his Beethoven, the first symphony abounding in joy with a detail of interwoven parts so finely drawn, so colored in short episodes of vagrant whim, that the painter's parallel still holds good because of the clarity and the esprit that entered into the lovely music that had moments of Mozartian beauty, moments that might have been tossed about by a perfectly orchestrated Gilbert and Sullivan humor. Yet it was all Beethoven of the early period, when life was gay and humor rugged.

Koussevitzky, in his own native Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony, is eloquent in solemnity, is elegant in the beauty of a waltz, but he is not so intense or sad or broad in rhythmic sway as we often feel Tschaikowsky. His emotion is refined always, not so tempestuously fundamental as that which surges beneath so much of Russian music.

But that is a matter of taste. It may be that the Russian “Valse” and the Beethoven “Menuetto” were so exquisite in detail of feathery tone that they, as perfect miniatures, transcended the immensities.

The orchestra played with joyous clarity, clear-cut, vibrant in dynamics of each subtle phrase. Though just what held back the thunder of Wagner's “Ride,” making it less exciting than is usual may have been a difference of accent, but Brunhilde's beloved Grani did not gallop with as huge bounds over his opal clouds of tone.

The novelty, Edward Burlingame Hill's “Lilacs,” after a poem by Amy Lowell, brought us an American who has created an exotic land around his New England lilac tree. Mr. Hill uses the ultra French tonalities and opens with true atmosphere of dissonant flute to soft harp that fairly tingles in overtones and that promises much. He rather over-works his phrases, however, with too much repeating, and two themes are rather obvious, though set in the dissonance of sophisticated ultra modulations. His lacking rhythm in a boat song is charming. There are fine moments of orchestration.

The Boston Symphony leaves us for the season. Mr. Koussevitzky has endowed us with musical memories of intellectual command, with elegance of taste, to which his great organization adds its fulsome glory of a rare orchestra whose and Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone and [illegible] secretary, Miss Mary Randolph.

(Continued from Page 6)

Mrs. James Couzens, wife of the senator from Michigan, who returned a few days ago from the south, departed this evening, accompanied by her second daughter, Miss Margo Couzens, to spend a fortnight in their home in Detroit.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert B. Dewey of Chicago have come up from the south and have taken an apartment at the Mayflower for the spring season.

Mrs. James R. Mann, widow of the representative from Chicago, who has made her home at The Highlands for eighteen years, has gone to 2400 16th street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
APR 6-1927

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert Of Season Tonight — Dr. J. Fred Wolle, Conductor Of Bach Choir At Bethlehem, To Give Recital.

THE closing concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place tonight at the Lyric under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of this fine organization, has gone outside of the beaten track and put two symphonies on the program, one of them Beethoven's First in C major, opus 21, and the other Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor, opus 36.

The only other number to be given is the Suite in F major by Roussel, a French composer, who has been heard of in this country very little, but who has to his credit quite a list of works. The Beethoven and the Tschaikowsky numbers are familiar to concert-goers, while the Roussel opus does not appear to have been given here before, offering the element of novelty to whatever other attractions it may possess. Roussel is said to spring into full being in his Divertissement, for piano and wood-wind instruments, composed in 1906, which is said to foreshadow Stravinsky's “Sacre du Printemps,” the work being called marvelous. He employs a contrapuntal technique of very original style, and is declared to have worked for some years unrestricted by any scruple for tonal construction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
APR 6-1927

Glad There Is To Be Something New In The Way Of A Musical Program.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: I note with satisfaction the following comment about the forthcoming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: “In order not to present numbers that have been given by other orchestral organizations here during the season, Mr. Koussevitzky had sent to him a complete list of works played by the other orchestras.”

A splendid idea! We have been served with the same pieces of music on so many occasions this season that one would incline to the belief that the orchestra leaders studied the list of works already played for the express purpose of repeating them. But now we see that one leader, at least, has at last a bright idea.

I still have a distinct recollection of the unsatisfactory way the Boston orchestra played some of the music at its last concert. I hope Mr. Koussevitzky will also give some attention to this phase of his duties. R. REIMANN.

Baltimore, April 3, 1927.

sumed the form of a study in contrasts, with the First Beethoven Symphony as one end of the line and a Suite by Roussel, a modern French composer, as the other.

The Beethoven work was presented with greatly reduced orchestra, as befitted the limited instrumental resources of the time when the work was written. Of the ten double-basses carried by the organization, only five appeared in the number, with all but four of the brass omitted, and with a number of the violins, violas and cellos also absent; [illegible] at the ensemble had a greatly reduced volume, according with the placid serene and quietly emotional character of the music, which shows Beethoven still very much under the influence of Haydn and Mozart, though many characteristic touches appear here and there.

The interpretation of the symphony held to the character of the opus, with fine shadings, delicate nuances and daintily molded phrases. With the impression of the later Beethoven strong upon the audience, this work appeared rather lacking in color, despite the occasional bursts of power and the abruptnesses which foreshadow the later Beethoven when he came fully into his own. The performance, however, carefully and minutely reflected the atmosphere of the opus and revealed a phase of the composer's development of the highest historical interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 6-1927

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led that organization in a varied program that built up to an exceptionally inspiring finale in the second and last concert to be given here this season by this orchestra yesterday afternoon at Poli's Theater. A large and unusually distinguished audience, led by Mrs. Coolidge and her party in the presidential box, and including in its midst Speaker Nicholas Longworth, who is almost as noted for his patronage and personal musical interests as for his political activities, and many leading musicians of the Capital gathered in spite of the continued depressing weather to hear this concert.

Beethoven was again given the place of honor, his first symphony being the opening number. It is a lovely work and was well played. The minuet was especially charming with its touch of Mozartian color and finesse, while the finale was most impressive.

Second came an American's work not previously heard in Washington, if memory serves correctly. The work was Edward Burlingame Hill's “Lilacs,” called a poem for orchestra “after Amy Lowell.” It rather suggested the modern French school in its pretty pictorialness and slightly sophisticated dissonances. The fragrance and quality of the flowers suggested in the title are pleasingly set forth and a nice convincing storm is worked up during the course of events, but there does not seem to be anything very vital in this music. It paled into complete insignificance before the vigor and richness of Wagner's “Ride of the Valkyries,” which was excellently presented, the brasses never swamping the strings and each phrase set forth with clean-cut, authentic delineation. The orchestra as well as Mr. Koussevitzky well deserved the ovation that brought them to their feet in acknowledgment at its conclusion.

However, it was left to Mr. Koussevitzky's great countryman, Tschaikowsky, to offer the pinnacle of the afternoon's inspiration when his great “Fifth Symphony in E Minor,” opus 64, was played in a manner in which it has rarely been heard in Washington. The poignancy and intangible genius that develop in the second movement and swell into the glory of the finale never were more authentically set forth. The first movement, the andante, was skillfully brought to the logical color level of the second movement and, again, the waltz movement, the third, led inevitably into the exact mood for the resolution in the finale. The strings were in perfect accord and the whole symphony left a wonderful memory to carry over until next season. Again and again Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra had to bow their recognition of the applause that rained enthusiastically from the audience. H. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
APR 6-1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting, gave its last concert for this season at Poli's yesterday afternoon to a well filled house. Beethoven's First Symphony, the opening number, was payed delicately and intelligently. Debussy once said he hoped Beethoven heard the parts he left out between the parts he wrote, for the First Symphony is scored for only 12 wind instruments beside the kettledrums and strings, so that it sounds very light, especially when compared with Wagner and Tschaikowsky numbers on the same program.

Burlingame Hill's orchestral poem inspired by Amy Lowell's “Lilacs” is very charming, sufficiently impressionistic to be called modern, too melodic to be experimental, colorful and expressive with one haunting little theme that flits restlessly throughout the “lilacs” themselves.

Wagner's “Ride of the Valkyries” was not as tumultuous as we expect those vigorous ladies to be. It was more like the way French orchestras play Wagner.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was beautifully played, the Andante with its alluring rhythm. The lovely Andante Cantabile with its song of passionate resignation, the graceful fluttering Valse movement, and the last martial Andante Maesto, at first reminiscent of Wagner's “Pilgrims' Chorus” and working up to a fine climax in old Russian hymn.

Koussevitzky was recalled many [illegible] and generously shared his [illegible] with his men. The concert [illegible]en under the management [illegible] Wilson-Greene.—FLOR [illegible]DE.

[illegible]ate priced apartments in desir-

134

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
APR 8 - 1927

135

Music

By Olga Samaroff

New York Symphony in Wagner Concert—Boston Orchestra Ends Evening Series

WALTER DAMROSCH, apparently quite recovered from his recent illness, repeated yesterday afternoon the Wagner program which he conducted under such difficult circumstances last week.

Olga Samaroff

The duet between Brunnhilde and Siegfried and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from the first act occupied the first part of the program. In the second Mr. Damrosch gave a concert version of the entire third act. The performance was much smoother than that of Friday and Mr. Damrosch once more showed not only his understanding but that the fire lighted by the spark of enthusiasm in his youth still burns within him.

He gave unsparingly of himself and kindled his musicians and soloists to a high degree of glowing warmth. Mme. Anstral sang the Brunnhilde music with ardor and great vocal opulence. Mr. Laubenthal, who was in exceptionally good voice, sang Siegfried's portion of the concert with ease and mastery born of a complete grasp as well as deep feeling. Frederic Baer and Frederick Patterson gave a good account of themselves as Gunther and Hagen respectively. Gitla Erstinn, Claribel Banks and Viola Silva undertook the music of the Rhine maidens.

At the conclusion of the concert there were many recalls for all the performers, and cries of "Damrosch" from all parts of the house which summoned the well-loved leader to accept a demonstration for himself alone.

IN THE evening Serge Koussewitzky took leave of the Thursday audience of the Boston Symphony orchestra for this season.

His well balanced program consisted of Beethoven's First Symphony, Roussel's Suite in F major—performed for the first time in New York and dedicated to Koussewitzky—and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

Roussel's Suite seemed to me to have more vitality than most of his works so far as I know them. Incidentally it may be remarked that during the next decade we may reasonably expect a perfect riot of imaginative titles for musical compositions. The anti-emotionalism and back-to-something-before-Beethoven movements have resulted in such an accumulation of concerto grossi and suites using the old nomenclature, that the pendulum of fashion seems bound to swing back.

The prelude, Sarabaude and Gigue played last night, proved that the new wine poured into these overworked containers of ancient mold had an individual flarer of considerable pungency. Mr. Koussewitzky acted as musical godfather with a conviction which communicated itself to the listener. Once rebellious ears have now become so accustomed to a certain degree of so-called modernism that Roussell's Suite apparently caused no concern, and, indeed, met with a warm reception.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening was aroused by Mr. Kousseritzky's magnetic and brilliant conducting of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. In my opinion, Mr. Koussevitzky has done nothing finer in New York. The performance glowed and throbbed with a legitimate emotionalism which, without any of the morbid exaggeration often indulged in by mediocre Tschaikowsky interpreters, fully revealed the inherent beauty of the work. This music is still intensely alive and Tschaikowsky looms larger as he is discovered and rediscovered by artists and critics who fell into the fashion or habit of belittling him.

The public in America has never swerved from faith in him and in my opinion this is a good instance of a rght instance. Tschaikowsky has his own place in the musical heavens—not among geniuses of greatest magnitude, but among those creative spirits who have sent a direct message to human hearts through an art form possessing both beauty and strong individuality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 8 - 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Symphony No. 1 in C.....Beethoven
Suite .....Roussel
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor..Tschaikowsky
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

The Boston Bans

The Boston Symphony played the first of its final pair of concerts of its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. The symphonies were Beethoven's First and Tchaikowsky's Fourth. The novelty was Albert Roussel's new Suite in F major, op. 33.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a veritable conjurer in the matter of shaking brand new compositions out of his sleeve. In return for his solicitude, the newer composers listen to his suggestions and dedicate their works to him. Last night's novelty, dedicated to the Boston leader, is still in manuscript.

In his newest suite Mr. Roussel courts the classical form both in the names of the three movements and the contents thereof. But lest the resemblance to his classical models might appear too slavish, there is a liberal sprinkling of the harmonic acid which is held by some to be the very essence of our present complicated state of heart and mind. The first movement, called prelude, is a vigorous design in which broad Bachlike phrases strut about very much as they do in the old suites and concertos. Yet while listening one calls to mind the picture of a little boy striding around in his father's shoes, simulating the walk of manhood and making an impressive clatter.

In the sarabande Mr. Roussel affects intellectualized emotion and in the gigue the coarse gayety to which men like Bach at times resorted after a prolonged stay on emotional heights. The suite is, of course, orchestrated expertly, but there is about it a non-Gallic opacity and bold stridency not quite natural for a Frenchman. It leaves one hoping that Mr. Roussel will in his next work discard his alien garments and go back to his national costume.

Mr. Koussevitzky has by now demonstrated that Beethoven is not his forte. In the "First" symphony the Russian conductor played around with a variety of curious tempi hardly beneficial to the straightforward simplicity of that youthful composition. Mr. Koussevitzky even sought to improve on the Master by taking the Trio of the Memietto half as fast as the rest of the movement, though neither by word nor sign did Beethoven indicate any change in tempo. The Tschaikowsky "Fourth," however, made ample amends for the Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitzky has penetrated to the heart of that brilliantly pessimistic document and made it his own. It exercised, as it always does, a powerful effect on last night's audience, which liberally acclaimed the visiting band and its Russian leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 8-1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

WE HAVE never known Mr. Koussewitsky to show himself so inexpert a program-maker as on the occasion of the Boston Symphony's last Thursday evening concert in New York. He joined in soporific union the First Symphony of Beethoven, a suite by Roussel and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Roussel music—a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue—was new and uninteresting. Orchestrally, the performances of Beethoven and Tschaikowsky were admirable, but the First Symphony is insipid music, and Tschaikowsky is very nearly at his worst in the Fourth.

• • •

DEBUSSY'S "Pelleas

7

REALM OF MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

SWIFTLY the symphonic season leaps to its close. The Philharmonic Orchestra has already said farewell. The New York Symphony Orchestra bids us adieu on Sunday. The tunable Philadelphians will make their exit next Tuesday night. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra is here for its final pair of concerts—one of which was given yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, while the other will be presented to-morrow afternoon.

For the fifth of his series of Thursday night concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky chose Beethoven's First Symphony, in A Major already heard here under the magic baton of Arturo Toscanini; a Suite in F Major by Albert Roussel, which was dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky and which was played from manuscript for the first time in this city, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F Minor. It was a program calculated to display the Boston leader's particular gifts. He is at home with the early Beethoven, if not the later one, and he is a congenial interpreter of modern and Russian music.

Severing his orchestra in twain for Beethoven's symphony, he gave to the music a reading dainty and elastic, poetic and affectionate. No doubt the wand of Toscanini is not in his power. Yet the performance — particularly of the last movement, with its rhythmic vivacity—was so ingratiating as to win a salute for both leader and players. But why the First Symphony? If a representation of the young Beethoven was required, why not the lovable Second, which strangely escaped performance throughout the late and unlamented Beethoven epidemic?

Like Rimsky-Korsakoff, M. Roussel began his career in the navy and resigned to devote himself to composition. His new suite, composed in 1926, consists of a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue. The very names of the movements indicate the pre-sonata well of his inspiration, as well as the tendency among living composers to flee from the blinding visage of Richard Wagner to the arms of Sebastian Bach.

The Prelude begins with some measures of orthodox counterpoint in the style of Bach, but then the composer recalls that after all he is a man of the twentieth century. So he injects abruptly a passage for muted trumpets, and thereafter the work is a hybird of obsolete dance rhythms and up-to-date dissonance. However, the discords and instrumental strokes are of the politest gentility, without a single accent to outrage a prudish ear. M. Roussel apparently had nothing of moment to utter, but he said it with grace, neatness and vivacity. His music won a friendly reception.

Tschaikowsky had a deal to say in his Fourth Symphony. He has told us that it is a discourse on Fate. The savage alarum of horns and bassoons in the Introduction is the voice of destiny—"that inexorable force which checks our aspirations toward happiness ere they reach the goal, which watches jealously lest our peace and bliss should be complete; the force, invincible and inescapable, which hangs perpetually over our heads and forever embitters the soul." This lament finds expression in the chromatic woe of the violin theme beginning the exposition.

From the despair of reality, a haven is sought in joyous dreams. The clarinet summons up a fair and tender vision, and how delectable a presence shines in the song of the violins! But the revery is only a subterfuge; it is not long until the barbarous shout of Fate once more thunders at our hearts.

The second movement, Tschaikowsky has explained, depicts another phase of suffering — "the melancholy which steals over us when of an evening we sit indoors alone, weary of work, while the book we have picked up for relaxation slips unheeded from our fingers." The third movement is one of "capricious arabesques and intangible forms" which "have no connection with actuality and are simply wild, strange and bizarre."

A final essay of escape is made in the fourth movement, in which the doomed spirit seeks to lose itself in the mad rout of merrymaking peasants, blind and unreflective. This, too, is in vain, for at the end there fulminates again the insensate motive of Fate.

In the utterance of this homily, Mr. Koussevitzky won the topmost triumph of his New York season. All of its moods were eloquently at his command —desperate cries, dreaming, dulcet ennui and orgiastic revel. The performance created two distinct furores, one after the first movement and another at the end. The orchestra was in its most harmonious vein.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 9 - 1927

WOMAN SUES BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston, April 8—Valia Valentinova of Boston seeks to recover $5000 in each of two suits, one against the Boston Symphony orchestra and the other against its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, claiming that she entered into a contract with them on June 19, 1925, to sing an opera during the latter part of 1925-1926 in Boston, and to give concerts during the 1926-1927 season.

She has always been ready and willing to carry out her part of the agreement, she says, but the defendants have refused to do their part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING WORLD
APR 8 - 1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
APR 9 - 1927

Is New Bedford a musical city? A thousand dollars was lost by the little group known as the New Bedford Musical Association when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was last brought here. Upon that occasion, it is remembered that there were vacant seats in the excellent and least expensive section of a commodious and recently constructed theater. No more comment is necessary.

Mr. Russell had a piano in the Me

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
4/8/27

PITTS SANBORN'S REVIEW

Koussevitzky Is Back

Boston Conductor Leads Beethoven, Roussel and Tschaikowsky.

Two symphonies were on the program of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Beethoven's first opened proceedings; Tschaikowsky's fourth closed them. The only other number offered was a suite in F major by Albert Roussel, performed for the first time in New York.

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's Russian conductor, is specializing during his present visit to our tight little island in the music of his deceased compatriot, Tschaikowsky. Besides leading the fourth symphony last night he has the fifth on his Carnegie Hall program for tomorrow afternoon. And there can be no question that Mr. Koussevitzky's Tschaikowsky is a rousing affair.

Some folk will doubtless blame him for certain extravagances in his treatment of the fourth. Nevertheless, few would undertake to deny that his reading of the familiar music was magnificently effective. The serried ranks of his brasses fairly shattered the zenith in the proclamations of the motto theme, and the final "Allegro con fuoco" started off with a crash of cymbals and drums that all but brought the audience up standing. And yet the pages of intimate feeling were in their turn suffused with the appropriate tenderness and pathos. The performance—one of conspicuous technical expertness — aroused tremendous enthusiasm.

A New, Old Suite.

Beethoven's early symphony Mr. Koussevitzky treated with due appreciation of its Eighteenth Century characteristics. The Roussel piece is an antique of another stripe. Composed in the year of grace 1926 for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, this suite employs forms of a day far older than Beethoven's—the prelude, sarabande and gigue of Bach and his contemporaries. The result of this modernized archaism as performed last evening was aptly described by a present wit as Bach orchestrated by Stravinsky and played by Johann Strauss' orchestra.

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New Yorkers a poem for orchestra, entitled "Lilacs" (inspired by verses of the late Amy Lowell), by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Cambridge, Mass. The other numbers promised, in addition to the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, are Bach's fourth "Brandenburg" concerto, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, and Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231."

Russian meets Russian in a rousing performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
APR 9 - 1927

Valia Valentinova of Boston seeks to recover $5000 in each of two suits, one against the Boston Symphony orchestra and the other against its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, claiming that she entered into a contract with them on June 19, 1925, to sing an opera during the latter part of 1925 26, in Boston and to give concerts during the 1926-1927 season. She has always been ready and willing to carry out her part of the agreement, she says, but the defendants have refused to do their part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURN.
APR 8 - 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS SOME NEW MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky brought some new music with him for the final Thursday concert of his Boston Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall. This was a suite in F by the Frenchman, Albert Roussel, who has turned himself inside out to become a modernist in the past few years. Otherwise the programme consisted of Beethoven's First Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Fourth, strange companions for the same evening.

The suite of Roussel, which is still in manuscript, is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky and was written especially for performance by the Boston Orchestra. In the grandiloquent phrase of the opera, the "world premiere" of the piece took place the other day in Boston. Last night's was of course the first time it had been done here.

Roussel is, in a way, one of the curiosities of contemporary French music. He is fifty-eight years old and had achieved a mature style, so far as it could be called a style, when he suddenly saw the light of modernistics in music and completely changed his attitude and manner of writing.

Previously, he had been doing things that showed the strong influence of Vincent d'Indy (who had been his teacher) and, whilst esthetically somewhat abstruse, they were quite evidently the work of a man who could qualify as professor of counterpoint in d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. Probably the best of his older work is the charming "Le festin d'araignee."

But it is a long jump from this ballet of "The Spider's Feast" to "Pour une fete de printemps" and the G minor symphony (which last has never been played in New York), whilst the suite performed last night displays an even newer phase. In all his modernism, however, Roussel is vastly more the imitator than the originator. Stravinsky, Casella and some of the others of the modernist leaders are now all for objectivity in music and they seek it in the unexpressionist forms of the eighteenth century. So, now, does Roussel.

The suite in F consists of a prelude, sarabande and gigue. The old forms are little violated, but as in the latest music of Stravinsky and Casella, the modernist touch is in the harmony and instrumentation. It is scarcely to be said that Roussel has done anything new or arresting in the suite, but merely followed in the footsteps of his betters.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a rather patronizing performance of the First Symphony of Beethoven, emphasizing its naiveties and not recognizing that the claws of the lion are already revealed in this early work.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
APR 8 - 1927

Music

By Olga Samaroff

New York Symphony in Wagner Concert—Boston Orchestra Ends Evening Series

WALTER DAMROSCH, apparently quite recovered from his recent illness, repeated yesterday afternoon the Wagner program which he conducted under such difficult circumstances last week.

Olga Samaroff

The duet between Brunnhilde and Siegfried and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from the first act occupied the first part of the program. In the second Mr. Damrosch gave a concert version of the entire third act. The performance was much smoother than that of Friday and Mr. Damrosch once more showed not only his understanding but that the fire lighted by the spark of enthusiasm in his youth still burns within him.

He gave unsparingly of himself and kindled his musicians and soloists to a high degree of glowing warmth. Mme. Anstral sang the Brunnhilde music with ardor and great vocal opulence. Mr. Laubenthal, who was in exceptionally good voice, sang Siegfried's portion of the concert with ease and mastery born of a complete grasp as well as deep feeling. Frederic Baer and Frederick Patterson gave a good account of themselves as Gunther and Hagen respectively. Gitla Erstinn, Claribel Banks and Viola Silva undertook the music of the Rhine maidens.

At the conclusion of the concert there were many recalls for all the performers, and cries of "Damrosch" from all parts of the house which summoned the well-loved leader to accept a demonstration for himself alone.

IN THE evening Serge Koussewitzky took leave of the Thursday audience of the Boston Symphony orchestra for this season.

His well balanced program consisted of Beethoven's First Symphony, Roussel's Suite in F major—performed for the first time in New York and dedicated to Koussewitzky—and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

Roussel's Suite seemed to me to have more vitality than most of his works so far as I know them. Incidentally it may be remarked that during the next decade we may reasonably expect a perfect riot of imaginative titles for musical compositions. The anti-emotionalism and back-to-something-before-Beethoven movements have resulted in such an accumulation of concerto grossi and suites using the old nomenclature, that the pendulum of fashion seems bound to swing back.

The prelude, Sarabaude and Gigue played last night, proved that the new wine poured into these overworked containers of ancient mold had an individual flarer of considerable pungency. Mr. Koussewitzky acted as musical godfather with a conviction which communicated itself to the listener. Once rebellious ears have now become so accustomed to a certain degree of so-called modernism that Roussell's Suite apparently caused no concern, and, indeed, met with a warm reception.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening was aroused by Mr. Kousseritzky's magnetic and brilliant conducting of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. In my opinion, Mr. Koussevitzky has done nothing finer in New York. The performance glowed and throbbed with a legitimate emotionalism which, without any of the morbid exaggeration often indulged in by mediocre Tschaikowsky interpreters, fully revealed the inherent beauty of the work. This music is still intensely alive and Tschaikowsky looms larger as he is discovered and rediscovered by artists and critics who fell into the fashion or habit of belittling him.

The public in America has never swerved from faith in him and in my opinion this is a good instance of a rght instance. Tschaikowsky has his own place in the musical heavens—not among geniuses of greatest magnitude, but among those creative spirits who have sent a direct message to human hearts through an art form possessing both beauty and strong individuality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 8 - 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Symphony No. 1 in C.....Beethoven
Suite .....Roussel
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor.....Tschaikowsky
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

The Bosto nians

The Boston Symphony played the first of its final pair of concerts of its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. The symphonies were Beethoven's First and Tchaikowsky's Fourth. The novelty was Albert Roussel's new Suite in F major, op. 33.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a veritable conjurer in the matter of shaking brand new compositions out of his sleeve. In return for his solicitude, the newer composers listen to his suggestions and dedicate their works to him. Last night's novelty, dedicated to the Boston leader, is still in manuscript.

In his newest suite Mr. Roussel courts the classical form both in the names of the three movements and the contents thereof. But lest the resemblance to his classical models might appear too slavish, there is a liberal sprinkling of the harmonic acid which is held by some to be the very essence of our present complicated state of heart and mind. The first movement, called prelude, is a vigorous design in which broad Bachlike phrases strut about very much as they do in the old suites and concertos. Yet while listening one calls to mind the picture of a little boy striding around in his father's shoes, simulating the walk of manhood and making an impressive clatter.

In the sarabande Mr. Roussel affects intellectualized emotion and in the gigue the coarse gayety to which men like Bach at times resorted after a prolonged stay on emotional heights. The suite is, of course, orchestrated expertly, but there is about it a non-Gallic opacity and bold stridency not quite natural for a Frenchman. It leaves one hoping that Mr. Roussel will in his next work discard his alien garments and go back to his national costume.

Mr. Koussevitzky has by now demonstrated that Beethoven is not his forte. In the "First" symphony the Russian conductor played around with a variety of curious tempi hardly beneficial to the straightforward simplicity of that youthful composition. Mr. Koussevitzky even sought to improve on the Master by taking the Trio of the Memietto half as fast as the rest of the movement, though neither by word nor sign did Beethoven indicate any change in tempo. The Tschaikowsky "Fourth," however, made ample amends for the Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitzky has penetrated to the heart of that brilliantly pessimistic document and made it his own. It exercised, as it always does, a powerful effect on last night's audience, which liberally acclaimed the visiting band and its Russian leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 8-1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

WE HAVE never known Mr. Koussewitsky to show himself so inexpert a program-maker as on the occasion of the Boston Symphony's last Thursday evening concert in New York. He joined in soporific union the First Symphony of Beethoven, a suite by Roussel and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony The Roussel music—a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue—was new and uninteresting. Orchestrally, the performances of Beethoven and Tschaikowsky were admirable, but the First Symphony is insipid music, and Tschaikowsky is very nearly at his worst in the Fourth.

* * *

DEBUSSY'S "Pelleas

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
APR 8 - 1927

REALM OF MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

SWIFTLY the symphonic season leaps to its close. The Philharmonic Orchestra has already said farewell. The New York Symphony Orchestra bids us adieu on Sunday. The tunable Philadelphians will make their exit next Tuesday night. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra is here for its final pair of concerts—one of which was given yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall, while the other will be presented to-morrow afternoon.

For the fifth of his series of Thursday night concerts, Mr. Koussewitzky chose Beethoven's First Symphony, in A Major already heard here under the magic baton of Arturo Toscanini; a Suite in F Major by Albert Roussel, which was dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky and which was played from manuscript for the first time in this city, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F Minor. It was a program calculated to display the Boston leader's particular gifts. He is at home with the early Beethoven, if not the later one, and he is a congenial interpreter of modern and Russian music.

Severing his orchestra in twain for Beethoven's symphony, he gave to the music a reading dainty and elastic, poetic and affectionate. No doubt the wand of Toscanini is not in his power. Yet the performance — particularly of the last movement, with its rhythmic vivacity—was so ingratiating as to win a salute for both leader and players. But why the First Symphony? If a representation of the young Beethoven was required, why not the lovable Second, which strangely escaped performance throughout the late and unlamented Beethoven epidemic?

Like Rimsky-Korsakoff, M. Roussel began his career in the navy and resigned to devote himself to composition. His new suite, composed in 1926, consists of a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue. The very names of the movements indicate the pre-sonata well of his inspiration, as well as the tendency among living composers to flee from the blinding visage of Richard Wagner to the arms of Sebastian Bach.

The Prelude begins with some measures of orthodox counterpoint in the style of Bach, but then the composer recalls that after all he is a man of the twentieth century. So he injects abruptly a passage for muted trumpets, and thereafter the work is a hybird of obsolete dance rhythms and up-to-date dissonance. However, the discords and instrumental strokes are of the politest gentility, without a single accent to outrage a prudish ear. M. Roussel apparently had nothing of moment to utter, but he said it with grace, neatness and vivacity. His music won a friendly reception.

Tschaikowsky had a deal to say in his Fourth Symphony. He has told us that it is a discourse on Fate. The savage alarum of horns and bassoons in the Introduction is the voice of destiny—"that inexorable force which checks our aspirations toward happiness ere they reach the goal, which watches jealously lest our peace and bliss should be complete; the force, invincible and inescapable, which hangs perpetually over our heads and forever embitters the soul." This lament finds expression in the chromatic woe of the violin theme beginning the exposition.

From the despair of reality, a haven is sought in joyous dreams. The clarinet summons up a fair and tender vision, and how delectable a presence shines in the song of the violins! But the revery is only a subterfuge; it is not long until the barbarous shout of Fate once more thunders at our hearts.

The second movement, Tschaikowsky has explained, depicts another phase of suffering — "the melancholy which steals over us when of an evening we sit indoors alone, weary of work, while the book we have picked up for relaxation slips unheeded from our fingers." The third movement is one of "capricious arabesques and intangible forms" which "have no connection with actuality and are simply wild, strange and bizarre."

A final essay of escape is made in the fourth movement, in which the doomed spirit seeks to lose itself in the mad rout of merrymaking peasants, blind and unreflective. This, too, is in vain, for at the end there fulminates again the insensate motive of Fate.

In the utterance of this homily, Mr. Koussevitzky won the topmost triumph of his New York season. All of its moods were eloquently at his command —desperate grief [illegible] dreaming, dulcet ennui and orgiastic revel. The performance created two distinct furores, one after the first movement and another at the end. The orchestra was in its most harmonious vein.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 9 - 1927

WOMAN SUES BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston, April 8—Valia Valentinova of Boston seeks to recover $5000 in each of two suits, one against the Boston Symphony orchestra and the other against its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, claiming that she entered into a contract with them on June 19, 1925, to sing an opera during the latter part of 1925-1926 in Boston, and to give concerts during the 1926-1927 season.

She has always been ready and willing to carry out her part of the agreement, she says, but the defendants have refused to do their part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERCURY
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
APR 9 - 1927

Is New Bedford a musical city? A thousand dollars was lost by the little group known as the New Bedford Musical Association when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was last brought here. Upon that occasion, it is remembered that there were vacant seats in the excellent and least expensive section of a commodious and recently constructed theater. No more comment is necessary.

Mr. Russell had a piano in the Me

THIS CLIPPING FROM Boston Transcript
4/7/27

PITTS SANBORN'S REVIEW

Koussevitzky Is Back

Boston Conductor Leads Beethoven, Roussel and Tschaikowsky.

Two symphonies were on the program of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Beethoven's first opened proceedings; Tschaikowsky's fourth closed them. The only other number offered was a suite in F major by Albert Roussel, performed for the first time in New York.

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's Russian conductor, is specializing during his present visit to our tight little island in the music of his deceased compatriot, Tschaikowsky. Besides leading the fourth symphony last night he has the fifth on his Carnegie Hall program for tomorrow afternoon. And there can be no question that Mr. Koussevitzky's Tschaikowsky is a rousing affair.

Some folk will doubtless blame him for certain extravagances in his treatment of the fourth. Nevertheless, few would undertake to deny that his reading of the familiar music was magnificently effective. The serried ranks of his brasses fairly shattered the zenith in the proclamations of the motto theme, and the final "Allegro con fuoco" started off with a crash of cymbals and drums that all but brought the audience up standing. And yet the pages of intimate feeling were in their turn suffused with the appropriate tenderness and pathos. The performance—one of conspicuous technical expertness — aroused tremendous enthusiasm.

A New, Old Suite.

Beethoven's early symphony Mr. Koussevitzky treated with due appreciation of its Eighteenth Century characteristics. The Roussel piece is an antique of another stripe. Composed in the year of grace 1926 for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, this suite employs forms of a day far older than Beethoven's—the prelude, sarabande and gigue of Bach and his contemporaries. The result of this modernized archaism as performed last evening was aptly described by a present wit as Bach orchestrated by Stravinsky and played by Johann Strauss' orchestra.

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New Yorkers a poem for orchestra, entitled "Lilacs" (inspired by verses of the late Amy Lowell), by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Cambridge, Mass. The other numbers promised, in addition to the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, are Bach's fourth "Brandenburg" concerto, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, and Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231."

Russian meets Russian in a rousing performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
APR 9 - 1927

Valia Valentinova of Boston seeks to recover $5000 in each of two suits, one against the Boston Symphony orchestra and the other against its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, claiming that she entered into a contract with them on June 19, 1925, to sing an opera during the latter part of 1925 26, in Boston and to give concerts during the 1926-1927 season. She has always been ready and willing to carry out her part of the agreement, she says, but the defendants have refused to do their part.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURN
APR 8 - 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS SOME NEW MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky brought some new music with him for the final Thursday concert of his Boston Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall. This was a suite in F by the Frenchman, Albert Roussel, who has turned himself inside out to become a modernist in the past few years. Otherwise the programme consisted of Beethoven's First Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Fourth, strange companions for the same evening.

The suite of Roussel, which is still in manuscript, is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky and was written especially for performance by the Boston Orchestra. In the grandiloquent phrase of the opera, the "world premiere" of the piece took place the other day in Boston. Last night's was of course the first time it had been done here.

Roussel is, in a way, one of the curiosities of contemporary French music. He is fifty-eight years old and had achieved a mature style, so far as it could be called a style, when he suddenly saw the light of modernistics in music and completely changed his attitude and manner of writing.

Previously, he had been doing things that showed the strong influence of Vincent d'Indy (who had been his teacher) and, whilst esthetically somewhat abstruse, they were quite evidently the work of a man who could qualify as professor of counterpoint in d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. Probably the best of his older work is the charming "Le festin d'araignee."

But it is a long jump from this ballet of "The Spider's Feast" to "Pour une fete de printemps" and the G minor symphony (which last has never been played in New York) whilst the suite performed last night displays an even newer phase. In all his modernism, however, Roussel is vastly more the imitator than the originator. Stravinsky, Casella and some of the others of the modernist leaders are now all for objectivity in music and they seek it in the unexpressionist forms of the eighteenth century. So, now, does Roussel.

The suite in F consists of a prelude, sarabande and gigue. The old forms are little violated, but as in the latest music of Stravinsky and Casella, the modernist touch is in the harmony and instrumentation. It is scarcely to be said that Roussel has done anything new or arresting in the suite, but merely followed in the footsteps of his betters.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a rather patronizing performance of the First Symphony of Beethoven, emphasizing its naiveties and not recognizing that the claws of the lion are already revealed in this early work.

NY Times
Apr 9

THE NI

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the most remarkable performances that Mr. Koussevitsky has given this season in New York was that of the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which ended the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. To those who can by no manner of means admit Tchaikovsky tothe circle of the immortals, and to the many who have heard excellent performances of this same symphony—they are given in many places—this will not seem a matter of particular moment. The performance, however, was one that will be remembered by those who heard it, and the memory will be an inspiration. We know, after such an interpretation, the true greatness of Tchaikovsky as a composer. Great he was, not withstanding banalities and naïve artistic indiscretions. For Tschaikowsky was a man of genius, greatly gifted, intensely human, reckless in self-relation.

The listener feels that he knew this man and that the man knew him. He is stirred by the simplicity and humanity of the music. He says to himself, "I, too, was there." Some of the musical ideas are vulgar, undignified, but how rich is the feeling, and what a wealth of musical material! Tschaikovsky has his native vein of sensuous melody and of Russian rhythms and folk-idioms to aid him. He already shows his genius for extremely effective instrumentation.

He has an excellent sense of proportion, even though his ideas are not of the classic mold and esthetically far from its standards. For all that, for all its palpable defects of style, this is a great work, one that has lived already half a century, while critics and musical pundits have been telling the world that Tchaikovsky had no business to pretend to write symphonies.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the symphony with the most admirable balance of intense feeling and carefully adjusted proportion; with elasticity of pace and on occasion with headlong passion, yet with clarity and precision of detail. He conducted as if he were composing the symphony, as though, with the composer, he had rejoiced, wept, cried aloud and shaken his fist at the skies. At the same time temperament never ran away with thinking, and the conductor often found ways, without expense to sincerity or spontaneity, of giving distinction to passages which customarily are commonplace. It is seldom indeed that Tchaikovsky is given such a performance, as it is exceptional when an audience delays the performance of a symphony for minutes by its applause between the movements. After the first part Mr. Koussevitsky could only bow and bow again until enthusiasm had spent itself in a measure and he could continue.

The other items of the program were Beethoven's First Symphony, performed by an orchestra duly diminished in size for its Haydnesque character, and a suite in F major, new in this city, by Albert Roussel. This suite is in three movements, a prelude, sarabande and gigue. The exterior forms of the old dances are observed; the content of the music is modern. It would not need Mr. Hale's invaluable notes in the program book to inform the hearer that Roussel had come strongly under the influence of Vincent d'Indy, whose pupil he was. The influence of d'Indy is paramount, though well assimilated in the opening prelude. In the last movement there are clear reminders of the finale of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." But the prelude is vigorous and witty music. If the idiom is that of d'Indy the spirit is French, Burgundian, Chabrierian! There is gusto and the kick of good wine in it, and that fine clarity and astringency in the modernly conceived harmony which stem directly from the master of the Paris School Cantorum.

At a first hearing the second and third movements were less convincing than the first—more perfunctory, despite ingenious figurations, and more diluted. The work served well to display the virtuosity of the splendid orchestra and the musical discipline which Mr. Koussevitsky has so effectively established. Beethoven's symphony was played with appreciation of its true proportions and with good tonal adjustments, although it was the exterior rather than the interior of this felicitous early composition of the master that the performance caught.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
Standard Union
APR 9 -

Music

Boston Orchestra Concludes Season of Brooklyn Concerts.

An eleventh-hour change of programme replaced Beethoven's First symphony with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the season's final in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music. Other numbers were the Glazounov violin concerto and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony. Serge Koussevitzky conducted and Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, was soloist.

It would not be a just evaluation to place the Glazounov concerto for violin among the few great works of this nature which have earned for themselves a definate niche in the repertoire of solo violinists. Glazounoy's concerto is a showy, ostentatious affair for the solo instrument, abounding in much embroidered figurations, double-stopping, single and double harmonics and nearly everything in the line of violin technique. But what of the music? What is its message and what does it stand for after all is said?

The opening section, with its spots of Russian folk-song episode, has touches of anticipation in content and development, but, alas, it too soon peters out into empty display and trivialness. The final allegro is about as empty a movement for a work of symphonic dimensions and serious intent, that the present writer knows of. Of course, there are not more than a bare half-dozen violin concertos that are to be considered as first grade works—and the Glazounov is not one of them.

Mr. Burgin mastered the almost insurmountable technical difficulties with ease and elan. He brought out of the music all that was humanly possible. Mr. Burgin's tone, although not one of special distinctive proportion or timbre, is satisfying and "gets over." His expression was scholarly, volatile and withal freely romantic.

In a letter to Mme. Von Meck, Tschaikowsky criticised his own symphony (No. 5). "I have come to the conclusion that it is a failure," he writes. "There is something repellent, something superfluous, patchy, and insincere, which the public instinctively recognizes." That was in 1888, shortly after the symphony's premiere. Time has reversed Tschaikowsky's estimate, and to-day the Fifth is very popular. But, under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton last evening, in which disjointed tempi held sway, the symphony seemed to have those identical faults pointed out by the composer in his letter to his benefactress and best friend. The slow movement was slackened to tempo much slower that the traffic of its melodic import could bear, and the finale was whipped up to a pace that accentuated its blatancy. It was a peculiarly overemphasized interpretation.

The audience was large and discreetly applausive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
APR - 9 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Burgin Is Soloist at Final Concert in Academy of Music.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND.

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the final concert in the series of five given annually in this borough. A last minute change of program resulted in Beethoven's Fifth being replaced by Tschaikovsky's symphony of the same number. Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi concerto in D Minor and Glazounoff's violin concerto made up the program.

After a beginning that was as hollow as the numbers selected Mr. Koussevitsky and his men gave us as fine a reading of the Tschaikovsky as it has been your reviewer's experience to hear in many a day. The second movement, that andante cantabile which is strongly reminiscent of Beethoven at his best was offered in broad, stately manner with the conductor and his men as one and with nuancing and orchestral color worthy of a Toscanini at his best.

In the Glazounoff, Richard Burgin, who is the concertmeister of the orchestra, had an opportunity to display some brilliant technique. And he made the most of every opportunity. At times his tone became almost 'cello-like as it throbbed with passion. The double-stops were slightly uneven but this was forgotten of him as one harkened to the player's tone of immeasurable beauty supported by technique that fairly bristled. He was warmly received and merited the ovation.

Other Events

At 39th st. the final "Meistersinger" of the season was sung and resulted in a personal triumph for Michael Bohnen as "Hans Sachs." Ever a rogue, this baritone made the role of the old shoemaker-singer one of appeal and reverence, though never lacking in happy moments. "Sachs," as Bohnen sung it last night, was just a jolly old fellow who paid a personal grudge against "Beckmesser" by aiding his rival. Mr. Schutzendorf was a first-rate "Beckmesser," with Rudolf Laubenthal as the neophyte master-singer, singing in excellent voice and acting capably. Maria Mueller was the "Eva" and proved more entrancing than some other "Eva's" that have appeared at the Metropolitan.

136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 8 - 1927

The Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was not one to arouse any ecstasy in the bosoms of those hardy voyagers who have breasted the flood waters of a prolific musical season. Mr. Koussevitzky's menu offered—perhaps as a belated centenary tribute—Beethoven's First Symphony, followed by a new work of Albert Charles Paul Roussel, a "Suite in F. Major" and as a closing number Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony."

M. Roussel's comment upon his suite asserts "the composer had no literary program in mind while writing his work. It is 'de la musique pure.' Three movements of the suite, prelude, sarabande and gigue, are well in accordance with the classical form. The prelude has, however, more than usually elaborated development."

According to Mr. Hale, the suite was composed in 1926 and is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitsky. It is still in manuscript.

Its performance last night simply calls for the stereotyped formula of consideration applied to so much new music presented this season. For M. Roussel's suite is well made, skillfully scored and unimportant music. The prelude was the most interesting, colorful and vital portion of the work. The rest of the composition presented a sarabande and gigue, in classical form perhaps, but dressed with mild dissonances and attired in all the familiar tonal habiliments of the skilled composer who has nothing vital or particularly interesting to say.

The harsh chains of duty compel one to record that, preceding the suite, Mr. Koussevitsky and his Boston men gave a colorless performance of Beethoven's First Symphony which would be hard to surpass for its meticulous pontificating upon unimportant details and its sheer monotony of line, contour and mood.

Perhaps this was simply the season's sigh of a weary band and Boston's Beethoven centenary celebration.

Without doubt the great Russian's Fourth Symphony enjoyed the vigorous, brilliant reading which Mr. Koussevitsky can set forth when he is on congenial musical territory.

C. H. N.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
APR 9-1927

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The distinguished and eminently well-bred Boston Symphony Orchestra paid one of ~~two final~~ social calls last night to Carnegie Hall. Socially speaking, Mr. Koussevitzky partially succeeded in maintaining the orderly and austere musical manners of his orchestral callers, at least throughout the first third of the evening, which was devoted to Beethoven's First Symphony; but the members of the orchestra, possibly weary of their model behavior with Beethoven, subsequently acted up as so many Peck's Bad Boys, and metaphorically taking Albert Roussel's Suite in F Major as so much china to hurl about the parlor, they ran riotously hither and thither and generally indulged in musical horseplay—all of which, parenthetically, was hugely enjoyed by an adequately appreciative audience. Even their conductor-chaperon, Mr. Koussevitzky, seemed himself amused at the pranks of his charges. But this breach in his customary code of musical etiquette may, no doubt, be explained in part by the fact that the Roussel Suite is dedicated to him, and by the fact that the symphony last night did a notably dexterous performance of an ingenuous and complicated modernistic work.

* * * *

The Roussel Suite, performed February 5 for the first time in New York, is a musical satire which, for all of its purposeful burlesque and grotesquerie, attains in spots a fine grace and persuasion. The suite was only completed last August, and the critical sage of Boston, Dr. Philip Hale, is thus loath in his annotative notes to tell the waiting world just what the work of the good Docteur Roussel is all about, other than a cautious admission that the "Suite en Fa" is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, tuba, the usual strings, etc., etc. We are no less cautiously informed that the suite's three movements, prelude, Sarabande and Gigue, are "well in accordance with the classical form."

But all this professorial datum overlooks the fact that the Frenchman's last work is a happily devised piece of musical satire, poking fun no less at Bach than at Ravel, his most immediate contemporary. In between the drolleries directed at the more outstanding composer of the eighteenth to the twentieth centuries, daintily tucked between those passages where Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms and along the line to Stravinsky and Ravel are seen and heard disportig themselves distortedly in a kind of musical Petit Guignol—between this comedy occurs no little brilliant music, much of it Oriental in sheen and texture, Mr. Koussevitzky, evidently in full grasp of the satiric nature of the suite, gave the work just that snap and sparkle, without which direction the composition would die a horrible death.

* * * *

In what is incontrovertibly, by this time, a rather Beethoven-burdened season, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the First Symphony with a genuinely noble conception and feeling for its persuasive melody and its robust sentiment. Criticizing the Boston Symphony's playing of Beethoven is about as futile and purposeless as attacking the Constitution of the United tSates—they must both be with us always, and they both possess the profundity that connotes permanence. But a legitimate comment, it would seem, is that Mr. Koussevitzky directed the symphony with somewhat too much restraint—with that sore of esceptic placity that characterizes any Beethoven performance by the Colonne in Paris. Such fragility is a needed quality in the Menuetto, the third movement, and it was an effective quality last night, but a little more vigor and concession to Beethoven's indubitable sentimentality in the first and second movements, might have been in order.

The program closed with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

SATURDAY, APR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 8 -1927

Boston Symphony Offers New Roussel Work at Carnegie

Koussevitzky Conducts Final Evening Concert Here, With Tchaikovsky and Beethoven Represented

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and final evening concert of its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program was not one of the most momentous offered here by the illustrious organization. It comprised Beethoven's First Symphony, a new Suite by the French composer, Albert Roussel, and Tchaikovsky's F minor Symphony. The suite by Roussel was composed in 1923. It was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky. Last night's performance was the first in New York.

Roussel follows the current fashion of composing in the old forms. His suite comprises a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue. Before the music had progressed very far, however, it became evident that Roussel had written it to please a symphonic public presumably wedded to an amiably sophisticated variety of modernism, and not averse to jazz. This music is agreeably pungent, exhilarating in its rhythms. It is good to listen to, and one rather wishes that it had been written by an American. Mr. Koussevitzky played it with infectious zest, and the audience received it politely.

The Beethoven symphony, played with reduced strings, won from Mr. Koussevitzky an affectionate reading, delicately and warmly conveyed.

The feature of to-morrow's Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall—their farewell concert of the season in New York—will be the first performance here of a new tone poem for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, the Boston composer, based on Amy Lowell's poem "Lilacs," and dedicated to her memory.

Boston Symphony Finishes Season in Colorful Work

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

OUR musical season is beginning to languish and droop. Opera has only a little over a week to run, the Philharmonic Orchestra has gone into its Summer's sleep, the New York Symphony is about to sound its final notes, and last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its local series at Carnegie Hall.

No Spring drowsiness was noticeable, however, in the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky. All his wonted devotion and energy shone forth impressively, especially in the fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky, which had a colorful and rousing performance that revealed the best abilities of the Boston players, in loveliness and sonority of tone and precision and brilliancy of execution.

Colorful Performance

The concert opened with Beethoven's first symphony, a composition in which the master had not yet freed himself from the influences of the earlier Haydn and Mozart. It is a work which now has only historical significance.

Attendance elsewhere prevented the hearing of the Roussel suite (performed in New York for the first time), which formed the middle number of the programme.

* * *

Roussel was sacrificed

tones is formidable, ranging to a clear and sweet high F. She displayed style and dash in "Magic Flute" arias and did an inordinately difficult number from Braunfels's opera, "The Birds," with astonishing dexterity, tonal charm and musical effect. She won her hearers completely.

Baritone Henri Marcoux contributed sympathetically sung French lyrics, with Wilfrid Pelletier's able piano assistance. Elsa Fiedler accompanied expertly for Miss Rogers, who wound up her programme with pyrotechnical arias from "Lakme" and David's "Pearl of Brazil."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES

APR - 9 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERI

Burgin Is Soloist at Final Concert in Academy of Music.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND.

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy [illegible]sic last night for the final concert in the series of five given annually in this borough. A last minute change of program resulted in Beethoven's Fifth being replaced by Tschaikovsky's symphony of the same number. Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi concerto in D Minor and Glazounoff's violin concerto made up the program.

After a beginning that was as hollow as the numbers selected Mr. Koussevitsky and his men gave us as fine a reading of the Tschaikovsky as it has been your reviewer's experience to hear in many a day. The second movement, that andante cantabile which is strongly reminiscent of Beethoven at his best was offered in broad, stately manner with the conductor and his men as one and with nuancing and orchestral color worthy of a Toscanini at his best.

In the Glazounoff, Richard Burgin, who is the concertmeister of the orchestra, had an opportunity to display some brilliant technique. And he made the most of every opportunity. At times his tone became almost 'cello-like as it throbbed with passion. The double-stops were slightly uneven but this was forgotten of him as one harkened to the player's tone of immeasurable beauty supported by technique that fairly bristled. He was warmly received and merited the ovation.

Other Events

At 39th st. the final "Meistersinger" of the season was sung and resulted in a personal triumph for Michael Bohnen as "Hans Sachs." Ever a rogue, this baritone made the role of the old shoemaker-singer one of appeal and reverence, though never lacking in happy moments. "Sachs," as Bohnen sung it last night, was just a jolly old fellow who paid a personal grudge against "Beckmesser" by aiding his rival. Mr. Schutzendorf was a first-rate "Beckmesser," with Rudolf Laubenthal as the neophyte master-singer, singing in excellent voice and acting capably. Maria Mueller was the "Eva" and proved more entrancing than some other "Eva's" that have appeared at the Metropolitan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
Standard Union
APR 9 -

Music

Boston Orchestra Concludes Season of Brooklyn Concerts.

An eleventh-hour change of programme replaced Beethoven's First symphony with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the season's final in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music. Other numbers were the Glazounov violin concerto and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony. Serge Koussevitzky conducted and Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, was soloist.

It would not be a just evaluation to place the Glazounov concerto for violin among the few great works of this nature which have earned for themselves a definate niche in the repertoire of solo violinists. Glazounoy's concerto is a showy, ostentatious affair for the solo instrument, abounding in much embroidered figurations, double-stopping, single and double harmonics and nearly everything in the line of violin technique. But what of the music? What is its message and what does it stand for after all is said?

The opening section, with its spots of Russian folk-song episode, has touches of anticipation in content and development, but, alas, it too soon peters out into empty display and trivialness. The final allegro is about as empty a movement for a work of symphonic dimensions and serious intent, that the present writer knows of. Of course, there are not more than a bare half-dozen violin concertos that are to be considered as first grade works—and the Glazounov is not one of them.

Mr. Burgin mastered the almost insurmountable technical difficulties with ease and elan. He brought out of the music all that was humanly possible. Mr. Burgin's tone, although not one of special distinctive proportion or timbre, is satisfying and "gets over." His expression was scholarly, volatile and withal freely romantic.

In a letter to Mme. Von Meck, Tschaikowsky criticised his own symphony (No. 5). "I have come to the conclusion that it is a failure," he writes. "There is something repellent, something superfluous, patchy, and insincere, which the public instinctively recognizes." That was in 1888, shortly after the symphony's premiere. Time has reversed Tschaikowsky's estimate, and to-day the Fifth is very popular. But, under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton last evening, in which disjointed tempi held sway, the symphony seemed to have those identical faults pointed out by the composer in his letter to his benefactress and best friend. The slow movement was slackened to tempo much slower that the traffic of its melodic import could bear, and the finale was whipped up to a pace that accentuated its blatancy. It was a peculiarly overemphasized interpretation.

The audience was large and discreetly applausive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 8 - 1927

The Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was not one to arouse any ecstasy in the bosoms of those hardy voyagers who have breasted the flood waters of a prolific musical season. Mr. Koussevitzky's menu offered—perhaps as a belated centenary tribute—Beethoven's First Symphony, followed by a new work of Albert Charles Paul Roussel, a "Suite in F. Major" and as a closing number Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony."

M. Roussel's comment upon his suite asserts "the composer had no literary program in mind while writing his work. It is 'de la musique pure.' Three movements of the suite, prelude, sarabande and gigue, are well in accordance with the classical form. The prelude has, however, more than usually elaborated development."

According to Mr. Hale, the suite was composed in 1926 and is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitsky. It is still in manuscript.

Its performance last night simply calls for the stereotyped formula of consideration applied to so much new music presented this season. For M. Roussel's suite is well made, skillfully scored and unimportant music. The prelude was the most interesting, colorful and vital portion of the work. The rest of the composition presented a sarabande and gigue, in classical form perhaps, but dressed with mild dissonances and attired in all the familiar tonal habiliments of the skilled composer who has nothing vital or particularly interesting to say.

The harsh chains of duty compel one to record that, preceding the suite, Mr. Koussevitsky and his Boston men gave a colorless performance of Beethoven's First Symphony which would be hard to surpass for its meticulous pontificating upon unimportant details and its sheer monotony of line, contour and mood.

Perhaps this was simply the season's sigh of a weary band and Boston's Beethoven centenary celebration.

Without doubt the great Russian's Fourth Symphony enjoyed the vigorous, brilliant reading which Mr. Koussevitsky can set forth when he is on congenial musical territory.

C. H. N.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH
APR 9 - 1927

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The distinguished and eminently well-bred Boston Symphony Orchestra paid one of ~~two final~~ social calls last night to Carnegie Hall. Socially speaking, Mr. Koussevitzky partially succeeded in maintaining the orderly and austere musical manners of his orchestral callers, at least throughout the first third of the evening, which was devoted to Beethoven's First Symphony; but the members of the orchestra, possibly weary of their model behavior with Beethoven, subsequently acted up as so many Peck's Bad Boys, and metaphorically, taking Albert Roussel's Suite in F Major as so much china to hurl about the parlor, they ran riotously hither and thither and generally indulged in musical horseplay—all of which, parenthetically, was hugely enjoyed by an adequately appreciative audience. Even their conductor-chaperon, Mr. Koussevitzky, seemed himself amused at the pranks of his charges. But this breach in his customary code of musical etiquette may, no doubt, be explained in part by the fact that the Roussel Suite is dedicated to him, and by the fact that the symphony last night did a notably dexterous performance of an ingenuous and complicated modernistic work.

* * * *

The Roussel Suite, performed February 5 for the first time in New York, is a musical satire which, for all of its purposeful burlesque and grotesquerie, attains in spots a fine grace and persuasion. The suite was only completed last August, and the critical sage of Boston, Dr. Philip Hale, is thus loath in his annotative notes to tell the waiting world just what the work of the good Docteur Roussel is all about, other than a cautious admission that the "Suite en Fa" is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, tuba, the usual strings, etc., etc. We are no less cautiously informed that the suite's three movements, prelude, Sarabande and Gigue, are "well in accordance with the classical form."

But all this professorial datum overlooks the fact that the Frenchman's last work is a happily devised piece of musical satire, poking fun no less at Bach than at Ravel, his most immediate contemporary. In between the drolleries directed at the more outstanding composer of the eighteenth to the twentieth centuries, daintily tucked between those passages where Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms and along the line to Stravinsky and Ravel are seen and heard disportig themselves distortedly in a kind of musical Petit Guignol—between this comedy occurs no little brilliant music, much of it Oriental in sheen and texture, Mr. Koussevitzky, evidently in full grasp of the satiric nature of the suite, gave the work just that snap and sparkle, without which direction the composition would die a horrible death.

* * * *

In what is incontrovertibly, by this time, a rather Beethoven-burdened season, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the First Symphony with a genuinely noble conception and feeling for its persuasive melody and its robust sentiment. Criticizing the Boston Symphony's playing of Beethoven is about as futile and purposeless as attacking the Constitution of the United tSates—they must both be with us always, and they both possess the profundity that connotes permanence. But a legitimate comment, it would seem, is that Mr. Koussevitzky directed the symphony with somewhat too much restraint—with that sore of esceptic placity that characterizes any Beethoven performance by the Colonne in Paris. Such fragility is a needed quality in the Menuetto, the third movement, and it was an effective quality last night, but a little more vigor and concession to Beethoven's indubitable sentimentality in the first and second movements, might have been in order.

The program closed with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

NY Times
apr 9
THE NI

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the most remarkable performances that Mr. Koussevitsky has given this season in New York was that of the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which ended the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. To those who can by no manner of means admit Tchaikovsky tothe circle of the immortals, and to the many who have heard excellent performances of this same symphony—they are given in many places—this will not seem a matter of particular moment. The performance, however, was one that will be remembered by those who heard it, and the memory will be an inspiration. We know, after such an interpretation, the true greatness of Tchaikovsky as a composer. Great he was, not withstanding banalities and naive artistic indiscretions. For Tschaikowsky was a man of genius, greatly gifted, intensely human, reckless in self-relation.

The listener feels that he knew this man and that the man knew him. He is stirred by the simplicity and humanity of the music. He says to himself, "I, too, was there." Some of the musical ideas are vulgar, undignified, but how rich is the feeling, and what a wealth of musical material! Tschaikovsky has his native vein of sensuous melody and of Russian rhythms and folk-idioms to aid him. He already shows his genius for extremely effective instrumentation.

He has an excellent sense of proportion, even though his ideas are not of the classic mold and esthetically far from its standards. For all that, for all its palpable defects of style, this is a great work, one that has lived already half a century, while critics and musical pundits have been telling the world that Tchaikovsky had no business to pretend to write symphonies.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the symphony with the most admirable balance of intense feeling and carefully adjusted proportion; with elasticity of pace and on occasion with headlong passion, yet with clarity and precision of detail. He conducted as if he were composing the symphony, as though, with the composer, he had rejoiced, wept, cried aloud and shaken his fist at the skies. At the same time temperament never ran away with thinking, and the conductor often found ways, without expense to sincerity or spontaneity, of giving distinction to passages which customarily are commonplace. It is seldom indeed that Tchaikovsky is given such a performance, as it is exceptional when an audience delays the performance of a symphony for minutes by its applause between the movements. After the first part Mr. Koussevitsky could only bow and bow again until enthusiasm had spent itself in a measure and he could continue.

The other items of the program were Beethoven's First Symphony, performed by an orchestra duly diminished in size for its Haydnesque character, and a suite in F major, new in this city, by Albert Roussel. This suite is in three movements, a prelude, sarabande and gigue. The exterior forms of the old dances are observed; the content of the music is modern. It would not need Mr. Hale's invaluable notes in the program book to inform the hearer that Roussel had come strongly under the influence of Vincent d'Indy, whose pupil he was. The influence of d'Indy is paramount, though well assimilated in the opening prelude. In the last movement there are clear reminders of the finale of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." But the prelude is vigorous and witty music. If the idiom is that of d'Indy the spirit is French, Burgundian, Chabrierian! There is gusto and the kick of good wine in it, and that fine clarity and astringency in the modernly conceived harmony which stem directly from the master of the Paris School Cantorum.

At a first hearing the second and third movements were less convincing than the first—more perfunctory, despite ingenious figurations, and more diluted. The work served well to display the virtuosity of the splendid orchestra and the musical discipline which Mr. Koussevitsky has so effectively established. Beethoven's symphony was played with appreciation of its true proportions and with good tonal adjustments, although it was the exterior rather than the interior of this felicitous early composition of the master that the performance caught.

CURANS ASK TA[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
APR 8 -1927

Boston Symphony Finishes Season in Colorful Work

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

OUR musical season is beginning to languish and droop. Opera has only a little over a week to run, the Philharmonic Orchestra has gone into its Summer's sleep, the New York Symphony is about to sound its final notes, and last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its local series at Carnegie Hall.

No Spring drowsiness was noticeable, however, in the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky. All his wonted devotion and energy shone forth impressively, especially in the fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky, which had a colorful and rousing performance that revealed the best abilities of the Boston players, in loveliness and sonority of tone and precision and brilliancy of execution.

Colorful Performance

The concert opened with Beethoven's first symphony, a composition in which the master had not yet freed himself from the influences of the earlier Haydn and Mozart. It is a work which now has only historical significance.

Attendance elsewhere prevented the hearing of the Roussel suite (performed in New York for the first time), which formed the middle number of the programme.

* * *

Roussel was sacrificed [illegible]

tones is formidable, ranging to a clear and sweet high F. She displayed style and dash in "Magic Flute" arias and did an inordinately difficult number from Braunfels's opera, "The Birds," with astonishing dexterity, tonal charm and musical effect. She won her hearers completely.

Baritone Henri Marcoux contributed sympathetically sung French lyrics, with Wilfrid Pelletier's able piano assistance. Elsa Fiedler accompanied expertly for Miss Rogers, who wound up her programme with pyrotechnical arias from "Lakme" and David's "Pearl of Brazil."

SATURDAY, APR

Boston Symphony Offers New Roussel Work at Carnegie

Koussevitzky Conducts Final Evening Concert Here, With Tchaikovsky and Beethoven Represented

(Dispatch from yesterday's late editions)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and final evening concert of its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program was not one of the most momentous offered here by the illustrious organization. It comprised Beethoven's First Symphony, a new work by the French composer, Albert Roussel, and Tchaikovsky's F minor symphony. The suite by Roussel was composed in 1925. It was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky. Last night's performance was the first in New York.

Roussel follows the current fashion of composing in the old forms. His suite comprises a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue. Before the music had proceeded very far, however, it became evident that Roussel had written it to please a symphonic public presumably wedded to an amiably sophisticated variety of modernism, and not averse to jazz. This music is agreeably pungent, exhilarating in its rhythms. It is good to listen to, and one rather wishes that it had been written by an American. Mr. Koussevitzky played it with infectious zest, and the audience received it politely.

The Beethoven symphony, played with reduced strings, won from Mr. Koussevitzky an affectionate reading, delicately and warmly conveyed.

The feature of to-morrow's Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall—their farewell concert of the season in New York—will be the first performance here of a new tone-poem for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, the Boston composer, based on Amy Lowell's poem "Lilacs," and dedicated to her memory.

J FROM URY
ORD, MASS.

1927

ord a musical city?
llars was lost by the own is the New Bed-Association when the ny Orchestra was last Upon that occasion, ere that there were the excellent and e section of a com-recently constructed ore comment is neces-had a piano in the Me

Back

Roussel and

S CLIPPING FROM YORK JOURN.

PR 8 -1927

SEVITZKY
'S SOME
MUSIC

evitzky brought some ith him for the final cert of his Boston Or-ght at Carnegie Hall.
te in F by the Frenchoussel, who has turned out to become a modast few years. Othergramme consisted of
First Symphony and Fourth, strange come same evening.
Roussel, which is still is dedicated to Mr.
nd was written espe-
rmance by the Boston the grandiloquent opera, the "world
the piece took place Boston. Last night's the first time it had n a way, one of the contemporary French fifty-eight years old ed a mature style, so d be called a style,

enly saw the light of music and completely ttitude and manner of

he had been doing howed the strong in-cent d'Indy (who had
er) and, whilst esthetat abstruse, they were y the work of a man ualify as professor of n d'Indy's Schola Can-ably the best of his the charming "Le fes-
."

long jump from this the Spider's Feast" to fete de printemps" and symphony (which last en played in New York), uite performed last night even newer phase. In rnism, however, Roussel ore the imitator than the Stravinsky, Casella and others of the modernist now all for objectivity in they seek it in the unex forms of the eighteenth
So, now, does Roussel.
te in F consists of a arabande and gigue. The are little violated, but as est music of Stravinsky
, the modernist touch is mony and instrumentation ely to be said that Roussel anything new or arresting te, but merely followed in eps of his betters.
ussevitzky gave a rather e performance of the First of Beethoven, emphasizmetles and not recognizing claws of the lion are al-aled in this early work.

NY Times
Apr 9

THE NI

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One of the most remarkable performances that Mr. Koussevitsky has given this season in New York was that of the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which ended the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. To those who can by no manner of means admit Tchaikovsky tothe circle of the immortals, and to the many who have heard excellent performances of this same symphony—they are given in many places—this will not seem a matter of particular moment. The performance, however, was one that will be remembered by those who heard it, and the memory will be an inspiration. We know, after such an interpretation, the true greatness of Tchaikovsky as a composer. Great he was, not withstanding banalities and naive artistic indiscretions. For Tschaikowsky was a man of genius, greatly gifted, intensely human, reckless in self-relation.

The listener feels that he knew this man and that the man knew him. He is stirred by the simplicity and humanity of the music. He says to himself, "I, too, was there." Some of the musical ideas are vulgar, undignified, but how rich is the feeling, and what a wealth of musical material! Tschaikovsky has his native vein of sensuous melody and of Russian rhythms and folk-idioms to aid him. He already shows his genius for extremely effective instrumentation.

He has an excellent sense of proportion, even though his ideas are not of the classic mold and esthetically far from its standards. For all that, for all its palpable defects of style, this is a great work, one that has lived already half a century, while critics and musical pundits have been telling the world that Tchaikovsky had no business to pretend to write symphonies.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the symphony with the most admirable balance of intense feeling and carefully adjusted proportion; with elasticity of pace and on occasion with headlong passion, yet with clarity and precision of detail. He conducted as if he were composing the symphony, as though, with the composer, he had rejoiced, wept, cried aloud and shaken his fist at the skies. At the same time temperament never ran away with thinking, and the conductor often found ways, without expense to sincerity or spontaneity, of giving distinction to passages which customarily are commonplace. It is seldom indeed that Tchaikovsky is given such a performance, as it is exceptional when an audience delays the performance of a symphony for minutes by its applause between the movements. After the first part Mr. Koussevitsky could only bow and bow again until enthusiasm had spent itself in a measure and he could continue.

The other items of the program were Beethoven's First Symphony, performed by an orchestra duly diminished in size for its Haydnesque character, and a suite in F major, new in this city, by Albert Roussel. This suite is in three movements, a prelude, sarabande and gigue. The exterior forms of the old dances are observed; the content of the music is modern. It would not need Mr. Hale's invaluable notes in the program book to inform the hearer that Roussel had come strongly under the influence of Vincent d'Indy, whose pupil he was. The influence of d'Indy is paramount, though well assimilated in the opening prelude. In the last movement there are clear reminders of the finale of d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." But the prelude is vigorous and witty music. If the idiom is that of d'Indy the spirit is French, Burgundian, Chabrierian! There is gusto and the kick of good wine in it, and that fine clarity and astringency in the modernly conceived harmony which stem directly from the master of the Paris School Cantorum.

At a first hearing the second and third movements were less convincing than the first—more perfunctory, despite ingenious figurations, and more diluted. The work served well to display the virtuosity of the splendid orchestra and the musical discipline which Mr. Koussevitsky has so effectively established. Beethoven's symphony was played with appreciation of its true proportions and with good tonal adjustments, although it was the exterior rather than the interior of this felicitous early composition of the master that the performance caught.

CURANS ASK TA...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
Standard Union

APR 9 -

Music

Boston Orchestra Concludes Season of Brooklyn Concerts.

An eleventh-hour change of programme replaced Beethoven's First symphony with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the season's final in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music. Other numbers were the Glazounov violin concerto and Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony. Serge Koussevitzky conducted and Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, was soloist.

It would not be a just evaluation to place the Glazounov concerto for violin among the few great works of this nature which have earned for themselves a definate niche in the repertoire of solo violinists. Glazounoy's concerto is a showy, ostentatious affair for the solo instrument, abounding in much embroidered figurations, double-stopping, single and double harmonics and nearly everything in the line of violin technique. But what of the music? What is its message and what does it stand for after all is said?

The opening section, with its spots of Russian folk-song episode, has touches of anticipation in content and development, but, alas, it too soon peters out into empty display and trivialness. The final allegro is about as empty a movement for a work of symphonic dimensions and serious intent, that the present writer knows of. Of course, there are not more than a bare half-dozen violin concertos that are to be considered as first grade works—and the Glazounov is not one of them.

Mr. Burgin mastered the almost insurmountable technical difficulties with ease and elan. He brought out of the music all that was humanly possible. Mr. Burgin's tone, although not one of special distinctive proportion or timbre, is satisfying and "gets over." His expression was scholarly, volatile and withal freely romantic.

In a letter to Mme. Von Meck, Tschaikowsky criticised his own symphony (No. 5). "I have come to the conclusion that it is a failure," he writes. "There is something repellent, something superfluous, patchy, and insincere, which the public instinctively recognizes." That was in 1888, shortly after the symphony's premiere. Time has reversed Tschaikowsky's estimate, and to-day the Fifth is very popular. But, under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton last evening, in which disjointed tempi held sway, the symphony seemed to have those identical faults pointed out by the composer in his letter to his benefactress and best friend. The slow movement was slackened to tempo much slower that the traffic of its melodic import could bear, and the finale was whipped up to a pace that accentuated its blatancy. It was a peculiarly overemphasized interpretation.

The audience was large and discreetly applausive.

. SATURDAY, APR

Boston Symphony Offers New Roussel Work at Carnegie

Koussevitzky Conducts Final Evening Concert Here, With Tchaikovsky and Beethoven Represented

(From yesterday's late editions)

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra gave [illegible] final evening concert of [illegible] season at Carnegie Hall [illegible] Koussevitzky conducting. [illegible] was not one of the most [illegible] offered here by the illus[illegible] organization. It comprised [illegible] First Symphony, a new [illegible] the French composer, Albert Roussel, and Tchaikovsky's F minor Symphony. The suite by Roussel was composed in 1925. It was written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky. Last night's performance was the first in New York.

Roussel follows the current fashion of composing in the old forms. His suite comprises a Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue. Before the music had progressed very far, however, it became apparent that Roussel had written it in case a symphonic public presumably wedded to an amiably sophisticated variety of modernism, and not averse to jazz. This music is agreeably pungent, exhilarating in its rhythms. It is good to listen to, and one rather wishes that it had been written by an American. Mr. Koussevitzky played it with infectious zest, and the audience received it politely.

The Beethoven symphony, played with reduced strings, won from Mr. Koussevitzky an affectionate reading, delicately and warmly conveyed.

The feature of to-morrow's Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall—their farewell concert of the season in New York—will be the first performance here of a new tone-poem for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, the Boston composer, based on Amy Lowell's poem "Lilacs," and dedicated to her memory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN TIMES

APR - 9 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERI

Burgin Is Soloist at Final Concert in Academy of Music.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND.

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Mu[illegible]ic last night for the final concert of the series of five given annually in this borough. A last minute change of program resulted in Beethoven's Fifth being replaced by Tschaikovsky's symphony of the same number. Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi concerto in D Minor and Glazounoff's violin concerto made up the program.

After a beginning that was as hollow as the numbers selected Mr. Koussevitsky and his men gave us as fine a reading of the Tschaikovsky as it has been your reviewer's experience to hear in many a day. The second movement, that andante cantabile which is strongly reminiscent of Beethoven at his best was offered in broad, stately manner with the conductor and his men as one and with nuancing and orchestral color worthy of a Toscanini at his best.

In the Glazounoff, Richard Burgin, who is the concertmeister of the orchestra, had an opportunity to display some brilliant technique. And he made the most of every opportunity. At times his tone became almost 'cello-like as it throbbed with passion. The double-stops were slightly uneven but this was forgotten of him as one harkened to the player's tone of immeasurable beauty supported by technique that fairly bristled. He was warmly received and merited the ovation.

Other Events

At 39th st. the final "Meistersinger" of the season was sung and resulted in a personal triumph for Michael Bohnen as "Hans Sachs." Ever a rogue, this baritone made the role of the old shoemaker-singer one of appeal and reverence, though never lacking in happy moments. "Sachs," as Bohnen sung it last night, was just a jolly old fellow who paid a personal grudge against "Beckmesser" by aiding his rival. Mr. Schutzendorf was a first-rate "Beckmesser," with Rudolf Laubenthal as the neophyte master-singer, singing in excellent voice and acting capably. Maria Mueller was the "Eva" and proved more entrancing than some other "Eva's" that have appeared at the Metropolitan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

APR 8 -1927

Boston Symphony Finishes Season in Colorful Work

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

OUR musical season is beginning to languish and droop. Opera has only a little over a week to run, the Philharmonic Orchestra has gone into its Summer's sleep, the New York Symphony is about to sound its final notes, and last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its local series at Carnegie Hall.

No Spring drowsiness was noticeable, however, in the conducting of Sergei Koussevitzky. All his wonted devotion and energy shone forth impressively, especially in the fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky, which had a colorful and rousing performance that revealed the best abilities of the Boston players, in loveliness and sonority of tone and precision and brilliancy of execution.

Colorful Performance

The concert opened with Beethoven's first symphony, a composition in which the master had not yet freed himself from the influences of the earlier Haydn and Mozart. It is a work which now has only historical significance.

Attendance elsewhere prevented the hearing of the Roussel suite (performed in New York for the first time), which formed the middle number of the programme.

* * *

Roussel was sacrificed [illegible]

[illegible] tones is formidable, ranging to a clear and sweet high F. She displayed style and dash in "Magic Flute" arias and did an inordinately difficult number from Braunfels's opera, "The Birds," with astonishing dexterity, tonal charm and musical effect. She won her hearers completely.

Baritone Henri Marcoux contributed sympathetically sung French lyrics, with Wilfrid Pelletier's able piano assistance. Elsa Fiedler accompanied expertly for Miss Rogers, who wound up her programme with pyrotechnical arias from "Lakme" and David's "Pearl of Brazil."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN

APR 8 - 1927

The Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was not one to arouse any ecstasy in the bosoms of those hardy voyagers who have breasted the flood waters of a prolific musical season. Mr. Koussevitzky's menu offered—perhaps as a belated centenary tribute—Beethoven's First Symphony, followed by a new work of Albert Charles Paul Roussel, a "Suite in F Major" and as a closing number Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony."

M. Roussel's comment upon his suite asserts "the composer had no literary program in mind while writing his work. It is 'de la musique pure.' Three movements of the suite, prelude, sarabande and gigue, are well in accordance with the classical form. The prelude has, however, more than usually elaborated development."

According to Mr. Hale, the suite was composed in 1926 and is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitsky. It is still in manuscript.

Its performance last night simply calls for the stereotyped formula of consideration applied to so much new music presented this season. For M. Roussel's suite is well made, skillfully scored and unimportant music. The prelude was the most interesting, colorful and vital portion of the work. The rest of the composition presented a sarabande and gigue, in classical form perhaps, but dressed with mild dissonances and attired in all the familiar tonal habiliments of the skilled composer who has nothing vital or particularly interesting to say.

The harsh chains of duty compel one to record that, preceding the suite, Mr. Koussevitsky and his Boston men gave a colorless performance of Beethoven's First Symphony which would be hard to surpass for its meticulous pontificating upon unimportant details and its sheer monotony of line, contour and mood.

Perhaps this was simply the season's sigh of a weary band and Boston's Beethoven centenary celebration.

Without doubt the great Russian's Fourth Symphony enjoyed the vigorous, brilliant reading which Mr. Koussevitsky can set forth when he is on congenial musical territory.

C. H. N.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

APR 9 - 1927

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The distinguished and eminently well-bred Boston Symphony Orchestra paid one of ~~two final~~ social calls last night to Carnegie Hall. Socially speaking, Mr. Koussevitzky partially succeeded in maintaining the orderly and austere musical manners of his orchestral callers, at least throughout the first third of the evening, which was devoted to Beethoven's First Symphony; but the members of the orchestra, possibly weary of their model behavior with Beethoven, subsequently acted up as so many Peck's Bad Boys, and metaphorically, taking Albert Roussel's Suite in F Major as so much china to hurl about the parlor, they ran riotously hither and thither and generally indulged in musical horseplay—all of which, parenthetically, was hugely enjoyed by an adequately appreciative audience. Even their conductor-chaperon, Mr. Koussevitzky, seemed himself amused at the pranks of his charges. But this breach in his customary code of musical etiquette may, no doubt, be explained in part by the fact that the Roussel Suite is dedicated to him, and by the fact that the symphony last night did a notably dexterous performance of an ingenuous and complicated modernistic work.

* * * *

The Roussel Suite, performed February 5 for the first time in New York, is a musical satire which, for all of its purposeful burlesque and grotesquerie, attains in spots a fine grace and persuasion. The suite was only completed last August, and the critical sage of Boston, Dr. Philip Hale, is thus loath in his annotative notes to tell the waiting world just what the work of the good Docteur Roussel is all about, other than a cautious admission that the "Suite en Fa" is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, tuba, the usual strings, etc., etc. We are no less cautiously informed that the suite's three movements, prelude, Sarabande and Gigue, are "well in accordance with the classical form."

But all this professorial datum overlooks the fact that the Frenchman's last work is a happily devised piece of musical satire, poking fun no less at Bach than at Ravel, his most immediate contemporary. In between the drolleries directed at the more outstanding composer of the eighteenth to the twentieth centuries, daintily tucked between those passages where Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms and along the line to Stravinsky and Ravel are seen and heard disportig themselves distortedly in a kind of musical Petit Guignol—between this comedy occurs no little brilliant music, much of it Oriental in sheen and texture, Mr. Koussevitzky, evidently in full grasp of the satiric nature of the suite, gave the work just that snap and sparkle, without which direction the composition would die a horrible death.

* * * *

In what is incontrovertibly, by this time, a rather Beethoven-burdened season, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the First Symphony with a genuinely noble conception and feeling for its persuasive melody and its robust sentiment. Criticizing the Boston Symphony's playing of Beethoven is about as futile and purposeless as attacking the Constitution of the United tSates—they must both be with us always, and they both possess the profundity that connotes permanence. But a legitimate comment, it would seem, is that Mr. Koussevitzky directed the symphony with somewhat too much restraint—with that sore of esceptic placity that characterizes any Beethoven performance by the Colonne in Paris. Such fragility is a needed quality in the Menuetto, the third movement, and it was an effective quality last night, but a little more vigor and concession to Beethoven's indubitable sentimentality in the first and second movements, might have been in order.

The program closed with Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 10 1927

NEW YORK'S ORCHESTRAL YEAR

Another Season's End Finds a Problematic Future in Store for Symphonic Concerts Here

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE end of the orchestral season of 1926-7 in New York comes with the final concert of the New York Symphony Society this afternoon. This season has not been markedly different from the preceding one, but it has reopened questions of the orchestral future in this city which were dormant during the season of 1925-6. Problems associated with musical unionism and the very important part it is to play in orchestral developments hereabouts—and indeed throughout the country—are again approaching a crisis. They nearly caused the fusion of the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony managements some two months ago. For the time at least the proposal of the combination of the two orchestras is in abeyance, but it may well arise again, and the decision may be different from the one reached this year. A year hence wage demands of the union will be increased. In Chicago, where orchestral musicians are paid a higher wage than here, the relations of the orchestra and the union are critical. It is only a question of time before a similar situation confronts the orchestras of New York. The result may be a single orchestra, capable of presenting a united front to the demands of those who direct union policies.

The opinion has been expressed in these pages that it would be a pity for New York to have only one symphonic orchestra of the first rank, but there is a very real danger that eventually this will happen. In the meantime the orchestras will proceed next year much as they have this one, with the important exception that the Philharmonic will have two conductors to divide its season instead of three, and that these gentlemen will occupy the position of regular conductors rather than "guests" invited for a short number of concerts. In place of the fourteen concerts that the great Toscanini gave the season before last, he has agreed to give forty, some of these in other cities than New York, which the Philharmonic will visit. The first half of the season, as heretofore, will employ the services of Willem Mengelberg.

Two of the conductors who have been with us during the two past seasons will not return in the immediate future. They are Wilhelm Furtwaengler and Otto Klemperer. A third conductor has decided to leave the ranks of the regulars and occupy that of a virtual "guest." We refer, of course, to Mr. Damrosch. He will conduct the children's concerts of the New York Symphony and follow Fritz Busch at its subscription concerts. Mr. Busch will open the season; Mr. Pollain will conduct for a brief period between his appearance and that of Mr. Damrosch. Mr. Damrosch will lead the orchestra in January and February. This will leave four weeks of concerts in March, and the conductor of these concerts has yet to be announced.

Thus the New York Symphony will present four conductors next season, all of them coming technically under the head of "guests," and the Philharmonic two. There will be other changes in orchestras that play in New York which will interest the public. More "guest conductors" will appear here. One of them, as stated by Mr. Richard Aldrich in THE TIMES of last Sunday, will be Thomas Beecham, as arrangements now stand. There will also be other retirements, permanent or temporary, than those which have been mentioned. In the main, and, in spite of the relative conservatism of the Philharmonic program for next season, the system of guest conductors will be pursued even more industriously than it has been during this one.

All this is in accordance with the operation of certain conditions that reviewers may inveigh against, but which they can hardly alter. The writer of these lines would hesitate long before he ventured to pronounce upon the justice or injustice of the wage demands of the musical union, in face of the continually rising cost of living and other concerns outside the conductors themselves. The conductor who has limited time and opportunity to address the new public can hardly remain unconscious of rivalries for the position he holds. His tenure of office is tense and feverish. He finds himself in a new environment which may have an inspiring effect upon him, but which, for a period, is a formidable test of personal and artistic equilibrium. Such influences, if he is unable to surmount them, affect his performances. They may even turn him into a seeker for success instead of a high priest of his art. These conditions of American musical life take their toll and are to be deplored.

This is not to say that the public fails to gain in important directions from the ministrations of different conductors. There is the opportunity to compare interpretations of familiar works, to hear interpreters of different nationalities and schools and ideas, to realize how many different aspects a single great work may have for its interpreters as well as listeners. There was also opportunity this season to hear an unusual number of visiting orchestras. Six symphony orchestras other than those of New York were heard. They were the orchestras of Boston, Philadelphia, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Minneapolis. The conductors were Koussevitzky, Stokowski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Nicolai Sokoloff, Fritz Reiner and Henri Verbruggen.

With the exception of the bands from Minneapolis and Detroit the visiting orchestras gave proportionately more novelties than the resident bodies, whose programs as regarded new works were less interesting than they were last season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra leads, proportionately, in the number and kind of novelties that it produced. The most important of the new works were the Sibelius Seventh Symphony, which Mr. Koussevitzky produced only a few days before Mr. Klemperer, who had planned to play the same work for the first time with the New York Symphony Orchestra, and the four pieces of Prokofieff, comprising the suite from "The Love of Three Oranges," the suite from the ballet "Chout," the "Classic" Symphony and the work for chorus, solo tenor and orchestra, "Sept, ils sont sept." The piano concerto of Aaron Copland showed marked talent and excited discussion, but it is questionable whether it has lasting qualities or whether Mr. Copland himself will endorse it ten years from today. The concerto for harpsichord of de Falla, composed for Mme. Landowska and played by her, proved a flat failure. The "Church Windows" of Respighi was undistinguished. At time of writing, the "Lilacs" of Hill and the suite in F major of Ravel, scheduled for the concerts of Thursday and Saturday just passed, cannot be discussed.

One of the best of the "novelties" performed by the Philharmonic Society was one of the oldest—the symphony in B flat by J. C. Bach. The eye travels down the list in search for something that impressed itself on the memory. It encounters the name of the substantial and very serious Seventh Symphony of Miaskovsky; of the Sibelius—not Honegger—overture to Shakespeare's "Tempest," a piece scored with the most singular and realistic effect; of suites for small orchestra of Stravinsky, and Wagenaer's overture to "The Taming of the Shrew." Admit comparative virtue in these; but not in the "Don Juan" variation of Braunfels, and not, oh, not the Prelude to "Palestrina" by Pfitzner! The Philadelphia Orchestra devoted two of its ten programs to Bach and one to Beethoven, which was a loss to the novelty hunters, but not a deprivation for Mr. Stokowski's audiences. André Caplet's "Ephiphanie" for solo violoncello and orchestra was very remarkable for craftsmanship, orchestral coloring and imaginative harmony. The first New York performance of Rachmaninoff's Fourth Piano Concerto was undoubtedly, for a great many, the crowning novelty of the season, though it represents no new departure of Mr. Rachmaninoff. The concerto on quarter tones of Juan Carillo had interest as an experiment.

The Cleveland Orchestra introduced as its principal novelty Douglas Moore's "Pageant of P. T. Barnum," in part a pageant of Petrushka and Stravinsky. Neither the Detroit nor Minneapolis Orchestra produced new works.

The Philharmonic played twelve novelties; the New York Symphony seven. Two of these had been ordered by the society from Alfredo Casella and Jean Sibelius. They were the suite "Scarlatianna," very brilliantly written, and Sibelius's somewhat disappointing "Tapiola," a work of style and manner rather than inspiration. There were other pieces by Ibert, Honegger, Rogers, Hindemith and Janacek. Janacek's "Sinfonietta" had somewhat of Stravinsky in it, but also a fresh, sylvan, fanciful quality that commended it. Hindemith's concerto might well be an intentional parody of militarism, with its stiffness, discordancy and mockery of a respected march tune.

It cannot be said that in this season a single new work unquestionably of the first rank was made known. Nor was the presence of a significant new figure among conductors established beyond a doubt or peradventure. What was evident in many ways is the steady increase of orchestral activities hereabout, and the public for orchestral music that is constantly growing. This is symptomatic not only of New York but of the whole country. It may even be that in a day not remote we will find ourselves short of guest conductors!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
APR 10 1927

The final concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitsky directed his splendid organization in the D minor concerto by Vivaldi; "Lilacs," by Hill; "Pacific 231," by Honegger, and Symphony No. 5 by Tschaikovsky.

"Lilacs," the novelty of the afternoon, was inspired by the poem by Amy Lowell. It was given an interesting interpretation, though its matter scarcely measured up to the capabilities of the orchestra.

While some music patrons may quibble about the "quality" of Tschaikovsky's writings, there is no question regarding the beauty and appeal of the symphony performed as it was by the Bostonians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 10 1927

Tone-Poem Features Boston Symphony's Last Concert Here

Koussevitzky Introduces New Work by American Composer Founded on Amy Lowell's "Lilacs"

The novelty on the program of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall (the last of the season) was a tone-poem for orchestra entitled "Lilacs," after the poem by Amy Lowell, composed by Edward Burlingame Hill, professor in the music department of Harvard University. Mr. Koussevitzky had played the work, for the first time anywhere, at a concert in Cambridge March 31. He introduced it to Boston in the same week.

Mr. Hill, long an admirer of Miss Lowell's poetry, was impressed by the fact that her celebrated poem (included in the posthumous volume entitled "What's o'Clock") was an excellent subject for musical treatment by one of New England ancestry. His symphonic commentary is "the result," he says, "of impressions connected with portions of the poem, chiefly the beginning and the end."

Miss Lowell's poem is a rhapsodic expression of the love of a true New Englander for the beauty of that incomparable land. Its soil, its roots, its fragrance, its visual loveliness moved her, as she says in her closing lines, to "sing of it with my own voice, since certainly it is mine." Mr. Hill has a like relationship to the land where lilacs blow in dooryards and in the grass of lanes and above old cellars dug in hills; and he sings of these things in his music with an ardor akin to that of the poet's.

He has written in this work with a sensitive blend of delicacy and fervor. This music has intensity of mood and imagery. It is poetic, richly fibered and it is beautifully put upon the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky played it with fine effectiveness, and at its close he directed the attention of the applauding audience to the presence of the composer in a box.

The remainder of the afternoon's program consisted of familiar numbers—Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor in Mr. Sir[illegible] here some five or six years ago); Honegger's famous locomotive piece, "Pacific 231"; and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The works by Vivaldi and Honegger figured on the program of the first concert which Mr. Koussevitzky ever conducted in New York—that of November 27, 1924, when he made his memorable debut here. They served yesterday to bring to a successful close the third season here of the brilliant conductor and his admirable orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EW YORK WORLD
APR 10 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, for violin and two flutes.....Bach
"Lilacs," poem for orchestra, after Amy Lowell .....Hill
First time in New York.
Pacific 231.....Honegger
Symphony No. 5, in E Minor...Tschaikowsky
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor.

The Boston Orchestra's Final Concert

At the concert of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the last of the season, Mr. Koussevitzky played Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," poem for orchestra, a composition new to New York. In a program note Mr. Hill, a musician living in Cambridge, Mass., confesses himself an admirer of the poetry of Amy Lowell, whose poem "Lilacs" he thought "a fit subject for musical treatment by one of New England ancestry." The fortunate conjunction of a poem and its musical counterpart both written by persons of New England ancestry held out the promise of some noteworthy results, but unfortunately Mr. Hill's musical ancestry is not New England at all. It is in fact Russian, which accounts for the Slavic hues of Miss Lowell's lilacs in yesterday's orchestral novelty.

If the truth must be told, the "Lilacs, * * * your great puffs of flowers are everywhere in this my New England," are hardly seen at all in the music. Perhaps my imagination is at fault, but nary a lilac could I feel. Instead, I found evidence of a Russian soul-conflict, with the music threatening momentarily to break out into Scriabine's "Poem d'Exstase." Mr. Hill's composition is, however, a respectable imitative effort, beautifully scored and not ineffective. It left the audience pleased, and the composer was induced to bow repeatedly from a first tier box.

The once sensational "Pacific 231" of Honegger, which followed, seemed yesterday not such a terrifying locomotive as when it made its first trip several years ago. It is inevitable that music which seeks to paint machinery must, like the picture of Dorian Gray, deteriorate with the original. "Pacific 231" already shows signs of age. Presently it will be an outmoded piece of mechanism, a second-hand engine ready to be scrapped.

Mr. Koussevitzky, by his fine reading of Tschaikowsky's "Fourth" last Thursday night, had aroused considerable interest in the same composer's "Fifth," the big piece of yesterday's program. These hopes were only partly realized. The Boston leader was in a sentimental mood. He stretched Tschaikowsky's cantabile to the bursting point and overemphasized those sensuous portions of the symphony which make themselves felt when published in strict time. With the exception of this tendency to inflate Tschaikowsky's sufficiently ballooned emotions, Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Fifth" was admirable in rhythm, balance and general expressiveness. A large audience gave him a hearty send-off.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 10 1927

KOUSSIRVITZKY AND DR. DAVIDSON, conductors, respectively, of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Harvard Glee club, with the score of Beethoven's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 10 1927

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to produce F. S. Converse's "Flivver Ten Million" in mid-April at their home concerts, which continue for a month or two later than the recently completed visit to New York. The new work's title and description run as follows:

"Flivver Ten Million," a joyous epic; fantasy for orchestra (inspired by the familiar legend, "The ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner").

Dawn in Detroit—Chanticleer announces the dawn; the city stirs; the call to labor; march of the toilers; the din of the builders; birth of the locomotive; the hero emerges from the welter full-fledged, ready for service; he tries his mettle; he wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure; May night by the roadside (America's romance); the joy-riders (America's frolic); the collision (America's tragedy); Phoenix Americanus (the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit).

138

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 10 1927

MUSIC
By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall did not begin, as originally planned, with the fourth Brandenburg concerto of J. S. Bach, but with the delightful Vivaldi concerto in D minor for strings and organ in the edition of Alexander Siloti. The clearness, the lyricism, the transparent workmanship of this concerto were gloriously published by the strings of Mr. Koussevitsky's orchestra—a body of instruments to which he has gradually imparted a sensitiveness and luminosity of the highest artistic character.

Mr. Koussevitsky took the middle movement of the concerto, which is the one for some time erroneously accredited to Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, at a slow pace, and in a manner that might be called sentimental. The concerto, however, is very romantic and personal music; it lends itself to individual interpretation. Mr. Koussevitsky read the music with warm feeling and the most eloquent phrasing, and the rapid movements with exhilerating spirit.

This was one of the best balanced programs that the Boston Symphony has given here. Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, was played for the first time in New York; Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony completed the concert. Mr. Hill has seldom written with a surer hand for beautiful harmonic and orchestral effect, or with more sensuous impulse than in his new work. The poem of Amy Lowell hardly suggests the impassioned climaxes of the most vigorous pages. Each reader of a poem that he loves, however, finds different things in it. Mr. Hill finds moods of his own which he translates in a personal manner. Always a fastidious workman and a musician of exceptional taste, he has produced pages which are not merely examples of fine style but of poetic and emotional expression. Mr. Hill was present at the performance and acknowledged the applause.

A greater contrast to this music than the robust laughter of Honegger in his famous locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," could not easily have been provided. It was good to hear the piece again and experience a fresh impression of it after a lapse of two seasons since the first performance hereabouts. The results were reassuring. "Pacific 231" is real, joyous music. To us it is infinitely more real and more original than that best seller among recent choral works, "Roi David," which Honegger wrote to order and which has been successfully disposed of everywhere. "Pacific 231" is first of all a work of admirable musical organization. Master-craft is the servant of wit.

The development of the rhythms which accelerate with the thought of the monster hurtling through the darkness is masterly, but even more masterly is the conclusion—the collecting of the rhythms together, the piling up of them, one upon the other, as brakes grind and wheels stop and the music comes to an end. It is not a small thing to write a piece like this, a piece which is contemporaneous, full of energy and inhabited by laughter.

On the Thursday night preceding Mr. Koussevitsky had given a memorable performance of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. His Fifth was no less inspiring to hear. It is the one symphony of Tchaikovsky in which the composer turns upon annihilating forces within him and puts them to rout. The underlying emotional plan, striking enough, is akin to that of another Fifth Symphony—Beethoven's—in which the first romanticist celebrated the ascent of the spirit of man. We shall venture to say that in the finale of the symphony heard yesterday are certain phrases and moments reminded in their essence of Beethoven, when Tchaikovsky's orchestra sounds wild triumph, when the soul unfurls its pennons, when the battle is proud and victorious.

Mr. Koussevitsky, adopting tempi of his own, gave this great movement an intensely dramatic character. Elsewhere in the symphony he did not attempt to palliate the obviousness or commonness of certain ideas, or to make Tchaikowsky, when he sobbed and groaned, nobler than he was. The veracity and unadorned sincerity of the musical narrative threw into greater relief the qualities of weakness, humanity, pathos, grandeur, all contained in one man and composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 11 192

Boston Symphony Presents a Novelty

The Saturday afternoon program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra displayed Mr. Koussevitsky and his band at their best. The offerings included a novelty, "Lilacs," after the poem by Amy Lowell, composed by Edward Burlingame Hill, professor in the music department of Harvard University; Vivaldi's Concerto Grosse in D minor, Honegger's much traveled "Pacific 231," and Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The Boston Symphony played Prof. Hill's work for the first time anywhere in Cambridge on March 31. Miss Lowell's rhapsodic tribute to New England's lovely lilacs, a poem included in the posthumous volume entitled "What's o'Clock," drew from Prof. Hill a finely colored, beautifully scored composition, full of fervor, of sensitive ardor and delicate feeling. In thematic material and instrumental treatment the work was hardly distinctive, but its workmanship in every department was excellent. It was admirably played.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" is worth all of three season's importations of Europe's modern music. Until some one recreates in music a Mallet articulated compound climbing Marshall Pass this work must remain a fine buoyant tribute to the power and beauty of these surging monarchs of the rail.

Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, with the exception of some attenuated tempi, was beautifully played, with a glaring nobility of rich tone. In short, the afternoon's proceedings of the Boston Symphony's last concert of the season formed a distinct triumph for Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

C. H. N.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
APR 13 1927

STOKOWSKI'S REST

DR. STOKOWSKI brought much more than knowledge and skill to the direction of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He brought a restless and genuine poetic imagination and a marked taste for all sorts of exploration in music and the allied fields. Partly because of his exceptional gifts and partly because of the encouragement and recognition he received here, the Philadelphia Orchestra is now perhaps the best and most finished in the world. The Berlin Orchestra before the war and the Boston Orchestra under Major Higginson's part of the age, magnificent as they were, never quite achieved standards of perfection it has established in recent years.

All friends of the Orchestra and everyone who has any sense of the great influence it has been exerting on the musical life of the community will be sorry to see Stokowski go for even a year of rest. They will hope to see him return fully recovered from the illness that has been troubling him during all the present season. It will be a task to find any one competent to fill the place even temporarily. If a leader can be found versatile enough to work brilliantly over all the wide field that runs between the warm-hearted and imaginative children's concerts and the sympathetic experiments with headlong modernists like Varese, the city and the Orchestra will be lucky indeed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
APR 11 1927

Boston Orchestra Coses Season Here

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season on Saturday afternoon with probably the most emphatic finale that has ever been written—the gaudy flourish of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps it was the sentimental significance of the occasion that induced Mr. Koussevitzky to give the work so tearful a reading, but his adoring audience consumed the entire portion of emotional dessert with evident relish.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave further eloquent evidence of understanding and versatility in his performance of the familiar Hunnegger "Pacific 231." We hear this modern work frequently, but rarely with that completeness and rhythmic sweep which seems the very dynamic force, and beauty and cruelty of the vast locomotive it portrays. Mr. Koussevitzky proved that his previous interpretation of the work, enthusiastically received last year, was not a mere accident.

The novelty of the program was Hill's "Lilacs," based on the poem of Amy Lowell, and apparently appreciated by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
APR 16 1927

FLIVVER INSPIRES COMPOSER'S FANCY

Fantasy Produced by Boston Symphony Orchestra Dignifies Lowly Ford

RENDITION BRINGS LAUGHS

Boston, April 16.—(AP)—The trials and tribulations of the Ford, butt of a million jokes, had been dignified today by a place in musical literature and rendition by the staid Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" was the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

An audience clearly in a receptive mood listened sympathetically and laughed good-naturedly to Mr. Converse's musical, if mechanistic and metalistic, interpretation of the adventures of a "flivver" from throes of birth through a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration, and its blasts, muted first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Throughout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal, and the crash of busy life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston's musical mechanist received a cordial curtain call in New York, while Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Converse's work relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 16 1927

FLIVVER'S LIFE GIVEN IN MUSIC

Fantasy in Tin Is Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, April 16.—(AP) — The trials and tribulations of the lowly Ford, butt of a million jokes, had been dignified today by a place in musical literature and a rendition by staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," was the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The Ten Millionth Ford Is Now Serving Its Owner."

An audience clearly in a receptive mood listened sympathetically and laughed good naturedly to Mr. Converse's musical, if mechanistic and metalistic interpretation, of the adventures of a "flivver" from throes of birth through a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration and its blasts, muted, first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Throughout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal, and the crash of busied life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston musical mechanist was given a cordial curtain call. In New York, Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience. Converse's opus relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects.

Converse is the father-in-law of Junius S. Morgan, a partner with his father in the banking firm of J. P. Morgan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
APR 16 1927

Trials and Tribulations of Ford Car Dignified in Music by Staid Symphony Orchestra at Boston

By Associated Press.

Boston, April 16.—The trials and tribulations of the Ford have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The Ten-Millionth Ford Is Now Serving Its Owner."

An audience listened sympathetically and laughed good naturedly at Mr. Converse's musical if mechanistic and metalistic interpretation of the adventures of a "flivver" from throes of birth through a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration, and its blasts, muted first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Throughout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal and the crash of busied life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston's musical mechanist was given a cordial curtain call. In New York Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Mr. Converse's opus relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects. Mr. Converse is the father-in-law of Junius S. Morgan, a partner with his father in the banking firm of J. P. Morgan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
APR 16 1927

FANTASY USES FORD HORN AS REALISTIC AID

Boston Symphony Scores at Premiere Offering of 'Flivver 10,000,000'

Boston, April 15—(By the Associated Press)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here to-day as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "certain Call" unmarred by any hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Balle Mecanique," in Carnegie Hall, New York, recently.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, A Joyous Epic Fantasy for the Orchestra, composed F. S. Converse, Inspired by the Familiar Legend, 'The Ten Millionth Ford Is Now Serving Its Owner." The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part.

Ford Horn Sounds

The chief "extra" was a Ford horn sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra first, muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal, or crash and of continued life.

The sub-titles running through the manuscript tell the story:

Titles Tell Story

"Dawn in Detroit, chantiolzer announces the dawn, the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers.

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero, the hero emerges from the welter, full-fledged, ready for service, he tries his petel;

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure.

May night by the roadside (America's romance):

"The joy-riders (America's frolic);

America's Tragedy

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr. Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said, "I did it just for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's "Pacific 231" came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land, with far more possibilities for literary or musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
POST
APR 16 1927

BOSTON HEARS SYMPHONY OF THE FORD AUTO

Adventures of a Flivver Given Odd Musical Setting.

BOSTON, April 16.—(AP)—The trials and tribulations of the Ford auto have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the name of the fantasy, for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

An audience clearly listened sympathetically to and laughed good-naturedly at Mr. Converse's musical if mechanistic and metallistic interpretation of the adventures of a "flivver" from the throes of birth thru a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration, and its blasts, muted, first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Thruout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal, and the crash of busied life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston's musical mechanist was given a cordial curtain call. In New York, Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Mr. Converse's opus relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WISC.
JOURNAL
APR 16 1927

Flivver Tone Poem, Played in Boston, Receives Applause

Boston—(AP)—"Flivver, 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here Friday as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Laughter, as well as applause, greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," in Carnegie hall, New York, Apr. 10.

The full title of the work reads: "Flivver, 10,000,000, a joyous epic; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part. The chief "extra" was a Ford horn, sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra, first muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 10 1927

MUSIC
By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall did not begin, as originally planned, with the fourth Brandenburg concerto of J. S. Bach, but with the delightful Vivaldi concerto in D minor for strings and organ in the edition of Alexander Siloti. The clearness, the lyricism, the transparent workmanship of this concerto were gloriously published by the strings of Mr. Koussevitsky's orchestra—a body of instruments to which he has gradually imparted a sensitiveness and luminosity of the highest artistic character.

Mr. Koussevitsky took the middle movement of the concerto, which is the one for some time erroneously accredited to Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, at a slow pace, and in a manner that might be called sentimental. The concerto, however, is very romantic and personal music; it lends itself to individual interpretation. Mr. Koussevitsky read the music with warm feeling and the most eloquent phrasing, and the rapid movements with exhilerating spirit.

This was one of the best balanced programs that the Boston Symphony has given here. Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," poem for orchestra after Amy Lowell, was played for the first time in New York; Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony completed the concert. Mr. Hill has seldom written with a surer hand for beautiful harmonic and orchestral effect, or with more sensuous impulse than in his new work. The poem of Amy Lowell hardly suggests the impassioned climaxes of the most vigorous pages. Each reader of a poem that he loves, however, finds different things in it. Mr. Hill finds moods of his own which he translates in a personal manner. Always a fastidious workman and a musician of exceptional taste, he has produced pages which are not merely examples of fine style but of poetic and emotional expression. Mr. Hill was present at the performance and acknowledged the applause.

A greater contrast to this music than the robust laughter of Honegger in his famous locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," could not easily have been provided. It was good to hear the piece again and experience a fresh impression of it after a lapse of two seasons since the first performance hereabouts. The results were reassuring. "Pacific 231" is real, joyous music. To us it is infinitely more real and more original than that best seller among recent choral works, "Roi David," which Honegger wrote to order and which has been successfully disposed of everywhere. "Pacific 231" is first of all a work of admirable musical organization. Master-craft is the servant of wit.

The development of the rhythms which accelerate with the thought of the monster hurtling through the darkness is masterly, but even more masterly is the conclusion—the collecting of the rhythms together, the piling up of them, one upon the other, as brakes grind and wheels stop and the music comes to an end. It is not a small thing to write a piece like this, a piece which is contemporaneous, full of energy and inhabited by laughter.

On the Thursday night preceding Mr. Koussevitsky had given a memorable performance of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. His Fifth was no less inspiring to hear. It is the one symphony of Tchaikovsky in which the composer turns upon annihilating forces within him and puts them to rout. The underlying emotional plan, striking enough, is akin to that of another Fifth Symphony—Beethoven's—in which the first romanticist celebrated the ascent of the spirit of man. We shall venture to say that in the finale of the symphony heard yesterday are certain phrases and moments reminding in their essence of Beethoven, when Tchaikovsky's orchestra sounds wild triumph, when the soul unfurls its pennons, when the battle is proud and victorious.

Mr. Koussevitsky, adopting tempi of his own, gave this great movement an intensely dramatic character. Elsewhere in the symphony he did not attempt to palliate the obviousness or commonness of certain ideas, or to make Tchaikowsky, when he sobbed and groaned, nobler than he was. The veracity and unadorned sincerity of the musical narrative threw into greater relief the qualities of weakness, humanity, pathos, grandeur, all contained in one man and composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 11 1927

Boston Symphony Presents a Novelty

The Saturday afternoon program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra displayed Mr. Koussevitzky and his band at their best. The offerings included a novelty, "Lilacs," after the poem by Amy Lowell, composed by Edward Burlingame Hill, professor in the music department of Harvard University; Vivaldi's Concerto Grosse in D minor, Honegger's much traveled "Pacific 231," and Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The Boston Symphony played Prof. Hill's work for the first time anywhere in Cambridge on March 31. Miss Lowell's rhapsodic tribute to New England's lovely lilacs, a poem included in the posthumous volume entitled "What's o'Clock," drew from Prof. Hill a finely colored, beautifully scored composition, full of fervor, of sensitive ardor and delicate feeling. Its thematic material and instrumental treatment the work was hardly distinctive, but its workmanship in every department was excellent. It was admirably played.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" is worth all the three season's importations of Europe's modern music. Until some one recreates in music a Mallet articulated compound climbing Marshall Foss this work must remain a fine buoyant tribute to the power and beauty of these surging monarchs of the rail.

Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, with the exception of some attenuated tempi, was beautifully played, with a lasting nobility of rich tone. In short, the afternoon's proceedings of the Boston Symphony's last concert of the season formed a distinct triumph for Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant band.

C. H. N.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
APR 13 1927

STOKOWSKI'S REST

DR. STOKOWSKI brought much more than knowledge and skill to the direction of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He brought a restless and genuine poetic imagination and a marked thirst for all sorts of exploration in music and the allied fields. Partly because of his exceptional gifts and partly because of the encouragement and recognition he received here, the Philadelphia Orchestra is now perhaps the best and most finished in the world. The Berlin Orchestra before the war and the Boston Orchestra under Major Higginson's patronage, magnificent as they were, never quite achieved standards of perfection it has established in recent years.

All friends of the Orchestra and everyone who has any sense of the great influence it has been exerting on the musical life of the community will be sorry to see Stokowski go for even a year of rest. They will hope to see him return fully recovered from the illness that has been troubling him during all the present season. It will be a task to find any one competent to fill the place even temporarily. If a leader can be found versatile enough to work brilliantly over all the wide field that runs between the warm-hearted and imaginative children's concerts and the sympathetic experiments with headlong modernists like Varese, the city and the Orchestra will be lucky indeed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST
APR 11 1927

Boston Orchestra Coses Season Here

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season on Saturday afternoon with probably the most emphatic finale that has ever been written—the gaudy flourish of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps it was the sentimental significance of the occasion that induced Mr. Koussevitzky to give the work so tearful a reading, but his adoring audience consumed the entire portion of emotional dessert with evident relish.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave further eloquent evidence of understanding and versatility in his performance of the familiar Hunnegger "Pacific 231." We hear this modern work frequently, but rarely with that completeness and rhythmic sweep which seems the very dynamic force, and beauty and cruelty of the vast locomotive it portrays. Mr. Koussevitzky proved that his previous interpretation of the work, enthusiastically received last year, was not a mere accident.

The novelty of the program was Hill's "Lilacs," based on the poem of Amy Lowell, and apparently appreciated by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
APR 16 1927

FLIVVER INSPIRES COMPOSER'S FANCY

Fantasy Produced by Boston Symphony Orchestra Dignifies Lowly Ford

RENDITION BRINGS LAUGHS

Boston, April 16.—(AP)—The trials and tribulations of the Ford, butt of a million jokes, had been dignified today by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphon Orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" was the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

An audience clearly in a receptive mood listened sympathetically and laughed good-naturedly to Mr. Converse's musical, if mechanistic and metalistic, interpretation of the adventures of a "flivver" from throes of birth through a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration, and its blasts, muted first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Throughout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal, and the crash of busy life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston's musical mechanist received a cordial curtain call in New York, while Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Converse's work relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 16 1927

FLIVVER'S LIFE GIVEN IN MUSIC

Fantasy in Tin Is Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, April 16.—(AP)—The trials and tribulations of the lowly Ford, butt of a million jokes, had been dignified today by a place in musical literature and a rendition by staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," was the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The Ten Millionth Ford Is Now Serving Its Owner."

An audience clearly in a receptive mood listened sympathetically and laughed good naturedly to Mr. Converse's musical, if mechanistic and metalistic interpretation, of the adventures of a "flivver" from throes of birth through a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration and its blasts, muted, first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Throughout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal, and the crash of busied life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston musical mechanist was given a cordial curtain call. In New York, Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Converse's opus relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects.

Converse is the father-in-law of Junius S. Morgan, a partner with his father in the banking firm of J. P. Morgan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
APR 16 1927

138

...the ...ngle, his swallow plane, and to the ...ght, Marvel Crosson, his sister.

Trials and Tribulations of Ford Car Dignified in Music by Staid Symphony Orchestra at Boston

By Associated Press.

Boston, April 16.—The trials and tribulations of the Ford have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The Ten-Millionth Ford Is Now Serving Its Owner."

An audience listened sympathetically and laughed good naturedly at Mr. Converse's musical ff mechanistic and metalistic interpretation of the adventures of a "flivver" from throes of birth through a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration, and its blasts, muted first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Throughout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal and the crash of busied life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston's musical mechanist was given a cordial curtain call. In New York Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Mr. Converse's opus relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects. Mr. Converse is the father-in-law of Junius S. Morgan

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
APR 16 1927

FANTASY USES FORD HORN AS REALISTIC AID

Boston Symphony Scores at Premiere Offering of 'Flivver 10,000,000'

Boston, April 15—(By the Associated Press)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here to-day as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "certain Call" unmarred by any hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," in Carnegie Hall, New York, recently.

The full title of the work reads "Fliver 10,000,000, A Joyous Epic Fantasy for the Orchestra, composed F. S. Converse. Inspired by the Familiar Legend, 'The Ten Millionth Ford Is Now Serving Its Owner.'" The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part.

Ford Horn Sounds

The chief "extra" was a Ford horn sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra first, muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal, or crash and of continued life.

The sub-titles running through the manuscript tell the story:

Titles Tell Story

"Dawn in Detroit, chantiolzer announces the dawn, the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers.

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero, the hero emerges from the welter, full-fledged, ready for service, he tries his petel;

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure.

May night by the roadside (America's romance):

"The joy-riders (America's frolic);

America's Tragedy

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr. Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said, "I did it just for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's "Pacific 231" came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land, with far more possibilities for literary or musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

ODD COMPANY FOR QUAKER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
POST
APR 16 1927

BOSTON HEARS SYMPHONY OF THE FORD AUTO

Adventures of a Flivver Given Odd Musical Setting.

BOSTON, April 16.—(AP)—The trials and tribulations of the Ford auto have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the name of the fantasy, for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan. "the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

An audience clearly listened sympathetically to and laughed good-naturedly at Mr. Converse's musical if mechanistic and metallistic interpretation of the adventures of a "flivver" from the throes of birth thru a world whose adventurous path was not entirely strewn with roses.

A very real Ford horn lent the proper touch of verisimilitude to the orchestration, and its blasts, muted, first, then louder and unmuted, featured a dead pause in the movement. Thruout the composition was painted a background of jolting, rattling metal, and the crash of busied life.

In contrast to the premier of another somewhat similar work recently in New York, George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," Boston's musical mechanist was given a cordial curtain call. In New York, Antheil was liberally booed by what remained of a dwindling audience.

Mr. Converse's opus relied principally on the usual orchestral instruments, while Antheil employed more unusual means to score his effects. Mr. Converse is the father-in-law of Junius S. Morgan, a partner with his father in the banking firm of J. P. Morgan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WISC.
JOURNAL
APR 16 1927

Flivver Tone Poem, Played in Boston, Receives Applause

Boston—(AP)—"Flivver, 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here Friday as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Laughter, as well as applause, greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique," in Carnegie hall, New York, Apr. 10.

The full title of the work reads: "Flivver, 10,000,000, a joyous epic; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part. The chief "extra" was a Ford horn, sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra, first muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 161927

"FLIVVER TEN MILLION" ON RADIO

Whimsical Musical Offering by Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Air This Evening

The first performance of "Flivver Ten Million," a oyous epic by Frederick Converse, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra as the principal feature of its Easter Eve concert tonight, which will be broadcast at 8.10 o'clock from WBZ. The program, which is the 22d of the winter series to be given under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, is made available to radio listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby.

Out of the grist of ultramodern art, this embodiment of mechanical progress in a musical paraphrase stands out. The development of Converse's descriptive symphony is delineated in the following synopsis: "Dawn in Detroit — Chanticleer anounces dawn; the city stirs; the call to labor; march of the toilers; the din of the builders; birth of the hero; the hero emerges from the welter full-fledged, ready for service; he tries his mettle. He wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure. May night by the roadside (America's romance)—The joy riders (America's frolic)—the collision (America's tragedy) Phoenix Americanus. The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit.

As a counterpoise for this whimsical offering, the classical Fifth Symphony of Tschaikovsky will be given, together with other interesting and varied works. Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the departments of music at Boston university and Holy Cross col[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 161927

Flivver-Inspired Musical Fantasy Pleases The Hub

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Work With Ford Motif

Boston, April 15.—(AP.)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic musical wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any of the hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" in Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 10.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, a joyous epic; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner.'" The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part. The chief "extra" was Ford horn, sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra first, muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal, or crash and of continued life.

The subltitles running through the manuscript tell the story:

"Dawn in Detroit, chanticleer announces the dawn, the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers;

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero, the hero emerges from the welter, full fledged, ready for service, he tries his metal;

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure;

"May night by the roadside (America's romance);

"The joy riders (America's frolic);

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr. Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established has said, "I did it just for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's 'Pacific 231' came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land, with far more possibilities for literary or musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

The fantasia will be played at two more concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
APR 161927

AUTO SYMPHONY HONKS TO BOSTON PLAUDITS

By the United Press.

BOSTON, April 16.—With the familiar squawk of "flivver" horns sounding through historic old Symphony Hall, a composition by Frederick S. Converse has been rendered successfully for an audience of erudite Boston music lovers.

The title of Converse's work was "Flivver 10,000,000," based upon a report that the ten millionth Ford had just been delivered to an owner. It was played by the Boston Symphony.

As is the case with the "movies," a series of sub-titles were considered necessary to make the composition clear to the Back Bay audience.

First of these was:—

"Dawn in Detroit. Chanticleer announces the dawn. The city stirs. The call to labor."

Spasmodic applause from the audience greeted the composer's initial effort.

"Birth of the hero," read the second sub-title. "The hero emerges from the welter, full-fledged, ready for service. He tries his metal."

Muffled drums. A squawk from the clarinet, and a loud accompaniment of flivver horns.

The Boston audience gasped, but held their seats.

"The hero wanders forth into great world in search of adventure," read the next sub-title.

Too-too-eltee-ootelteeoo!

"May night by the roadside (American romance)."

"The joy-drivers (America's frolic)."

Oh, Mr. Converse, how could you?

"The collision (America's tragedy."

By this time, the audience at Symphony Hall was warmed to the plot. So many of them had to ride home in them.

"Phoenix Americanus." Turns upon the program. More horns and a lot of bass from the viols.

"The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the American spirit."

Boston is wondering what it was all about, while Converse wears a broad grin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 161927

'Flivver 10,000,000" Latest Musical Offering

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Presentation Draws Laughter, and Applause for Composer, F. S. Converse

Boston, April 15—(AP)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic musical wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any of the hostile demonstrations such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" at Carnegie hall, New York, the 10th.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, a joyous epic"; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the 10,000,000th Ford is now serving its owner.'" The fantasy tling metal, or crash and continued life.

The subtitles running through the manuscripe tell the story:—

"Dawn in Detroit, chanticleer announces the dawn; the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers;

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero; the hero emerges from the welter, fullfledged, ready for service, he tries his metal.

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure;

"May night by the roadside (America's romance);

"The joy-riders (America's frolic);

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his wal with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said: "I did it for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's 'Pacific 231' came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land with far more possibilities for literary o. musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

The fantasia will be played at two more Sym-

THIS CLIPPING FROM COMMERCIAL APPEA
MEMPHIS, TENN.
APR 171927

Saying It With Music.

Ever since a clever advertising man invented the slogan of "say it with" some particular commodity, almost everybody has been endeavoring to express himself or herself without words. It has come to the point where musical composers have been trying to express prevailing sentiment in music. Jazz, we are told by some students of music, is expressive of the turbulent, discordant and almost neurotic period in which we live. And it might be said also to interpret prevailing lawlessness since it is violative of musical canons.

In harmony with this same spirit are the two recent musical compositions designed to interpret our mechanical age. One of these, the "Ballet Mechanique," was recently produced amid considerable confusion, while the other, "Flivver 10,000,000," was played the other night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra amid much enjoyment and fun. It put a Ford car with its many sounds to music and the audience seemed to relish the rendition.

Naturally we may expect more of these interpretative compositions and just as naturally will fear arise in the minds of those who are enamored of music. Maybe the terrible day will come when some composer offers a symphony founded upon the construction of a steel building, a baseball game or a political convention. Who can tell? Or what can be done to prevent it?

We suggest these possibilities to the lovers of music so that, being forewarned, they may also be forearmed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PENSACOLA, FLA.
APR 17192[illegible]

FLIVVER NOW SET TO MUSIC

Latest Composition Is Well Received in Boston

BOSTON, April 16.—(AP)—"Flivver, 10,000,000" latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston symphony orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition bu[t] the composer, Frederick S. Covers[e] took a "curtain call" unmarred b[y] an hostile demonstration such a[s] greeted George Antheil's "balle[t] mecanique", in Carnegie Hall, Ne[w] York, on April 10.

The full title of the words read[s] "Flivver 10,000,000 a joyous epi[c] fantasy for the orchestra compose[d] by F. S. Converse, inspired by th[e] familiar legend 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner".

The fantasy as a whole followe[d] established form and utilized th[e] regular instrument of the orchestr[a] for the most part.

The chief "extra" was a Ford ho[rn] sounded in a dead pause of the o[r]chestra, first muted, then loud[er] blasts unmuted. It was here that t[he] audience laughed. The entire co[m]position was a realistic treatment [of] its subject with tortured hormoni[es] with more than a hint of joltin[g] rattling metal, or crash and of co[n]tinued life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK AMERICAN
APR 171927

Critic Cites Outstanding Events in His Memory

Says Good-Bye Until New Season Sounds Its Tones, Recalling Him to Duty.

As the musical season crowds to a close and the critic casts a backward glance over the concert events of the Winter, certain outstanding performances seem to remain in his memory and amaze him that there could be so many others which, in the words of a current song, he has "forgotten to remember."

Of visiting orchestras we had six, from Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Detroit, Cleveland and Minneapolis. Five of them played well and the Philadelphia Orchestra played superlatively.

* * *

Novelties in the way of new compositions were introduced here by the out-of-town, as well as by our local, orchestras. No epoch-making opus was in the list. Prokofieff's savage chorus, Seven, They Are Seven," was about the most distinctive of the lot. Rachmaninoff's latest piano concerto caused keen disappointment; Aaron Copeland's aroused hopes for his future; De Falla's (for harpsichord) was a dreadful bore. Douglas Moore's "P. T. Barnum" had pisuant moments that never touched greatness. Sibelius's latest symphony, overture and symphonic poem ("Tapiola") appeared to be the dying embers of a once glowing creative fire. Nothing of the contemporary French or English output scored a lasting impression.

Russians Ignored Us

Casella, with his suite, "Scarlatianna," and Respighi, with "Church Windows," showed that Italian composers do not move the world profoundly when they leave the medium of grand opera.

Modern Germany supplied us with Hindemith's concerto, a piece with cynicism, but no soul.

Janacek, of Czecho Slovakia, was on hand with a "Sinfonietta" that had some amiable pages where it did not try to be consciously "modernistic."

The Russians left us in the lurch entirely, so far as any new orchestral revelation of importance was concerned. Tschaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Moussorgsky [illegible] their twentieth century successors East of Brest-Litovsk.

* * *

Heading the conductors of our New York Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestras, Toscanini outdid them all in the finesse and finical musicianship of his leading. Others who swung the local baton were Mengelberg, Furtwaengler, Klemperer, Busch, Lange, Enesco, Casella, Poilain and the reliable and patriarchal Walter Damrosch, whose protracted farewellings brought him many displays of public esteem, private dinners and verdant laurel wreaths.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 1[illegible]

Boston Symphony In New London Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in the State Armory, New London, on Tuesday night, when the following program has been presented:

Overture to "Oberon" Weber
Prelude to "Lohengrin" Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" Wagner
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64 Tchaikovsky

1. Andante
2. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
3. Valse (Allegro moderato)
4. Finale (Andante maestoso, allegro vivace)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
ATLANTA, GA.
APR 171927

company.

* * *

IN THE Beethoven Centenary festival, arranged by the Boston Symphony, which ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, the coperation of the Harvard Glee club and the [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
T LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 17 1927

Symphony Orchestra Remembers Flivvers

BOSTON, April 16 (AP).—The trials and tribulations of the Ford have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The ten-millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

Trials of a Ford Are Pictured by Boston Symphony

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, April 16.—The trials and tribulations of the Ford, have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Con-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 161927

"FLIVVER TEN MILLION" ON RADIO

Whimsical Musical Offering by Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Air This Evening

The first performance of "Flivver Ten Million," a joyous epic by Frederick Converse, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra as the principal feature of its Easter Eve concert tonight, which will be broadcast at 8.10 o'clock from WBZ. The program, which is the 22d of the winter series to be given under the direction of Serge Kousseyitsky, conductor, is made available to radio listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby.

Out of the grist of ultramodern art, this embodiment of mechanical progress in a musical paraphrase stands out. The development of Converse's descriptive symphony is delineated in the following synopsis: "Dawn in Detroit — Chanticleer anounces dawn; the city stirs; the call to labor; march of the toilers; the din of the builders; birth of the hero; the hero emerges from the welter full-fledged, ready for service; he tries his mettle. He wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure. May night by the roadside (America's romance)—The joy riders (America's frolic)—the collision" (America's tragedy) Phoenix Americanus. The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit.

As a counterpoise for this whimsical offering, the classical Fifth Symphony of Tschaikovsky will be given, together with other interesting and varied works. Prof John Patten Marshall head of the departments of music at Boston university and Holy Cross col[lege will] t on Con[cert] [Sym]phony [Hall] [New] York

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 161927

Flivver-Inspired Musical Fantasy Pleases The Hub

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Work With Ford Motif

Boston, April 15.—(AP.)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic musical wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any of the hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" in Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 10.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, a joyous epic; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner.'" The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part. The chief "extra" was Ford horn, sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra first, muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal, or crash and of continued life.

The subtitles running through the manuscript tell the story:

"Dawn in Detroit, chanticleer announces the dawn, the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers;

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero, the hero emerges from the welter, full fledged, ready for service, he tries his metal;

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure;

"May night by the roadside (America's romance);

"The joy riders (America's frolic);

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr. Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said, "I did it just for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's 'Pacific 231' came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land, with far more possibilities for literary or musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

The fantasy will be played at two more concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
APR 161927

AUTO SYMPHONY HONKS TO BOSTON PLAUDITS

By the United Press.

BOSTON, April 16.—With the familiar squawk of "flivver" horns sounding through historic old Symphony Hall, a composition by Frederick S. Converse has been rendered successfully for an audience of erudite Boston music lovers.

The title of Converse's work was "Flivver 10,000,000," based upon a report that the ten millionth Ford had just been delivered to an owner. It was played by the Boston Symphony.

As is the case with the "movies," a series of sub-titles were considered necessary to make the composition clear to the Back Bay audience.

First of these was:—

"Dawn in Detroit. Chanticleer announces the dawn. The city stirs. The call to labor."

Spasmodic applause from the audience greeted the composer's initial effort.

"Birth of the hero," read the second sub-title. "The hero emerges from the welter, full-fledged, ready for service. He tries his metal."

Muffled drums. A squawk from the clarinet, and a loud accompaniment of flivver horns.

The Boston audience gasped, but held their seats.

"The hero wanders forth into great world in search of adventure," read the next sub-title.

Too-too-eltee-ootelteeoo!

"May night by the roadside (American romance)."

"The joy-drivers (America's frolic)."

Oh, Mr. Converse, how could you?

"The collision (America's tragedy."

By this time, the audience at Symphony Hall was warmed to the plot. So many of them had to ride home in them.

"Phoenix Americanus." Turns upon the program. More horns and a lot of bass from the viols.

"The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the American spirit."

Boston is wondering what it was all about, while Converse wears a broad grin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 161927

'Flivver 10,000,000" Latest Musical Offering

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Presentation Draws Laughter, and Applause for Composer, F. S. Converse

Boston, April 15—(AP)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic musical wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any of the hostile demonstrations such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" at Carnegie hall, New York, the 10th.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, a joyous epic"; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the 10,000,000th Ford is now serving its owner.'" The fantasy tling metal, or crash and continued life.

The subtitles running through the manuscripe tell the story:—

"Dawn in Detroit, chanticleer announces the dawn; the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers;

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero; the hero emerges from the welter, fullfledged, ready for service, he tries his metal.

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure;

"May night by the roadside (America's romance);

"The joy-riders (America's frolic);

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his wal with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said: "I did it for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's 'Pacific 231' came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land with far more possibilities for literary o. musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

The fantasia will be played at two more Sym-

THIS CLIPPING FROM COMMERCIAL APPEA
MEMPHIS, TENN.
APR 171927

Saying It With Music.

Ever since a clever advertising man invented the slogan of "say it with" some particular commodity, almost everybody has been endeavoring to express himself or herself without words. It has come to the point where musical composers have been trying to express prevailing sentiment in music. Jazz, we are told by some students of music, is expressive of the turbulent, discordant and almost neurotic period in which we live. And it might be said also to interpret prevailing lawlessness since it is violative of musical canons.

In harmony with this same spirit are the two recent musical compositions designed to interpret our mechanical age. One of these, the "Ballet Mechanique," was recently produced amid considerable confusion, while the other, "Flivver 10,000,000," was played the other night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra amid much enjoyment and fun. It put a Ford car with its many sounds to music and the audience seemed to relish the rendition.

Naturally we may expect more of these interpretative compositions and just as naturally will fear arise in the minds of those who are enamored of music. Maybe the terrible day will come when some composer offers a symphony founded upon the construction of a steel building, a baseball game or a political convention. Who can tell? Or what can be done to prevent it?

We suggest these possibilities to the lovers of music so that, being forewarned, they may also be forearmed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PENSACOLA, FLA.
APR 1 7 192

FLIVVER NOW SET TO MUSIC

Latest Composition Is Well Received in Boston

BOSTON, April 16.—(AP)—"Flivver, 10,000,000" latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston symphony orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition bu the composer, Frederick S. Coverse took a "curtain call" unmarred b an hostile demonstration such a greeted George Antheil's "balle mecanique", in Carnegie Hall, Ne York, on April 10.

The full title of the words read "Flivver 10,000,000 a joyous epi fantansy for the orchestra compose by F. S. Converse, inspired by th familiar legend 'the ten milliont Ford is now serving its owner".

The fantasy as a whole followe established form and utilized th regular instrument of the orchest for the most part.

The chief "extra" was a Ford ho sounded in a dead pause of the c chestra, first muted, then loud blasts unmuted. It was here that t audience laughed. The entire co position was a realistic treatment its subject with tortured hormoni with more than a hint of joltin rattling metal, or crash and of co tinued life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK AMERICAN
APR 171927

Critic Cites Outstanding Events in His Memory

Says Good-Bye Until New Season Sounds Its Tones, Recalling Him to Duty.

As the musical season crowds to a close and the critic casts a backward glance over the concert events of the Winter, certain outstanding performances seem to remain in his memory and amaze him that there could be so many others which, in the words of a current song, he has "forgotten to remember."

Of visiting orchestras we had six, from Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Detroit, Cleveland and Minneapolis. Five of them played well and the Philadelphia Orchestra played superlatively.

* * *

Novelties in the way of new compositions were introduced here by the out-of-town, as well as by our local, orchestras. No epoch-making opus was in the list. Prokofieff's savage chorus, Seven, They Are Seven," was about the most distinctive of the lot. Rachmaninoff's latest piano concerto caused keen disappointment; Aaron Copeland's aroused hopes for his future; De Falla's (for harpsichord) was a dreadful bore. Douglas Moore's "P. T. Barnum" had piquant moments that never touched greatness. Sibelius's latest symphony, overture and symphonic poem ("Tapiola") appeared to be the dying embers of a once glowing creative fire. Nothing of the contemporary French or English output scored a lasting impression.

* * *

Heading the conductors of our New York Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestras, Toscanini outdid them all in the finesse and finical musicianship of his leading. Others who swung the local baton were Mengelberg, Furtwaengler, Klemperer, Busch, Lange, Ersco, Casella, Pollain and the reliable and patriarchal Walter Damrosch, whose protracted farewellings brought him many displays of public esteem, private dinners and verdant laurel wreaths.

tieth century successors East of Brest-Litovsk.

* * *

Russians Ignored Us

Casella, with his suite, "Scarlatianna," and Respighi, with "Church Windows," showed that Italian composers do not move the world profoundly when they leave the medium of grand opera.

Modern Germany supplied us with Hindemith's concerto, a piece with cynicism, but no soul.

Janacek, of Czecho Slovakia, was on hand with a "Sinfonietta" that had some amiable pages where it did not try to be consciously "modernistic."

The Russians left us in the lurch entirely, so far as any new orchestral revelation of importance wa concerned. Tschaikowsky, Rim sky-Korsakoff and Moussorgsky their twen

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
ATLANTA, GA.
APR 171927

company.

* * *

IN THE Beethoven Centenary festival, arranged by the Boston Symphony, which ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, the coperation of the Harvard Glee club and the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
T LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 17 1927

Symphony Orchestra Remembers Flivvers

BOSTON, April 16 (AP).—The trials and tribulations of the Ford have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The ten-millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 1

Boston Symphony In New London Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in the State Armory, New London, on Tuesday night, when the following program has been presented:

Overture to "Oberon" Weber
Prelude to "Lohengrin" Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" Wagner
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64 Tchaikovsky

1. Andante
2. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
3. Valse (Allegro moderato)
4. Finale (Andante maestoso, allegro vivace)

Trials of a Ford Are Pictured by Boston Symphony

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, April 16.—The trials and tribulations of the Ford, have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Con-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 161927

"FLIVVER TEN MILLION" ON RADIO

Whimsical Musical Offering by Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Air This Evening

The first performance of "Flivver Ten Million," a oyous epic by Frederick Converse, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra as the principal feature of its Easter Eve concert tonight, which will be broadcast at 8.10 o'clock from WBZ. The program, which is the 22d of the winter series to be given under the direction of Serge Kousseyitsky, conductor, is made available to radio listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby.

Out of the grist of ultramodern art, this embodiment of mechanical progress in a musical paraphrase stands out. The development of Converse's descriptive symphony is delineated in the following synopsis: "Dawn in Detroit — Chanticleer anounces dawn; the city stirs; the call to labor; march of the toilers; the din of the builders; birth of the hero; the hero emerges from the welter full-fledged, ready for service; he tries his mettle. He wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure. May night by the roadside (America's romance)—The joy riders (America's frolic)—the collision (America's tragedy) Phoenix Americanus. The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit.

As a counterpoise for this whimsical offering, the classical Fifth Symphony of Tschaikovsky will be given, together with other interesting and varied works. Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the departments of music at Boston university and Holy Cross col[lege] will [con]cert or[ga]n[ist] [Con]verse [pre]sented [hal]f [York]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 161927

Flivver-Inspired Musical Fantasy Pleases The Hub

Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Work With Ford Motif

Boston, April 15.—(AP.)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic musical wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any of the hostile demonstration such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" in Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 10.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, a joyous epic; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner.'" The fantasy as a whole followed established form and utilized the regular instruments of the orchestra for the most part. The chief "extra" was Ford horn, sounded in a dead pause of the orchestra first, muted, and then louder blasts unmuted. It was here that the audience laughed. The entire composition was a realistic treatment of its subject with tortured harmonies, with more than a hint of jolting, rattling metal, or crash and of continued life.

The subtitles running through the manuscript tell the story:

"Dawn in Detroit, chanticleer announces the dawn, the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers;

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero, the hero emerges from the welter, full fledged, ready for service, he tries his metal;

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure;

"May night by the roadside (America's romance);

"The joy riders (America's frolic);

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr. Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said, "I did it just for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's 'Pacific 231' came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land, with far more possibilities for literary or musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

The fantasy will be played at two more concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
APR 161927

AUTO SYMPHONY HONKS TO BOSTON PLAUDITS

By the United Press.

BOSTON, April 16.—With the familiar squawk of "flivver" horns sounding through historic old Symphony Hall, a composition by Frederick S. Converse has been rendered successfully for an audience of erudite Boston music lovers.

The title of Converse's work was "Flivver 10,000,000," based upon a report that the ten millionth Ford had just been delivered to an owner. It was played by the Boston Symphony.

As is the case with the "movies," a series of sub-titles were considered necessary to make the composition clear to the Back Bay audience.

First of these was:—

"Dawn in Detroit. Chanticleer announces the dawn. The city stirs. The call to labor."

Spasmodic applause from the audience greeted the composer's initial effort.

"Birth of the hero," read the second sub-title. "The hero emerges from the welter, full-fledged, ready for service. He tries his metal."

Muffled drums. A squawk from the clarinet, and a loud accompaniment of flivver horns.

The Boston audience gasped, but held their seats.

"The hero wanders forth into great world in search of adventure," read the next sub-title.

Too-too-eltee-ootelteeoo!

"May night by the roadside (American romance)."

"The joy-drivers (America's frolic)."

Oh, Mr. Converse, how could you?

"The collision (America's tragedy."

By this time, the audience at Symphony Hall was warmed to the plot. So many of them had to ride home in them.

"Phoenix Americanus." Turns upon the program. More horns and a lot of bass from the viols.

"The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the American spirit."

Boston is wondering what it was all about, while Converse wears a broad grin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 161927

"Flivver 10,000,000" Latest Musical Offering

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Presentation Draws Laughter, and Applause for Composer, F. S. Converse

Boston, April 15—(AP)—"Flivver 10,000,000," latest of the mechanistic and metalistic musical wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition, but the composer, Frederick S. Converse, took a "curtain call" unmarred by any of the hostile demonstrations such as greeted George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" at Carnegie hall, New York, the 10th.

The full title of the work reads "Flivver 10,000,000, a joyous epic"; fantasy for the orchestra composed by F. S. Converse, inspired by the familiar legend, 'the 10,000,000th Ford is now serving its owner.'" The fantasy [form]

THIS CLIPPING FROM COMMERCIAL APPEA
MEMPHIS, TENN.
APR 171927

Saying It With Music.

Ever since a clever advertising man invented the slogan of "say it with" some particular commodity, almost everybody has been endeavoring to express himself or herself without words. It has come to the point where musical composers have been trying to express prevailing sentiment in music. Jazz, we are told by some students of music, is expressive of the turbulent, discordant and almost neurotic period in which we live. And it might be said also to interpret prevailing lawlessness since it is violative of musical canons.

In harmony with this same spirit are the two recent musical compositions designed to interpret our mechanical age. One of these, the "Ballet Mechanique," was recently produced amid considerable confusion, while the other, "Flivver 10,000,000," was played the other night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra amid much enjoyment and fun. It put a Ford car with its many sounds to music and the audience seemed to relish the rendition.

Naturally we may expect more of these interpretative compositions and just as naturally will fear arise in the minds of those who are enamored of music. Maybe the terrible day will come when some composer offers a symphony founded upon the construction of a steel building, a baseball game or a political convention. Who can tell? Or what can be done to prevent it?

We suggest these possibilities to the lovers of music so that, being forewarned, they may also be forearmed.

tling metal, or crash and continued life.

The subtitles running through the manuscripe tell the story:—

"Dawn in Detroit, chanticleer announces the dawn; the city stirs—the call to labor;

"March of the toilers;

"Din of the builders;

"Birth of the hero; the hero emerges from the welter, fullfledged, ready for service, he tries his metal.

"The hero wanders forth into the great world in search of adventure;

"May night by the roadside (America's romance);

"The joy-riders (America's frolic);

"The collision (America's tragedy);

"Phoenix Americanus, the hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his wal with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable American spirit."

Mr Converse, whose reputation for orchestration is established, has said: "I did it for fun, just to amuse myself. When Honegger's 'Pacific 231' came out, I said to myself that we in this country surely had something far more representative of the land with far more possibilities for literary o. musical treatment, than a mountain locomotive."

The fantasia will be played at two more [Bo]ston Sym-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PENSACOLA, FLA.
APR 1 7 192

FLIVVER NOW SET TO MUSIC

Latest Composition Is Well Received in Boston

BOSTON, April 16.—(AP)—"Flivver, 10,000,000" latest of the mechanistic and metalistic wares, offered itself for the first time to the public here today as one of four numbers played by the Boston symphony orchestra. Laughter as well as applause greeted the composition bu the composer, Frederick S. Covers took a "curtain call" unmarred b an hostile demonstration such a greeted George Antheil's "balle mecanique", in Carnegie Hall, Ne York, on April 10.

The full title of the words read "Flivver 10,000,000 a joyous epi fantasy for the orchestra compose by F. S. Converse, inspired by th familiar legend 'the ten millionth Ford is now serving its owner".

The fantasy as a whole followe established form and utilized th regular instrument of the orchest for the most part.

The chief "extra" was a Ford ho sounded in a dead pause of the o chestra, first muted, then loud blasts unmuted. It was here that t audience laughed. The entire co position was a realistic treatment its subject with tortured hormoni with more than a hint of joltir rattling metal, or crash and of co tinued life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
W YORK AMERICAN
APR 171927

Critic Cites Outstanding Events in His Memory

Says Good-Bye Until New Season Sounds Its Tones, Recalling Him to Duty.

As the musical season crowds to a close and the critic casts a backward glance over the concert events of the Winter, certain outstanding performances seem to remain in his memory and amaze him that there could be so many others which, in the words of a current song, he has "forgotten to remember."

Of visiting orchestras we had six, from Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Detroit, Cleveland and Minneapolis. Five of them played well and the Philadelphia Orchestra played superlatively.

* * *

Novelties in the way of new compositions were introduced here by the out-of-town, as well as by our local, orchestras. No epoch-making opus was in the list. Prokofieff's savage chorus, Seven, They Are Seven," was about the most distinctive of the lot. Rachmaninoff's latest piano concerto caused keen disappointment; Aaron Copeland's aroused hopes for his future; De Falla's (for harpsichord) was a dreadful bore. Douglas Moore's "P. T. Barnum" had piquant moments that never touched greatness. Sibelius's latest symphony, overture and symphonic poem ("Tapiola") appeared to be the dying embers of a once glowing creative fire. Nothing of the contemporary French or English output scored a lasting impression.

Russians Ignored Us

Casella, with his suite, "Scarlatianna," and Respighi, with "Church Windows," showed that Italian composers do not move the world profoundly when they leave the medium of grand opera.

Modern Germany supplied us with Hindemith's concerto, a piece with cynicism, but no soul.

Janacek, of Czecho Slovakia, was on hand with a "Sinfonietta" that had some amiable pages where it did not try to be consciously "modernistic."

The Russians left us in the lurch entirely, so far as any new orchestral revelation of importance wa concerned. Tschaikowsky, Rim sky-Korsakoff and Moussorgsky by their twen tieth century successors East of Brest-Litovsk.

* * *

Heading the conductors of our New York Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestras, Toscanini outdid them all in the finesse and finical musicianship of his leading. Others who swung the local baton were Mengelberg, Furtwaengler, Klemperer, Busch, Lange, Enesco, Casella, Pollain and the reliable and patriarchal Walter Damrosch, whose protracted farewellings brought him many displays of public esteem, private dinners and verdant laurel wreaths.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
ATLANTA, GA.
APR 171927

company.

* * *

IN THE Beethoven Centenary festival, arranged by the Boston Symphony, which ended with the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, the coperation of the Harvard Glee club and the [Radcliffe] society made THIS CLIPPING FROM [the] of the

T LAKE CITY, UT[AH] who
TRIBUNE

APR 17 1927

Symphony Orchestra Remembers Flivvers

BOSTON, April 16 (AP).—The trials and tribulations of the Ford have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000" is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Converse found inspiration in the advertising slogan, "The ten-millionth Ford is now serving its owner."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
APR 1

Boston Symphony In New London Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in the State Armory, New London, on Tuesday night, when the following program has been presented:

Overture to "Oberon" Weber
Prelude to "Lohengrin" Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" Wagner
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64 Tchaikovsky

1. Andante
2. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
3. Valse (Allegro moderato)
4. Finale (Andante maestoso, allegro vivace)

Trials of a Ford Are Pictured by Boston Symphony

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, April 16.—The trials and tribulations of the Ford, have been dignified by a place in musical literature and a rendition by the staid Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Flivver 10,000,000," is the name of the fantasy for which F. S. Con-

AUDITS

...ollision (America's trag-
...s time, the audience at
...y Hall was warmed to
So many of them had
...ome in them.
...ix Americanus." Turns
...e program. More horns
... of bass from the viols.
...hero, righted and shaken,
... on his way with re-
... energy, typical of the ...n spirit."
...n is wondering what it
... about, while Converse
... broad grin.

...nding Memory

...son Sounds Its
...o Duty.

...ose and the critic
... concert events of
...erformances seem
...hat there could be
... current song, he

... we had six, from
...ncinnati, Detroit,
...lis. Five of them
...iladelphia Orches-

...f new compositions
... the out-of-town, as
...estras. No epoch-
... Prokofieff's savage
...even," was about the
...lot. Rachmaninoff's
...ed keen disappoint-
...oused hopes for his
...harpsichord) was a
...ore's "P. T. Barnum"
...ry successors East of
...sk.

* * *

...g the conductors of our
...k Symphony and Philhar-
...Orchestras, Toscanini out-
... all in the finesse and
...usicianship of his leading.
...who swung the local baton
...engelberg, Furtwaengler,
...er, Busch, Lange, Enesco,
... Polain and the reliable
...ciarchal Walter Damrosch,
... protracted farewellings
... many displays of
...eem, private dinners and
...al wreaths.

...PPING FROM
...UN

...719

...ymphony In ...w London Tuesday

...on Symphony Orchestra, ...rge Koussevitzky, will be ...e State Armory, New Lon-...sday night, when the fol-...ram has been presented:

... "Oberon"	Weber
... "Tannhaengrin"	Wagner
... "Die Meistersinger ...urnberg"	Wagner
... No. 5 in E minor, op. 64	Tchaikovsky

...ante ...ante cantabile, con alcuna ...za.
... (Allegro moderato)
... (Andante maestoso, ...ssai vivace)

...t a Ford ...Pictured by ...t Symphony

...ociated Press.
...t 16.—The trials ...of the Ford, have ...a place in musical ...rendition by the ...phony orchestra. ...," is the name ...which F. S. Con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

...R 17 1927

NEWMAN HAILS BOSTON

ERNEST NEWMAN, who delivered the address on Beethoven at the festival held in Boston in commemoration of his death, wrote for The Boston Globe his impressions of Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Perhaps a keen American visitor of London, hearing one of our orchestras at its best, might find a touch or two about the playing that is our peculiar virtue. They say our men are the best sight-readers imaginable. They have to be particularly good at that, for they get such scanty rehearsals. I heard a number of representative American orchestras in New York, where I spent the Winter of 1924-1925, and I had the feeling at times that while these orchestras were miles ahead of ours in the qualities that come from long and steady and concentrated discipline, there is sometimes more spontaneity and intensity in the playing of our men. I put this down to the fact that, knowing as they do that the machine of which they are parts is not of itself perfect, and that it is up to each of them to do all he can to atone for the defects in the machine, each man is a more highly charged dynamo than the individual player in a perfectly disciplined and perfectly rehearsed orchestra feels it necessary for him to be. But this is only a conjecture on my part; I should like to exchange opinions on the subject with some shrewd American observer after he had spent a Winter in the London concert halls.

"Certainly the perfection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are lucid and lustrous, and the wood wind tone is ravishing. Perhaps for judging the wood wind, the Beethoven symphonies have been especially useful, for Beethoven's curt epigrammatic phrases for flute, clarinet, oboe and bassoon are often of extraordinary significance; the flute and the bassoon tone in particular have been a constant joy to me.

"But what has impressed me most in the orchestral playing has been the ensemble, the perfect fitting of detail to detail. In London, under present conditions, it is sheerly impossible to get such playing as we have just had in Boston in the first, second, fourth and sixth symphonies of Beethoven, not because our men are incapable of such delicacy of style, but simply because they could never get the necessary amount of rehearsal.

"The one man in England who can get results of this kind is Sir Thomas Beecham, a conductor of rare genius. I have heard him play Beethoven's Second Symphony in a way that, like Koussevitsky's, was a revelation to people who had got into the habit of thinking this early work is old-fashioned and negligible. But Sir Thomas could get his results, for the most part, only by magnetism and driving power—the exquisite detail work, the ease and calm assurance of the little snatches of dialogue between one instrument and another, that made the Boston performance of the first and second symphonies so entrancing, all this it is impossible to get under our English conditions of one or two rehearsals, often with deputies—that is to say, one man playing at rehearsal and another at the concert. I thought I knew my Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, during the last ten days or so, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y. NEWS
APR 17 1927

* * *

"Flivver No. 10,000,000!" What does this suggest? Well, anyway, it was the name of a futuristic composition played by the Boston Symphony orchestra through WJZ.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 17 1927

Printing Press Will Enter Lists for Musical Honors

By United Press.

Boston, April 16.—With a symphony based on steam riveting and airplane propellers presented in New York and a musical narrative representing the life of a Ford car offered a Boston audience in a single week, the music world today awaited a tone poem of printing presses or a sonata of subways to make the mechanical series complete.

George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" stunned a New York audience Sunday night and Frederick Converse's "Flivver 10,000,000" was sprung on unsuspecting Bostonians by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. One of the differences, according to music critics, that Converse intended his to be funny.

Opening at dawn of a bright day in Detroit the Converse music depicts the driver of a "Lizzie" sailing blithely down the high road. Then comes a crash, but a moment or two later the sprightly car is again chugging merrily along

Shrill tootings on a Ford horn interrupt the progress of the symphony at frequent intervals. A noisy scene in the Ford factory was hailed by critics as "exceedingly ingenius."

The orchestral fantasy was favorably received by the critics and the public. Converse was given an ovation at the conclusion of the concert.

The words of one Boston critic, "Flivver 10,000,000 is not mere smart aleckry, but a symphonic piece, admirable for its resourceful orchestration, its command of a wide range of harmonic effects, its fancy and its humor."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 17 1928

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL

$5303 Raised Thus Far to Bring Boston Symphony Back to Providence.

PLEDGES ARE SOLICITED

Officers Point Out That Contributions May Be Paid in Fall. $3059 Given This Week

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hail	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
MAY 19 1928

Mischa Elman Back For Concert Tour

Mischa Elman, famous violinist, who has been spending eighteen months in a concert tour through Europe, returned to this country last week on the Paris, accompanied by his wife and his daughter, Nadia. After a short rest he will begin immediately to prepare for an extensive concert tour next season, whjch is to number eighty performances. Mr. Elman disagreed with Pierre Monteux, eminent composer and conductor who recently declared on leaving Philadelphia that Americans were more interested in the clothes of the conductor that in the music of the orchestra.

"Leading European musicians I met in my recent tour," said the violinist, "emphasized that American audiences are not only musically intelligent but are supercritical because they command the greatest talent of the world today. The Philharmonic of New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony are far superior to any European symphonies except the Amsterdam Symphony, which is conducted by William Mengelberg."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 17 192...

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL; $5303 IS PLEDGED

Officers Gratified by Response to Appeal for $10,000 to Assure Return of Symphony to City and to Provide for Two Separate Concerts.

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hail	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 17 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fund Is at Half Way Point

A fund raised for the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston symphony orchestra to Providence next season has reached a total of $5303, which is just over the half-way mark. The total sought is $10,000.

So far this week $3059 in pledges and contributions has been received. Officers of the organization emphasized today that pledges are as acceptable as contributions, the pledges to become due in the fall.

The fund is to underwrite two concerts here by brilliant artists in 1929 as well as to enable the return of the symphony orchestra next season. In case the concerts are self supporting, substantial refunds to the contributors' will be made.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street.

Late contributions are: Mrs. Frederick Talcott, $50; Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, $50; Mrs. Albert A. Baker, $25; Mrs. Frederick William Howe, $50; Dr. William H. P. Faunce, $75; Donald Jackson, $100; a Masonic group, $144; Hugh MacColl, $100; Helen G. Chase, $25; W. G. W., $100; Mrs. G. C. Carpenter, $15; Francis B. Keeney, $25; Herbert W. Rice, $125; William Gammell, $100; Miss Mary Caron Smith, $5; Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard, $50; Mrs. Murray Danforth, $100; Mrs. John W. Knowles, $125; Mrs. George Hail, $200; Anonymous, $500; John Nicholas Brown, $500; Samuel M. Nicholson, $500; D. W. W., $75; Mrs. Archibald Silverman, $20.

MARRIAGE INTENTIONS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 19 1928

...tial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hail	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

...VETERAN CHIEF RESIGNS ...assure the success of two concerts which the Music Association proposes to present to the Providence music lovers in the spring of 1929. These will be solo concerts by world-famous artists.

Although most of the contributions to date have been proportionately large ones, one of the officers of the Music Association yesterday pointed out that the fund is in reality a community affair and that pledges (which would become due next fall) or contributions of small denominations are as welcome as are the larger contributions to the fund.

Juvenile Club Leads Way.

The Juvenile Chopin Club leads the way for the contributors of small amounts and the letter which Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, received with the $7 contribution indicates the attitude with which the Symphony Fund is viewed by this young musical organization.

The letter follows:

"My dear Mrs. Gammell:

"Inclosed please find check for $7 from the Juvenile Chopin Club. Five dollars was taken from the club's treasury and $2 was donated by guests at last Saturday's meeting.

"The Juvenile Chopin Club's members range in age from eight to 16 years and we are the youngest music club in Rhode Island. We are not too young, however, to realize the necessity and benefits of good music and so we send this contribution and we wish we had 100 times that to give for such a worthy cause. I hope you meet with the greatest success in collecting your fund.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "SELMA RUTH SILVERMAN,
"President, The Juvenile Chopin Club."

Music Association Gratified

Officers of the Music Association are highly gratified by the response with which the music-lovers of Providence and the vicinity have met the appeal for the fund which will make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city for still another season. It is, however, the desire of the Music Association to make the Symphony Fund one which all music lovers may be interested in and for that reason it is hoped that small contributions and pledges will be received in greater numbers in the future.

All pledges and contributions should be sent to Mrs. Gammell, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted contributions follow:

Mrs. R. Edwards Annin, Jr.	$15
Helen C. Robertson	50
R. Clinton Fuller	100
Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr.	50
Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Prescott Knight, Jr.	100
Mrs. Elisha H. Howard	25
Charles H. W. Mandeville	25
Mary Greene Chapin	12
Mr. and Mrs. W. Kinsley Low	50
Juvenile Chopin Club	7
Total	$434
Total to date	$5737
Amount still to be raised	$4263

FIVE HARVARD STUDENTS

...N
...'S
...ds
...ED
...ing
...n-
...or-
...lub.
...As-
...Bos-
...just
...iven
...$434.
...date
...Fund
...hony
...d to

Other notices for 1928 are in Book marked 1927 - 1928 - FROM MAY 17 to Aug 26 -

AUDITS

llision (America's trag-

time, the audience at Hall was warmed to
So many of them had
me in them.
x Americanus." Turns program. More horns
of bass from the viols.
ero, righted and shaken,
on his way with re-
energy, typical of the spirit."
is wondering what it
about, while Converse broad grin.

ding lemory
n Sounds Its Duty.
e and the critic
oncert events of rformances seem at there could be current song, he

we had six, from cinnati, Detroit,
. Five of them
delphia Orches-

new compositions
he out-of-town, as tras. No epoch-
Prokofieff's savage
en," was about the Rachmaninoff's keen disappoint-
sed hopes for his rpsichord) was a e's "P. T. Barnum"

successors East of conductors of our phony and Philhartras, Toscanini out-in the finesse and ship of his leading.

wung the local baton berg, Furtwaengler, usch, Lange, Enesco, ain and the reliable
l Walter Damrosch, racted farewellings
many displays of private dinners and l wreaths.

PPING FROM UN 1927 mphony In w London Tuesday

Symphony Orchestra,
Koussevitzky, will be
State Armory, New Lon-
day night, when the fol-
am has been presented:
"Oberon" Weber
"Lohengrin" Wagner
Die Meistersinger
Wagner
berg"
5 in E minor, op. 64
Tchaikovsky
te cantabile, con alcuna
(Allegro moderato)
(Andante maestoso, vivace)

Ford
ed by mphony
Press.
The trials
d, have musical the tra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 17 1927

NEWMAN HAILS BOSTON

ERNEST NEWMAN, who delivered the address on Beethoven at the festival held in Boston in commemoration of his death, wrote for The Boston Globe his impressions of Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Perhaps a keen American visitor of London, hearing one of our orchestras at its best, might find a touch or two about the playing that is our peculiar virtue. They say our men are the best sight-readers imaginable. They have to be particularly good at that, for they get such scanty rehearsals. I heard a number of representative American orchestras in New York, where I spent the Winter of 1924-1925, and I had the feeling at times that while these orchestras were miles ahead of ours in the qualities that come from long and steady and concentrated discipline, there is sometimes more spontaneity and intensity in the playing of our men. I put this down to the fact that, knowing as they do that the machine of which they are parts is not of itself perfect, and that it is up to each of them to do all he can to atone for the defects in the machine, each man is a more highly charged dynamo than the individual player in a perfectly disciplined and perfectly rehearsed orchestra feels it necessary for him to be. But this is only a conjecture on my part; I should like to exchange opinions on the subject with some shrewd American observer after he had spent a Winter in the London concert halls.

"Certainly the perfection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are lucid and lustrous, and the wood wind tone is ravishing. Perhaps for judging the wood wind, the Beethoven symphonies have been especially useful, for Beethoven's curt epigrammatic phrases for flute, clarinet, oboe and bassoon are often of extraordinary significance; the flute and the bassoon tone in particular have been a constant joy to me.

"But what has impressed me most in the orchestral playing has been the ensemble, the perfect fitting of detail to detail. In London, under present conditions, it is sheerly impossible to get such playing as we have just had in Boston in the first, second, fourth and sixth symphonies of Beethoven, not because our men are incapable of such delicacy of style, but simply because they could never get the necessary amount of rehearsal.

"The one man in England who can get results of this kind is Sir Thomas Beecham, a conductor of rare genius. I have heard him play Beethoven's Second Symphony in a way that, like Koussevitsky's, was a revelation to people who had got into the habit of thinking this early work is old-fashioned and negligible. But Sir Thomas could get his results, for the most part, only by magnetism and driving power—the exquisite detail work, the ease and calm assurance of the little snatches of dialogue between one instrument and another, that made the Boston performance of the first and second symphonies so entrancing, all this it is impossible to get under our English conditions of one or two rehearsals, often with deputies—that is to say, one man playing at rehearsal and another at the concert. (I thought I knew my Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, during the last ten days or so, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
NEWS
APR 17 1927

* * * *

"Flivver No. 10,000,000!" What does this suggest? Well, anyway, it was the name of a futuristic composition played by the Boston Symphony orchestra through WJZ.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 17 1927

Printing Press Will Enter Lists for Musical Honors

By United Press.

Boston, April 16.—With a symphony based on steam riveting and airplane propellers presented in New York and a musical narrative representing the life of a Ford car offered a Boston audience in a single week, the music world today awaited a tone poem of printing presses or a sonata of subways to make the mechanical series complete.

George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" stunned a New York audience Sunday night and Frederick Converse's "Flivver 10,000,000" was sprung on unsuspecting Bostonians by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. One of the differences, according to music critics, that Converse intended his to be funny.

Opening at dawn of a bright day in Detroit the Converse music depicts the driver of a "Lizzie" sailing blithely down the high road. Then comes a crash, but a moment or two later the sprightly car is again chugging merrily along.

Shrill tootings on a Ford horn interrupt the progress of the symphony at frequent intervals. A noisy scene in the Ford factory was hailed by critics as "exceedingly ingenius."

The orchestral fantasy was favorably received by the critics and the public. Converse was given an ovation at the conclusion of the concert.

The words of one Boston critic, "Flivver 10,000,000 is not mere smart aleckry, but a symphonic piece, admirable for its resourceful orchestration, its command of a wide range of harmonic effects, its fancy and its humor."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 17 1928

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL

$5303 Raised Thus Far to Bring Boston Symphony Back to Providence.

PLEDGES ARE SOLICITED

Officers Point Out That Contributions May Be Paid In Fall.

$3059 Given This Week

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the Music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hall	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
MAY 19 1928

Mischa Elman Back For Concert Tour

Mischa Elman, famous violinist, who has been spending eighteen months in a concert tour through Europe, returned to this country last week on the Paris, accompanied by his wife and his daughter, Nadia. After a short rest he will begin immediately to prepare for an extensive concert tour next season, which is to number eighty performances. Mr. Elman disagreed with Pierre Monteux, eminent composer and conductor who recently declared on leaving Philadelphia that Americans were more interested in the clothes of the conductor that in the music of the orchestra.

"Leading European musicians I met in my recent tour," said the violinist, "emphasized that American audiences are not only musically intelligent but are supercritical because they command the greatest talent of the world today. The Philharmonic of New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony are far superior to any European symphonies except the Amsterdam Symphony, which is conducted by William Mengelberg."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 17 1928

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL; $5303 IS PLEDGED

Officers Gratified by Response to Appeal for $10,000 to Assure Return of Symphony to City and to Provide for Two Separate Concerts.

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hall	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 17 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fund Is at Half Way Point

A fund raised for the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston symphony orchestra to Providence next season has reached a total of $5303, which is just over the half-way mark. The total sought is $10,000.

So far this week $3059 in pledges and contributions has been received. Officers of the organization emphasized today that pledges are as acceptable as contributions, the pledges to become due in the fall.

The fund is to underwrite two concerts here by brilliant artists in 1929 as well as to enable the return of the symphony orchestra next season. In case the concerts are self supporting, substantial refunds to the contributors' will be made.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street.

Late contributions are: Mrs. Frederick Talcott, $50; Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, $50; Mrs. Albert A. Baker, $25; Mrs. Frederick William Howe, $50; Dr. William H. P. Faunce, $75; Donald Jackson, $100; a Masonic group, $144; Hugh MacColl, $100; Helen G. Chase, $25; W. G. W., $100; Mrs. G. C. Carpenter, $15; Francis B. Keeney, $25; Herbert W. Rice, $125; William Gammell, $100; Miss Mary Caron Smith, $5; Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard, $50; Mrs. Murray Danforth, $100; Mrs. John W. Knowles, $125; Mrs. George Hall, $200; Anonymous, $500; John Nicholas Brown, $500; Samuel M. Nicholson, $500; D. W. W., $75; Mrs. Archibald Silverman, $20.

MARRIAGE INTENTIONS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 19 1928

tial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hall	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

VETERAN CHIEF RESIGNS

assure the success of two concerts which the Music Association proposes to present to the Providence music lovers in the spring of 1929. These will be solo concerts by world-famous artists.

Although most of the contributions to date have been proportionately large ones, one of the officers of the Music Association yesterday pointed out that the fund is in reality a community affair and that pledges (which would become due next fall) or contributions of small denominations are as welcome as are the larger contributions to the fund.

Juvenile Club Leads Way.

The Juvenile Chopin Club leads the way for the contributors of small amounts and the letter which Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, received with the $7 contribution indicates the attitude with which the Symphony Fund is viewed by this young musical organization.

The letter follows:

"My dear Mrs. Gammell:

"Inclosed please find check for $7 from the Juvenile Chopin Club. Five dollars was taken from the club's treasury and $2 was donated by guests at last Saturday's meeting.

"The Juvenile Chopin Club's members range in age from eight to 16 years and we are the youngest music club in Rhode Island. We are not too young, however, to realize the necessity and benefits of good music and so we send this contribution and we wish we had 100 times that to give for such a worthy cause. I hope you meet with the greatest success in collecting your fund.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "SELMA RUTH SILVERMAN,
"President, The Juvenile Chopin Club."

Music Association Gratified

Officers of the Music Association are highly gratified by the response with which the music-lovers of Providence and the vicinity have met the appeal for the fund which will make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city for still another season. It is, however, the desire of the Music Association to make the Symphony Fund one which all music lovers may be interested in and for that reason it is hoped that small contributions and pledges will be received in greater numbers in the future.

All pledges and contributions should be sent to Mrs. Gammell, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted contributions follow:

Mrs. R. Edwards Annin, Jr.	$15
Helen C. Robertson	100
R. Clinton Fuller	50
Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr.	50
Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Prescott Knight, Jr.	100
Mrs. Elisha H. Howard	25
Charles H. W. Mandeville	25
Mary Greene Chapin	12
Mr. and Mrs. W. Kinsley Low	50
Juvenile Chopin Club	7
Total	$434
Total to date	$5737
Amount still to be raised	$4263

BLUE HARVEST

Other notices for 1928 are in Book marked 1927 - 1928 - From May 17 to Aug 26 -

AUDITS

llision (America's trag-

time, the audience at Hall was warmed to
So many of them had
me in them.
x Americanus." Turns program. More horns
of bass from the viols.
ero, righted and shaken,
on his way with re-
energy, typical of the spirit."
is wondering what it
about, while Converse broad grin.

nding Memory

n Sounds Its Duty.

e and the critic
oncert events of rformances seem at there could be current song, he

we had six, from ncinnati, Detroit,
s. Five of them hiladelphia Orches-

new compositions
the out-of-town, as stras. No epoch-
Prokofieff's savage
en," was about the Rachmaninoff's
keen disappointaroused hopes for his harpsichord) was a
Moore's "P. T. Barnum" successors East of

• • •

the conductors of our k Symphony and Philhar-
Orchestras, Toscanini out-
all in the finesse and musicianship of his leading,
who swung the local baton
engelberg, Furtwaengler,
r, Busch, Lange, Enesco, Poltkin and the reliable
riarchal Walter Damrosch,
protracted farewellings hing many displays of ers, private dinners and al wreaths.

PPING FROM UN

719

Symphony In ew London Tuesday

on Symphony Orchestra,
Koussevitzky, will be
State Armory, New Lon-
day night, when the fol-
am has been presented:
"Oberon" Weber
"Lohengrin" Wagner
"Die Meistersinger
Nurnberg" Wagner
No. 5 in E minor, op. 64
Tchaikovsky
ante ante cantabile, con alcuna aza
(Allegro moderato)
o (Andante maestoso, ro vivace)

of a Ford Pictured by ton Symphony ited Press.

16.—The trials
the Ford, have place in musical dition by the orchestra.
is the name
h F. S. Con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 17 1927

NEWMAN HAILS BOSTON

ERNEST NEWMAN, who delivered the address on Beethoven at the festival held in Boston in commemoration of his death, wrote for The Boston Globe his impressions of Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Perhaps a keen American visitor of London, hearing one of our orchestras at its best, might find a touch or two about the playing that is our peculiar virtue. They say our men are the best sight-readers imaginable. They have to be particularly good at that, for they get such scanty rehearsals. I heard a number of representative American orchestras in New York, where I spent the Winter of 1924-1925, and I had the feeling at times that while these orchestras were miles ahead of ours in the qualities that come from long and steady and concentrated discipline, there is sometimes more spontaneity and intensity in the playing of our men. I put this down to the fact that, knowing as they do that the machine of which they are parts is not of itself perfect, and that it is up to each of them to do all he can to atone for the defects in the machine, each man is a more highly charged dynamo than the individual player in a perfectly disciplined and perfectly rehearsed orchestra feels it necessary for him to be. But this is only a conjecture on my part; I should like to exchange opinions on the subject with some shrewd American observer after he had spent a Winter in the London concert halls.

"Certainly the perfection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are lucid and lustrous, and the wood wind tone is ravishing. Perhaps for judging the wood wind, the Beethoven symphonies have been especially useful, for Beethoven's curt epigrammatic phrases for flute, clarinet, oboe and bassoon are often of extraordinary significance; the flute and the bassoon tone in particular have been a constant joy to me.

"But what has impressed me most in the orchestral playing has been the ensemble, the perfect fitting of detail to detail. In London, under present conditions, it is sheerly impossible to get such playing as we have just had in Boston in the first, second, fourth and sixth symphonies of Beethoven, not because our men are incapable of such delicacy of style, but simply because they could never get the necessary amount of rehearsal.

"The one man in England who can get results of this kind is Sir Thomas Beecham, a conductor of rare genius. I have heard him play Beethoven's Second Symphony in a way that, like Koussevitsky's, was a revelation to people who had got into the habit of thinking this early work is old-fashioned and negligible. But Sir Thomas could get his results, for the most part, only by magnetism and driving power—the exquisite detail work, the ease and calm assurance of the little snatches of dialogue between one instrument and another, that made the Boston performance of the first and second symphonies so entrancing, all this it is impossible to get under our English conditions of one or two rehearsals, often with deputies—that is to say, one man playing at rehearsal and another at the concert. I thought I knew my Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, during the last ten days or so, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
NEWS
APR 17 1927

* * *

"Flivver No. 10,000,000!" What does this suggest? Well, anyway, it was the name of a futuristic composition played by the Boston Symphony orchestra through WJZ.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 17 1927

Printing Press Will Enter Lists for Musical Honors

By United Press.

Boston, April 16.—With a symphony based on steam riveting and airplane propellers presented in New York and a musical narrative representing the life of a Ford car offered a Boston audience in a single week, the music world today awaited a tone poem of printing presses or a sonata of subways to make the mechanical series complete.

George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" stunned a New York audience Sunday night and Frederick Converse's "Flivver 10,000,000" was sprung on unsuspecting Bostonians by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. One of the differences, according to music critics, that Converse intended his to be funny.

Opening at dawn of a bright day in Detroit the Converse music depicts the driver of a "Lizzie" sailing blithely down the high road. Then comes a crash, but a moment or two later the sprightly car is again chugging merrily along

Shrill tootings on a Ford horn interrupt the progress of the symphony at frequent intervals. A noisy scene in the Ford factory was hailed by critics as "exceedingly ingenius."

The orchestral fantasy was favorably received by the critics and the public. Converse was given an ovation at the conclusion of the concert.

The words of one Boston critic, "Flivver 10,000,000 is not mere smart aleckry, but a symphonic piece, admirable for its resourceful orchestration, its command of a wide range of harmonic effects, its fancy and its humor."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 17 1928

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL

$5303 Raised Thus Far to Bring Boston Symphony Back to Providence.

PLEDGES ARE SOLICITED

Officers Point Out That Contributions May Be Paid in Fall. $3059 Given This Week

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hall	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
MAY 19 1928

Mischa Elman Back For Concert Tour

Mischa Elman, famous violinist, who has been spending eighteen months in a concert tour through Europe, returned to this country last week on the Paris, accompanied by his wife and his daughter, Nadia. After a short rest he will begin immediately to prepare for an extensive concert tour next season, which is to number eighty performances. Mr. Elman disagreed with Pierre Monteux, eminent composer and conductor who recently declared on leaving Philadelphia that Americans were more interested in the clothes of the conductor that in the music of the orchestra.

"Leading European musicians I met in my recent tour," said the violinist, "emphasized that American audiences are not only musically intelligent but are supercritical because they command the greatest talent of the world today. The Philharmonic of New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony are far superior to any European symphonies except the Amsterdam Symphony, which is conducted by William Mengelberg."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 17 1928

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL; $5303 IS PLEDGED

Officers Gratified by Response to Appeal for $10,000 to Assure Return of Symphony to City and to Provide for Two Separate Concerts.

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hall	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 17 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fund Is at Half Way Point

A fund raised for the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston symphony orchestra to Providence next season has reached a total of $5303, which is just over the half-way mark. The total sought is $10,000.

So far this week $3059 in pledges and contributions has been received. Officers of the organization emphasized today that pledges are as acceptable as contributions, the pledges to become due in the fall.

The fund is to underwrite two concerts here by brilliant artists in 1929 as well as to enable the return of the symphony orchestra next season. In case the concerts are self supporting, substantial refunds to the contributors' will be made.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street.

Late contributions are: Mrs. Frederick Talcott, $50; Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, $50; Mrs. Albert A. Baker, $25; Mrs. Frederick William Howe, $50; Dr. William H. P. Faunce, $75; Donald Jackson, $100; a Masonic group, $144; Hugh MacColl, $100; Helen G. Chase, $25; W. G. W., $100; Mrs. G. C. Carpenter, $15; Francis B. Keeney, $25; Herbert W. Rice, $125; William Gammell, $100; Miss Mary Caron Smith, $5; Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard, $50; Mrs. Murray Danforth, $100; Mrs. John W. Knowles, $125; Mrs. George Hall, $200; Anonymous, $500; John Nicholas Brown, $500; Samuel M. Nicholson, $500; D. W. W., $75; Mrs. Archibald Silverman, $20.

MARRIAGE INTENTIONS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 19 1928

tial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hall	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

VETERAN CHIEF DESIGNS

assure the success of two concerts which the Music Association proposes to present to the Providence music lovers in the spring of 1929. These will be solo concerts by world-famous artists.

Although most of the contributions to date have been proportionately large ones, one of the officers of the Music Association yesterday pointed out that the fund is in reality a community affair and that pledges (which would become due next fall) or contributions of small denominations are as welcome as are the larger contributions to the fund.

Juvenile Club Leads Way.

The Juvenile Chopin Club leads the way for the contributors of small amounts and the letter which Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, received with the $7 contribution indicates the attitude with which the Symphony Fund is viewed by this young musical organization.

The letter follows:

"My dear Mrs. Gammell:

"Inclosed please find check for $7 from the Juvenile Chopin Club. Five dollars was taken from the club's treasury and $2 was donated by guests at last Saturday's meeting.

"The Juvenile Chopin Club's members range in age from eight to 16 years and we are the youngest music club in Rhode Island. We are not too young, however, to realize the necessity and benefits of good music and so we send this contribution and we wish we had 100 times that to give for such a worthy cause. I hope you meet with the greatest success in collecting your fund.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "SELMA RUTH SILVERMAN,
"President, The Juvenile Chopin Club."

Music Association Gratified

Officers of the Music Association are highly gratified by the response with which the music-lovers of Providence and the vicinity have met the appeal for the fund which will make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city for still another season. It is, however, the desire of the Music Association to make the Symphony Fund one which all music lovers may be interested in and for that reason it is hoped that small contributions and pledges will be received in greater numbers in the future.

All pledges and contributions should be sent to Mrs. Gammell, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted contributions follow:

Mrs. R. Edwards Annin, Jr.	$15
Helen C. Robertson	50
R. Clinton Fuller	100
Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr.	50
Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Prescott Knight, Jr.	100
Mrs. Elisha H. Howard	25
Charles H. W. Mandeville	25
Mary Greene Chapin	12
Mr. and Mrs. W. Kinsley Low	50
Juvenile Chopin Club	7
Total	$434
Total to date	$5737
Amount still to be raised	$4263

FIVE HARVARD STUDENTS

Other notices for 1928 are in Book marked 1927 - 1928 — From May 17 to Aug 26 —

AUDITS

llision (America's trag-

time, the audience at y Hall was warmed to
So many of them had
me in them.
ix Americanus." Turns program. More horns
of bass from the viols.
ero, righted and shaken,
on his way with re-
energy, typical of the spirit."
is wondering what it
about, while Converse broad grin.

nding Memory on Sounds Its Duty.

se and the critic
concert events of erformances seem hat there could be current song, he

we had six, from incinnati, Detroit,
lis. Five of them
iladelphia Orches-

* * *

of new compositions
the out-of-town, as estras. No epoch-
Prokofieff's savage
even," was about the
lot. Rachmaninoff's
ed keen disappoint-
roused hopes for his harpsichord) was a ore's "P. T. Barnum" ury successors East of ovsk.

* * *

the conductors of our Symphony and Philhar-rchestras, Toscanini out-
all in the finesse and usicianship of his leading.
he swung the local baton enzelberg, Furtwaengler,
er, Busch, Lange, Enesco,
Pollain and the reliable
Marshal Walter Damrosch,
Protracted farewellings him many displays of em, private dinners and el wreaths.

PPING FROM UN

7 19

Symphony In ew London Tuesday

ton Symphony Orchestra, ge Koussevitzky, will be e State Armory, New Lonsday night, when the folgram has been presented:
"Oberon" Weber
"Lohengrin" Wagner
"Die Meistersinger
urnberg" Wagner
No. 5 in E minor, op. 64
Tchaikovsky
nte nte cantabile, con alcuna za.
(Allegro moderato) (Andante maestoso,
o vivace)

of a Ford Pictured by for Symphony ated Press.

16.—The trials
the Ford, have place in musical ndition by the ny orchestra.
" is the name
hich F. S. Con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 17 1927

NEWMAN HAILS BOSTON

ERNEST NEWMAN, who delivered the address on Beethoven at the festival held in Boston in commemoration of his death, wrote for The Boston Globe his impressions of Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Perhaps a keen American visitor of London, hearing one of our orchestras at its best, might find a touch or two about the playing that is our peculiar virtue. They say our men are the best sight-readers imaginable. They have to be particularly good at that, for they get such scanty rehearsals. I heard a number of representative American orchestras in New York, where I spent the Winter of 1924-1925, and I had the feeling at times that while these orchestras were miles ahead of ours in the qualities that come from long and steady and concentrated discipline, there is sometimes more spontaneity and intensity in the playing of our men. I put this down to the fact that, knowing as they do that the machine of which they are parts is not of itself perfect, and that it is up to each of them to do all he can to atone for the defects in the machine, each man is a more highly charged dynamo than the individual player in a perfectly disciplined and perfectly rehearsed orchestra feels it necessary for him to be. But this is only a conjecture on my part; I should like to exchange opinions on the subject with some shrewd American observer after he had spent a Winter in the London concert halls.

"Certainly the perfection of the ensemble, the beauty of detail, and the rightness of the proportions in such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony are at once a delight and a source of envy to a visitor from England. I never want or expect to hear more exquisite orchestral playing than I have heard during the last few days in Boston. The strings are lucid and lustrous, and the wood wind tone is ravishing. Perhaps for judging the wood wind, the Beethoven symphonies have been especially useful, for Beethoven's curt epigrammatic phrases for flute, clarinet, oboe and bassoon are often of extraordinary significance; the flute and the bassoon tone in particular have been a constant joy to me.

"But what has impressed me most in the orchestral playing has been the ensemble, the perfect fitting of detail to detail. In London, under present conditions, it is sheerly impossible to get such playing as we have just had in Boston in the first, second, fourth and sixth symphonies of Beethoven, not because our men are incapable of such delicacy of style, but simply because they could never get the necessary amount of rehearsal.

"The one man in England who can get results of this kind is Sir Thomas Beecham, a conductor of rare genius. I have heard him play Beethoven's Second Symphony in a way that, like Koussevitsky's, was a revelation to people who had got into the habit of thinking this early work is old-fashioned and negligible. But Sir Thomas could get his results, for the most part, only by magnetism and driving power—the exquisite detail work, the ease and calm assurance of the little snatches of dialogue between one instrument and another, that made the Boston performance of the first and second symphonies so entrancing, all this it is impossible to get under our English conditions of one or two rehearsals, often with deputies—that is to say, one man playing at rehearsal and another at the concert. I thought I knew my Beethoven fairly well, but Mr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, during the last ten days or so, have shown me aspects of his genius that have not been revealed to me before."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
APR 17 1927

* * *

"Flivver No. 10,000,000!" What does this suggest? Well, anyway, it was the name of a futuristic composition played by the Boston Symphony orchestra through WJZ.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
APR 17 1927

Printing Press Will Enter Lists for Musical Honors

By United Press.

Boston, April 16.—With a symphony based on steam riveting and airplane propellers presented in New York and a musical narrative representing the life of a Ford car offered a Boston audience in a single week, the music world today awaited a tone poem of printing presses or a sonata of subways to make the mechanical series complete.

George Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" stunned a New York audience Sunday night and Frederick Converse's "Flivver 10,000,000" was sprung on unsuspecting Bostonians by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. One of the differences, according to music critics, that Converse intended his to be funny.

Opening at dawn of a bright day in Detroit the Converse music depicts the driver of a "Lizzie" sailing blithely down the high road. Then comes a crash, but a moment or two later the sprightly car is again chugging merrily along

Shrill tootings on a Ford horn interrupt the progress of the symphony at frequent intervals. A noisy scene in the Ford factory was hailed by critics as "exceedingly ingenius."

The orchestral fantasy was favorably received by the critics and the public. Converse was given an ovation at the conclusion of the concert.

The words of one Boston critic, "Flivver 10,000,000 is not mere smart aleckry, but a symphonic piece, admirable for its resourceful orchestration, its command of a wide range of harmonic effects, its fancy and its humor."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 17 1928

MUSIC FUND HALF WAY TOWARD GOAL

$5303 Raised Thus Far to Bring Boston Symphony Back to Providence.

PLEDGES ARE SOLICITED

Officers Point Out That Contributions May Be Paid in Fall.

$3059 Given This Week

Pledges and contributions received this week for the fund being raised by the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season bring the total to $5303, pledged or contributed, which is more than half way toward the goal of $10,000.

Highly gratified by the response to the appeal for funds, the officers of the Music Association last night stressed the fact that pledges as well as outright contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substantial refunds to the contributors to the Music Association fund.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., the treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Contributions not previously listed follow:

Mrs. Frederick Talcott	$50
Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry	50
Mrs. Albert A. Baker	25
Mrs. Frederick William Howe	50
Dr. William H. P. Faunce	75
Donald Jackson	100
A Masonic Group	144
Hugh MacColl	100
Helen G. Chase	25
W. G. W.	100
Mrs. G. C. Carpenter	15
Francis B. Keeney	25
Herbert W. Rice	125
William Gammell	100
Miss Mary Caron Smith	5
Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard	50
Mrs. Murray Danforth	100
Mrs. John W. Knowles	125
Mrs. George Hail	200
Anonymous	500
John Nicholas Brown	500
Samuel M. Nicholson	500
D. W. W.	75
Mrs. Archibald Silverman	20
Total	$3059
Total to date	5303
Amount still to be raised	4697

Mischa Elman, ... who has been spending eighteen months in a concert tour through Europe, returned to this country last week on the Paris, accompanied by his wife and his daughter, Nadia. After a short rest he will begin immediately to prepare for an extensive concert tour next season, which is to number eighty performances. Mr. Elman disagreed with Pierre Monteux, eminent composer and conductor who recently declared on leaving Philadelphia that Americans were more interested in the clothes of the conductor that in the music of the orchestra.

"Leading European musicians I met in my recent tour," said the violinist, "emphasized that American audiences are not only musically intelligent but are supercritical because they command the greatest talent of the world today. The Philharmonic of New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony are far superior to any European symphonies except the Amsterdam Symphony, which is conducted by William Mengelberg."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 17 1928

140 cludes also those representing the Sophia Little Home, the Providence Health Department, the Mothers' Aid Department, Travellers' Aid, Veterans Bureau, Mental Hygiene Society, Children's Friends Society, Sockanosset School, St. Vincent de Paul Society, John W. Keefe Surgery, Children's Bureau of the State, State Probation Department, Pawtucket Red Cross and the Probation Department of that city, and the Salvation Army.

Municipal Representatives.

Present will be members of the District, Superior and Supreme Courts, the Attorney General's department, representatives of various grocers and markets with whom Mr. Cummings has done business in his official capacity, the Y. M. C. A., Chamber of Commerce, Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the City Government, executive departments and members of the Common Council and the Board of Aldermen, also from the public oups of F

Attractive Prices!

right contributions are acceptable. The pledges will become due in the fall.

Pledges and contributions totalling $3059 have been received since the week-end. The first appeal for funds was made last Wednesday, and it is hoped that another week will see the fund over the top.

In addition to underwriting the customary series of concerts by the Boston Orchestra, the fund is to be used to make possible two concerts by brilliant artists during the spring of 1929. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple, and it is expected that these concerts will be self-supporting.

The extra funds sought over the $6000 necessary for the Symphony are to assure these soloist concerts, although Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, stated that all indications are that these concerts will be entirely self-supporting. In that event, it will be possible for the music Association to make substan-

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 17 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fund Is at Half Way Point

A fund raised for the Music Association to make possible the return of the Boston symphony orchestra to Providence next season has reached a total of $5303, which is just over the half-way mark. The total sought is $10,000.

So far this week $3059 in pledges and contributions has been received. Officers of the organization emphasized today that pledges are as acceptable as contributions, the pledges to become due in the fall.

The fund is to underwrite two concerts here by brilliant artists in 1929 as well as to enable the return of the symphony orchestra next season. In case the concerts are self supporting, substantial refunds to the contributors' will be made.

Pledges and contributions may be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, at her home, 25 Charles Field street.

Late contributions are: Mrs. Frederick Talcott, $50; Mr. and Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, $50; Mrs. Albert A. Baker, $25; Mrs. Frederick William Howe, $50; Dr. William H. P. Faunce, $75; Donald Jackson, $100; a Masonic group, $144; Hugh MacColl, $100; Helen G. Chase, $25; W. G. W., $100; Mrs. G. C. Carpenter, $15; Francis B. Keeney, $25; Herbert W. Rice, $125; William Gammell, $100; Miss Mary Caron Smith, $5; Mrs. R. H. I. Goddard, $50; Mrs. Murray Danforth, $100; Mrs. John W. Knowles, $125; Mrs. George Hail, $200; Anonymous, $500; John Nicholas Brown, $500; Samuel M. Nicholson, $500; D. W. W., $75; Mrs. Archibald Silverman, $20.

MARRIAGE INTENTIONS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 19 1928

MUSIC ASSOCIATION ASKS SMALL GIFTS

Juvenile Chopin Club Leads Way with $7 Donation to Symphony Fund.

$4262 STILL TO BE PLEDGED

$10,000 Total Required to Bring Back Boston Orchestra and Underwrite Two Solo Concerts

Rhode Island's youngest musical organization, the Juvenile Chopin Club, voiced its approval of the Music Association Fund to make possible Boston Symphony concerts in Prov... next season and swelled that fund just $7 more toward the desired $10,000.

Pledges and contributions received Thursday and yesterday totalled $434, bringing the total of the fund to date to $5737. The Music Association Fund is to underwrite the Boston Symphony concert series for next season and to assure the success of two concerts which the Music Association proposes to present to the Providence music lovers in the spring of 1929. These will be solo concerts by world-famous artists.

Although most of the contributions to date have been proportionately large ones, one of the officers of the Music Association yesterday pointed out that the fund is in reality a community affair and that pledges (which would become due next fall) or contributions of small denominations are as welcome as are the larger contributions to the fund.

Juvenile Club Leads Way.

The Juvenile Chopin Club leads the way for the contributors of small amounts and the letter which Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, received with the $7 contribution indicates the attitude with which the Symphony Fund is viewed by this young musical organization.

The letter follows:

"My dear Mrs. Gammell:

"Inclosed please find check for $7 from the Juvenile Chopin Club. Five dollars was taken from the club's treasury and $2 was donated by guests at last Saturday's meeting.

"The Juvenile Chopin Club's members range in age from eight to 16 years and we are the youngest music club in Rhode Island. We are not too young, however, to realize the necessity and benefits of good music and so we send this contribution and we wish we had 100 times that to give for such a worthy cause. I hope you meet with the greatest success in collecting your fund.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "SELMA RUTH SILVERMAN,
"President, The Juvenile Chopin Club."

Music Association Gratified

Officers of the Music Association are highly gratified by the response with which the music-lovers of Providence and the vicinity have met the appeal for the fund which will make possible the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city for still another season. It is, however, the desire of the Music Association to make the Symphony Fund one which all music lovers may be interested in and for that reason it is hoped that small contributions and pledges will be received in greater numbers in the future.

All pledges and contributions should be sent to Mrs. Gammell, at her home, 25 Charles Field street, or to the office of the Treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions and pledges will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted contributions follow:

Mrs. R. Edwards Annin, Jr.	$15
Helen C. Robertson	50
R. Clinton Fuller	100
Mrs. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr.	50
Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Prescott Knight, Jr.	100
Mrs. Elisha H. Howard	25
Charles H. W. Mandeville	25
Mary Greene Chapin	12
Mr. and Mrs. W. Kinsley Low	50
Juvenile Chopin Club	7
Total	$434
Total to date	$5737
Amount still to be raised	$4263

FIVE HARVARD STUDENTS

Other notices for 1928 are in Book marked 1927 - 1928 - From May 17 to Aug 26 -

EAGLE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
MAY 26 1928

(3)

Pop Concerts Offer a Delightfu Musical Entertainment.

Without the stiffness and formality of the regular symphonic concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the Pop concerts, now being held there nightly, afford a most enjoyable evening's entertainment along with the element of sociability. Recently we had the good fortune to attend one of these events and while munching pretzels and sipping pop punch (non-alcoholic) listened to the 80 piece orchestra, led by the astute Alfredo Casella, play such favorites as Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Grieg's Lyric Suite, Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, Handel's Largo and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Novelties on the program included Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. Besides this formidable list there were a few encores of a lighter nature.

All the members of the orchestra are regular Boston Symphony players and as such ensure renditions of a high order. Mr. Casella is a conductor with sound ideas of interpretation and while these interpretations did not wander far from well-tested conventions, there was a well defined outline to the music; the thematic idea was always maintained. The lyric beauty of the Nocturne of the Grieg suite was memorable; there was the proper "atmosphere" in the Saitn-Saens number and the modern spirit was set forth in the Enesco and Chabrier scores. But it remained for the stately Handel Largo—calling for the full resources of the magnificent organ—to create a deep and genuine spiritual feeling. Wagner's hackneyed—though always engrossing—"Tannhauser" overture closed the evening's Those who enjoy fine music—a blend of the classic and the semi-popular—splendidly played, will be well repaid by a visit to the Pops.

Literary Lig[illegible]
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
MAY 26 1928

The Boston Symphony orchestra, through [redacted] of the trustees, has invited Leon Vartanian, the young Armenian pianist, who won the grand piano annually offered at the New England Conservatory of Music, to play as a soloist with the orchestra.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 28 192[illegible]

Boston Symphony Local Fund Now At Total of $7605

The Music association's fund to underwrite the Boston Symphony orchestra and two other concerts in his city next season has reached 7605. The goal is $10,000.

While the appeal for contributions has been limited to Providence, music lovers from Pawtucket have also offered their aid to the cause. A check for $20 has been received by Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the fund, from the Dilettanti Music club of Pawtucket.

Recent pledges and contributions are:

Howard Langley, $8; Mrs. Harold J. Gross, $25; Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, $100; Mrs. William Ely, $20; Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, $150; Mrs. B. L. Steedman, $15; Mrs. Edgar John Lownes, $250; Miss Lorraine Johnson, $10; Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, $10; Miss Margaret Shove Morris, $10; Mrs. H. J. Lanpher, 25; Dilettanti Music Club, $20; Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman, $100 Mrs. Caesar Misch, $100; Mrs. James Elgar, $25; J. D. M. and M. A. Jones, $100; a friend, $50.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 28 1928

PAWTUCKET AIDS SYMPHONY FUND

Dilletanti Music Club Sends Check Toward Guarantee to Bring Orchestra Here.

GIFTS REACH $7605 TOTAL

$2395 More Needed to Insure Full Program, Including Concerts by Two Leading Artists

Contributions and pledges amounting to $1018 received during the past week have raised the total of the Music Association Fund for the underwriting of the Boston Symphony and presentation of t[illegible] concerts in Providence next season to $7605. This means that the fund is still $2395 short of the $10,000 goal.

In making announcement of these latest contributions last night the officers of the Music Association again pointed out that, although many of the contributions which were received during the early part of the campaign were for sizeable amounts, contributions and pledges payable in the fall for small amounts are earnestly solicited. It was stressed that, since the Music Association is a community affair, it is hoped that all music lovers will avail themselves of the chance to help bring the Boston Symphony back to Providence to continue the concerts here.

Seventy-one music lovers contributed to the guarantee fund for the Symphony concerts last year, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, said. So far this year 65 contributions and pledges have been received.

Although the appeal for contributions and pledges has been made principally to Providence people the, officials of the Music Association were highly gratified when a check from the Dilettanti Music Club of Pawtucket was received. The contribution was sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, with the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Gammell—

"The Dilletanti Music Club of Pawtucket, desiring to aid your work to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, has requested me, as treasurer, to send you $20 as their contribution to your fund.

"I therefore enclose check for that amount.

"Very sincerely yours,
"S. ADELE BOARDMAN,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

The Music Association fund will be used to defray the additional expense incurred in bringing the Boston Orchestra here, owing to the fact that the Albee Theatre must be used. A part of the fund will repay Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, for the expense he incurs in turning his theatre over to Providence music lovers on the evenings of the concerts. The remainder will be used to bring two world-famous musicians to Providence in the spring of 1929 for solo concerts. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple.

All pledges and contributions to the fund should be sent either to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., at her home, 25 Charles Field street, Providence, or to the office of the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted pledges and contributions follow:

Howard Langley	$ 8
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	25
Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson	100
Mrs. William Ely	20
Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf	150
Mrs. B. L. Steedman	15
Mrs. Edgar John Lownes	250
Miss Lorraine Johnson	10
Mrs. Edward L. Johnson	10
Miss Margaret Shove Morriss	10
Mrs. H. J. Lanpher	25
Dilettanti Music Club	20
Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman	100
Mrs. Caesar Misch	100
Mrs. James Elgar	25
J. D. E. and M. A. Jones	100
A Friend	50
Total	$1018
Total to date	$7605
Amount still to be raised	$2395

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 28 192[illegible]

PAWTUCKET AIDS BOSTON SYMPHONY GUARANTEE FUND

Dilletanti Music Club Sends Check Toward $10,000 to Warrant Return of Orchestra Here. — $7605 Secured. $2395 Needed.

Contributions and pledges amounting to $1018 received during the past week have raised the total of the Music Association Fund for the underwriting of the Boston Symphony and presentation of two soloist concerts in Providence next season to $7605. This means that the fund is still $2395 short of the $10,000 goal.

In making announcement of these latest contributions last night the officers of the Music Association again pointed out that, although many of the contributions which were received during the early part of the campaign were for sizeable amounts, contributions and pledges payable in the fall for small amounts are earnestly solicited. It was stressed that, since the Music Association is a community affair, it is hoped that all music lovers will avail themselves of the chance to help bring the Boston Symphony back to Providence to continue the concerts here.

Seventy-one music lovers contributed to the guarantee fund for the Symphony concerts last year, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, said. So far this year 65 contributions and pledges have been received.

Although the appeal for contributions and pledges has been made principally to Providence people the, officials of the Music Association were highly gratified when a check from the Dilettanti Music Club of Pawtucket was received. The contribution was sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, with the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Gammell—

"The Dilletanti Music Club of Pawtucket, desiring to aid your work to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, has requested me, as treasurer, to send you $20 as their contribution to your fund.

"I therefore enclose check for that amount.

"Very sincerely yours,
"S. ADELE BOARDMAN,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

The Music Association fund will be used to defray the additional expense incurred in bringing the Boston Orchestra here, owing to the fact that the Albee Theatre must be used. A part of the fund will repay Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, for the expense he incurs in turning his theatre over to Providence music lovers on the evenings of the concerts. The remainder will be used to bring two world-famous musicians to Providence in the spring of 1929 for solo concerts. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple.

All pledges and contributions to the fund should be sent either to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., at her home, 25 Charles Field street, Providence, or to the office of the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted pledges and contributions follow:

Howard Langley	$ 8
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	25
Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson	100
Mrs. William Ely	20
Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf	150
Mrs. B. L. Steedman	15
Mrs. Edgar John Lownes	250
Miss Lorraine Johnson	10
Mrs. Edward L. Johnson	10
Miss Margaret Shove Morriss	10
Mrs. H. J. Lanpher	25
Dilettanti Music Club	20
Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman	100
Mrs. Caesar Misch	100
Mrs. James Elgar	25
J. D. E. and M. A. Jones	100
A Friend	50
Total	$1018
Total to date	$7605
Amount still to be raised	$2395

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
JUN 20 1928

Radio station KHJ at Los Angeles assures itself of nation-wide fame and popularity by its choice of one of the coast's leading musicians as its musical director. He is Arthur Kay, orchestra director, composer and arranger, former member of the German Royal orchestra and the Boston Symphony orchestra, and conductor for [redacted] Victor Herbert's successes and for many later musical comedies.

Kay

MER JUN 20

Mr. Philip Hale

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored yesterday with a degree has chosen deliberately [illegible] all his life. [illegible] magazine [illegible] his later work [illegible] Boston Sym[illegible]tter, filed in [illegible]y, are a last[illegible]during industrial[illegible]dition. Writ[illegible]orward, un[illegible]erald readers [illegible]mmatched in [illegible]n any other [illegible]r articles, to[illegible]orrow a dra[illegible] day a sym[illegible]tten against [illegible]ore attention [illegible]ic and the [illegible]d than the [illegible] critic in the [illegible] of repeated [illegible]hers in the [illegible]and to write [illegible]o devote his [illegible] years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him.

The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUN 22 1928

AMERICA SEEN MUSIC CENTER

Paris—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEW YORK
BRONX HOME NEWS
JUN 23 1928

America Will Be Music Center, Director States

Paris.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better apreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

EAGLE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
MAY 26 1928

(3)

141

Pop Concerts Offer a Delightfu Musical Entertainment.

Without the stiffness and formality of the regular symphonic concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the Pop concerts, now being held there nightly, afford a most enjoyable evening's entertainment along with the element of sociability. Recently we had the good fortune to attend one of these events and while munching pretzels and sipping pop punch (non-alcoholic) listened to the 80 piece orchestra, led by the astute Alfredo Casella, play such favorites as Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Grieg's Lyric Suite, Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, Handel's Largo and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Novelties on the program included Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. Besides this formidable list there were a few encores of a lighter nature.

All the members of the orchestra are regular Boston Symphony players and as such ensure renditions of a high order. Mr. Casella is a conductor with sound ideas of interpretation and while these interpretations did not wander far from well-tested conventions, there was a well defined outline to the music; the thematic idea was always maintained. The lyric beauty of the Nocturne of the Grieg suite was memorable; there was the proper "atmosphere" in the Saitn-Saens number and the modern spirit was set forth in the Enesco and Chabrier scores. But it remained for the stately Handel Largo—calling for the full resources of the magnificent organ—to create a deep and genuine spiritual feeling. Wagner's hackneyed—though always engrossing—"Tannhauser" overture closed the evening's Those who enjoy fine music—a blend of the classic and the semi-popular—splendidly played, will be well repaid by a visit to the Pops.

Literary Digest
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
MAY 26 1928

The Boston Symphony orchestra, through [redacted] of the trustees, has invited Leon Vartanian, the young Armenian pianist, who won the grand piano annually offered at the New England Conservatory of Music, to play as a soloist with the orchestra.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 28 [illegible]

Boston Symphony Local Fund Now At Total of $7605

The Music association's fund to underwrite the Boston Symphony orchestra and two other concerts in his city next season has reached 7605. The goal is $10,000.

While the appeal for contributions has been limited to Providence, music lovers from Pawtucket have also offered their aid to the cause. A check for $20 has been received by Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the fund, from the Dilettanti Music club of Pawtucket.

Recent pledges and contributions are:

Howard Langley, $8; Mrs. Harold J. Gross, $25; Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, $100; Mrs. William Ely, $20; Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, $150; Mrs. B. L. Steedman, $15; Mrs. Edgar John Lownes, $250; Miss Lorraine Johnson, $10; Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, $10; Miss Margaret Shove Morris, $10; Mrs. H. J. Lanpher, 25; Dilettanti Music Club, $20; Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman, $100 Mrs. Caesar Misch, $100; Mrs. James Elgar, $25; J. D. M. and M. A. Jones, $100; a friend, $50.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 28 1928

PAWTUCKET AIDS SYMPHONY FUND

Dilletanti Music Club Sends Check Toward Guarantee to Bring Orchestra Here.

GIFTS REACH $7605 TOTAL

$2395 More Needed to Insure Full Program, Including Concerts by Two Leading Artists

Contributions and pledges amounting to $1018 received during the past week have raised the total of the Music Association Fund for the underwriting of the Boston Symphony and presentation of two soloist concerts in Providence next season to $7605. This means that the fund is still $2395 short of the $10,000 goal.

In making announcement of these latest contributions last night the officers of the Music Association again pointed out that, although many of the contributions which were received during the early part of the campaign were for sizeable amounts, contributions and pledges payable in the fall for small amounts are earnestly solicited. It was stressed that, since the Music Association is a community affair, it is hoped that all music lovers will avail themselves of the chance to help bring the Boston Symphony back to Providence to continue the concerts here.

Seventy-one music lovers contributed to the guarantee fund for the Symphony concerts last year, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, said. So far this year 65 contributions and pledges have been received.

Although the appeal for contributions and pledges has been made principally to Providence people the, officials of the Music Association were highly gratified when a check from the Dilettanti Music Club of Pawtucket was received. The contribution was sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, with the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Gammell—

"The Dilletanti Music Club of Pawtucket, desiring to aid your work to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, has requested me, as treasurer, to send you $20 as their contribution to your fund.

"I therefore enclose check for that amount.

"Very sincerely yours,
"S. ADELE BOARDMAN,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

The Music Association fund will be used to defray the additional expense incurred in bringing the Boston Orchestra here, owing to the fact that the Albee Theatre must be used. A part of the fund will repay Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, for the expense he incurs in turning his theatre over to Providence music lovers on the evenings of the concerts. The remainder will be used to bring two world-famous musicians to Providence in the spring of 1929 for solo concerts. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple.

All pledges and contributions to the fund should be sent either to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., at her home, 25 Charles Field street, Providence, or to the office of the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted pledges and contributions follow:

Howard Langley	$ 8
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	25
Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson	100
Mrs. William Ely	20
Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf	150
Mrs. B. L. Steedman	15
Mrs. Edgar John Lownes	250
Miss Lorraine Johnson	10
Mrs. Edward L. Johnson	10
Miss Margaret Shove Morriss	10
Mrs. H. J. Lanpher	25
Dilettanti Music Club	20
Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman	100
Mrs. Caesar Misch	100
Mrs. James Elgar	25
J. D. E. and M. A. Jones	100
A Friend	50
Total	$1018
Total to date	$7605
Amount still to be raised	$2395

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 28 1928

PAWTUCKET AIDS BOSTON SYMPHONY GUARANTEE FUND

Dilletanti Music Club Sends Check Toward $10,000 to Warrant Return of Orchestra Here. — $7605 Secured. $2395 Needed.

Contributions and pledges amounting to $1018 received during the past week have raised the total of the Music Association Fund for the underwriting of the Boston Symphony and presentation of two soloist concerts in Providence next season to $7605. This means that the fund is still $2395 short of the $10,000 goal.

In making announcement of these latest contributions last night the officers of the Music Association again pointed out that, although many of the contributions which were received during the early part of the campaign were for sizeable amounts, contributions and pledges payable in the fall for small amounts are earnestly solicited. It was stressed that, since the Music Association is a community affair, it is hoped that all music lovers will avail themselves of the chance to help bring the Boston Symphony back to Providence to continue the concerts here.

Seventy-one music lovers contributed to the guarantee fund for the Symphony concerts last year, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, said. So far this year 65 contributions and pledges have been received.

Although the appeal for contributions and pledges has been made principally to Providence people the, officials of the Music Association were highly gratified when a check from the Dilettanti Music Club of Pawtucket was received. The contribution was sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, with the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Gammell—

"The Dilletanti Music Club of Pawtucket, desiring to aid your work to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, has requested me, as treasurer, to send you $20 as their contribution to your fund.

"I therefore enclose check for that amount.

"Very sincerely yours,
"S. ADELE BOARDMAN,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

The Music Association fund will be used to defray the additional expense incurred in bringing the Boston Orchestra here, owing to the fact that the Albee Theatre must be used. A part of the fund will repay Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, for the expense he incurs in turning his theatre over to Providence music lovers on the evenings of the concerts. The remainder will be used to bring two world-famous musicians to Providence in the spring of 1929 for solo concerts. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple.

All pledges and contributions to the fund should be sent either to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., at her home, 25 Charles Field street, Providence, or to the office of the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted pledges and contributions follow:

Howard Langley	$ 8
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	25
Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson	100
Mrs. William Ely	20
Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf	150
Mrs. B. L. Steedman	15
Mrs. Edgar John Lownes	250
Miss Lorraine Johnson	10
Mrs. Edward L. Johnson	10
Miss Margaret Shove Morriss	10
Mrs. H. J. Lanpher	25
Dilettanti Music Club	20
Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman	100
Mrs. Caesar Misch	100
Mrs. James Elgar	25
J. D. E. and M. A. Jones	100
A Friend	50
Total	$1018
Total to date	$7605
Amount still to be raised	$2395

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
JUN 20 1928

Radio station KHJ at Los Angeles assures itself of nation-wide fame and popularity by its choice of one of the coast's leading musicians as its musical director. He is Arthur Kay, orchestra director, composer and arranger, former member of the German Royal orchestra and the Boston Symphony orchestra, and conductor for [illegible] Victor Herbert's successes and for many later musical comedies.

Kay

HER JUN 20

Mr. Philip Hale

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored yesterday with a degree has chosen deliberately [illegible] all his life. [illegible] magazine [illegible] later work Boston Symphony, filed in [illegible], are a last- [illegible] tiring industry [illegible]. Writ- [illegible] forward, unerald readers unmatched in any other articles, tomorrow a dra- day a sym- tten against ore attention ic and the d than the critic in the of repeated hers in the and to write o devote his years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him.

The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUN 22 1928

AMERICA SEEN MUSIC CENTER

Paris—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEW YORK
BRONX HOME NEWS
JUN 23 1928

America Will Be Music Center, Director States

Paris.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better apreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

EAGLE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
MAY 26 1928

(3)

141

Pop Concerts Offer a Delightfu Musical Entertainment.

Without the stiffness and formality of the regular symphonic concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the Pop concerts, now being held there nightly, afford a most enjoyable evening's entertainment along with the element of sociability. Recently we had the good fortune to attend one of these events and while munching pretzels and sipping pop punch (non-alcoholic) listened to the 80 piece orchestra, led by the astute Alfredo Casella, play such favorites as Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Grieg's Lyric Suite, Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, Handel's Largo and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Novelties on the program included Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. Besides this formidable list there were a few encores of a lighter nature.

All the members of the orchestra are regular Boston Symphony players and as such ensure renditions of a high order. Mr. Casella is a conductor with sound ideas of interpretation and while these interpretations did not wander far from well-tested conventions, there was a well defined outline to the music; the thematic idea was always maintained. The lyric beauty of the Nocturne of the Grieg suite was memorable; there was the proper "atmosphere" in the Saitn-Saens number and the modern spirit was set forth in the Enesco and Chabrier scores. But it remained for the stately Handel Largo—calling for the full resources of the magnificent organ—to create a deep and genuine spiritual feeling. Wagner's hackneyed—though always engrossing—"Tannhauser" overture closed the evening's Those who enjoy fine music—a blend of the classic and the semi-popular—splendidly played, will be well repaid by a visit to the Pops.

Literary Digest
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
MAY 26 1928

The Boston Symphony orchestra, through [redacted] of the trustees, has invited Leon Vartanian, the young Armenian pianist, who won the grand piano annually offered at the New England Conservatory of Music, to play as a soloist with the orchestra.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
MAY 28 [illegible]

Boston Symphony Local Fund Now At Total of $7605

The Music association's fund to underwrite the Boston Symphony orchestra and two other concerts in his city next season has reached 7605. The goal is $10,000.

While the appeal for contributions has been limited to Providence, music lovers from Pawtucket have also offered their aid to the cause. A check for $20 has been received by Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the fund, from the Dilettanti Music club of Pawtucket.

Recent pledges and contributions are:

Howard Langley, $8; Mrs. Harold J. Gross, $25; Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, $100; Mrs. William Ely, $20; Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, $150; Mrs. B. L. Steedman, $15; Mrs. Edgar John Lownes, $250; Miss Lorraine Johnson, $10; Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, $10; Miss Margaret Shove Morris, $10; Mrs. H. J. Lanpher, 25; Dilettanti Music Club, $20; Mr. and Mrs. W: L. Hodgman, $100 Mrs. Caesar Misch, $100; Mrs. James Elgar, $25; J. D. M, and M. A. Jones, $100; a friend, $50.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 28 1928

PAWTUCKET AIDS SYMPHONY FUND

Dilletanti Music Club Sends Check Toward Guarantee to Bring Orchestra Here.

GIFTS REACH $7605 TOTAL

$2395 More Needed to Insure Full Program, Including Concerts by Two Leading Artists

Contributions and pledges amounting to $1018 received during the past week have raised the total of the Music Association Fund for the underwriting of the Boston Symphony and presentation of two soloist concerts in Providence next season to $7605. This means that the fund is still $2395 short of the $10,000 goal.

In making announcement of these latest contributions last night the officers of the Music Association again pointed out that, although many of the contributions which were received during the early part of the campaign were for sizeable amounts, contributions and pledges payable in the fall for small amounts are earnestly solicited. It was stressed that, since the Music Association is a community affair, it is hoped that all music lovers will avail themselves of the chance to help bring the Boston Symphony back to Providence to continue the concerts here.

Seventy-one music lovers contributed to the guarantee fund for the Symphony concerts last year, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, said. So far this year 65 contributions and pledges have been received.

Although the appeal for contributions and pledges has been made principally to Providence people the, officials of the Music Association were highly gratified when a check from the Dillettanti Music Club of Pawtucket was received. The contribution was sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, with the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Gammell—

"The Dilletanti Music Club of Pawtucket, desiring to aid your work to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, has requested me, as treasurer, to send you $20 as their contribution to your fund.

"I therefore enclose check for that amount.

"Very sincerely yours,
"S. ADELE BOARDMAN,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

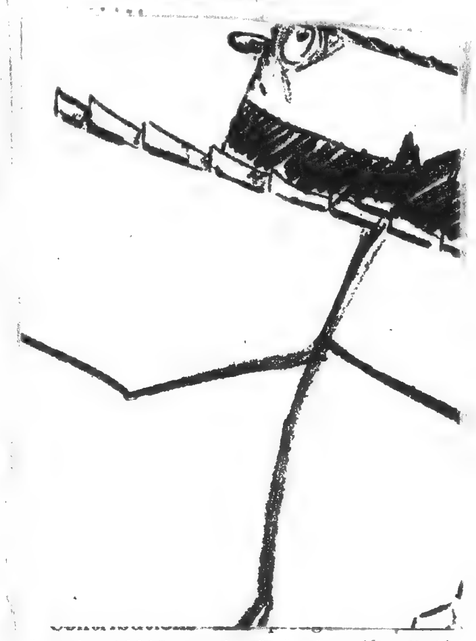
The Music Association fund will be used to defray the additional expense incurred in bringing the Boston Orchestra here, owing to the fact that the Albee Theatre must be used. A part of the fund will repay Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, for the expense he incurs in turning his theatre over to Providence music lovers on the evenings of the concerts. The remainder will be used to bring two world-famous musicians to Providence in the spring of 1929 for solo concerts. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple.

All pledges and contributions to the fund should be sent either to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., at her home, 25 Charles Field street, Providence, or to the office of the treasurer of the Providence Journal Company. All contributions will be acknowledged in the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin.

Hitherto unlisted pledges and contributions follow:

Howard Langley	$ 8
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	25
Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson	100
Mrs. William Ely	20
Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf	150
Mrs. B. L. Steedman	15
Mrs. Edgar John Lownes	250
Miss Lorraine Johnson	10
Mrs. Edward L. Johnson	10
Miss Margaret Shove Morriss	10
Mrs. H. J. Lanpher	25
Dilettanti Music Club	20
Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hodgman	100
Mrs. Caesar Misch	100
Mrs. James Elgar	25
J. D. E. and M. A. Jones	100
A Friend	50
Total	$1018
Total to date	$7605
Amount still to be raised	$2395

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 28 192[illegible]



ing to $1018 received during the past week have raised the total of the Music Association Fund for the underwriting of the Boston Symphony and presentation of two soloist concerts in Providence next season to $7605. This means that the fund is still $2395 short of the $10,000 goal.

In making announcement of these latest contributions last night the officers of the Music Association again pointed out that, although many of the contributions which were received during the early part of the campaign were for sizeable amounts, contributions and pledges payable in the fall for small amounts are earnestly solicited. It was stressed that, since the Music Association is a community affair, it is hoped that all music lovers will avail themselves of the chance to help bring the Boston Symphony back to Providence to continue the concerts here.

Seventy-one music lovers contributed to the guarantee fund for the Symphony concerts last year, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association, said. So far this year 65 contributions and pledges have been received.

Although the appeal for contributions and pledges has been made principally to Providence people the, officials of the Music Association were highly gratified when a check from the Dillettanti Music Club of Pawtucket was received. The contribution was sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer of the Music Association, with the following letter:

"My Dear Mrs. Gammell—

"The Dilletanti Music Club of Pawtucket, desiring to aid your work to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season, has requested me, as treasurer, to send you $20 as their contribution to your fund.

"I therefore enclose check for that amount.

"Very sincerely yours,
"S. ADELE BOARDMAN,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

The Music Association fund will be used to defray the additional expense incurred in bringing the Boston Orchestra here, owing to the fact that the Albee Theatre must be used. A part of the fund will repay Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, for the expense he incurs in turning his theatre over to Providence music lovers on the evenings of the concerts. The remainder will be used to bring two world-famous musicians to Providence in the spring of 1929 for solo concerts. It is hoped that these concerts may be held in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple.

All pledges and contributions to the fund should be sent either to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., at her home, 25 Charles Field street, Providence, or to the office of the treasurer of the Provi-

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
JUN 20 1928

Radio station KHJ at Los Angeles assures itself of nation-wide fame and popularity by its choice of one of the coast's leading musicians as its musical director. He is Arthur Kay, orchestra director, composer and arranger, former member of the German Royal orchestra and the Boston Symphony orchestra, and conductor for [illegible] Victor Herbert's successes and for many later musical comedies.

Kay

Mr. Philip Hale

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored yesterday with a degree has chosen deliberately to be a Boston journalist all his life. Except for an occasional magazine article, he has confined his later work to The Herald and Boston Symphony programs. The latter, filed in the Boston Public Library, are a lasting monument of his untiring industry and his amazing erudition. Written in that straightforward, unadorned style which Herald readers know so well, they are unmatched in any other country or in any other language. His newspaper articles, today a concert review, tomorrow a dramatic criticism, the next day a symphony notice, all written against time, probably receive more attention from students of music and the drama here and abroad than the comment of any other critic in the United States. In spite of repeated invitations from publishers in the United States and England to write books, he has chosen to devote his years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him.

The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUN 22 1928

AMERICA SEEN MUSIC CENTER

Paris—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEW YORK
BRONX HOME NEWS
JUN 23 1928

America Will Be Music Center, Director States

Paris.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better apreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JUN 23 1928

SEES AMERICA TUNE LEADER

By International News Service

PARIS, June 23.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the [illegible] Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

JUN 27 1928

America Center Of Music, Is Assertion

PARIS, June 27.-(INS)-America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
LIGHT

U. S. to Be Center For World Music

By International News Service.

PARIS, June 30.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
NEWS

JUL 4 - 1928

A Bostonian's Holiday.

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for 15 years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall.—Variety.

J. Y. TELEGRAPH

JUL 22 1928

Copley's Forecast Promises A Most Brilliant Season

A MIGHTY busy and interesting season is ahead for Richard Copley. One of the unique presentations he will make will be to bring Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to play his first contrass recital in this city, a novelty which will be a brilliant musical treat.

The Society of the Friends of Music, which is looked on as a dark horse in the orchestral situation of New York, is under Mr. Copley's direction, but he leaves the really exciting news they may have to bring, entirely to them, to bring forth. But Mr. Copley recalls that they are to be heard at ten concerts in New York City this Fall.

Much interest is gathering in the tour of the Society of Ancient Instruments, which was heard only once last year, but which is already booked for fifteen chamber music societies and educational organizations around the country. It is going to take a little while, according to Mr. Copley, before the country realizes how much beauty there is in the old instruments of Henri Casadeseus and his fellows.

A new departure for Mr. Copley is the arrangement he has made with his old friend, M. H. Hanson, to book the Prague Teachers' Chorus and the Westminster Choir of Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Hanson is handling the European affairs and Mr. Copley is looking after American dates. The Prague folk will be here three months and will be officially presented by the United States Government in Washington, at the Library of Congress. Yale, Harvard and all leading colleges have booked the visitors. The tour covers the principal cities of America, and even includes a jaunt to Cuba (see below). The Dayton Choir will be feted by European countries and has a long tour booked on the Continent. Their American dates are limited to the Middle West for lack of time.

Mr. Copley smiles broadly when he mentions the new quartette of the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia. He does not disclose the personnel, but says that it will not be of the faculty. It is the new and coming chamber music organization.

Nina Kolhetz is coming back. She will debut this coming season in Philadelphia and then have a very interesting tour. Over thirty dates are already booked for Povla Frish which will carry her all the way to California. Maurice Maurici, the cellist, is announced. Temianka, the best of the young violinists of the Curtis Institute is going out on tour.

Mme. Matzenauer opens at the Worcester Festival in October and then after twelve weeks at the Metropolitan Opera she has a tour of fifty concerts to the Pacific Coast. The French violinist, Renee Chemet is booked for twenty five concerts, and Merle Alcock in the little free time she has outside the Metropolitan Opera House has many fine dates.

Other names in the Copley list are Tudor Davies, with a long tour and New York appearances, Soggin the cellist, Ethel Hayden, the young American soprano and others.

JACKSON, MISS.
CLARION LEDGER

America to be Center For World Music

PARIS, June 25—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days —only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

Big Picnic for INDEPENDENT
WILKES BARRE, PA.

AMERICA TO BE CENTER FOR WORLD MUSIC, SAYS FAMOUS BOSTON DIRECTOR

PARIS, (INS)—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JUN 28 1928

Mr. Philip Hale

(From the Boston Herald)

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored with a degree has chosen deliberately to be a Boston journalist all his life. Except for an occasional magazine article, he has confined his later work to The Herald and Boston Symphony programs. The latter, filed in the Boston Public Library, are a lasting monument of his untiring industry and his amazing erudition. Written in that straightfordward, unadorned style which Herald readers know so well, they are unmatched in any other country or in any other language. His newspaper articles, to-day a concert review, to-morrow a dramatic criticism, the next day a symphony notice, all written against time, probably receive more attention from students of music and the drama here and abroad than the comment of any other critic in the United States. In spite of repeated invitations from publishers in the United States and England to write books, he has chosen to devote his years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him.

The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

PUNXSUTAWNEY, PA.
SPIRIT

America to Be Center For World Music Says Noted Boston Director

Paris, July 3.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a larger number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEWS
Michigan City,
JUL 3 1928

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

JUL 3 - 1928

Honor for Philip Hale.

Newspaper writers and lovers of music all over the land will applaud the action of Dartmouth College in honoring Philip Hale of Boston with the degree of Doctor of Music. Few writers in any of the special fields have been more highly successful, not many have had the honor of leadership in a special field for so many years. Mr. Hale has been a brilliant success, his own modesty has operated to prevent the general public from becoming more intimately acquainted with his work.

His life has been given to musical and dramatic writing for The Boston Herald, with the added duty of preparing the explanatory and analytical programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a long term of years. In all lines he has been scholarly to a degree that has given him the foremost position in his field. Probably no musical and dramatic writer has a larger following or has wielded a more positive educational influence for years.

Many times he has declined offers to become an author of books, leading publishers being ambitious to secure his services. He chose the field of newspaper writing many years ago, has been content to continue in his special section, doing musical and dramatic writing in his home city, happy in his long-continued daily task. Dartmouth recognized real genius and scholarly excellence when it gave its honorary degree to Philip Hale.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

JUL 16 1928

America To Be Center for Music World

PARIS—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated. "One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and, of course, every one knows that America isn't starving these days—only starivng for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired outer with prosperity. It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras can not satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 22 1928

Two important American compositions, the concerto of Gershwin and Carpenter's symphonic poem "Skyscrapers," were among this year's novelties in Paris.

Gershwin recently visited Paris. He did not play in public, but was heard in the houses of his friends, where his qualities of rhythmic and melodic inventiveness aroused great enthusiasm. While playing the piano and singing his compositions he impresses one as being truly creative. He needs only to study technic in order to become a great musician. His concerto, in Tiomkin's masterful interpretation, confirmed this impression. It was played at a great opera-concert, with the Golschman Orchestra collaborating. One cannot but remark a certain clumsiness of construction in the piece, though it has ideas and charm.

Carpenter is much liked and appreciated in Paris. His symphonic poem "Skyscrapers" is very brilliantly orchestrated and has a rhythmic life of its own. We are very grateful to Koussevitzky for revealing it to us.

No gratitude is equal to Koussevitzky's merits in the field of modern and international music. His four Spring concerts brought more novelties than all other concerts from October to May. To him goes the credit this year for the propagation of Carpenter, Ferroud, Paul Hindemith, Lazar and Prokofieff. Fragments of Prokofieff's "L'Ange de Feu" made a deep impression.

The "grande saison" is over; the concert halls of Paris are benumbed. It will be November before music will be roused from its long hibernation. The lyric theatres of Paris produced nothing of great interest during the past year. We hope to be indemnified next season. One looks forward to the program of the Théâtre des Champs Elysées with great curiosity. May this institution again become a temple of music!

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

JUN 23 1928

SEES AMERICA TUNE LEADER

By International News Service

PARIS, June 23.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

JACKSON, MISS.
CLARION LEDGER

America to be Center For World Music

PARIS, June 25—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days —only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

Big Picnic for INDEPENDENT
WILKES BARRE, PA.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

JUN 27 1928

America Center Of Music, Is Assertion

PARIS, June 27.-(INS)-America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

PUNXSUTAWNEY, PA.
SPIRIT

AMERICA TO BE CENTER FOR WORLD MUSIC, SAYS FAMOUS BOSTON DIRECTOR

PARIS. (INS)—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

JUN 28 1928

Mr. Philip Hale

(From the Boston Herald)

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored with a degree has chosen deliberately to be a Boston journalist all his life. Except for an occasional magazine article, he has confined his later work to The Herald and Boston Symphony programs. The latter, filed in the Boston Public Library, are a lasting monument of his untiring industry and his amazing erudition. Written in that straightfordward, unadorned style which Herald readers know so well, they are unmatched in any other country or in any other language. His newspaper articles, to-day a concert review, to-morrow a dramatic criticism, the next day a symphony notice, all written against time, probably receive more attention from students of music and the drama here and abroad than the comment of any other critic in the United States. In spite of repeated invitations from publishers in the United States and England to write books, he has chosen to devote his years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him.

The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
LIGHT

U. S. to Be Center For World Music

By International News Service.

PARIS, June 30.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses.

NEWS
Ludington, Mich.
JUL 3 1928

America to Be Center For World Music Says Noted Boston Director

Paris, July 3.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a larger number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even 20 large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

JUL 3 - 1928

Honor for Philip Hale.

Newspaper writers and lovers of music all over the land will applaud the action of Dartmouth College in honoring Philip Hale of Boston with the degree of Doctor of Music. Few writers in any of the special fields have been more highly successful, not many have had the honor of leadership in a special field for so many years. Mr. Hale has been a brilliant success, his own modesty has operated to prevent the general public from becoming more intimately acquainted with his work.

His life has been given to musical and dramatic writing for The Boston Herald, with the added duty of preparing the explanatory and analytical programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a long term of years. In all lines he has been scholarly to a degree that has given him the foremost position in his field. Probably no musical and dramatic writer has a larger following or has wielded a more positive educational influence for years.

Many times he has declined offers to become an author of books, leading publishers being ambitious to secure his services. He chose the field of newspaper writing many years ago, has been content to continue in his special section, doing musical and dramatic writing in his home city, happy in his long-continued daily task. Dartmouth recognized real genius and scholarly excellence when it gave its honorary degree to Philip Hale.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
NEWS

JUL 4 - 1928

A Bostonian's Holiday.

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for 15 years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall.—Variety.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

JUL 16 1928

America To Be Center for Music World

PARIS—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated. "One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and, of course, every one knows that America isn't starving these days—only starivng for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired outer with prosperity. It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly educated that are crowding the concert halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras can not satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 22 1928

Two important American compositions, the concerto of Gershwin and Carpenter's symphonic poem "Skyscrapers," were among this year's novelties in Paris.

Gershwin recently visited Paris. He did not play in public, but was heard in the houses of his friends, where his qualities of rhythmic and melodic inventiveness aroused great enthusiasm. While playing the piano and singing his compositions he impresses one as being truly creative. He needs only to study technic in order to become a great musician. His concerto, in Tiomkin's masterful interpretation, confirmed this impression. It was played at a great opera-concert, with the Golschman Orchestra collaborating. One cannot but remark a certain clumsiness of construction in the piece, though it has ideas and charm.

Carpenter is much liked and appreciated in Paris. His symphonic poem "Skyscrapers" is very brilliantly orchestrated and has a rhythmic life of its own. We are very grat..ful to Koussevitzky for revealing it to us.

No gratitude is equal to Koussevitzky's merits in the field of modern and international music. His four Spring concerts brought more novelties than all other concerts from October to May. To him goes the credit this year for the propagation of Carpenter, Ferroud, Paul Hindemith, Lazar and Prokofieff. Fragments of Prokofieff's "L'Ange de Feu" made a deep impression.

The "grande saison" is over; the concert halls of Paris are benumbed. It will be November before music will be roused from its long hibernation. The lyric theatres of Paris produced nothing of great interest during the past year. We hope to be indemnified next season. One looks forward to the program of the Théâtre des Champs Elysées with great curiosity. May this institution again become a temple of music!

142
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JUL 22 1928

Copley's Forecast Promises A Most Brilliant Season

A MIGHTY busy and interesting season is ahead for Richard Copley. One of the unique presentations he will make will be to bring Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to play his first contrass recital in this city, a novelty which will be a brilliant musical treat.

The Society of the Friends of Music, which is looked on as a dark horse in the orchestral situation of New York, is under Mr. Copley's direction, but he leaves the really exciting news they may have to bring, entirely to them, to bring forth. But Mr. Copley recalls that they are to be heard at ten concerts in New York City this Fall.

Much interest is gathering in the tour of the Society of Ancient Instruments, which was heard only once last year, but which is already booked for fifteen chamber music societies and educational organizations around the country. It is going to take a little while, according to Mr. Copley, before the country realizes how much beauty there is in the old instruments of Henri Casadeseus and his fellows.

A new departure for Mr. Copley is the arra..gement he has made with his old friend, M. H. Hanson, to book the Prague Teachers' Chorus and the Westminster Choir of Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Hanson is handling the European affairs and Mr. Copley is looking after American dates. The Prague folk will be here three months and will be officially presented by the United States Government in Washington, at the Library of Congress. Yale, Harvard and all leading colleges have booked the visitors. The tour covers the principal cities of America, and even includes a jaunt to Cuba (see below). The Dayton Choir will be feted by European countries and has a long tour booked on the Continent. Their American dates are limited to the Middle West for lack of time.

Mr. Copley smiles broadly when he mentions the new quartette of the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia. He does not disclose the personnel, but says that it will not be of the faculty. It is the new and coming chamber music organization.

Nina Kolhetz is coming back. She will debut this coming season in Philadelphia and then have a very interesting tour. Over thirty dates are already booked for Povla Frish which will carry her all the way to California. Maurice Maurici, the cellist, is announced. Temianka, the best of the young violinists of the Curtis Institute is going out on tour.

Mme. Matzenauer opens at the Worcester Festival in October and then after twelve weeks at the Metropolitan Opera she has a tour of fifty concerts to the Pacific Coast. The French violinist, Renee Chemet is booked for twenty five concerts, and Merle Alcock in the little free time she has outside the Metropolitan Opera House has many fine dates.

Other names in the Copley list are Tudor Davies, with a long tour and New York appearances, Soggia the cellist, Ethel Hayden, the young American soprano and others.

ronicle of ..... July 22, 1928 19....

Music Dept, Alexander Fried, Editor

143

HOW KOUSSEVITZKY BECAME CONDUCTOR

(From an Article by Arthur Abell in the Musical Courier)

One winter's evening, twenty-seven years ago, a handsome, dapper, romantic-looking young Russian walked onto the stage of the venerable Berlin Singakademie, lugging a ponderous double-bass. This was no ordinary Berlin debut, for even in that concert-ridden city recitals on the double-bass had not been heard since the days of Bottesini.

And the interest was all the keener because this aristocratic looking young man from Moscow did not play a small sized three-string bass tuned in fifths, as did Bottesini, but he was to give rein to his virtuosity on a full-sized orchestra bass tuned to fourths in the regulation way. No one had attempted to win virtuoso laurels on the full-sized bass since Dragonetti, 100 years before.

The Russian's name was Serge Koussevitzky. The principal number on his program was his own concerto. Next season New York will hear him perform on the double bass, and America will then know how he plays it.

I was among those present on that occasion more than a quarter of a century ago, and during the ensuing five years I frequently heard Koussevitzky, for he concertized extensively as a double-bass virtuoso. I once journeyed from Berlin to Leipsig to hear him as soloist with the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch. At that concert Koussevitzky played his transcriptions of Mozart's Concerto for bassoon and of Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" for cello. In Russia he gave joint recitals with Feodor Chaliapin.

Meanwhile a web of romance had been woven into the young musician's life. He was married to Natalie Constantinowa Ouschakoff, a charming and cultured, as well as very wealthy young Russian girl. That couple settled in Berlin, and there they maintained a beautiful home, and entertained lavishly. It was there that I first met Chaliapin, and also Sobinoff, the Russian tenor. And it was there that I first heard the exquisite chamber music performances of the Parisian Societe des Instruments Anciens, and it was there also that I heard Koussevitzky and Jacques Thibaut play Bottesini's famous duo for violin and double bass, with Fritz Kreisler at the piano.

Koussevitzky had always had a pronounced flair for conducting, and with the princely income now at his disposal he was free to turn his attention to this branch of musical activity. He began to practice with an orchestra recruited from pupils at the Berlin High School of Music. The young Russian profited immensely from Arthur Nikisch.

Koussevitzky's own public debut as a conductor was made in the German capital with the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1906. For several years he gave annual series of all-Russian programs. Later he returned to Moscow, where he established a home of such proportions that thirteen servants were required to maintain it.

In Moscow Koussevitzky founded his own private orchestra of seventy-three musicians, recruited from among the best players available in Europe, and he directed this orchestra for a period of five years at a personal expense of $100,000. This was the largest and most proficient private orchestra ever kept by a professional musician, and it was with this organization that Koussevitzky was able to develop his great musical resources and skill as a leader.

Koussevitzky then concertized extensively in Russia. His orchestral concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg were not only great musical but also great social events. After the war came his successes in London and Paris, which were followed by his Boston engagement.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 3 - 1928

BOSTON, Aug. 3—If present plans materialize, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will tour Europe at the close of next season. Official announcement of this trip is contingent upon the arrival home of W. H. Brennan, manager, who is now abroad, presumably making bookings for the event. Such a tour would be the orchestra's first appearance outside of America. Since its inception, 47 years ago, the organization has only been heard in the United States and in the principal cities in Canada.

Should the European itinerary come to pass the summer "pop" concerts, an annual feature of Boston activities at the close of the regular symphony season and in which most of the Boston Symphony players participate, must be forgone. There is a possibility that the People's Symphony orchestra might fill in the hiatus caused by the Boston Symphony's foreign tour. But that, too, is another story, as the People's Symphony orchestra is at present hard put for a suitable place in which to give the 20 Sunday afternoon concerts scheduled for each season. Jordan hall, where the People's Symphony has been playing several seasons, is inadequate seating capacity, making it difficult for these volunteer musicians to solve financial problems. In fact, a movement is already afoot to have a suitable auditorium ready for next season, so that this popular organization may be perpetuated.

W. J. PARKER.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JUL 27 1928

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is considering a tour of Europe at the close of next season.

Official announcement of this trip is contingent upon the arrival home of W. H. Brennan, manager, who is now abroad, presumably making bookings for the event.

Such a tour would be the orchestra's first appearance outside of America.

* * *

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

Whirl of Concerts.

As I write, the concert season is ebbing fast. John McCormack, Jascha Heifetz, Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, Tito Schipa, 73 years old Vladimir de Pachmann, and a host of other celebrities are crossing the horizon. The passing of the Grand Semaine has meant as well the decline of recital activities. The Yale Glee Club is on its way here, and there will be a spasmodic affair or two, but until autumn the best of the 1927-28 concert efforts are done.

To the credit of Paris, it gave the aged de Pachmann a rousing reception on the occasion of his return after a 20-year absence. As for Schipa, his recital debut set a standard for other opera tenors to pattern after . . . if they expect to duplicate his success. The McCormack, Paderewski and Heifetz conquests were to be expected, and Kreisler's ability to pack the Paris Opera auditorium.

But the Koussevitzky orchestral programs found less support than they have in the yast—two years ago, for example, when I last heard the Boston Symphony's conductor [illegible] usual array of modern compositions. Thus the music of Paris of today—and about which, and France as well, there remains more to be said.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

AUG 6 - 1928

Conductor Coming

FREDERICK STOCK.

LIST CONCERT FEATURES HERE

Chicago Symphony Is Scheduled For January 8.

The Chicago Symphony orchestra, with Frederick Stock conducting, will be an outstanding event musically during the coming symphony orchestra season, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The orchestra, with its replete personnel, will make a special trip direct to Pittsburgh and return, and owing to the heavy schedule in Chicago, it is only possible to have this orchestra for one evening concert on Monday evening, January 28.

Another announcement is that the New York Philharmonic will come for three pairs, the first two pairs to be conducted by William Mengelberg, and the third will be conducted by Arthur Toscannini. The dates for the New York Philharmonic concerts are November 16-17, January 11-12 and March 8-9.

The Boston Symphony will open the series on November 2-3, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokolof will be herd on December 7-8, and the Minneapolis orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen, will be welcomed on February 15-16.

These concerts will all be given at Syria Mosque.

In addition to the regular series at Syria Mosque, a series of three special orchestra concerts for children will be given at Carnegie Music Hall. These concerts will be given on Friday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
AUG 10 1928

Probable Novelties.

By PITTS SANBORN.

While the list of concert novelties for the coming season is still in the guesswork stage, one can glean certain probabilities from Serge Koussevitzky's summer concerts in Paris. He has brought out new compositions, for instance, by Albert Roussel, by Dukelsky and by Prokofieff, and it is altogether likely that he will repeat them in Boston and perhaps in New York.

The Roussel piece happens to be a concerto for piano and orchestra. The first movement is described as "energetic," "robust," "virile." The second movement, a "Meditation"—Oh, Thais!—is likened by one critic to the "most emotional of Beethoven's slow movements. It attains the heights to which music alone can lift us, and all this is achieved with a simplicity of means that the better discloses depth of thought." Gayety returns in the finale. As a whole, the concerto "shuns useless development."

Dukelsky's symphony is said to display "qualities of youthful freshness and elegance not so noticeable in earlier works by this composer." Dramatic intensity and powerful orchestration are attributed to the Prokofieff affair, but in melodic invention it is pronounced inferior to some other of its composer's works.

Out of compliment to America, Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to Paris Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (of course, in the concert arrangement). One commentator found it difficult to distinguish between the pages depicting the labor of the workingmen and those setting forth their diversions.

THIS CL. PING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

AUG 18 1928

HE PLAYS THE BIG FIDDLE—AND HOW

The story of how Fabien Sevitzky, nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, "fell in love with [illegible] and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination, and perseverance, and moreover, has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia String Simfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Simfonietta."

Born in Tver, Russia, he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter, since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed, there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player. And at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later, he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of the entrants, he was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui Scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being, incidentally, the only person who ever did win it for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour—as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass" and his reputation was made. But he soon found that there in America, is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music-loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the Simfonietta was born. And its success in musical history.

OIL CITY, PA.
Oil City Blizzard

AUG 1 [illegible]

Bostonian's Night Off.

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for fifteen years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Symphony [illegible] Hall. Va-

SACREMENTO, CAL.
BEE

ETERMINATION CAN LES.

less ris-

world arm

sym-

his ingly

soon.

on of purpose there was in this young man's heart.

He went on with his musical education. He found a number of compositions written for the left hand only. Noted European composers aided him.

That was ten years ago.

And now according to press dispatches, Wittgenstein has been engaged to make his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the best on the continent, next Winter.

Who can deny persistent grit, like faith, can remove mountains?

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

AUG [illegible] 1928

DOUBLE BASS MAKES GOOD

The story of how Fabien Sevitzky nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitzky, "fell in love with the big fiddle" and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination and perseverence, and, moreover, has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Sinfonietta."

Born in Tver, Russia he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed, there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player, and at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of the entrants. He was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory, and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being incidentally the only person who ever did win it for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass," and his reputation was made. But he soon found here in America there is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the sinfonietta was born, and its success is musical history.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

AUG 21 [illegible]

News Notes

To assist Serge Koussevits in two recitals for double bass which he will give in Boston and New York, Henri Casadesus, the leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments, and a celebrated performer on the viol d'amore, will make a special trip to this country, arriving early in October.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

AUG 28 1928

Henri Casadesus, leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments, and himself a performer on the viola d'amore, will make a special trip to this country, arriving early in October, to assist Serge Koussevitsky in two recitals for double bass, which he will give in Boston and in New York.

NEW YORK WORLD

AUG 2[illegible]

HENRI CASADESUS, the leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments and a celebrated performer on the viol d'amore, will make a special trip to this country arriving early in October, to assist Mr. Serge Koussevits in the two recitals for double bass which he will give in Boston and New York City.

* * *

ronicle of ..... July 22, 1928 19....

Music Dept, Alexander Fried, Editor

HOW KOUSSEVITZKY BECAME CONDUCTOR

(From an Article by Arthur Abell in the Musical Courier)

One winter's evening, twenty-seven years ago, a handsome, dapper, romantic-looking young Russian walked onto the stage of the venerable Berlin Singakademie, lugging a ponderous double-bass. This was no ordinary Berlin debut, for even in that concert-ridden city recitals on the double-bass had not been heard since the days of Bottesini.

And the interest was all the keener because this aristocratic looking young man from Moscow did not play a small sized three-string bass tuned in fifths, as did Bottesini, but he was to give rein to his virtuosity on a full-sized orchestra bass tuned to fourths in the regulation way. No one had attempted to win virtuoso laurels on the full-sized bass since Dragonetti, 100 years before.

The Russian's name was Serge Koussevitzky. The principal number on his program was his own concerto. Next season New York will hear him perform on the double bass, and America will then know how he plays it.

I was among those present on that occasion more than a quarter of a century ago, and during the ensuing five years I frequently heard Koussevitzky, for he concertized extensively as a double-bass virtuoso. I once journeyed from Berlin to Leipsig to hear him as soloist with the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch. At that concert Koussevitzky played his transcriptions of Mozart's Concerto for bassoon and of Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" for cello. In Russia he gave joint recitals with Feodor Chaliapin.

Meanwhile a web of romance had been woven into the young musician's life. He was married to Natalie Constantinowa Ouschakoff, a charming and cultured, as well as very wealthy young Russian girl. That couple settled in Berlin, and there they maintained a beautiful home, and entertained lavishly. It was there that I first met Chaliapin, and also Sobinoff, the Russian tenor. And it was there that I first heard the exquisite chamber music performances of the Parisian Societe des Instruments Anciens, and it was there also that I heard Koussevitzky and Jacques Thibaut play Bottesini's famous duo for violin and double bass, with Fritz Kreisler at the piano.

Koussevitzky had always had a pronounced flair for conducting, and with the princely income now at his disposal he was free to turn his attention to this branch of musical activity. He began to practice with an orchestra recruited from pupils at the Berlin High School of Music. The young Russian profited immensely from Arthur Nikisch.

Koussevitzky's own public debut as a conductor was made in the German capital with the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1906. For several years he gave annual series of all-Russian programs. Later he returned to Moscow, where he established a home of such proportions that thirteen servants were required to maintain it.

In Moscow Koussevitzky founded his own private orchestra of seventy-three musicians, recruited from among the best players available in Europe, and he directed this orchestra for a period of five years at a personal expense of $100,000. This was the largest and most proficient private orchestra ever kept by a professional musician, and it was with this organization that Koussevitzky was able to develop his great musical resources and skill as a leader.

Koussevitzky then concertized extensively in Russia. His orchestral concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg were not only great musical but also great social events. After the war came his successes in London and Paris, which were followed by his Boston engagement.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 3 - 1928

BOSTON, Aug. 3—If present plans materialize, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will tour Europe at the close of next season. Official announcement of this trip is contingent upon the arrival home of W. H. Brennan, manager, who is now abroad, presumably making bookings for the event. Such a tour would be the orchestra's first appearance outside of America. Since its inception, 47 years ago, the organization has only been heard in the United States and in the principal cities in Canada.

Should the European itinerary come to pass the summer "pop" concerts, an annual feature of Boston activities at the close of the regular symphony season and in which most of the Boston Symphony players participate, must be forgone. There is a possibility that the People's Symphony orchestra might fill in the hiatus caused by the Boston Symphony's foreign tour. But that, too, is another story, as the People's Symphony orchestra is at present hard put for a suitable place in which to give the 20 Sunday afternoon concerts scheduled for each season. Jordan hall, where the People's Symphony has been playing several seasons, is inadequate seating capacity, making it difficult for these volunteer musicians to solve financial problems. In fact, a movement is already afoot to have a suitable auditorium ready for next season, so that this popular organization may be perpetuated.

W. J. PARKER.

Whirl of Concerts.

As I write, the concert season is ebbing fast. John McCormack, Jascha Heifetz, Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, Tito Schipa, 73 years old Vladimir de Pachmann, and a host of other celebrities are crossing the horizon. The passing of the Grand Semaine has meant as well the decline of recital activities. The Yale Glee Club is on its way here, and there will be a spasmodic affair or two, but until autumn the best of the 1927-28 concert efforts are done.

To the credit of Paris, it gave the aged de Pachmann a rousing reception on the occasion of his return after a 20-year absence. As for Schipa, his recital debut set a standard for other opera tenors to pattern after . . . if they expect to duplicate his success. The McCormack, Paderewski and Heifetz conquests were to be expected, and Kreisler's ability to pack the Paris Opera auditorium.

But the Koussevitzky orchestral programs found less support than they have in the yast—two years ago, for example, when I last heard the Boston Symphony's conductor conduct his usual array of modern compositions. Thus the musical Paris of today—and about which, and France as well, there remains more to be said.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

AUG 6 - 1928

Conductor Coming

FREDERICK STOCK.

LIST CONCERT FEATURES HERE

Chicago Symphony Is Scheduled For January 8.

The Chicago Symphony orchestra, with Frederick Stock conducting, will be an outstanding event musically during the coming symphony orchestra season, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The orchestra, with its replete personnel, will make a special trip direct to Pittsburgh and return, and owing to the heavy schedule in Chicago, it is only possible to have this orchestra for one evening concert on Monday evening, January 28.

Another announcement is that the New York Philharmonic will come for three pairs, the first two pairs to be conducted by William Mengelberg, and the third will be conducted by Arthur Toscannini. The dates for the New York Philharmonic concerts are November 16-17, January 11-12 and March 8-9.

The Boston Symphony will open the series on November 2-3, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokolof will be herd on December 7-8, and the Minneapolis orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen, will be welcomed on February 15-16.

These concerts will all be given at Syria Mosque.

In addition to the regular series at Syria Mosque, a series of three special orchestra concerts for children will be given at Carnegie Music Hall. These concerts will be given on Friday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JUL 27 1928

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is considering a tour of Europe at the close of next season.

Official announcement of this trip is contingent upon the arrival home of W. H. Brennan, manager, who is now abroad, presumably making bookings for the event.

Such a tour would be the orchestra's first appearance outside of America.

* * *

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

AUG 10 1928

ETERMINATION CAN ...LES.

Probable Novelties.

By PITTS SANBORN.

While the list of concert novelties for the coming season is still in the guesswork stage, one can glean certain probabilities from Serge Koussevitzky's summer concerts in Paris. He has brought out new compositions, for instance, by Albert Roussel, by Dukelsky and by Prokofieff, and it is altogether likely that he will repeat them in Boston and perhaps in New York.

The Roussel piece happens to be a concerto for piano and orchestra. The first movement is described as "energetic," "robust," "virile." The second movement, a "Meditation"—Oh, Thais!—is likened by one critic to the "most emotional of Beethoven's slow movements. It attains the heights to which music alone can lift us, and all this is achieved with a simplicity of means that the better discloses depth of thought." Gayety returns in the finale. As a whole, the concerto "shuns useless development."

Dukelsky's symphony is said to display "qualities of youthful freshness and elegance not so noticeable in earlier works by this composer." Dramatic intensity and powerful orchestration are attributed to the Prokofieff affair, but in melodic invention it is pronounced inferior to some other of its composer's works.

Out of compliment to America, Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to Paris Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (of course, in the concert arrangement). One commentator found it difficult to distinguish between the pages depicting the labor of the workingmen and those setting forth their diversions.

THIS CL...PING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

AUG 18 1928

HE PLAYS THE BIG FIDDLE— AND HOW

The story of how Fabien Sevitzky, nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, "fell in love with the big fiddle" and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination, and perseverance, and moreover, has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia String Simfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Simfonietta."

Born in Tver, Russia, he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter, since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed, there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player. And at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later, he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of the entrants, he was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui Scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being, incidentally, the only person who ever did win it for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour—as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass" and his reputation was made. But he soon found that there in America, is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music-loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the Simfonietta was born. And its success in musical history.

OIL CITY, PA.
Oil City Blizzard

AUG

Bostonian's Night Off.

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for fifteen years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Symphony Co... Hall. Va...rie...

SACREMENTO, CAL.
BEE

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

...28

DOUBLE BASS MAKES GOOD

The story of how Fabien Sevitzky nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitzky, "fell in love with the big fiddle" and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination and perseverance, and, moreover, has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Sinfonietta."

Born in Tver, Russia he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed, there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player, and at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of the entrants. He was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory, and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being incidentally the only person who ever did win it for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass," and his reputation was made. But he soon found here in America there is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the sinfonietta was born, and its success is musical history.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

AUG

News Notes

To assist Serge Koussevits in two recitals for double bass which he will give in Boston and New York, Henri Casadesus, the leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments, and a celebrated performer on the viol d'amore, will make a special trip to this country, arriving early in October.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

AUG

Henri Casadesus, leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments, and himself a performer on the viola d'amore, will make a special trip to this country, arriving early in October, to assist Serge Koussevitsky in two recitals for double bass, which he will give in Boston and in New York.

NEW YORK WORLD

AUG

HENRI CASADESUS, the leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments and a celebrated performer on the viol d'amore, will make a special trip to this country arriving early in October, to assist Mr. Serge Koussevits in the two recitals for double bass which he will give in Boston and New York City.

* * *

Chronicle of ..... July 22, 1928 .19....

Music Dept, Alexander Fried, Editor

HOW KOUSSEVITZKY BECAME CONDUCTOR

(From an Article by Arthur Abell in the Musical Courier)

One winter's evening, twenty-seven years ago, a handsome, dapper, romantic-looking young Russian walked onto the stage of the venerable Berlin Singakademie, lugging a ponderous double-bass. This was no ordinary Berlin debut, for even in that concert-ridden city recitals on the double-bass had not been heard since the days of Bottesini.

And the interest was all the keener because this aristocratic looking young man from Moscow did not play a small sized three-string bass tuned in fifths, as did Bottesini, but he was to give rein to his virtuosity on a full-sized orchestra bass tuned to fourths in the regulation way. No one had attempted to win virtuoso laurels on the full-sized bass since Dragonetti, 100 years before.

The Russian's name was Serge Koussevitzky. The principal number on his program was his own concerto. Next season New York will hear him perform on the double bass, and America will then know how he plays it.

I was among those present on that occasion more than a quarter of a century ago, and during the ensuing five years I frequently heard Koussevitzky, for he concertized extensively as a double-bass virtuoso. I once journeyed from Berlin to Leipsig to hear him as soloist with the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch. At that concert Koussevitzky played his transcriptions of Mozart's Concerto for bassoon and of Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" for cello. In Russia he gave joint recitals with Feodor Chaliapin.

Meanwhile a web of romance had been woven into the young musician's life. He was married to Natalie Constantinowa Ouschakoff, a charming and cultured, as well as very wealthy young Russian girl. That couple settled in Berlin, and there they maintained a beautiful home, and entertained lavishly. It was there that I first met Chaliapin, and also Sobinoff, the Russian tenor. And it was there that I first heard the exquisite chamber music performances of the Parisian Societe des Instruments Anciens, and it was there also that I heard Koussevitzky and Jacques Thibaut play Bottesini's famous duo for violin and double bass, with Fritz Kreisler at the piano.

Koussevitzky had always had a pronounced flair for conducting, and with the princely income now at his disposal he was free to turn his attention to this branch of musical activity. He began to practice with an orchestra recruited from pupils at the Berlin High School of Music. The young Russian profited immensely from Arthur Nikisch.

Koussevitzky's own public debut as a conductor was made in the German capital with the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1906. For several years he gave annual series of all-Russian programs. Later he returned to Moscow, where he established a home of such proportions that thirteen servants were required to maintain it.

In Moscow Koussevitzky founded his own private orchestra of seventy-three musicians, recruited from among the best players available in Europe, and he directed this orchestra for a period of five years at a personal expense of $100,000. This was the largest and most proficient private orchestra ever kept by a professional musician, and it was with this organization that Koussevitzky was able to develop his great musical resources and skill as a leader.

Koussevitzky then concertized extensively in Russia. His orchestral concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg were not only great musical but also great social events. After the war came his successes in London and Paris, which were followed by his Boston engagement.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 3 - 1928

BOSTON, Aug. 3—If present plans materialize, the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will tour Europe at the close of next season. Official announcement of this trip is contingent upon the arrival home of W. H. Brennan, manager, who is now abroad, presumably making bookings for the event. Such a tour would be the orchestra's first appearance outside of America. Since its inception, 47 years ago, the organization has only been heard in the United States and in the principal cities in Canada.

Should the European itinerary come to pass the summer "pop" concerts, an annual feature of Boston activities at the close of the regular symphony season and in which most of the Boston Symphony players participate, must be forgone. There is a possibility that the People's Symphony orchestra might fill in the hiatus caused by the Boston Symphony's foreign tour. But that, too, is another story, as the People's Symphony orchestra is at present hard put for a suitable place in which to give the 20 Sunday afternoon concerts scheduled for each season. Jordan hall, where the People's Symphony has been playing several seasons, is inadequate seating capacity, making it difficult for these volunteer musicians to solve financial problems. In fact, a movement is already afoot to have a suitable auditorium ready for next season, so that this popular organization may be perpetuated.

W. J. PARKER.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JUL 27 1928

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is considering a tour of Europe at the close of next season.

Official announcement of this trip is contingent upon the arrival home of W. H. Brennan, manager, who is now abroad, presumably making bookings for the event.

Such a tour would be the orchestra's first appearance outside of America.

* * *

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

Whirl of Concerts.

As I write, the concert season is ebbing fast. John McCormack, Jascha Heifetz, Ignace Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, Tito Schipa, 73 years old Vladimir de Pachmann, and a host of other celebrities are crossing the horizon. The passing of the Grand Semaine has meant as well the decline of recital activities. The Yale Glee Club is on its way here, and there will be a spasmodic affair or two, but until autumn the best of the 1927-28 concert efforts are done.

To the credit of Paris, it gave the aged de Pachmann a rousing reception on the occasion of his return after a 20-year absence. As for Schipa, his recital debut set a standard for other opera tenors to pattern after . . . if they expect to duplicate his success. The McCormack, Paderewski and Heifetz conquests were to be expected, and Kreisler's ability to pack the Paris Opera auditorium.

But the Koussevitzky orchestral programs found less support than they have in the yast—two years ago, for example, when I last heard the Boston Symphony's conductor conduct the usual array of modern compositions. Thus the music which, and France as well, there remains more to be said.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

AUG 6 - 1928

Conductor Coming

FREDERICK STOCK.

LIST CONCERT FEATURES HERE

Chicago Symphony Is Scheduled For January 8.

The Chicago Symphony orchestra, with Frederick Stock conducting, will be an outstanding event musically during the coming symphony orchestra season, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The orchestra, with its replete personnel, will make a special trip direct to Pittsburgh and return, and owing to the heavy schedule in Chicago, it is only possible to have this orchestra for one evening concert on Monday evening, January 28.

Another announcement is that the New York Philharmonic will come for three pairs, the first two pairs to be conducted by William Mengelberg, and the third will be conducted by Arthur Toscannini. The dates for the New York Philharmonic concerts are November 16-17, January 11-12 and March 8-9.

The Boston Symphony will open the series on November 2-3, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokolof will be herd on December 7-8, and the Minneapolis orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen, will be welcomed on February 15-16.

These concerts will all be given at Syria Mosque.

In addition to the regular series at Syria Mosque, a series of three special orchestra concerts for children will be given at Carnegie Music Hall. These concerts will be given on Friday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

AUG 10 1928

U. S. PAT. OFF. NEA SERVICE, INC.

Dukelsky's symphony is said to display "qualities of youthful freshness and elegance not so noticeable in earlier works by this composer." Dramatic intensity and powerful orchestration are attributed to the Prokofieff affair, but in melodic invention it is pronounced inferior to some other of its composer's works.

Out of compliment to America, Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to Paris Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (of course, in the concert arrangement). One commentator found it difficult to distinguish between the pages depicting the labor of the workingmen and those setting forth their diversions.

THIS CL PING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

AUG 18 1928

HE PLAYS THE BIG FIDDLE— AND HOW

The story of how Fabien Sevitzky, nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, "fell in love with the big fiddle" and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination, and perseverance, and moreover, has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia String Simfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Simfonietta."

Born in Tver, Russia, he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter, since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed, there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player. And at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later, he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of the entrants, he was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui Scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being, incidentally, the only person who ever did win it for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour—as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass" and his reputation was made. But he soon found that there in America, is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music-loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the Simfonietta was born. And its success in musical history.

OIL CITY, PA.
Oil City Blizzard

AUG

Bostonian's Night Off.

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for fifteen years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall.—Variety.

purpose [illegible] man's heart.

He went on with his musical education. He found a number of compositions written for the left hand only. Noted European composers aided him.

That was ten years ago.

And now according to press dispatches, Wittgenstein has been engaged to make his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the best on the continent, next Winter.

Who can deny persistent grit, like faith, can remove mountains?

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

[illegible]28

DOUBLE BASS MAKES GOOD

The story of how Fabien Sevitzky nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitzky, "fell in love with the big fiddle" and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination and perseverence, and, moreover, has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Sinfonietta."

Born in Tver, Russia he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed, there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player, and at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of the entrants. He was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory, and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being incidentally the only person who ever did win it for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass," and his reputation was made. But he soon found here in America there is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the sinfonietta was born, and its success is musical history.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

AUG

News Notes

To assist Serge Koussevits in two recitals for double bass which he will give in Boston and New York, Henri Casadesus, the leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments, and a celebrated performer on the viol d'amore, will make a special trip to this country, arriving early in October.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

AUG

Henri Casadesus, leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments, and himself a performer on the viola d'amore, will make a special trip to this country, arriving early in October, to assist Serge Koussevitsky in two recitals for double bass, which he will give in Boston and in New York.

NEW YORK WORLD

AUG

HENRI CASADESUS, the leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments and a celebrated performer on the viol d'amore, will make a special trip to this country arriving early in October, to assist Mr. Serge Koussevits in the two recitals for double bass which he will give in Boston and New York City.

SECOND TUESDAY CONCERT

Brian Post Jan 5

Gallic Pieces Played by Symphony Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A Gallic programme made the Symphony Concert of yesterday, the second of the current Tuesday series, with Berlioz to represent the older, Franck the middle, and Debussy and Ravel the later ways of French symphonic music; and an audience that filled the hall heard intently and eagerly applauded a succession of brilliant performances.

KOUSSEVITZKYIZED FRANCK

One of the pieces that stood on the first programme ever conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky in this city, Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," came then to new life at his hands. This season he has restored it to the active repertory of the orchestra, and it made spirited and exciting beginning to the concert of yesterday. For the rest there were two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," in which conductor and band have now several times distinguished themselves, Ravel's Viennese rhapsody, "La Valse," one of the most highly mettled of Mr. Koussevitzky's war-horses, and the Symphony of Franck.

For some Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this Symphony, though effective in its own right and often deeply moving and engrossing, remains, in its essential spirit, foreign to Franck's peculiar temperament. From it the note of mysticism, of spiritual ecstacy seems largely missing, and in its place come disquieting suggestions of more earthly concerns. But who knows? The composer himself might have applauded the Koussevitzkian version of his masterpiece. Certainly the audience of yesterday, like those of recent Friday, Saturday and Monday concerts, took huge delight in it.

SYMPHONY IN 2D TUESDAY CONCERT

Program of Modern French Music Given

HERALD

For the second symphony concert of the Tuesday series, given yesterday afternoon before very large audiences, Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of French music. Berlioz's Roman Carnival overture; two of Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Ravel's "La Valse," and the D minor symphony by Franck. Though classic composers and those ahead of these, our own, times, were not allowed a hearing, the program was surely representative of what French composers have done and are doing. Of greater moment, it proved in the hearing well contrasted and agreeable. Since both Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were in finest fettle, the concert gave rare pleasure.

It began delightfully with those few lovely pages that open the Carnival overture, pages in which, if ever he did, Berlioz followed Fetis's advice: "Charm the ear." As for those that follow—Mr. Koussevitzky's free-handed use of vivid color and quicker rhythm stood those faded measures in fine stead; if nothing more, they "sounded."

So did Debussy's Clouds, lovelier than ever before—also clearer; each melody threaded its way through the tonal maze as neat and precise as though Bach himself had written a new fugue. Thus the untidiness that too often mars a Debussy performance was wiped away. In the good cause of clarity did poetic suggestion perhaps suffer some loss? There seemed slight hint of those "billowing skies that scatter and amass" of which Rossetti sang. The "Fetes" Mr. Koussevitzky played brilliantly.

So he did "La Valse," of which he seems strangely fond. No doubt the waltz is a good waltz; the closer it keeps to Strauss, the better. But when Ravel adds the personal note, he appears to add very little. Maybe he was toying with that quality of irony for which he is famous. If so, as Charles Lamb said of Elia, "He too much affected that dangerous figure—irony."

The third concert of the Tuesday series will take place on Feb. 8.

R. R. G

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Converse, Frederick Shepherd

"Flivver Ten Million"

1st perf., Bos (S.H.) 4/15-16/27 (XXII)

Mon. Series 4/18/27

Wellesley 4/20/27

From the Desk of LANING HUMPHREY

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
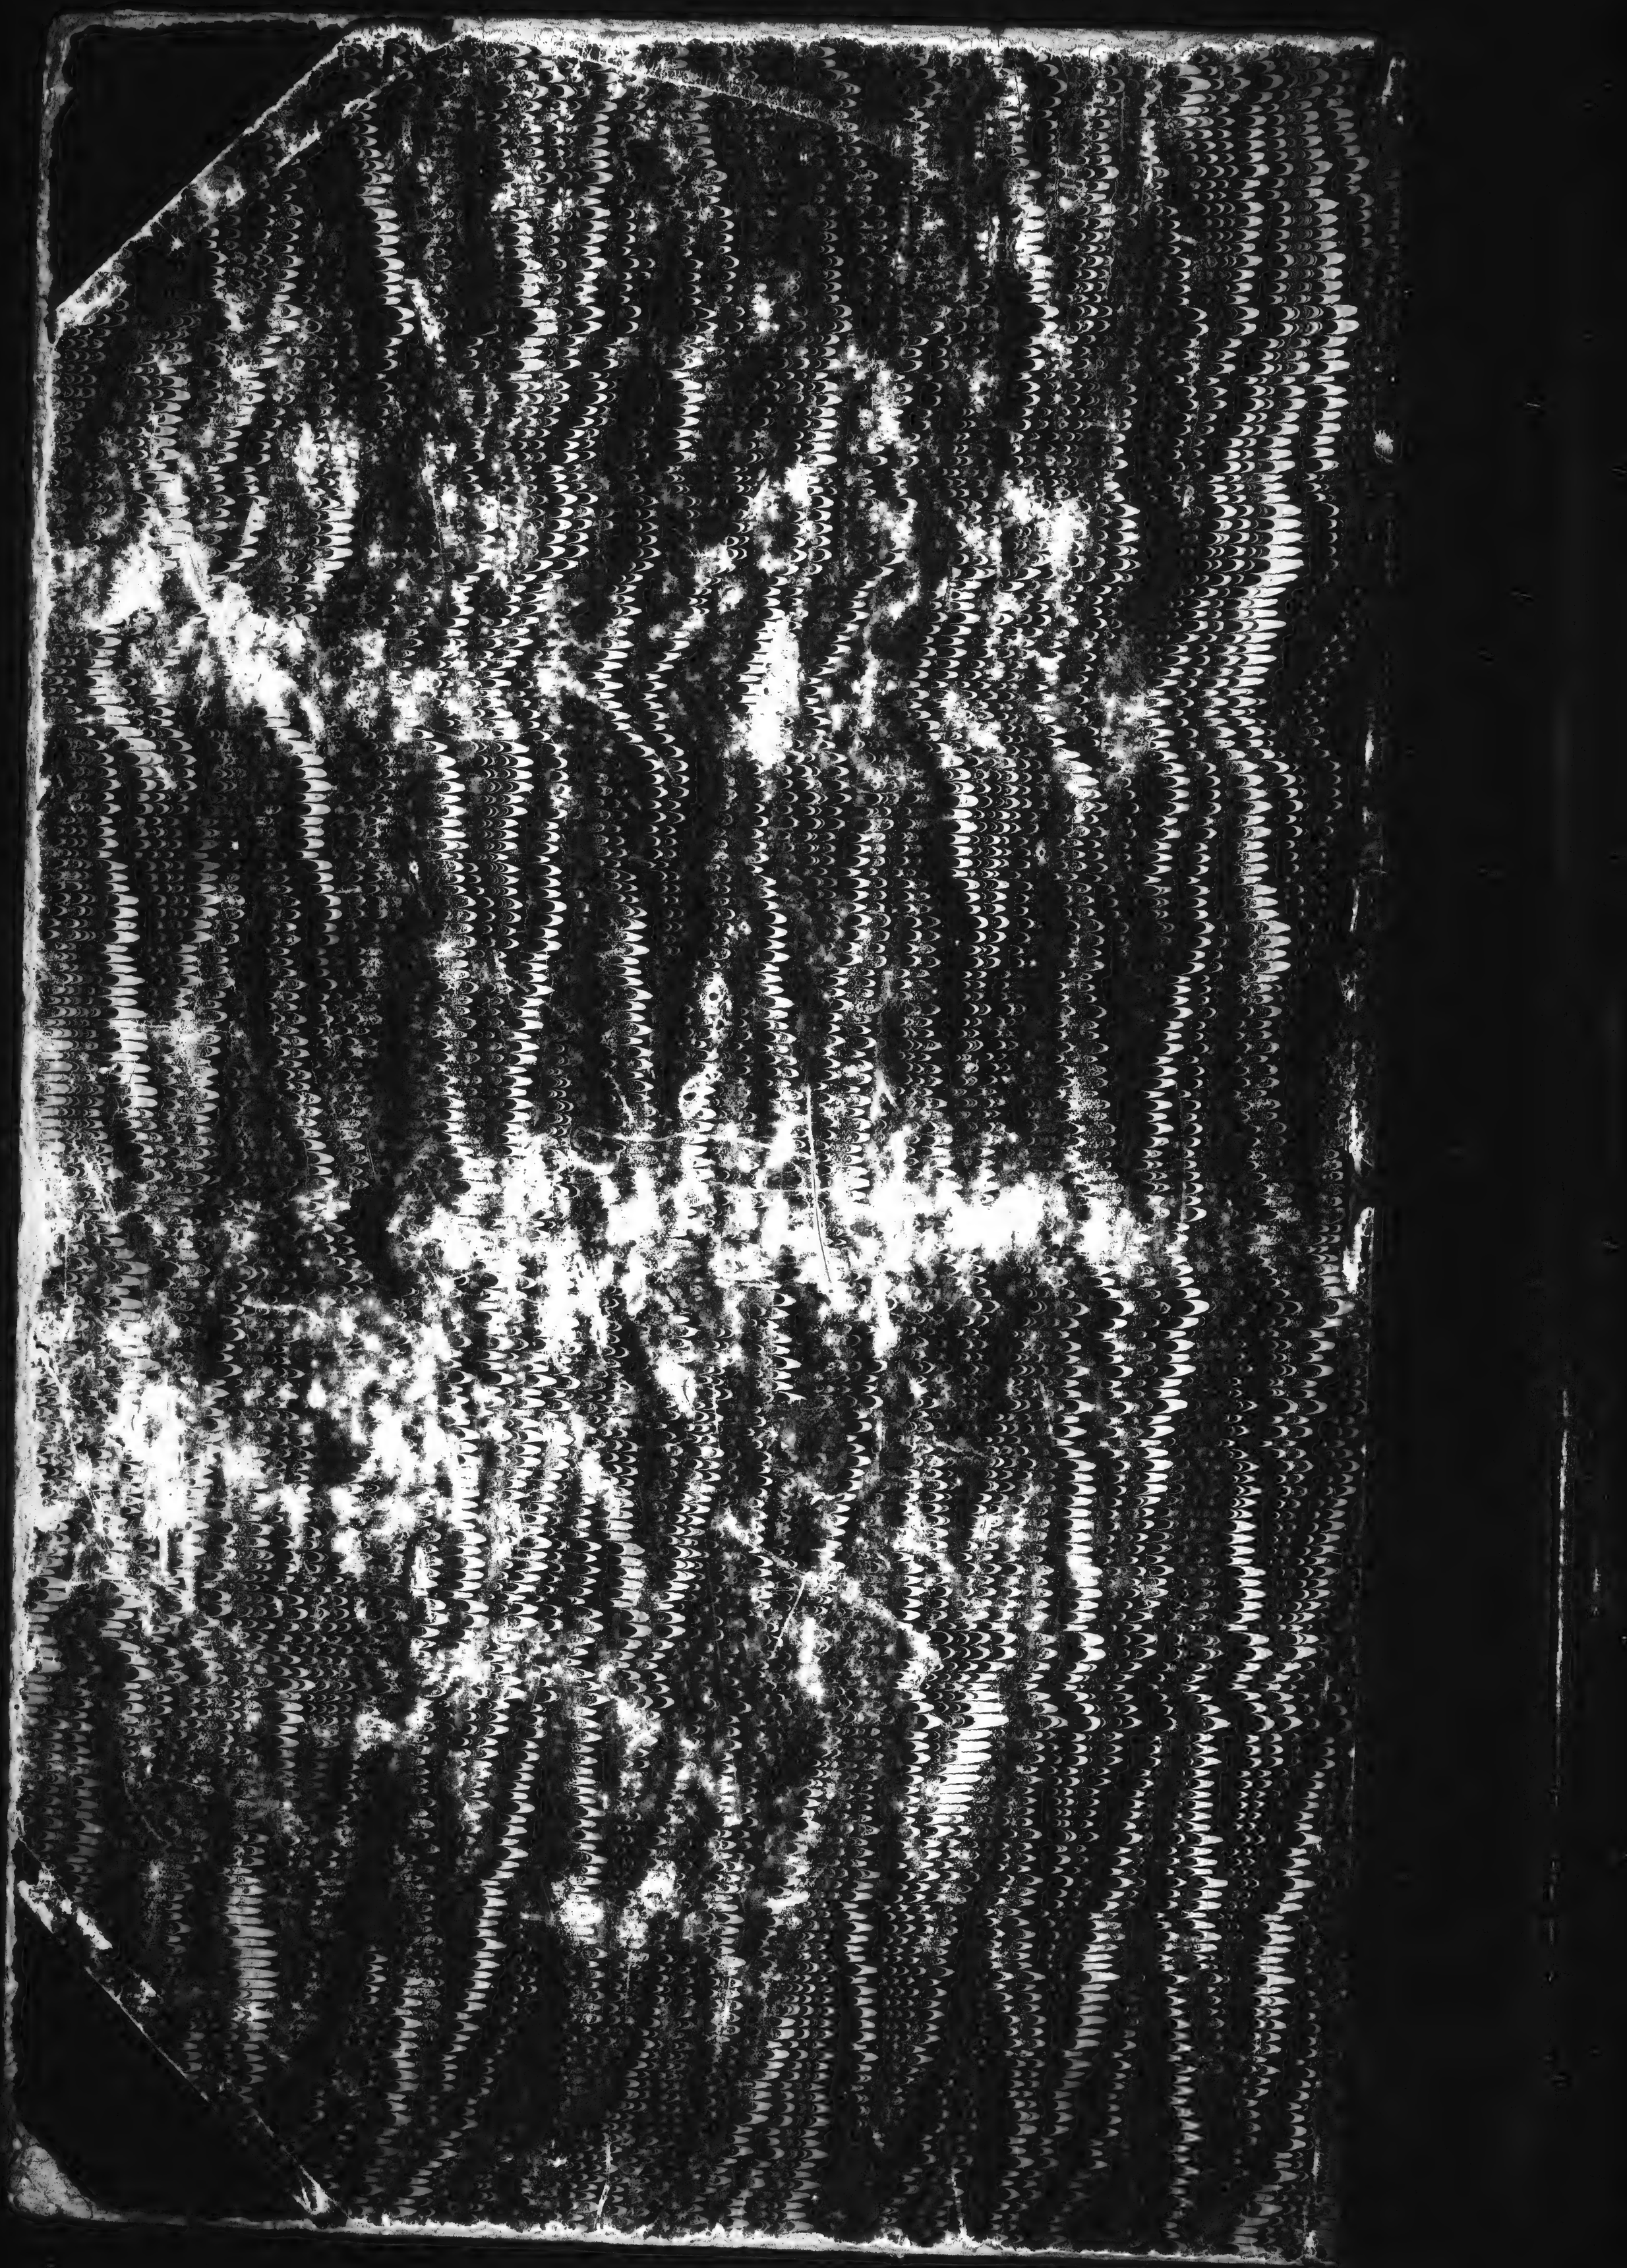
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

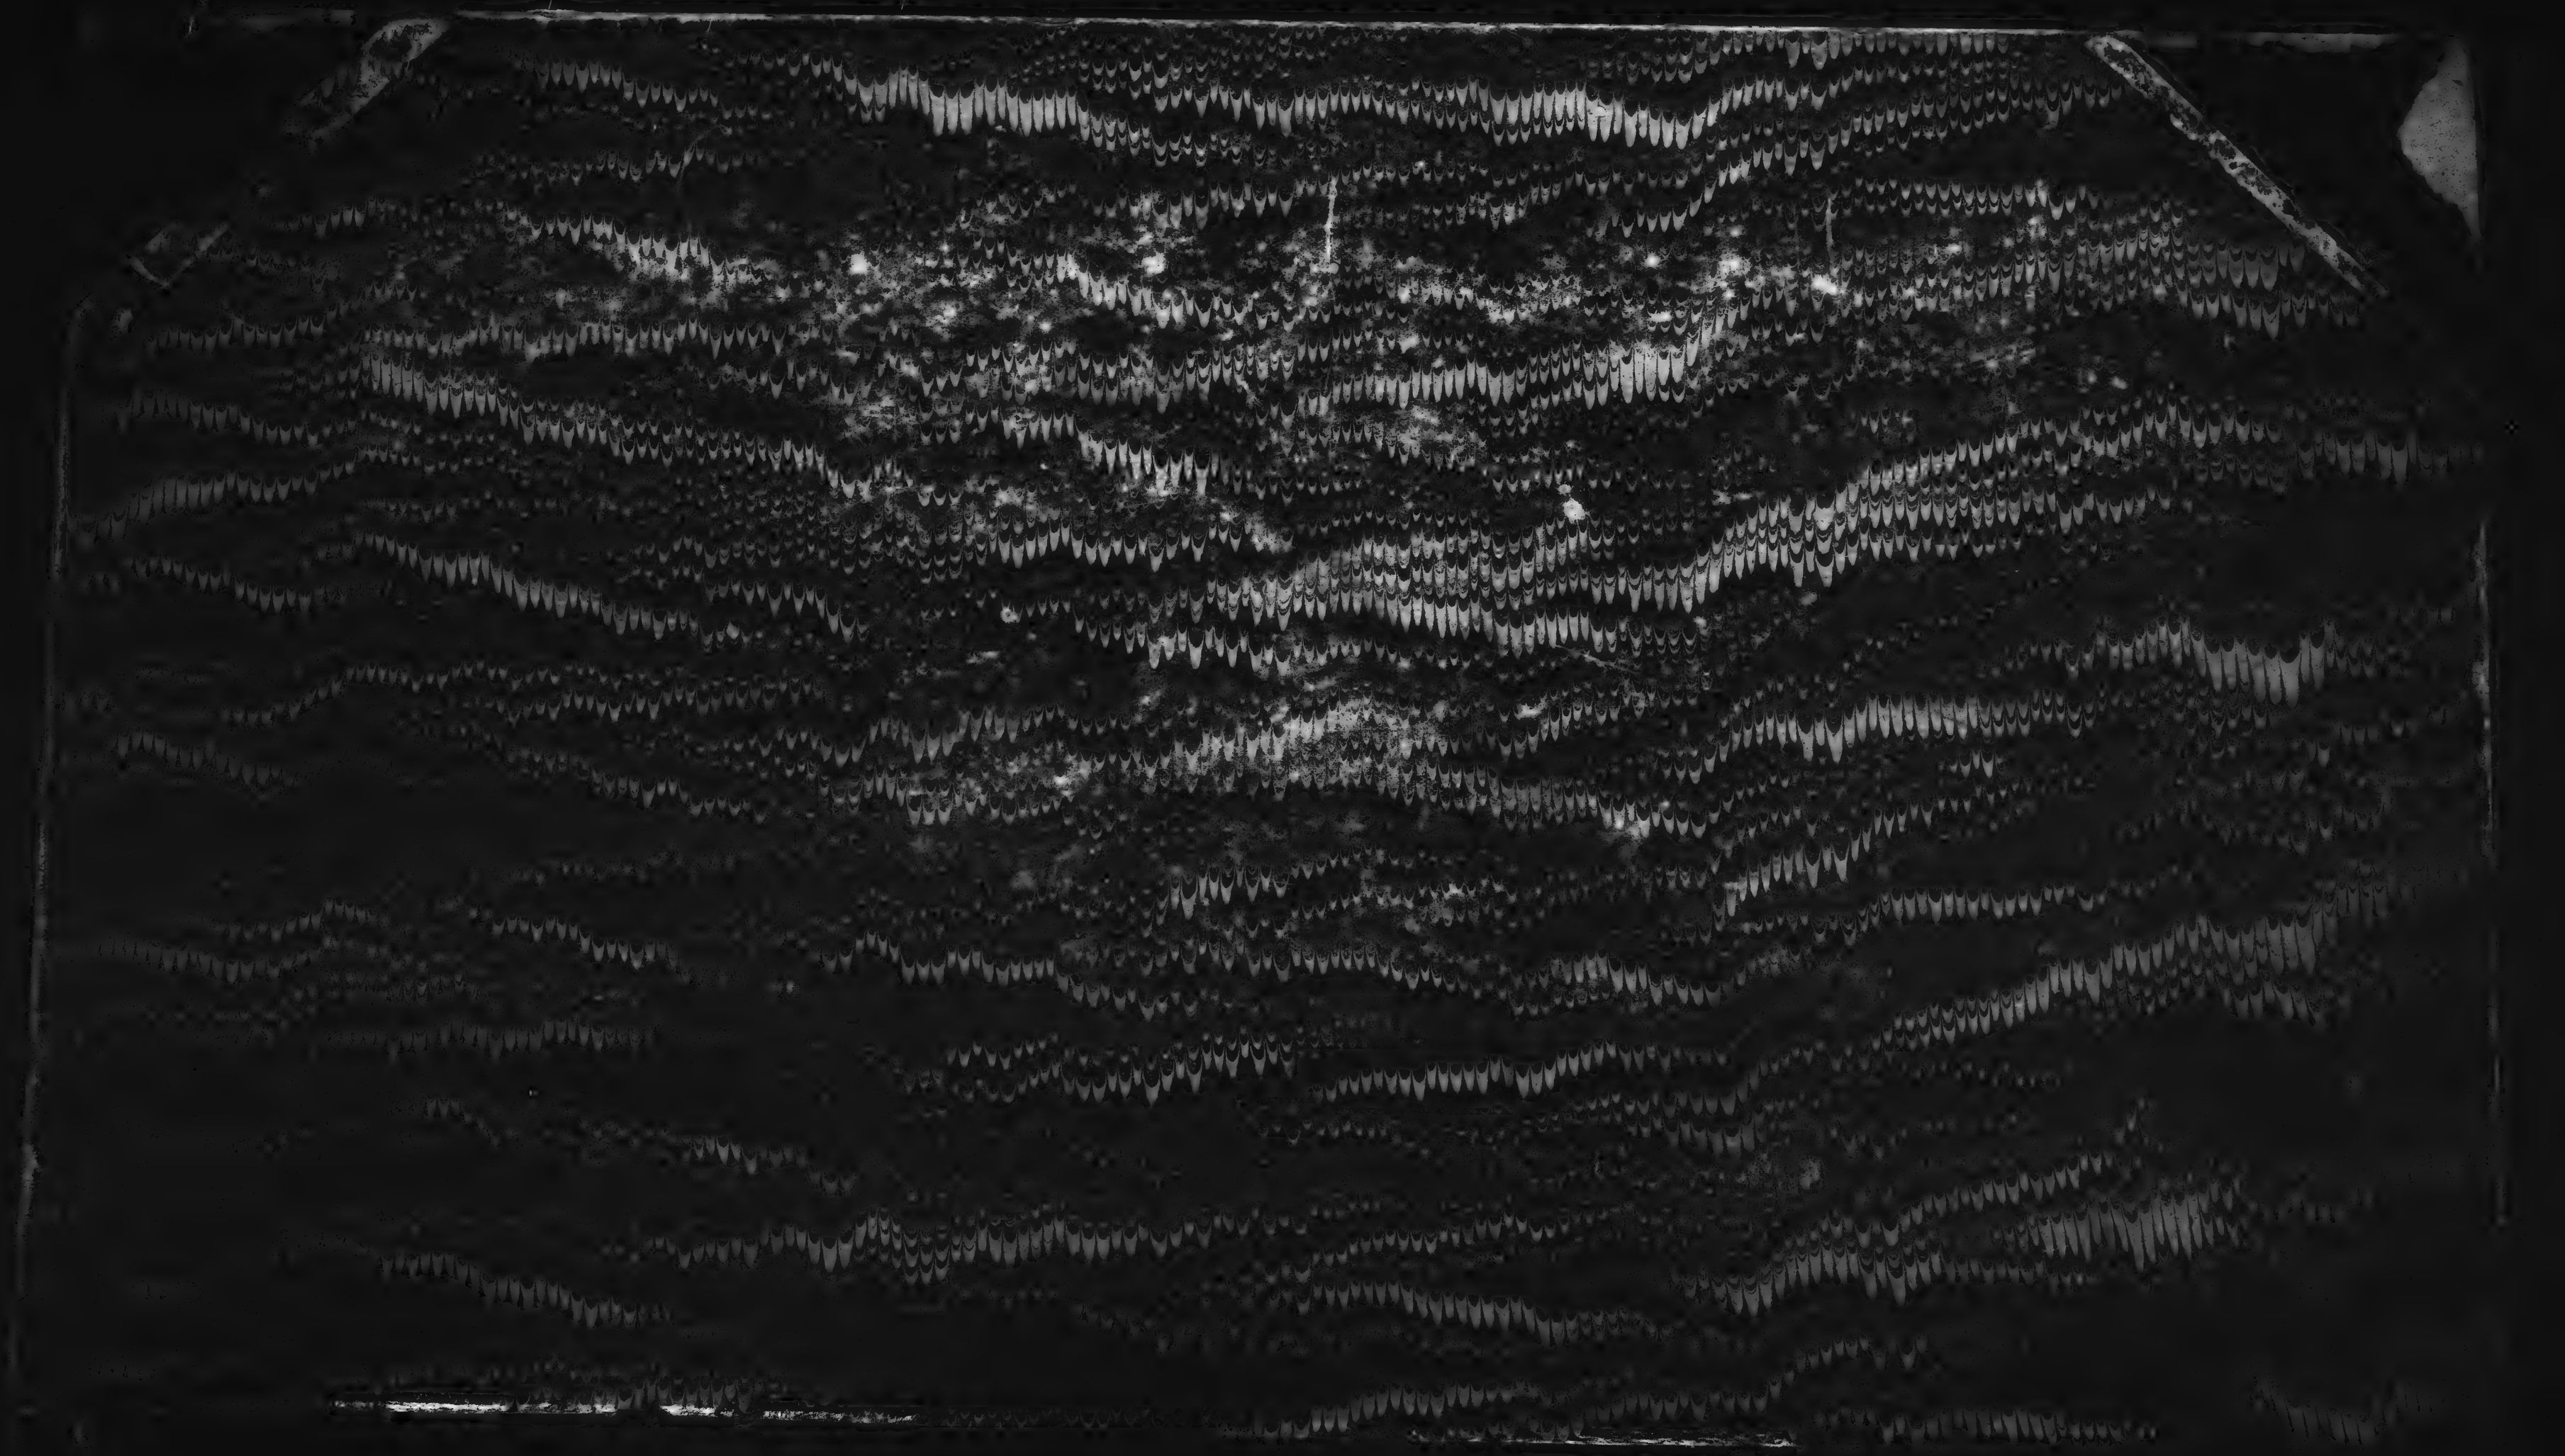


END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 50

BSO

1928



HILL, SMITH & CO.
INC.
STATIONERS
AND BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
BOSTON.
Job No. J. 1926
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

BLANK PAGE

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

LOOK IN Book
1926 & 1927
FOR CLIPPINGS FROM May 17 to Aug 26 -

(1)

TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.

MAY 25 1926

Pop Concerts Offer a Delightful Musical Entertainment.

Without the stiffness and formality of the regular symphonic concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the Pop concerts, now being held there nightly, afford a most enjoyable evening's entertainment along with the element of sociability. Recently we had the good fortune to attend one of these events and while munching pretzels and sipping pop punch (non-alcoholic) listened to the 80 piece orchestra, led by the astute Alfredo Casella, play such favorites as Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Grieg's Lyric Suite, Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, Handel's Largo and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Novelties on the program included Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. Besides this formidable list there were a few encores of a lighter nature.

All the members of the orchestra are regular Boston Symphony players and as such ensure renditions of a high order. Mr. Casella is a conductor with sound ideas of interpretation and while these interpretations did not wander far from well-tested conventions, there was a well defined outline to the music; the thematic idea was always maintained. The lyric beauty of the Nocturne of the Grieg suite was memorable; there was the proper "atmosphere" in the Saitn-Saens number and the modern spirit was set forth in the Enesco and Chabrier scores. But it remained for the stately Handel Largo—calling for the full resources of the magnificent organ—to create a deep and genuine spiritual feeling. Wagner's hackneyed—though always engrossing—"Tannhauser" overture closed the evening's program in a truly glamorous style.

Those who enjoy fine music—a blend of the classic and the semi-popular—splendidly played, will be well repaid by a visit to the Pops.

Literary Lights Not Over Bright in Musical Matters.

In the book review column of the New York World, Harry Hansen recently remarked that "music is always the first art to win recognition, because it is most easily comprehended."

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JUN 3 - 1926

Orchestras Favor Foreign Compositions

Reports recently compiled in New York from programs rendered and announced for the 1927-28 season of symphony orchestras of the nation, show that American compositions continue in the minority on these programs.

For the season reports show that of 128 selections rendered by the New York Philharmonic Society, only four were compositions of Americans.

Of 88 renditions by the New York Symphony orchestra, five were works of American composers. The Philadelphia symphony orchestra in its entire season played three American compositions, while the Boston Symphony played only two American works during its season's appearances.

Other orchestras, as far west as Chicago, also chose the larger part of their repertoire from foreign composers.

SUNDAY POPS SYMPHONIC

AFTER SUN

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will complete the fifth week of the current season. Tomorrow evening there will be played the third Sunday night concert, with a special symphonic program. The two programs follow, tonight and tomorrow night:

TONIGHT

"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg.....Wagner
Valse triste.....Sibelius
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Two Nocturnes.....Debussy
"Rossiniana," Suite.....Rossini-Respighi
Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Waltz from "The Bat".....Strauss
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky

SUNDAY

MOZART.....Symphony in E-flat major (K. No. 543).
BACH Concerto in D minor, for two violins and String Orchestra (Solo violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen).
WAGNER.....'Tannhauser," Bacchanale
WAGNER....."Lohengrin" Prelude to Act III
WAGNER....."Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death.
WAGNER....."The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.
WAGNER....."The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 3 - 1926

Culture Statistics

Daniel Gregory Mason's article in the June number of Harper's Magazine on "Our Orchestras and Our Money's Worth" puts culture on a solid cash basis. The American public, he holds, is not getting its money's worth at orchestral concerts because in making the programs the conductors are trying to give the public what it wants. This may seem paradoxical, but perhaps Mr Mason, himself a fastidious critic, is speaking less for the public at large than for a select minority.

His indictment of current programs is supported by formidable statistics showing what percentage of different types of music the five leading American orchestras gave during one season. New England will be interested to note that his figures show the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky to stand almost at the top according to the critical standards suggested, being surpassed, by a hair's breadth, only by the Chicago orchestra under Mr Stock, while the Philharmonic and Symphony orchestra of New York and the Philadelphia orchestra, under Stokowski, rank much lower.

Both the classification and the rating of the several classes of music, it is true, are somewhat arbitrary. The fundamental division is into old and new, but it is hard to say precisely when music ceases to be new. All American works are set down as modern, but there is a great difference in their modernity. The one clear-cut division is that between American music and other modern works, though even here the distinction may be biographical rather than musical.

The older works Mr Mason divides first into the familiar and the neglected, and the familiar he subdivides, arbitrarily but intelligibly, into "stand-bys" and "war horses." What he means can best be shown by examples. A New York manager says that only a dozen symphonies help the box office. Beethoven's third, fifth and seventh, Tschaikowsky's fourth, fifth and sixth, Schubert's "Unfinished," Dvorak's "New World," Cesar Franck's and all four by Brahms. These, then, are typical "stand bys."

"War horses" is applied to works which are special favorites with "guest" and "prima donna" conductors who find in them an opportunity for personal display. Here Mr Mason puts the works of Liszt, Strauss, Tschaikowsky (who thus falls in both groups) and Wagner. In general the "war horses," "being of a more external and sensational type of art, lend themselves particularly to the posings, exaggerations, artificial and specious effects of the prima donna conductor. They are thus well adapted to the low stage of mentality of those 'fans' in every audience who conceive performers not as artists but as 'stars' and devote themselves in the spirit of college athletics to boosting them."

These remarks give force to the statistical evidence. In the Philadelphia programs the "war horses" made up almost exactly one-third of the total (32.5 per cent) as compared with 21.42 per cent for the Philharmonic; 15.23 for Dr. Damrosch's Symphony orchestra, 19.20 for Chicago and 15.74 for Boston. Of the "stand bys" the Boston orchestra gave fewest—but 23.14 per cent as compared with 25.60 for Chicago, 26.66 for Philadelphia, 34.11 for the Philharmonic and 33.33 for the New York Symphony. From this we may expect to find, and do find, Boston well in the lead in modern works. In American music it falls behind only the Philharmonic; and in the total of modern works it is well ahead, with 40.64 per cent as against 33.86 for Chicago, 30.40 for the Philharmonic, 25.83 for Philharmonic, and 25.70 for the New York Symphony.

These figures are suggestive, but for their full interpretation other data are needed. To give a generous allowance of new works shows a progressive spirit, but much depends on their selection. If Mr Mason sounds the inertia of conservatism deplores fer old favorites in preference to unfamiliar masterpieces, he also deplores the moronic radicalism of the minority that clamors for sensational novelties.

One thing which Mr Mason's statistics appear to show is that in the long run an orchestra with a permanent conductor will give its listeners a better-balanced musical diet than is likely to be provided by a succession of guest conductors who are out for a quick and concentrated personal success. Certainly the resident conductors do best by American music, which Mr Mason calls "the ugly duckling" of our concert halls. There is no getting away from the fact that American music is unpopular. It does not draw the public, the critics treat it superciliously, and the players in the orchestra, Mr Mason remarks, do not like it because it usually comes in manuscript parts full of errors and has to be deciphered with difficulty. Perhaps philanthropists who want to aid American composers would do better in providing for the printing and trial performance of their music than in offering prizes. A prize competition is but a lottery and prize-winning works have a bad name; what the composer wants is assurance of a fair chance to get his work before the public.

That American music has done as well as it has Mr Mason ascribes almost entirely to "the vision and artistic enthusiasm of those of our conductors who are true artists. . . . It will never be known how much American music owes to Frederick Stock alone, for example, who for years has given it his great skill and his tireless loyalty; and there are several others." This is a point at which money can really help, for the cost nowadays of giving new music a fair hearing is formidable.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Mozart, Bach and Wagner are the composers represented on the symphonic programme prepared by Alfred Casella for this evening's Pop concert. From Mozart comes the Symphony in E-flat major, from Bach, a Concerto in M minor for two violins and string orchestra, and the Wagner excerpts are the "Bachanale" from "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Ride of the Valkyries and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie."

POST JUNE 3

SIXTH WEEK OF POPS

Though this the sixth week of the Pop concerts Mr. Casella's programmes follow familiar lines. On Monday the orchestra will be heard in the music Russian and Italian composers, plus the "Valse Triste" of Sibelius and Handel's Largo. Tuesday evening the chosen numbers include the "Peer Gynt" Suite of Grieg and Chabrier's "Espana." There will be songs by the chorus of the Boston Square and Compass Club.

The Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony has played on Wednesday's programme together with the Meditation from Massenet's "Thais." Also on this list is the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Wagner is thrice represented on Thursday—by the Prelude to the "Mastersingers," the Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods' and the Overture to "Tannhauser." Numbers from French opera will be forthcoming on Friday—the March from Meyerbeer's "Le Prophete," the Ballet Music from Gounod's "Faust,' the Overture to Lalo's "La Roi d' Ys' and the Bachannale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." On Saturday Mr. Casella's "Scarlattiana" with himself as pianist will be repeated and on this programme stand also the Ballet Music from "La Gioconda' and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain."

"POPS" BEGIN SIXTH WEEK

Varied and Interesting Programs Have Been Arranged for Concerts

HER JUN 3

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will begin tonight the sixth week of their 43d season. Alfredo Casella, the celebrated Pops conductor, announces the following programs for this week:

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E-flat major.....Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra.....Bach
(Solo violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gunderson)
"Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale.....Wagner
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III...Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death.....Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music...Wagner

MONDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Tchaikovsky
Valse Trieste.....Sibelius
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
"Fountains of Rome," Symphonic Poem.....Respighi
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Le Maschere".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Prelude to Act III, "Traviata".....Verdi
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Marche Ecossaise.....Debussy
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini

WEDNESDAY

Overture in C minor.....Foroni
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem.....Liszt
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rassoll
"Molly on the Shore".....Grainger
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY

Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods".....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin
March, "Lorraine".....Ganne

FRIDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Ballet Music from "Faust".....Gounod
Overture to "The King of Ys".....Lalo
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Largo.....Handel
Capriccio Espagnol.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Bacchanale, "Sampson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
March, "The Garden City".....C. R. Spalding

SATURDAY

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Ballet Suite.....Gluck-Mottl
Overture, "The Italian in Algiers".....Rossini
Marche Joyeuse.....Chabrier
Night on Bald Mountain.....Moussorgsky
Scarlattiana.....Casella
(Piano solo: Alfredo Casella)
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Dance of the Waves, "Lorelei".....Casella
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

A Symphonic Pops; Bach for Novelty

TRANS—JUN 4

For the next to the last of the symphonic programs of the present summer of Pops concerts, Mr. Casella was content to be conservative in both matter and manner. The program fell evenly into two divisions, the first half comprising the classical patterns of Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Bach's brief concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra; and the second half, devoted entirely to excerpts from the operas of Wagner. For this closing division, Mr. Casella's choice included the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the prelude to act three of "Lohengrin," the prelude and Love-Death of "Tristan and Isolde," the Ride of the Valkyrs and the Magic Fire Spell from "Die Walküre." The aspect of Symphony Hall last evening testified that the prospect of the concert had been inviting, for only those chairs in the rear of the main floor were left vacant, and both the first and second balconies were as populous as ever. Whether or not Mr. Casella designs his program with the thought that the many who may not attend the regular winter series shall now have the opportunity of hearing music of similar importance, at least the popular response to his plan of concert indicates that some such opinion is generally entertained and acted upon.

Last evening, however, either the symphonic appetite of the general listener appeared larger than his ability to assimilate the solid fare that was put before him on a lovely summer evening, or Mr. Casella was less dramatic than his usual wont; for the general outcome of the occasion fell short of the enthusiasm of anticipation. At the close of Mozart's symphony the applause from listeners grateful to hear a sound performance of a familiar and well-liked classic brought the orchestra to its feet. Thereafter, the response was more than moderate only for the brisk strides of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" and for the dramatic ride of the Valkyrs. Mr. Casella preferred a careful and leisurely performance of Mozart's symphony to the crispness and piquancy with which this music is sometimes heard. The motion of the music was smooth and sure; the changes of pace were scarcely abrupt; the contrasts in dynamics never startling. Mr. Casella, supple and brilliant in the music of the present, takes his eighteenth-century Mozart "straight;" the composer speaks for himself; personal illumination and present-day touching-up are quietly denied.

In similar vein [illegible] concerto [illegible] novelty [illegible] sensu- [illegible] those [illegible] e an- [illegible] f the [illegible] d pe- [illegible] ts in [illegible]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUN 10 192[illegible]

The Boston Symphony And Its "Pop" Concerts

THE famous and dignified Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized as one of the most popular visiting organizations that Washington music lovers welcome in the "season." Due to many requests, the orchestra will play in Washington twice next year (instead of just once as in the past season), giving programs January 20 and March 6 under local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Many Washingtonians do not know about the more frivolous side of Boston Symphony activties; do not realize that this will be the forty-third consecutive season of the highly successful "Pop" Summer concerts which begin in Boston in May and run until July 4.

The Pop concerts date back to Boston's earliest music annals. They are indeed as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden dome of the State House. There is nothing in other American cities just like the Pops. Often they have been imitated, but never with success. Perhaps the secret of the popularity of the Boston Pops lies in their happy and precisely adjusted blend of music and sociability.

The programs are never too solemn for lighter tastes and yet never too jazzy for the musically particular. They range from a rhapsody or a movement from a symphony to a waltz or a march for variety. The scope is extensive and it appeals to an extensive public. The "Pop goers" gather at the tables, partake of "Pop punch," or ice cream, converse with their companions and enjoy music of many degrees and of uniformly fine performance.

The Pops date back to the Summer of 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modeled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa.

The experiment was an immediate success. The "promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the old Music Hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony Hall, the magnificent new auditorium, built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

There has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Alfredo Casella's orchestra numbers about 80 players (all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra), which doubles the size of the original Pops Orchestra. The music is now taken more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gayety prevails.

Last season the Pops acquired Alfredo Casella, a distinguished figure in the line of Pops conductors, and this celebrity has returned from Europe to conduct the forty-third season this year. Casella is a leading Italian composer, a brilliant pianist and a fine conductor. The Pops under Casella have taken on a new interest and importance.

Mr. Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra in the winter season, is now in Paris giving his annual series of concert programs there. He will conduct the orchestra in the two Washington appearances next Winter.

[illegible] deeps. 3 cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

Koussevitzky's fame as a virtuoso was high, indeed, and there is every indication that his mastery of the instrument was a thing to wonder at. A particular musical treat must have been the joint recitals which he gave in Paris with Casadesus, the leader of the renowned Society of Ancient Instruments.

TO PLAY AT POPS

When Gershwin's celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue" is performed under the direction of Arthur Fiedler at the Pop concert of June 14 (Tufts Night), the pianist will be Doris Estey of Brockton, a pupil of Frederic Tillotson of this city. Mr. Gershwin's "Classical Jazz," hitherto unheard at the Pops, will be repeated at these concerts on June 20, with Miss Estey as soloist.

POST JUN 10

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 4 - 1926

There is a possibility that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitsky will be taken to Europe for a ten-weeks' tour next spring. That ought to wake 'em up in England, at least, if all that Sir Thomas Beecham said about the decline of good orchestral music in England is true.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 6 - 1926

Waking England Up.

From the Providence Journal.

There is a possibility that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitsky will be taken to Europe for a 10 weeks' tour next spring. That ought to wake 'em up in England, at least, if all that Sir. Thomas Beecham said about the decline of good orchestral music in England is true.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUN 10 1926

[illegible] and the National Capital goes the [illegible]esting custom of radio commence-

[illegible]g to think about when he said over

[illegible]dder a woman's lips get, the whiter [illegible]hen he added: "Now, its just the

[illegible]old stager, whose voice in all these [illegible]eightest, almost blew up the town. [illegible]hinn tells us he stood at least three [illegible]oud speakers shivered and the win-

[illegible] these [illegible]orld's [illegible] were [illegible] trees

[illegible]niliar

LOOK IN Book
1926 & 1927
FOR CLIPPINGS FROM May 17 to Aug 26 -

(1)

TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.

MAY 25 1926

Pop Concerts Offer a Delightful Musical Entertainment.

Without the stiffness and formality of the regular symphonic concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the Pop concerts, now being held there nightly, afford a most enjoyable evening's entertainment along with the element of sociability. Recently we had the good fortune to attend one of these events and while munching pretzels and sipping pop punch (non-alcoholic) listened to the 80 piece orchestra, led by the astute Alfredo Casella, play such favorites as Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Grieg's Lyric Suite, Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, Handel's Largo and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Novelties on the program included Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. Besides this formidable list there were a few encores of a lighter nature.

All the members of the orchestra are regular Boston Symphony players and as such ensure renditions of a high order. Mr. Casella is a conductor with sound ideas of interpretation and while these interpretations did not wander far from well-tested conventions, there was a well defined outline to the music; the thematic idea was always maintained. The lyric beauty of the Nocturne of the Grieg suite was memorable; there was the proper "atmosphere" in the Saitn-Saens number and the modern spirit was set forth in the Enesco and Chabrier scores. But it remained for the stately Handel Largo—calling for the full resources of the magnificent organ—to create a deep and genuine spiritual feeling. Wagner's hackneyed—though always engrossing—"Tannhauser" overture closed the evening's program in a truly glamorous style.

Those who enjoy fine music—a blend of the classic and the semi-popular—splendidly played, will be well repaid by a visit to the Pops.

Literary Lights Not Over Bright in Musical Matters.

In the book review column of the New York World, Harry Hansen recently remarked that "music is always the first art to win recognition, because it is most easily compre-

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

Orchestras Favor Foreign Compositions

Reports recently compiled in New York from programs rendered and announced for the 1927-28 season of symphony orchestras of the nation, show that American compositions continue in the minority on these programs.

For the season reports show that of 128 selections rendered by the New York Philharmonic Society, only four were compositions of Americans.

Of 88 renditions by the New York Symphony orchestra, five were works of American composers. The Philadelphia symphony orchestra in its entire season played three American compositions, while the Boston Symphony played only two American works during its season's appearances.

Other orchestras, as far west as Chicago, also chose the larger part of their repertoire from foreign composers.

SUNDAY POPS SYMPHONIC

HYER SUN

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will complete the fifth week of the current season. Tomorrow evening there will be played the third Sunday night concert, with a special symphonic program. The two programs follow, tonight and tomorrow night:

TONIGHT

"Tannhauser:" Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg.....Wagner
Valse triste.....Sibelius
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Two Nocturnes.....Debussy
"Rossiniana," Suite.....Rossini-Respighi
Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Waltz from "The Bat".....Strauss
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky

SUNDAY

MOZART.....Symphony in E-flat major (K. No. 543).
BACH Concerto in D minor, for two violins and String Orchestra (Solo violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen).
WAGNER.....Tannhauser," Bacchanale
WAGNER..."Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III
WAGNER...."Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death.
WAGNER...."The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.
WAGNER....."The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 3 - 1926

Culture Statistics

Daniel Gregory Mason's article in the June number of Harper's Magazine on "Our Orchestras and Our Money's Worth" puts culture on a solid cash basis. The American public, he holds, is not getting its money's worth at orchestral concerts because in making the programs the conductors are trying to give the public what it wants. This may seem paradoxical, but perhaps Mr Mason, himself a fastidious critic, is speaking less for the public at large than for a select minority.

His indictment of current programs is supported by formidable statistics showing what percentage of different types of music the five leading American orchestras gave during one season. New England will be interested to note that his figures show the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky to stand almost at the top according to the critical standards suggested, being surpassed, by a hair's breadth, only by the Chicago orchestra under Mr Stock, while the Philharmonic and Symphony orchestra of New York and the Philadelphia orchestra, under Stokowski, rank much lower.

Both the classification and the rating of the several classes of music, it is true, are somewhat arbitrary. The fundamental division is into old and new, but it is hard to say precisely when music ceases to be new. All American works are set down as modern, but there is a great difference in their modernity. The one clear-cut division is that between American music and other modern works, though even here the distinction may be biographical rather than musical.

The older works Mr Mason divides first into the familiar and the neglected, and the familiar he subdivides, arbitrarily but intelligibly, into "stand-bys" and "war horses." What he means can best be shown by examples. A New York manager says that only a dozen symphonies help the box office. Beethoven's third, fifth and seventh, Tschaikowsky's fourth, fifth and sixth, Schubert's "Unfinished," Dvorak's "New World," Cesar Franck's and all four by Brahms. These, then, are typical "stand bys."

"War horses" is applied to works which are special favorites with "guest" and "prima donna" conductors who find in them an opportunity for personal display. Here Mr Mason puts the works of Liszt, Strauss, Tschaikowsky (who thus falls in both groups) and Wagner. In general the "war horses," "being of a more external and sensational type of art, lend themselves particularly to the posings, exaggerations, artificial and specious effects of the prima donna conductor. They are thus well adapted to the low stage of mentality of those 'fans' in every audience who conceive performers not as artists but as 'stars' and devote themselves in the spirit of college athletics to boosting them."

These remarks give force to the statistical evidence. In the Philadelphia programs the "war horses" made up almost exactly one-third of the total (32.5 per cent) as compared with 21.42 per cent for the Philharmonic; 15.23 for Dr. Damrosch's Symphony orchestra, 19.20 for Chicago and 15.74 for Boston. Of the "stand bys" the Boston orchestra gave fewest—but 23.14 per cent as compared with 25.60 for Chicago, 26.66 for Philadelphia, 34.11 for the Philharmonic and 33.33 for the New York Symphony. From this we may expect to find, and do find, Boston well in the lead in modern works. In American music it falls behind only the Philharmonic; and in the total of modern works it is well ahead, with 40.64 per cent as against 33.86 for Chicago, 30.40 for the Philharmonic, 25.83 for Philharmonic, and 25.70 for the New York Symphony.

These figures are suggestive, but for their full interpretation other data are needed. To give a generous allowance of new works shows a progressive spirit, but much depends on their selection. If Mr Mason depends on the inertia of conservation deplores fer old favorites to the detriment of representatives who prepieces, he also deplores the moronic unfamiliar masterradicalism of the minority that clamors for sensational novelties.

One thing which Mr Mason's statistics appear to show is that in the long run an orchestra with a permanent conductor will give its listeners a better-balanced musical diet than is likely to be provided by a succession of guest conductors who are out for a quick and concentrated personal success. Certainly the resident conductors do best by American music, which Mr Mason calls "the ugly duckling" of our concert halls. There is no getting away from the fact that American music is unpopular. It does not draw the public, the critics treat it superciliously, and the players in the orchestra, Mr Mason remarks, do not like it because it usually comes in manuscript parts full of errors and has to be deciphered with difficulty. Perhaps philanthropists who want to aid American composers would do better in providing for the printing and trial performance of their music than in offering prizes. A prize competition is but a lottery and prize-winning works have a bad name; what the composer wants is assurance of a fair chance to get his work before the public.

That American music has done as well as it has Mr Mason ascribes almost entirely to "the vision and artistic enthusiasm of those of our conductors who are true artists. . . . It will never be known how much American music owes to Frederick Stock alone, for example, who for years has given it his great skill and his tireless loyalty; and there are several others." This is a point at which money can really help, for the cost nowadays of giving new music a fair hearing is formidable.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Mozart, Bach and Wagner are the composers represented on the symphonic programme prepared by Alfred Casella for this evening's Pop concert. From Mozart comes the Symphony in E-flat major, from Bach, a Concerto in M minor for two violins and string orchestra, and the Wagner excerpts are the "Bachanale" from "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Ride of the Valkyries and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie."

POST JUNE 3

SIXTH WEEK OF POPS

Though this the sixth week of the Pop concerts Mr. Casella's programmes follow familiar lines. On Monday the orchestra will be heard in the music Russian and Italian composers, plus the "Valse Triste" of Sibelius and Handel's Largo. Tuesday evening the chosen numbers include the "Peer Gynt" Suite of Grieg and Chabrier's "Espana." There will be songs by the chorus of the Boston Square and Compass Club.

The Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony has played on Wednesday's programme together with the Meditation from Massenet's "Thais." Also on this list is the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Wagner is thrice represented on Thursday—by the Prelude to the "Mastersingers," the Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods' and the Overture to "Tannhauser." Numbers from French opera will be forthcoming on Friday—the March from Meyerbeer's "Le Prophete," the Ballet Music from Gounod's "Faust," the Overture to Lalo's "La Roi d' Ys' and the Bachannale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." On Saturday Mr. Casella's "Scarlattiana" with himself as pianist will be repeated and on this programme stand also the Ballet Music from "La Gioconda' and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain."

"POPS" BEGIN SIXTH WEEK

Varied and Interesting Programs Have Been Arranged for Concerts

HER JUN 3

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will begin tonight the sixth week of their 43d season. Alfredo Casella, the celebrated Pops conductor, announces the following programs for this week:

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E-flat major.....Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra.....Bach
(Solo violins, Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gunderson)
"Tannhaeuser," Bacchanale.....Wagner
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III.....Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death.....Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music.....Wagner

MONDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
"Fountains of Rome," Symphonic Poem.....Respighi
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Le Maschere".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Prelude to Act III, "Traviata".....Verdi
"Espana" Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Marche Ecossaise.....Debussy
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini

WEDNESDAY

Overture in C minor.....Foroni
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem.....Liszt
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
"Molly on the Shore".....Grainger
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY

Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods".....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin
March, "Lorraine".....Ganne

FRIDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Ballet Music from "Faust".....Gounod
Overture to "The King of Ys".....Lalo
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Largo.....Handel
Capriccio Espagnol.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Bacchanale, "Sampson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
March, "The Garden City".....C. R. Spalding

SATURDAY

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Ballet Suite.....Gluck-Mottl
Overture, "The Italian in Algiers".....Rossini
Marche Joyeuse.....Chabrier
Night on Bald Mountain.....Mousso[illegible]
Scarlattiana.....Ca[illegible]
(Piano solo: Alfredo Casella)
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponc[illegible]
Dance of the Waves, "Lorelei".....Ca[illegible]
Ride of the Valkyries.....W[illegible]

A Symphonic Pops; Bach for Novelty

TRANS—JUN 4

For the next to the last of the symphonic programs of the present summer of Pops concerts, Mr. Casella was content to be conservative in both matter and manner. The program fell evenly into two divisions, the first half comprising the classical patterns of Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Bach's brief concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra; and the second half, devoted entirely to excerpts from the operas of Wagner. For this closing division, Mr. Casella's choice included the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the prelude to act three of "Lohengrin," the prelude and Love-Death of "Tristan and Isolde," the Ride of the Valkyrs and the Magic Fire Spell from "Die Walküre." The aspect of Symphony Hall last evening testified that the prospect of the concert had been inviting, for only those chairs in the rear of the main floor were left vacant, and both the first and second balconies were as populous as ever. Whether or not Mr. Casella designs his program with the thought that the many who may not attend the regular winter series shall now have the opportunity of hearing music of similar importance, at least the popular response to his plan of concert indicates that some such opinion is generally entertained and acted upon.

Last evening, however, either the symphonic appetite of the general listener appeared larger than his ability to assimilate the solid fare that was put before him on a lovely summer evening, or Mr. Casella was less dramatic than his usual wont; for the general outcome of the occasion fell short of the enthusiasm of anticipation. At the close of Mozart's symphony the applause from listeners grateful to hear a sound performance of a familiar and well-liked classic brought the orchestra to its feet. Thereafter, the response was more than moderate only for the brisk strides of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" and for the dramatic ride of the Valkyrs. Mr. Casella preferred a careful and leisurely performance of Mozart's symphony to the crispness and piquancy with which this music is sometimes heard. The motion of the music was smooth and sure; the changes of pace were scarcely abrupt; the contrasts in dynamics never startling. Mr. Casella, supple and brilliant in the music of the present, takes his eighteenth-century Mozart "straight;" the composer speaks for himself; personal illumination and present-day touching-up are quietly denied.

In similar vein[illegible] ncerto ovelty sensu- those ie an- f the id pe- ts in

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUN 1[illegible]

The Boston Symphony And Its "Pop" Concerts

THE famous and dignified Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized as one of the most popular visiting organizations that Washington music lovers welcome in the "season." Due to many requests, the orchestra will play in Washington twice next year (instead of just once as in the past season), giving programs January 20 and March 6 under local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Many Washingtonians do not know about the more frivolous side of Boston Symphony activties; do not realize that this will be the forty-third consecutive season of the highly successful "Pop" Summer concerts which begin in Boston in May and run until July 4.

The Pop concerts date back to Boston's earliest music annals. They are indeed as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden dome of the State House. There is nothing in other American cities just like the Pops. Often they have been imitated, but never with success. Perhaps the secret of the popularity of the Boston Pops lies in their happy and precisely adjusted blend of music and sociability.

The programs are never too solemn for lighter tastes and yet never too jazzy for the musically particular. They range from a rhapsody or a movement from a symphony to a waltz or a march for variety. The scope is extensive and it appeals to an extensive public. The "Pop goers" gather at the tables, partake of "Pop punch," or ice cream, converse with their companions and enjoy music of many degrees and of uniformly fine performance.

The Pops date back to the Summer of 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modeled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa.

The experiment was an immediate success. The "promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony Orchestra left the old Music Hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony Hall, the magnificent new auditorium, built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

There has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Alfredo Casella's orchestra numbers about 80 players (all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra), which doubles the size of the original Pops Orchestra. The music is now taken more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gayety prevails.

Last season the Pops acquired Alfredo Casella, a distinguished figure in the line of Pops conductors, and this celebrity has returned from Europe to conduct the forty-third season this year. Casella is a leading Italian composer, a brilliant pianist and a fine conductor. The Pops under Casella have taken on a new interest and importance.

Mr. Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra in the Winter season, is now in Paris giving his annual series of concert programs there. He will conduct the orchestra in the two Washington appearances next Winter.

[illegible] deeper 'cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

Koussevitzky's fame as a virtuoso was high, indeed, and there is every indication that his mastery of the instrument was a thing to wonder at. A particular musical treat must have been the joint recitals which he gave in Paris with Casadesus, the leader of the renowned Society of Ancient Instruments.

TO PLAY AT POPS

When Gershwin's celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue" is performed under the direction of Arthur Fiedler at the Pop concert of June 14 (Tufts Night), the pianist will be Doris Estey of Brockton, a pupil of Frederic Tillotson of this city. Mr. Gershwin's "Classical Jazz," hitherto unheard at the Pops, will be repeated at these concerts on June 20, with Miss Estey as soloist.

POST JUN 10

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 4 - 1926

There is a possibility that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitsky will be taken to Europe for a ten-weeks' tour next spring. That ought to wake 'em up in England, at least, if all that Sir Thomas Beecham said about the decline of good orchestral music in England is true.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 6 - 1926

Waking England Up.

From the Providence Journal.

There is a possibility that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitsky will be taken to Europe for a 10 weeks' tour next spring. That ought to wake 'em up in England, at least, if all that Sir. Thomas Beecham said about the decline of good orchestral music in England is true.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUN 10 1926

[illegible] deserving of any com-

[illegible] and the National Capital goes the [illegible]sting custom of radio commence-

[illegible]g to think about when he said over

[illegible]lder a woman's lips get, the whiter [illegible]hen he added: "Now, its just the

[illegible]old stager, whose voice in all these [illegible]eightest, almost blew up the town. [illegible]hinn tells us he stood at least three [illegible]oud speakers shivered and the win-

[illegible] these [illegible]orld's were [illegible] trees [illegible] niliar

[illegible]sn-n. of [illegible]s a [illegible]e. [illegible]ed [illegible]y [illegible]s- [illegible]e c. [illegible]s [illegible]t, [illegible]a h

LOOK IN Book
1926 & 1927
FOR CLIPPINGS FROM May 17 to Aug 26 -

(1)

TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.

MAY 25 1926

Pop Concerts Offer a Delightful Musical Entertainment.

Without the stiffness and formality of the regular symphonic concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the Pop concerts, now being held there nightly, afford a most enjoyable evening's entertainment along with the element of sociability. Recently we had the good fortune to attend one of these events and while munching pretzels and sipping pop punch (non-alcoholic) listened to the 80 piece orchestra, led by the astute Alfredo Casella, play such favorites as Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," Grieg's Lyric Suite, Bizet's L'Arlesienne Suite, Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, Handel's Largo and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Novelties on the program included Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. Besides this formidable list there were a few encores of a lighter nature.

All the members of the orchestra are regular Boston Symphony players and as such ensure renditions of a high order. Mr. Casella is a conductor with sound ideas of interpretation and while these interpretations did not wander far from well-tested conventions, there was a well defined outline to the music; the thematic idea was always maintained. The lyric beauty of the Nocturne of the Grieg suite was memorable; there was the proper "atmosphere" in the Saitn-Saens number and the modern spirit was set forth in the Enesco and Chabrier scores. But it remained for the stately Handel Largo—calling for the full resources of the magnificent organ—to create a deep and genuine spiritual feeling. Wagner's hackneyed—though always engrossing—"Tannhauser" overture closed the evening's program in a truly glamorous style.

Those who enjoy fine music—a blend of the classic and the semi-popular—splendidly played, will be well repaid by a visit to the Pops.

Literary Lights Not Over Bright in Musical Matters.

In the book review column of the New York World, Harry Hansen recently remarked that "music is always the first art to win recognition, because it is most easily compre-

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

Orchestras Favor Foreign Compositions

Reports recently compiled in New York from programs rendered and announced for the 1927-28 season of symphony orchestras of the nation, show that American compositions continue in the minority on these programs.

For the season reports show that of 128 selections rendered by the New York Philharmonic Society, only four were compositions of Americans.

Of 88 renditions by the New York Symphony orchestra, five were works of American composers. The Philadelphia symphony orchestra in its entire season played three American compositions, while the Boston Symphony played only two American works during its season's appearances.

Other orchestras, as far west as Chicago, also chose the larger part of their repertoire from foreign composers.

SUNDAY POPS SYMPHONIC

LATER SUN

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will complete the fifth week of the current season. Tomorrow evening there will be played the third Sunday night concert, with a special symphonic program. The two programs follow, tonight and tomorrow night:

TONIGHT

"Tannhauser:" Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg.....Wagner
Valse triste.....Sibelius
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Two Nocturnes.....Debussy
"Rossiniana," Suite.....Rossini-Respighi
Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Waltz from "The Bat".....Strauss
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky

SUNDAY

MOZART.....Symphony in E-flat major (K. No. 543).
BACH.....Concerto in D minor, for two violins and String Orchestra (Solo violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen).
WAGNER.....Tannhauser," Bacchanale
WAGNER....."Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III
WAGNER....."Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death.
WAGNER....."The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.
WAGNER....."The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 3 - 1926

Culture Statistics

Daniel Gregory Mason's article in the June number of Harper's Magazine on "Our Orchestras and Our Money's Worth" puts culture on a solid cash basis. The American public, he holds, is not getting its money's worth at orchestral concerts because in making the programs the conductors are trying to give the public what it wants. This may seem paradoxical, but perhaps Mr Mason, himself a fastidious critic, is speaking less for the public at large than for a select minority.

His indictment of current programs is supported by formidable statistics showing what percentage of different types of music the five leading American orchestras gave during one season. New England will be interested to note that his figures show the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky to stand almost at the top according to the critical standards suggested, being surpassed, by a hair's breadth, only by the Chicago orchestra under Mr Stock, while the Philharmonic and Symphony orchestra of New York and the Philadelphia orchestra, under Stokowski, rank much lower.

Both the classification and the rating of the several classes of music, it is true, are somewhat arbitrary. The fundamental division is into old and new, but it is hard to say precisely when music ceases to be new. All American works are set down as modern, but there is a great difference in their modernity. The one clear-cut division is that between American music and other modern works, though even here the distinction may be biographical rather than musical.

The older works Mr Mason divides first into the familiar and the neglected, and the familiar he subdivides, arbitrarily but intelligibly, into "stand-bys" and "war horses." What he means can best be shown by examples. A New York manager says that only a dozen symphonies help the box office. Beethoven's third, fifth and seventh, Tschaikowsky's fourth, fifth and sixth, Schubert's "Unfinished," Dvorak's "New World," Cesar Franck's and all four by Brahms. These, then, are typical "stand bys."

"War horses" is applied to works which are special favorites with "guest" and "prima donna" conductors who find in them an opportunity for personal display. Here Mr Mason puts the works of Liszt, Strauss, Tschaikowsky (who thus falls in both groups) and Wagner. In general the "war horses," "being of a more external and sensational type of art, lend themselves particularly to the posings, exaggerations, artificial and specious effects of the prima donna conductor. They are thus well adapted to the low stage of mentality of those 'fans' in every audience who conceive performers not as artists but as 'stars' and devote themselves in the spirit of college athletics to boosting them."

These remarks give force to the statistical evidence. In the Philadelphia programs the "war horses" made up almost exactly one-third of the total (32.5 per cent) as compared with 21.42 per cent for the Philharmonic; 15.23 for Dr. Damrosch's Symphony orchestra, 19.20 for Chicago and 15.74 for Boston. Of the "stand bys" the Boston orchestra gave fewest—but 23.14 per cent as compared with 25.60 for Chicago, 26.66 for Philadelphia, 34.11 for the Philharmonic and 33.33 for the New York Symphony. From this we may expect to find, and do find, Boston well in the lead in modern works. In American music it falls behind only the Philharmonic; and in the total of modern works it is well ahead, with 40.64 per cent as against 33.86 for Chicago, 30.40 for the Philharmonic, 25.83 for Philharmonic, and 25.70 for the New York Symphony.

These figures are suggestive, but for their full interpretation other data are needed. To give a generous allowance of new works shows a progressive spirit, but much depends on their selection. If Mr Mason ends on the inertia of conservatism deplores fer old favorites to natives who prepieces, [illegible] unfamiliar masterpieces also deplores the moronic radicalism of the minority that clamors for sensational novelties.

One thing which Mr Mason's statistics appear to show is that in the long run an orchestra with a permanent conductor will give its listeners a better-balanced musical diet than is likely to be provided by a succession of guest conductors who are out for a quick and concentrated personal success. Certainly the resident conductors do best by American music, which Mr Mason calls "the ugly duckling" of our concert halls. There is no getting away from the fact that American music is unpopular. It does not draw the public, the critics treat it superciliously, and the players in the orchestra, Mr Mason remarks, do not like it because it usually comes in manuscript parts full of errors and has to be deciphered with difficulty. Perhaps philanthropists who want to aid American composers would do better in providing for the printing and trial performance of their music than in offering prizes. A prize competition is but a lottery and prize-winning works have a bad name; what the composer wants is assurance of a fair chance to get his work before the public.

That American music has done as well as it has Mr Mason ascribes almost entirely to "the vision and artistic enthusiasm of those of our conductors who are true artists. . . . It will never be known how much American music owes to Frederick Stock alone, for example, who for years has given it his great skill and his tireless loyalty; and there are several others." This is a point at which money can really help, for the cost nowadays of giving new music a fair hearing is formidable.

POP CONCERT TONIGHT

Mozart, Bach and Wagner are the composers represented on the symphonic programme prepared by Alfred Casella for this evening's Pop concert. From Mozart comes the Symphony in E-flat major, from Bach, a Concerto in M minor for two violins and string orchestra, and the Wagner excerpts are the "Bachanale" from "Tannhauser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Ride of the Valkyries and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie."

POST JUNE 3

SIXTH WEEK OF POPS

Though this the sixth week of the Pop concerts Mr. Casella's programmes follow familiar lines. On Monday the orchestra will be heard in the music Russian and Italian composers, plus the "Valse Triste" of Sibelius and Handel's Largo. Tuesday evening the chosen numbers include the "Peer Gynt" Suite of Grieg and Chabrier's "Espana." There will be songs by the chorus of the Boston Square and Compass Club.

The Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony has played on Wednesday's programme together with the Meditation from Massenet's "Thais." Also on this list is the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Wagner is thrice represented on Thursday—by the Prelude to the "Mastersingers," the Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods' and the Overture to "Tannhauser." Numbers from French opera will be forthcoming on Friday—the March from Meyerbeer's "Le Prophete," the Ballet Music from Gounod's "Faust,' the Overture to Lalo's "La Roi d' Ys' and the Bachannale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." On Saturday Mr. Casella's "Scarlattiana" with himself as pianist will be repeated and on this programme stand also the Ballet Music from "La Gioconda" and Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain."

"POPS" BEGIN SIXTH WEEK

Varied and Interesting Programs Have Been Arranged for Concerts

HER JUN 3

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will begin tonight the sixth week of their 43d season. Alfredo Casella, the celebrated Pops conductor, announces the following programs for this week:

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E-flat major.....Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra.....Bach
(Solo violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gunderson)
"Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale.....Wagner
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III.....Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death.....Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music.....Wagner

MONDAY

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".....Tchaikovsky
Valse Trieste.....Sibelius
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
"Fountains of Rome," Symphonic Poem.....Respighi
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Le Maschere".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Prelude to Act III, "Traviata".....Verdi
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Marche Ecossaise.....Debussy
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini

WEDNESDAY

Overture in C minor.....Foroni
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem.....Liszt
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rassgi
"Molly on the Shore".....Grainger
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY

Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods".....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin
March, "Lorraine".....Gannet

FRIDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Ballet Music from "Faust".....Gounod
Overture to "The King of Ys".....Lalo
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Largo.....Handel
Capriccio Espagnol.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Bacchanale, "Sampson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
March, "The Garden City".....C. R. Spalding

SATURDAY

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Ballet Suite.....Gluck-Mottl
Overture, "The Italian in Algiers".....Rossini
Marche Joyeuse.....Chabrier
Night on Bald Mountain.....Moussorgsky
Scarlattiana.....Casella
(Piano solo: Alfredo Casella)
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Dance of the Waves, "Lorelei".....Catalani
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

A Symphonic Pops; Bach for Novelty

TRANS—JUN 4

For the next to the last of the symphonic programs of the present summer of Pops concerts, Mr. Casella was content to be conservative in both matter and manner. The program fell evenly into two divisions, the first half comprising the classical patterns of Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Bach's brief concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra; and the second half, devoted entirely to excerpts from the operas of Wagner. For this closing division, Mr. Casella's choice included the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the prelude to act three of "Lohengrin," the prelude and Love-Death of "Tristan and Isolde," the Ride of the Valkyrs and the Magic Fire Spell from "Die Walküre." The aspect of Symphony Hall last evening testified that the prospect of the concert had been inviting, for only those chairs in the rear of the main floor were left vacant, and both the first and second balconies were as populous as ever. Whether or not Mr. Casella designs his program with the thought that the many who may not attend the regular winter series shall now have the opportunity of hearing music of similar importance, at least the popular response to his plan of concert indicates that some such opinion is generally entertained and acted upon.

Last evening, however, either the symphonic appetite of the general listener appeared larger than his ability to assimilate the solid fare that was put before him on a lovely summer evening, or Mr. Casella was less dramatic than his usual wont; for the general outcome of the occasion fell short of the enthusiasm of anticipation. At the close of Mozart's symphony the applause from listeners grateful to hear a sound performance of a familiar and well-liked classic brought the orchestra to its feet. Thereafter, the response was more than moderate only for the brisk strides of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" and for the dramatic ride of the Valkyrs. Mr. Casella preferred a careful and leisurely performance of Mozart's symphony to the crispness and piquancy with which this music is sometimes heard. The motion of the music was smooth and sure; the changes of pace were scarcely abrupt; the contrasts in dynamics never startling. Mr. Casella, supple and brilliant in the music of the present, takes his eighteenth-century Mozart "straight;" the composer speaks for himself; personal illumination and present-day touching-up are quietly denied.

In similar vein went Bach's concerto for two violins—something of a novelty these days, in spite of its age. The sensuous visitor, should he be present at those rare times it is heard, describes the angular and iterative counterpoint of the first and last movements as dull and pedantic. The learned listener delights in each revealed felicity of imitation. Nearly everyone can listen with serene pleasure to the beautiful largo. Suffice it that Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen matched fine-spun melodies in this slow movement and whipped off a sprightly and almost jocular see-saw in the cadenza of the final movement.

With Wagner, Mr. Casella may be vigorous and authoritative, as in the mutic from "Lohengrin" and "Die Walküre"; or of a smooth and cumulative eloquence as in the carefully builded drama that he made of the prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan."

N. M. J.

—The prohibition department heeds to "dry up" the Kansas City and Houston conventions "so far as possible." It is no more than right that the delegates remain sober long enough to give prohibition their hearty indorsement. [Springfield Sun

At The Pops Tonight

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky
Valse Trieste.....Sibelius
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
"Fountains of Rome," Symphonic Poem.....Respighi
Italian Caprice.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Le Maschere".....Mascagni
Intermezzo, "L'Ampico Fritz".....Mascagni
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi

Conductor: A. Casella

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 4 - 1926

There is a possibility that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitsky will be taken to Europe for a ten-weeks' tour next spring. That ought to wake 'em up in England, at least, if all that Sir Thomas Beecham said about the decline of good orchestral music in England is true.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

JUN 6 - 1926

Waking England Up.

From the Providence Journal.

There is a possibility that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitsky will be taken to Europe for a 10 weeks' tour next spring. That ought to wake 'em up in England, at least, if all that Sir. Thomas Beecham said about the decline of good orchestral music in England is true.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUN 10 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ON PARISIAN ADVENTURE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just now in Paris discovering new symphonic works for his American public next fall and arranging for his annual series of "Concerts Koussevitzky," is expected, while he is in the French capital, to give music lovers there another idea of his virtuosity as a master of the double bass. It will be recalled that he created something of a sensation last summer by his joint recitals with Casadesus, leader of the Society of Ancient Instruments.

Koussevitzky is one of the few virtuosos of that curious instrument, the double bass. It is possible that he finds recreation in playing it, after his strenuous work conducting a large orchestra.

Many a conductor has started his career as a virtuoso of some particular instrument. Stokowski, the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, for example, and Stock, the Chicago conductor, both worked up from the orchestral ranks, while Pierre Monteux's instrument, as a student, was the violin.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has the sole distinction of having been a virtuoso of the double bass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When, as a boy of 14, he entered the Moscow Conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study for the orchestral class either a brass instrument or the double bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. He developed an extraordinary proficiency, and for the first ten years of his professional career toured Europe, east, and west, giving recitals upon this unusual instrument. He even composed a concerto for it which he played with the leading orchestras of the time.

It must not be supposed that Koussevitzky used the unwieldy double bass of the modern orchestra, which, of course, is built for volume and depth of "ground tone." He acquired an instrument made by Amati, the illustrious Italian and contemporary of Stradivarius, in the seventeenth century.

These early Italian basses were really chamber instruments, somewhat smaller than those to which we are accustomed, and, of course, more adaptable for solo purposes. Koussevitzky's double bass can be likened to an enlarged and deepened cello, retaining all the tonal beauty of this more familiar instrument.

Koussevitzky's fame as a virtuoso was high, indeed, and there is every indication that his mastery of the instrument was a thing to wonder at. A particular musical treat must have been the joint recitals which he gave in Paris with Casadesus, the leader of the renowned Society of Ancient Instruments.

The rigors of a conductor's duties have compelled Koussevitzky more or less to lay aside his beloved "Amati," but it has never been far from him. Indeed, he brought it across the Atlantic when he first came to America. He first played it publicly in this country at Brown University, in Providence, when, on February 24, 1926, the degree of doctor of music was conferred upon him.

Koussevitzky will return to America in the fall for the regular season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which includes two appearances in this city, one on January 30, as a feature of the artists' course, which also includes appearances of Roland Hayes, tenor; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Sigfrid Onegin, contralto, and Rachmaninoff, pianist, and on March 6, with the Philharmonic course. Both courses are under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

TO PLAY AT POPS

When Gershwin's celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue" is performed under the direction of Arthur Fiedler at the Pop concert of June 14 (Tufts Night), the pianist will be Doris Estey of Brockton, a pupil of Frederic Tillotson of this city. Mr. Gershwin's "Classical Jazz," hitherto unheard at the Pops, will be repeated at these concerts on June 20, with Miss Estey as soloist.

POST JUN 13

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

May 7 -

BOSTON POST, MO

HEAVY MUSIC AT THE POPS

Symphony Programme on First Sunday Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In accordance with his practice of last year Mr. Casella is devoting the Sunday evening Pop Concerts to music strictly symphonic in character. Last evening brought the first of these symphonic programmes, and on it Mr. Casella placed Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and his own ballet-suite, "La Giara."

To hear this concert which, although it came in the season of Pops, was in reality a symphony concert and nothing else. An audience assembled that virtually filled the balconies and occupied something more than half the floor. Since smoking and the serving of refreshments are both banned by city ordinance at these Sunday evening concerts, there is little advantage in sitting at a table, and last evening's audience, as the above-mentioned distribution showed, seemed thus minded. To a programme decidedly "stiff" this audience listened attentively, and each number was warmly applauded. Nor does the convention, which at the symphony concerts bans applause after the separate movements of a symphony, in force at these Sunday Pops, and last night there was clapping—and fervent clapping to boot—after each of the "Eroica's" four movements.

It is incumbent upon the conductor of the symphony orchestra to prepare one or, at the most, two programmes each week. Last evening's concert was the seventh that Mr. Casella has conducted since last Monday, and each of the daily programmes has contained a good deal of exacting music. Under the circumstances, then, he could hardly bestow upon the preparation of last evening's concert the attention that Mr. Koussevitzky would give it had this programme served for a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of the regular series. It was not to be wondered at that Mr. Casella's reading of Beethoven was essentially straightforward, or that in Strauss' elaborate score a dramatic effect or two slipped through his fingers. It is more to the point—and, for the matter of that, quite sufficient—that last evening's performances were musical in quality, faithful to the spirit of composer and composition and often of genuine eloquence, that such music in such performance was to be heard for a relatively moderate sum, and finally that it was heard and enjoyed by a numerous company.

William Wayne, the Majestic MAY 26

Fifth Week of TRAV. Pop Concerts

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will enter upon the fifth week of their 43th season Monday evening. Alfredo Casella announces a program of the "Music of Heroes" for Wednesday, Memorial day, including Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, "Finlandia," the "1812" overture, and other appropriate numbers.

For the third Sunday concert, June 3, Mr. Casella will present a program featuring the following Wagerian excerpts: "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III; "Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death; "The Valkyrie," Ride, and Magic Fire Music; likewise Bach's double violin concerto, with Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen, as soloists, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat.

Tuesday will be Zionists' Night, and Friday, M. I. T. Night (the latter to be conducted by Arthur Fiedler). These like all other nights will be open to the public.

News of Music

TRANS MAY 28 '28

Here in Boston

At Mr. Koussevitzky's concert in Paris last Thursday, Mr. Sanromá played the solo-part in the gay and witty Piano-Concerto of the lately risen German, Ernest Toch, with whom he had studied the piece. The conductor will include it in the Symphony Concerts next season, and Mr. Sanroma will again play the piano-part.

Morning concerts in an hotel flourish in New York. These have been tried in Boston, but with little encouragement from the public. Now, after an interval of years, the test will be made again—at the Statler next autumn and winter from month to month for the profit of the School of Occupational Therapy. Celebrities in varying degree will be heard—one to a concert. For another hotel-venture, the Copley-Plaza is planning a series of concerts on Sunday evenings at monthly

TRANS MAY 26

Concerts Next Week

Progress of the Pops

NO ONE need doubt the range of the music played at the current Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. On Wednesday next, for example, Mr. Casella will lead the orchestra through the Wagner's "Siegfried" and Sibelius's tone-whole of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; add to it the Forest Scene from poem, "Finlandia." For Sunday week, June 3, he proposes Mozart's Symphony in E-flat; a Concerto of Bach for Two Violins and String Orchestra; five excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. Yet on Friday next, which is the annual evening of the Institute of Technology, the program—with Mr. Fiedler conducting—includes a "Selection" from "Good News"; Ferdy Grofé's "Mississippi Suite," highly jazzed; arrangements of Sullivan's "Lost Chord" and Schubert's "Ave Maria." And so it goes—to all tastes.

More particularly, the program of Monday brings the Polovtsian Dances from the Russian opera, "Prince Igor"; the Dance of Salome according to Strauss; Musorgsky's fantasia, "A Night on the Bald Mountain." To the assembled Zionists on Tuesday Mr. Casella and the orchestra will repeat the Polovtsian Dances and play Goldmark's overture, "Sakountala." The program of Wednesday, as already outlined, is a "Music of Heroes." There will be room on Thursday for Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko," Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody, the familiar dances from "La Gioconda." The mixed matter of next Saturday promises interest: the Suite arranged by Respighi from forgotten operas of Rossini; the two Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes"—of Debussy; the Suite from Lalo's ballet, "Namouna"; the waltz from Johann Strauss's operetta, "The Bat." . . . Already The Pops of 1928 have run half the course.

"POPS" BEGIN FIFTH WEEK

HER MAY 27

Special "Music for Hewes" Program Announced for Memorial Day

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will enter upon the fifth week of their 43d season tomorrow evening. Mr. Casella announces a program of the "Music of Heroes" for Wednesday, Memorial day, and one of Wagnerian excerpts for the third Sunday concert, next Sunday evening. Tuesday will be Zionists' night, and Friday M. I. T. night (the latter concert to be conducted by Arthur Fiedler). These, like all other nights, will be open to the public.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 28

Overture to "Il Matrimonio Segreto" ..... Cimarosa
Ballet Suite ..... Gluck-Mottl
Overture to "Matilde de Shabran" ..... Rossini
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" ..... Berlioz
A Night on Bald Mountain ..... Moussorgsky
Salome's Dance, from "Salome" ..... R. Strauss
Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Entr'acte from "Messidor" ..... Bruneau
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin

TUESDAY, MAY 29

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
"Kol Nidrei" ..... Bruch
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
"Hatikvah"

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ..... Berlioz
"Siegfried," Forest Murmurs ..... Wagner
Overture to "Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
"Eroica" Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem ..... Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY, MAY 31

First Military March ..... Schubert-Casella
Petite Suite ..... Debussy
(Arranged by Buesser)
Roumanian Rhapsody ..... Enesco
"Sadko," Tone Poem ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Lyric Suite ..... Grieg
Italia, Rhapsody ..... Casella
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Overture to "Semiramide" ..... Rossini

FRIDAY, JUNE 1

Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Ballet of the Hours from "Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Mississippi Suite ..... Grofe
Selection, "Good News" ..... De Sylva
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Volletedt
American Patrol ..... Meacham
Stein Song

SATURDAY, JUNE 2

Tannhaeuser: Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg ..... Wagner
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Suite, "Namouna" ..... Lalo
Overture to "Der Freischuetz" ..... Weber
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Rossiniana Suite ..... Rossini-Respighi
Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... Strauss
Italian Caprice ..... Tchaikovsky

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E flat major ..... Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra ..... Bach
"Tannhaeuser," Bacchanale ..... Wagner
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III ..... Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death ..... Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music ..... Wagner

Concerts Next Week

TRANS. June 2

Progress of The Pops

BY the signs of the programs The Pops will run tranquil course next week. Through a month and more, Mr. Casella has arrayed pieces by the score to meet many a taste in his audience. Now, having assembled them and found the public content, he takes the relative ease of a week of repetitions. Established numbers and numbers still making their way appear on the lists: Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Chalkovsky's "Italian Caprice" on Monday; overtures to "Oberon" and "Lohengrin" on Tuesday; the Suite from "Namouna," Lalo's graphic, full-flavored ballet, and the slow movment of the "New World Symphony" on Wednesday; four fragments of Wagner on Thursday; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" on Friday.

Twice Mr. Casella will gratify his symphonic tastes: on Saturday week when the orchestra will repeat his blending of eighteenth and twentieth-century matters and manners in the Suite, "Scarlattiana." He himself will be the pianist, leading the band from his seat with a nod or a lifted finger. Tomorrow, according to custom, he will proffer a symphonic program to the audience of Sunday evening:

Symphony in E-flat major ..... Mozart
Concerto in D minor for Two Violins and String Orchestra ..... Bach (Violinists: Messrs. Theodorowicz and Gundersen)
From Wagner's Operas:
Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin"
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"
Ride of the Valkyrs and Fire Music from "Die Walküre"

LAST TWO WEEKS OF POP CONCERTS

ADV JON 17

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight start their final fortnight with the last Sunday concert.

Next Thursday will be the annual request night, with a program determined by public ballot.

Tonight's program, to be conducted by Alfredo Casella, follows:

Franck ..... Symphony in D minor
Respighi ..... Rossiniana Suite
Debussy ..... Two Nocturnes
Stravinsky Suite No. 2 for small orchestra
Chabrier ..... "Espana" Rhapsody

POST MAY 25 1928 BOSTON POST

All New England Festival High School Orchestra to Play Tomorrow

POPS CONDUCTOR DIRECTING GROUP OF HIGH SCHOOL MUSICIANS

Conductor Alfredo Casella is shown at the Hotel Statler coaching some of the pupils who will play in the All New England Festival High School Orchestra. The pupils are, left to right: Frances Alberton of Falmouth, playing bassoon; Janet Ryther of Newton Highlands, with violin; Lois Studley of Attleboro, playing bassoon; Phyllis Gilman of Auburn, Me., with trombone, and Dora Cummings of Newton Centre, bass viol.

With Alfredo Casella, conductor of the Pops, wielding the baton, a gathering of 216 high school girls and boys from all sections of New England were symphonized into a gigantic orchestra for the first time yesterday afternoon in the Georgian Room of the Hotel Statler.

It was the opening rehearsal as a composite whole of these girls and boys, hand picked from the New England high school orchestras, in preparation for the first annual concert of the All New England Festival High School Orchestra, representing 43 cities and towns, to be given in Mechanic Hall tomorrow night.

This concert will be the climax of the fourth annual conclave of New England Music Festival Association, in co-operation with the City of Boston, Boston Public Schools, Civic Music Association of the City of Boston, and the Rotary Club of Boston.

This symphony orchestra will be only a small part of the elaborate programme arranged for the entire day tomorrow, with events scheduled at Mechanics Hall and on Boston Common. Besides the orchestra there will be 3197 other high school musicians participating in the programmes, comprising 23 high school orchestras and 20 high school bands that will compete for prizes, and 21 other high school bands that will not be entered into the competitive events.

In addition to the group trophies, an outstanding prize of a scholarship for the National Orchestra Summer Camp in Michigan, will be awarded to the high school boy or girl picked by the judges as the most promising musician among the entire groups.

The programme tomorrow will start at 9 o'clock in the morning, with events at Mechanics Hall and Boston Common, and will continue throughout the day. There will be four classes into which the various bands and orchestras will be divided, and the prizes to be distributed are valued at $2000.

Post MAY 27

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

A special programme for Memorial Day, Zionists' Night on Tuesday and M. I. T. night on Friday, with Arthur Fiedler conducting, are the outstanding features of the fifth week of the current Pops, beginning at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. For Monday, Mr. Casella has arranged a programme of more than usual musical interest, all of it operatic, save for Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain." Cimarosa, Gluck, Rossini, Belioz, Strauss, Bizet, Bruneau and Borodin are the other composers represented.

Composers of Jewish blood figure largely on Tuesday's programme. Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrov" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" are among the chosen pieces for this Zionists' night. On his Memorial Day list Mr. Casella has once more placed the music of heroic deeds. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is the pricipal item.

For Friday night Mr. Fiedler has prepared a programme delightfully light in character, recalling the Pops of an earlier day. Popular favorites, old and timely, make this list. Resuming the baton on Saturday evening, Mr. Casella proffers music by Wagner, Weber, Debussy and other standard composers. The waltz from Johann Strauss' "Fledermaus," a Brahms Hungarian dance, Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice are the lighter numbers.

On June 3 will come the third Sunday concert with music by Wagner predominating.

MUSIC

GLOBE JUNE 3

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Casella has chosen for the third of the fortnightly Sunday Pop concerts tonight two great classics not of late years heard in Boston as often as they deserve to be, Mozart's E flat Symphony, known to amateur pianists by a popular arrangement of its minuet, and the concerto for two violins of Bach. There is an exceptionally fine phonograph record by Kreisler and Zimbalist of the Bach. The Wagner excerpts that fill the rest of tonight's program are too familiar to call for comment. These Sunday night concerts offer a unique opportunity to enjoy programs and performances equivalent to those in subscription series of Symphony concerts under informal conditions and at prices within the reach of almost any purse.

Serge Koussevitzky is announced as one of the board of judges in the Victor Talking Machine Company's $25,000 prize contest for the best work of symphonic type by an American composer, which closes May 27, 1929.

The prize is to go to an American citizen. The work may be in any form suitable for performance at a Symphony concert. It must not have been published or performed before submission. Prizes of $10,000 and $5000 are also offered for the best and the next best works submitted before Oct 29, 1929 within the scope of the American dance or "jazz" orchestra. Any or all prizes may be withheld if the judges so elect. But in that case the money will go to some project for the development of creative talent in America. These are among the most munificent prizes yet offered anywhere for musical composition.

Post MAY 31

A FINE IDEA

The Post, for one, is heartily in favor of the suggestion now, we understand, under official consideration, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when next season's concerts are ended in May, 1929, make a 10-weeks tour of Europe giving concerts in most of the great capitals of that continent

We have something here that we believe to be the finest of its kind in the world. Visiting conductors and noted musicians from abroad who have heard it play under the baton of the incomparable Koussevitsky say about the same thing. We are certain that European cities would respond enthusiastically to the invitations of the Boston Symphony to hear it play. We are told that there is much curiosity there in regard to its reputed supremacy. The tour would settle that question once and for all.

Naturally if this foreign trip were undertaken, the "Pops" would have to be given up next summer, or continued with a different orchestra. But for the sake of the glory of the journey Bostonians would give up even those summer concerts, especially since as now constituted they are practically a continuation of the Symphony concerts under a different conductor.

THIRD SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin their sixth week tonight with the third Sunday Evening concert. The program follows:

Mozart ..... Symphony in E-flat major (K. No. 543)
Bach ..... Concerto in D minor, for Two violins and String Orchestra (Solo violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gunderson)
Wagner ..... "Tannhauser," Bacchanale
Wagner ..... "Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III
Wagner ..... "Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death
Wagner ..... "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries
Wagner ..... "The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music

NEW MURRAY FILM

A regular old-fashioned celebration, including a ball, banquet and other small-town features, are the chief of "The Head Man," Charlie Murray's new First National comedy.

JUNE 3 1928

May 7 -

BOSTON POST, MO

HEAVY MUSIC AT THE POPS

Symphony Programme on First Sunday Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In accordance with his practice of last year Mr. Casella is devoting the Sunday evening Pop Concerts to music strictly symphonic in character. Last evening brought the first of these symphonic programmes, and on it Mr. Casella placed Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and his own ballet-suite, "La Giara."

To hear this concert which, although it came in the season of Pops, was in reality a symphony concert and nothing else. An audience assembled that virtually filled the balconies and occupied something more than half the floor. Since smoking and the serving of refreshments are both banned by city ordinance at these Sunday evening concerts, there is little advantage in sitting at a table, and last evening's audience, as the above-mentioned distribution showed, seemed thus minded. To a programme decidedly "stiff" this audience listened attentively, and each number was warmly applauded. Nor does the convention, which at the symphony concerts bans applause after the separate movements of a symphony, in force at these Sunday Pops, and last night there was clapping—and fervent clapping to boot—after each of the "Eroica's" four movements.

It is incumbent upon the conductor of the symphony orchestra to prepare one or, at the most, two programmes each week. Last evening's concert was the seventh that Mr. Casella has conducted since last Monday, and each of the daily programmes has contained a good deal of exacting music. Under the circumstances, then, he could hardly bestow upon the preparation of last evening's concert the attention that Mr. Koussevitzky would give it had this programme served for a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of the regular series. It was not to be wondered at that Mr. Casella's reading of Beethoven was essentially straightforward, or that in Strauss' elaborate score a dramatic effect or two slipped through his fingers. It is more to the point—and, for the matter of that, quite sufficient—that last evening's performances were musical in quality, faithful to the spirit of composer and composition and often of genuine eloquence, that such music in such performance was to be heard for a relatively moderate sum, and finally that it was heard and enjoyed by a numerous company.

William Wayne, the Majestic MAY 26

Fifth Week of TRAV. Pop Concerts

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will enter upon the fifth week of their 43th season Monday evening. Alfredo Casella announces a program of the "Music of Heroes" for Wednesday, Memorial day, including Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, "Finlandia," the "1812" overture, and other appropriate numbers.

For the third Sunday concert, June 3, Mr. Casella will present a program featuring the following Wagerian excerpts: "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III; "Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death; "The Valkyrie," Ride, and Magic Fire Music; likewise Bach's double violin concerto, with Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen, as soloists, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat.

Tuesday will be Zionists' Night, and Friday, M. I. T. Night (the latter to be conducted by Arthur Fiedler). These like all other nights will be open to the public.

News of Music

TRANS MAY 28 '28

Here in Boston

At Mr. Koussevitzky's concert in Paris last Thursday, Mr. Sanromá played the solo-part in the gay and witty Piano-Concerto of the lately risen German, Ernest Toch, with whom he had studied the piece. The conductor will include it in the Symphony Concerts next season, and Mr. Sanroma will again play the piano-part.

Morning concerts in an hotel flourish in New York. This ... last they have been tried in Boston, with little encouragement from the public. Now, after an interval of years, the test will be made again—at the Statler next autumn and winter from month to month for the profit of the School of Occupational Therapy. Celebrities in varying degree will be heard—one at a concert. For another hotel-venture, the Copley-Plaza is planning a series of concerts on Sunday evenings at monthly

TRANS MAY 26

Concerts Next Week

Progress of the Pops

NO ONE need doubt the range of the music played at the current Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. On Wednesday next, for example, Mr. Casella will lead the orchestra through the Wagner's "Siegfried" and Sibelius's tone-whole of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; add to it the Forest Scene from poem, "Finlandia." For Sunday week, June 3, he proposes Mozart's Symphony in E-flat; a Concerto of Bach for Two Violins and String Orchestra; five excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. Yet on Friday next, which is the annual evening of the Institute of Technology, the program—with Mr. Fiedler conducting—includes a "Selection" from "Good News"; Ferdy Grofé's "Mississippi Suite," highly jazzed; arrangements of Sullivan's "Lost Chord" and Schubert's "Ave Maria." And so it goes—to all tastes.

More particularly, the program of Monday brings the Polovtsian Dances from the Russian opera, "Prince Igor"; the Dance of Salome according to Strauss; Musorgsky's fantasia, "A Night on the Bald Mountain." To the assembled Zionists on Tuesday Mr. Casella and the orchestra will repeat the Polovtsian Dances and play Goldmark's overture, "Sakountala." The program of Wednesday, as already outlined, is a "Music of Heroes." There will be room on Thursday for Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko," Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody, the familiar dances from "La Gioconda." The mixed matter of next Saturday promises interest: the Suite arranged by Respighi from forgotten operas of Rossini; the two Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes"—of Debussy: the Suite from Lalo's ballet, "Namouna"; the waltz from Johann Strauss's operetta, "The Bat." . . . Already The Pops of 1928 have run half the course.

"POPS" BEGIN FIFTH WEEK

HER MAY 27

Special "Music for Hewes" Program Announced for Memorial Day

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will enter upon the fifth week of their 43d season tomorrow evening. Mr. Casella announces a program of the "Music of Heroes" for Wednesday, Memorial day, and one of Wagnerian excerpts for the third Sunday concert, next Sunday evening. Tuesday will be Zionists' night, and Friday M. I. T. night (the latter concert to be conducted by Arthur Fiedler). These, like all other nights, will be open to the public.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 28

Overture to "Il Matrimonio Segreto"	Cimarosa
Ballet Suite	Gluck-Mottl
Overture to "Matilde de Shabran"	Rossini
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"	Berlioz
A Night on Bald Mountain	Moussorgsky
Salome's Dance, from "Salome"	R. Strauss
Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Entr'acte from "Messidor"	Bruneau
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin

TUESDAY, MAY 29

Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
"Kol Nidrei"	Bruch
"Italia," Rhapsody	Casella
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Kammenoi Ostrow	Rubinstein
Ouverture Solemnelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
"Hatikvah"

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
"Siegfried," Forest Murmurs	Wagner
Overture to "Sicilian Vespers"	Verdi
"Eroica" Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55	Beethoven
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY, MAY 31

First Military March	Schubert-Casella
Petite Suite	Debussy
(Arranged by Buesser)
Roumanian Rhapsody	Enesco
"Sadko," Tone Poem	Rimsky-Korsakov
Lyric Suite	Grieg
Italia, Rhapsody	Casella
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"	Mascagni
Overture to "Semiramide"	Rossini

FRIDAY, JUNE 1

Entrance of the Gladiators	Fucik
Overture to "Mignon"	Thomas
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Fantasia, "Aida"	Verdi
Ballet of the Hours from "Gioconda"	Ponchielli
The Lost Chord	Sullivan
Mississippi Suite	Grofe
Selection, "Good News"	De Sylva
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows"	Vollstedt
American Patrol	Meacham
Stein Song

SATURDAY, JUNE 2

Tannhaeuser: Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg	Wagner
Valse Triste	Sibelius
Suite, "Namouna"	Lalo
Overture to "Der Freischuetz"	Weber
Two Nocturnes	Debussy
Rossiniana Suite	Rossini-Respighi
Hungarian Dance	Brahms
Waltz from "The Bat"	Strauss
Italian Caprice	Tchaikovsky

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E flat major	Mozart
Concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra	Bach
"Tannhaeuser," Bacchanale	Wagner
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III	Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
"The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music	Wagner

Concerts Next Week

TRANS. JUNE 2

Progress of The Pops

BY the signs of the programs The Pops will run tranquil course next week. Through a month and more, Mr. Casella has arrayed pieces by the score to meet many a taste in his audience. Now, having assembled them and found the public content, he takes the relative ease of a week of repetitions. Established numbers and numbers still making their way appear on the lists: Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice" on Monday; overtures to "Oberon" and "Lohengrin" on Tuesday; the Suite from "Namouna," Lalo's graphic, full-flavored ballet, and the slow movment of the "New World Symphony" on Wednesday; four fragments of Wagner on Thursday; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" on Friday.

Twice Mr. Casella will gratify his symphonic tastes: on Saturday week when the orchestra will repeat his blending of eighteenth and twentieth-century matters and manners in the Suite, "Scarlattiana." He himself will be the pianist, leading the band from his seat with a nod or a lifted finger. Tomorrow, according to custom, he will proffer a symphonic program to the audience of Sunday evening:

Symphony in E-flat major	Mozart
Concerto in D minor for Two Violins and String Orchestra (Violinists: Messrs. Theodorowicz and Gundersen)	Bach
From Wagner's Operas:
Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin"
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"
Ride of the Valkyrs and Fire Music from "Die Walküre"

LAST TWO WEEKS OF POP CONCERTS ADV JON 17

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall tonight start their final fortnight with the last Sunday concert.

Next Thursday will be the annual request night, with a program determined by public ballot.

Tonight's program, to be conducted by Alfredo Casella, follows:

Franck	Symphony in D minor
Respighi	Rossiniana Suite
Debussy	Two Nocturnes
Stravinsky	Suite No. 2 for small orchestra
Chabrier	"Espana" Rhapsody

BOSTON POST,

POST MAY 25 1928

All New England Festival High School Orchestra to Play Tomorrow

POPS CONDUCTOR DIRECTING GROUP OF HIGH SCHOOL MUSICIANS

Conductor Alfredo Casella is shown at the Hotel Statler coaching some of the pupils who will play in the All New England Festival High School Orchestra. The pupils are, left to right: Frances Alberton of Falmouth, playing bassoon; Janet Ryther of Newton Highlands, with violin; Lois Studley of Attleboro, playing bassoon; Phyllis Gilman of Auburn, Me., with trombone, and Dora Cummings of Newton Centre, bass viol.

With Alfredo Casella, conductor of the Pops, wielding the baton, a gathering of 216 high school girls and boys from all sections of New England were symphonized into a gigantic orchestra for the first time yesterday afternoon in the Georgian Room of the Hotel Statler.

It was the opening rehearsal as a composite whole of these girls and boys, hand picked from the New England high school orchestras, in preparation for the first annual concert of the All New England Festival High School Orchestra, representing 43 cities and towns, to be given in Mechanic Hall tomorrow night.

This concert will be the climax of the fourth annual conclave of New England Music Festival Association, in co-operation with the City of Boston, Boston Public Schools, Civic Music Association of the City of Boston, and the Rotary Club of Boston.

This symphony orchestra will be only a small part of the elaborate programme arranged for the entire day tomorrow, with events scheduled at Mechanics Hall and on Boston Common. Besides the orchestra there will be 3197 other high school musicians participating in the programmes, comprising 23 high school orchestras and 20 high school bands that will compete for prizes, and 21 other high school bands that will not be entered into the competitive events.

In addition to the group trophies, an outstanding prize of a scholarship for the National Orchestra Summer Camp in Michigan, will be awarded to the high school boy or girl picked by the judges as the most promising musician among the entire groups.

The programme tomorrow will start at 9 o'clock in the morning, with events at Mechanics Hall and Boston Common, and will continue throughout the day. There will be four classes into which the various bands and orchestras will be divided, and the prizes to be distributed are valued at $2000.

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

POST MAY 27

A special programme for Memorial Day, Zionists' Night on Tuesday and M. I. T. night on Friday, with Arthur Fiedler conducting, are the outstanding features of the fifth week of the current Pops, beginning at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. For Monday, Mr. Casella has arranged a programme of more than usual musical interest, all of it operatic, save for Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain." Cimarosa, Gluck, Rossini, Belioz, Strauss, Bizet, Bruneau and Borodin are the other composers represented.

Composers of Jewish blood figure largely on Tuesday's programme. Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," Rubinstein's "Kammenoi Ostrov" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" are among the chosen pieces for this Zionists' night. On his Memorial Day list Mr. Casella has once more placed the music of heroic deeds. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is the pricipal item.

For Friday night Mr. Fiedler has prepared a programme delightfully light in character, recalling the Pops of an earlier day. Popular favorites, old and timely, make this list. Resuming the baton on Saturday evening, Mr. Casella proffers music by Wagner, Weber, Debussy and other standard composers. The waltz from Johann Strauss' "Fledermaus," a Brahms Hungarian dance, Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice are the lighter numbers.

On June 3 will come the third Sunday concert with music by Wagner predominating.

MUSIC

GUEST JUNE 3

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Casella has chosen for the third of the fortnightly Sunday Pop concerts tonight two great classics not of late years heard in Boston as often as they deserve to be, Mozart's E flat Symphony, known to amateur pianists by a popular arrangement of its minuet, and the concerto for two violins of Bach. There is an exceptionally fine phonograph record by Kreisler and Zimbalist of the Bach. The Wagner excerpts that fill the rest of tonight's program are too familiar to call for comment. These Sunday night concerts offer a unique opportuniey to enjoy programs and performances equivalent to those in subscription series of Symphony concerts under informal conditions and at prices within the reach of almost any purse.

Serge Koussevitzky is announced as one of the board of judges in the Victor Talking Machine Company's $25,000 prize contest for the best work of symphonic type by an American composer, which closes May 27, 1929.

The prize is to go to an American citizen. The work may be in any form suitable for performance at a Symphony concert. It must not have been published or performed before submission. Prizes of $10,000 and $5000 are also offered for the best and the next best works submitted before Oct 29, 1929 within the scope of the American dance or "jazz" orchestra. Any or all prizes may be withheld if the judges so elect. But in that case the money will go to some project for the development of creative talent in America. These are among the most munificent prizes yet offered anywhere for musical composition.

POST A FINE IDEA

The Post, for one, is heartily in favor of the suggestion now, we understand, under official consideration, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when next season's concerts are ended in May, 1929, make a 10-weeks tour of Europe giving concerts in most of the great capitals of that continent

We have something here that we believe to be the finest of its kind in the world. Visiting conductors and noted musicians from abroad who have heard it play under the baton of the incomparable Koussevitsky say about the same thing. We are certain that European cities would respond enthusiastically to the invitations of the Boston Symphony to hear it play. We are told that there is much curiosity there in regard to its reputed supremacy. The tour would settle that question once and for all.

Naturally if this foreign trip were undertaken, the "Pops" would have to be given up next summer, or continued with a different orchestra. But for the sake of the glory of the journey Bostonians would give up even those summer concerts, especially since as now constituted they are practically a continuation of the Symphony concerts under a different conductor.

THIRD SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin their sixth week tonight with the third Sunday Evening concert. The program follows:

Mozart	Symphony in E-flat major (K. No. 543)
Bach	Concerto in D minor, for Two violins and String Orchestra (Solo Violins—Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gunderson)
Wagner	"Tannhauser," Bacchanale
Wagner	"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III
Wagner	"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death
Wagner	"The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries
Wagner	"The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music

NEW MURRAY FILM

A regular old-fashioned celebration, including a ball, banquet and other small-town features, are being shot for "The Head Man," Charlie Murray's new First National comedy.

JUNE 3 1928

REQUEST PROGRAM AT POPS ARRANGED

Handel Largo Leads Again by Large Vote—Concert Next Thursday Night

All of the ballots from the brown box in Symphony hall have been counted and the annual request program has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The request night will take place Thursday.

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular, as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture still holds second place. The only newcomer on the request program, as finally fixed, will be Schubert's Unfinished symphony. This number, the only one on the program which has what might be termed a "respectable winter standing," indicates that the Pops public is eager for "the best." In electing this classic, Pops followers evidently much prefer it to Beethoven's Fifth symphony or Tchaikovsky's Pathetic.

Close contenders among the suites were the Peer Gynt and Nutcracker suites, and among the rhapsodies, Casella's Italia and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. The first mentioned suite and rhapsody won by a very small count.

The program will be as follows, here listed according to the number of ballots cast for each number:

Largo ..... Handel
Overture, Solennelle 1812 ..... Tchaikovsky
Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube, ... Strauss
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished .. Schubert
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Italia, rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of sugar fairy from Nutcracker suite ..... Tchaikovsky
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Alfredo Casella, conductor at the Pops, has made the following program, which he will lead in Symphony hall tonight.

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Ballet Suite ..... Gluck-Mottl
Minuet for String Orchestra ..... Valensin
Overture to "Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Introduction and Bridal Procession from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Kikimora ..... Liadov
"On the Steppes of Central Asia" ... Borodin
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy ..... Balakirev (Arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella)
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried ... Wagner
"Magic Fire Music" from "The Valkyrie" ..... Wagner

LAST TWO WEEKS OF "POP" CONCERTS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will enter tonight upon the last week but one of their 42d season. A number of special nights are in store for the Pops patrons.

Mr. Casella will conduct the last Sunday concert of the season tonight; next Thursday will be the annual request night, the program for which has been determined entirely by public ballot; while on Saturday there will be a program of music of the dance. Next Monday and Wednesday are exceptions to the general rule that all nights are open to the public.

The programs for the week follow:

SUNDAY, JUNE 17

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Rossiniana, Suite from "Les Riens," Rossini ..... Respighi
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Suite No. 2, for small orchestra, Stravinsky
"Espana," rhapsody ..... Chabrier

TUESDAY

Second Military March ... Schubert-Casella
Minuet for string orchestra ..... Valensin
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture to "Cinderella" ..... Rossini
"The Roman Carnival" Overture ... Berlioz
Suite for small orchestra, No. 2, Stravinsky
"Pines of Rome" symphonic poem, Respighi
"Orpheus and Eurydice," ..... Boardman
Nocturne for flute and small orchestra ... Jacobi
Humoresque on two American folk songs ..... Kramer
Russian Lullaby ..... Berlin
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert

THURSDAY
REQUEST NIGHT

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture Sonenelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" Schubert
"Italia" Rhapsody ..... Casella
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danbue .. Strauss
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

FRIDAY

Overture to "The Magic Flute" .. Mozart
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 .... Beethoven
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz
"Sadko," Tone Poem ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Pacific 2-3-1," symphonic movement .... Honegger
Magic Fire music, from "The Valkyrie" .. Wagner
Prelude for a Modern Drama ..... McClain
Watlz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube .. Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt

SATURDAY
MUSIC OF THE DANCE

Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" .. Gretry-Mottl
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Suite "Namouna" ..... Lalo
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
"The Convent on the Water" ..... Casella
Dance of Salome from "Salome," R. Strauss
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem .... Ravel
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .. Ponchielli
Waltz, Artists' Life ..... Strauss
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin

JUNE 17. GLOBE

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

GLOBE

Stravinsky Suite Proves Amusing Novelty

June 18

The last of the Sunday night Pop concerts attracted an enthusiastic audience which left few vacant places in Symphony Hall last evening. Stravinsky's Second Suite for small orchestra, played for the first time in Boston, proved an amusing novelty, with brief and ludicrous parodies of the old-fashioned waltz, polka, and galop.

The Franck Symphony, Respighi's "Rossiniana," two of Debussy's Nocturnes, and Chabrier's "Espana" were Mr Casella's other numbers. These fortnightly Sunday concerts have been successful from every point of view, so that their continuance in future seasons ought to be insured.

Mr Casella's reading of Franck's familiar symphony was not wholly satisfactory. The lento introduction to the first movement was dragged. The finale, though marked "allegro non troppo," was taken at a very rapid pace. These tempi may perhaps be justified, though they are not customary. But the conductor showed little feeling for Franck's characteristic melody and his even more characteristic harmony from which the melody can scarcely be disentangled. The orchestra made too much noise, and at times the wrong things in the score stood out so strongly as to obscure what Franck meant to have come uppermost in the listening ear.

Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," on the other hand, were very well played, with a beautiful logic and clarity of style and plenty of imaginative energy. Chabrier's rhapsody, which Mr Casella did not vulgarize as most conductors seem to do, was unusually impressive and appealing last evening.

Stravinsky's suite, written, it would seem, some years ago, is a very clever and entertaining trifle, taking but a few moments to perform. It would no doubt amuse the symphony subscribers if it were to be played at the regular concerts.

"Rossiniana," drawn by Respighi from "Les Riens," a work which Rossini obviously, as the title proves, did not regard as important, is fluent and mildly entertaining music, rather too lusciously scored for orchestra. The performance of this, as of all the latter part of the program left little to desire.

The special programs announced for the remaining fortnight of the Pops season, which will end Saturday, June 30, are the annual request night Thursday, June 21; a program of dance pieces Saturday, June 23; a Russian program Monday, June 25, and a Wagner program Wednesday, June 27. Boston University has taken the seats for tonight, and the Friends of the Yiddish Art Theatre have reserved the hall for Wednesday, when Arthur Fiedler is to conduct a program for the most part of pieces by Jewish composers.

P. R.

At The Pops Tonight

Second Military March .. Schubert-Casella
Minuet for String Orchestra ... Valensin
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture to "Cinderella" ..... Rossini
"The Roman Carnival," Overture .. Berlioz
Suite for Small Orchestra, No. 2, Stravinsky
"Pines of Rome," Symphonic Poem Respighi
"Orpheus and Eurydice" ..... Boardman
Nocturne for Flute and Small Orchestra ..... Jacobi
Humoresque on Two American Folk Songs ..... Kramer
Russian Lullaby ..... Berlin
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert

Conductor: A. Casella

"Symphonic" Finale; Novelties for Fillip

SUNDAY evening Mr. Casella conducted the last of this year's so-called "Symphonic Pops." The audience was of good size, filling the balconies and most of the floor. Better, it counted among its numbers some of the musical notables of the metropolitan Boston. Best of all, it was an exceedingly enthusiastic audience, calling the orchestra to their feet several times. The program was one that alternated between favorites and novelties. Franck's Symphony, Debussy's two Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Festivals"—Chabrier's "Espana" made up the former; Respighi's "Rossiniana" and Stravinsky's second suite for small orchestra the latter.

Franck's Symphony ranged from the mystic and the melancholy to the energetically brilliant. Applause long and loud was the reward. Debussy's subtleties as his vividness gave pleasure. And the vigors of Chabrier—as always—gave exciting close.

But it was concerning the two novelties that expectation ran highest. Signor Respighi is a composer with his ear to the ground. There have been a Scarlattiana and a Cimarosiana, and they have been popular, why not a Rossiniana? Thus out of the forgotten "Les Riens" the signor constructs four movements—a barcarolle and siciliano entitled "Capri and Taormina," a lament, a short and intriguing intermezzo, a tarantelle, the mad rush of which stops just long enough to allow a solemn religious procession to pass by. The piece abounds in pleasing tunes, which though obvious, have charm. Being of Rossini, it lacks not in startling rhythmic and dynamic effects. And Respighi, in his succession and arrangement of moods, has by no means forgotten the old conservative symphonic plan.

Stravinsky's little suite—a march, a waltz, a polka, a galop—is merely a piece a la mode. If to be "amusant," and ironically so at that, is a criterion, then this suite is a little masterpiece. The four dances it puts through their paces, slyly referring to this or that work in the form, all the while having its little laugh at their expense. The audience caught the spirit. Long before the suite was over, it laughed, too.

A. H. M.

Mr. Philip Hale

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored yesterday with a degree has chosen deliberately to be a Boston journalist all his life. Except for an occasional magazine article, he has confined his later work to The Herald and Boston Symphony programs. The latter, filed in the Boston Public Library, are a lasting monument of his untiring industry and his amazing erudition. Written in that straightforward, unadorned style which Herald readers know so well, they are unmatched in any other country or in any other language. His newspaper articles, today a concert review, tomorrow a dramatic criticism, the next day a symphony notice, all written against time, probably receive more attention from students of music and the drama here and abroad than the comment of any other critic in the United States. In spite of repeated invitations from publishers in the United States and England to write books, he has chosen to devote his years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him.

The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

HER. JUNE 2023

TRANS. JUNE 23

At The Pops Tonight

Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" ..... Gretry-Mottl
Tambourin
Minuet ("The Nymphs of Diana")
Gigue
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Invitation to the Dance .. Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Suite, "Namouna" ..... Lalo
Theme and Variations
Fête Foraine
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
"The Convent on the Water" ... Casella
Children's Round
Old Ladies' Dance
Dance of Salomé from "Salomé" R. Strauss
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem .. Ravel
"Ballet of the Hours" from La Gioconda ..... Ponchelilli
Waltz, "Artists' Life" ..... Strauss
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin

Conductor: A. Casella

Concert Chronicle

Conclusion of The Pops

ONE week earlier than customary, the current season of The Pops reaches conclusion on Saturday evening, June 30. Special programs mark the progress of the final six evenings, starting on Monday with selections chosen exclusively from Russian composers. Included in the music for that evening will be the well-remembered "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakov, and his less familiar prelude to "Khovantchina," Liadov's "Kilimora," the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Balakirev's "Islamey" and the thrice familiar measures of Rachmaninov's "Prelude" and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave." On Tuesday evening the request program of last Thursday will be repeated for those who were unable to gain admission for the first performance. Wednesday will be distinguished by Wagnerian music including selections from "Tannhauser," "Tristan and Isolde," "Rienzi," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Siegfried," "Lohengrin," "Parsifal" and "The Valkyrie." On Friday there will be a Tchaikovsky program, including the "Marche Slave" once more, Italian caprice, the Symphony Pathetique, the Nutcracker ballet suite, "Song Without Words" and the 1812 overture.

Thursday and Saturday alone of the week's program will be general in nature. On the former evening the selections will include an arrangement by Casella of Schubert's "First Military March," a suite from "Carmen," the overture to "Sicilian Vespers," overture to Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," the bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espanol," the overture to "Le Maschere" and the intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" of Mascagni, and "The Marche Slave." On the concluding evening there will be Elgar's showy "Pomp and Circumstance," the Liszt-Herbert "Love's Dream," the overture to "Tannhauser," likewise the overture to "Leonore," Handel's 'Largo," the Rakoczy March from Berlioz, Sibelius's "Valse Triste," "The Ride of the Valkyries," Brahms's "Hungarian Dance No. D Major," Kriesler's "Caprice Viennois," with Casella's "Italia" rhapsody for finale.

Fifth Week of Pops at Symphony Hall

Mr Casella has arranged for this week, the fifth of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, another remarkably attractive set of programs. For Memorial Day there will be a concert of "Music of Heroes," including Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. This is the first time that a complete symphony has appeared on one of the weekday Pops programs. Friday night is M. I. T. night. Arthur Fiedler will conduct a program of the type customary 30 years ago on such occasions. This concert is open to the public. Next Sunday the third of the special Sunday concerts will be devoted to Mozart's E-flat major Symphony, Bach's concerto for two violins, and familiar Wagner excerpts, a list that ought to crowd the hall.

GLOBE MAY 27

The programs in detail follow. There is no concert this evening. Concerts begin at 8:15 and last until about 10:45:

Monday, May 28—Overture to "Il Matrimonia Segreto," Cimarosa; ballet suite, Gluck-Mottl; overture to "Matilde de Shabran," Rossini; overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; "A Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; "Salome's Dance," from "Salome," R. Strauss; prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; entra'acte from "Messidor," Bruneau; Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

TUESDAY, MAY 29

"Coronation March," from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; "Polovtsian Dances," from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "Kol Nidrei," Bruch; "Italia," rhapsody, Casella; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein; overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30

Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Siegfried, "Forest Murmurs," Wagner; overture to "Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; "Eroica," symphony, Beethoven; Finlandia, Sibelius; overture, Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

THURSDAY, MAY 31

First Military March, Schubert-Casella; Petite Suite, Debussy; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov; Lyric Suite, Grieg; Italia, Rhapsody, Casella; Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; overture to "Semiramide," Rossini.

FRIDAY, JUNE 1

"Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; ballet of the hours from "Gioconda," Ponchielli; "The Lost Chord," Sullivan; "Mississippi Suite," Grote; selection, "Good News," De Sylva; waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; "American Patrol," Meacham; stein song, Bullard.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2

Tannhauser, "Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," Wagner; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; suite, "Namouna," Lalo; overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; two nocturnes, Debussy; "Rossiniana" suite, Rossini-Respighi; Hungarian dance, Brahms; waltz from "The Bat," Strauss; Italian caprice, Tchaikovsky.

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E flat major, Mozart; concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra; "Tannhauser," Bacchanale; "Lohengrin," prelude to act 3; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death; "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries; magic fire music, Wagner.

TRANSCRIPT

Capitol Press

JUN 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Planning Tour of the United States.

Now there is talk of taking the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its 110 musicians under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, to Europe for a 10 weeks' tour next Spring after the close of the regular season. Tone poems, modern "music" and all?

LAUDS FEIDLER

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—I have noticed with great interest the letters in your columns concerning the "Pops." It is clearly evident that the public is not satisfied with the music rendered in the season which closes this week.

Mr. Jacchia has been praised, and rightfully so, for his able and efficient years of service.

But I doubt very much if Mr. Jacchia could be persuaded to return. Mr. Jacchia filled Symphony Hall during the past seasons and the public was well pleased.

Whatever may be said of Mr. Casella, the fact remains the "Pops" are on the decline. He seems to have not been able to "balance" the programme with popular as well as classical music.

On several occasions this year we have glimpsed the days of Jacchia again. The director of the evening was an American, a fact which should be noted; he understood his audiences and the results were that everyone was pleased and moreover the house was packed on every occasion that Mr. Feidler conducted.

I think that the "powers that be" in Symphony Hall should carefully study Mr. Feidler's success and act accordingly. All music lovers and especially Bostonians are behind him.

LEO F. [illegible]ORAN.

[3]

REQUEST PROGRAM AT POPS ARRANGED

Handel Largo Leads Again by Large Vote—Concert Next Thursday Night

All of the ballots from the brown box in Symphony hall have been counted and the annual request program has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The request night will take place Thursday.

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular, as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture still holds second place. The only newcomer on the request program, as finally fixed, will be Schubert's Unfinished symphony. This number, the only one on the program which has what might be termed a "respectable winter standing," indicates that the Pops public is eager for "the best." In electing this classic, Pops followers evidently much prefer it to Beethoven's Fifth symphony or Tchaikovsky's Pathetic.

Close contenders among the suites were the Peer Gynt and Nutcracker suites, and among the rhapsodies, Casella's Italia and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. The first mentioned suite and rhapsody won by a very small count.

The program will be as follows, here listed according to the number of ballots cast for each number:

Largo ..... Handel
Overture, Solennelle 1812 ..... Tchaikovsky
Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube, ... Strauss
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished..Schubert
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Italia, rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of sugar fairy from Nutcracker suite ..... Tchaikovsky
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Alfredo Casella, conductor at the Pops, has made the following program, which he will lead in Symphony hall tonight.

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Ballet Suite ..... Gluck-Mottl
Minuet for String Orchestra ..... Valensin
Overture to "Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Introduction and Bridal Procession from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Kikimora ..... Liadov
"On the Steppes of Central Asia" ..... Borodin
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy ..... Balakirev
(Arranged for orchestra by Alfredo Casella)
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried ..... Wagner
"Magic Fire Music" from "The Valkyrie" ..... Wagner

LAST TWO WEEKS OF "POP" CONCERTS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will enter tonight upon the last week but one of their 42d season. A number of special nights are in store for the Pops patrons.

Mr. Casella will conduct the last Sunday concert of the season tonight; next Thursday will be the annual request night, the program for which has been determined entirely by public ballot; while on Saturday there will be a program of music of the dance. Next Monday and Wednesday are exceptions to the general rule that all nights are open to the public.

The programs for the week follow:

SUNDAY, JUNE 17

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Rossiniana, Suite from "Les Riens," Rossini ..... Respighi
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Suite No. 2, for small orchestra, Stravinsky
"Espana," rhapsody ..... Chabrier

TUESDAY

Second Military March ..... Schubert-Casella
Minuet for string orchestra ..... Valensin
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture to "Cinderella" ..... Rossini
"The Roman Carnival" Overture ..... Berlioz
Suite for small orchestra, No. 2 ..... Stravinsky
"Pines of Rome" symphonic poem ..... Respighi
"Orpheus and Eurydice" ..... Boardman
Nocturne for flute and small orchestra ..... Jacobi
Humoresque on two American folk songs ..... Kramer
Russian Lullaby ..... Berlin
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert

THURSDAY
REQUEST NIGHT

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture Sonenelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
"Italia" Rhapsody ..... Casella
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danbue ..... Strauss
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

FRIDAY

Overture to "The Magic Flute" ..... Mozart
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 ..... Beethoven
Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz
"Sadko," Tone Poem ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Pacific 2-3-1," symphonic movement ..... Honegger
Magic Fire music, from "The Valkyrie" ..... Wagner
Prelude for a Modern Drama ..... McClain
Watlz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube ..... Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt

SATURDAY
MUSIC OF THE DANCE

Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" ..... Gretry-Mottl
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Suite "Namouna" ..... Lalo
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
"The Convent on the Water" ..... Casella
Dance of Salome from "Salome," R. Strauss
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ..... Ravel
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Waltz, Artists' Life ..... Strauss
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin

JUNE 17. GLOBE

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

GLOBE

Stravinsky Suite Proves Amusing Novelty

June 18

The last of the Sunday night Pop concerts attracted an enthusiastic audience which left few vacant places in Symphony Hall last evening. Stravinsky's Second Suite for small orchestra, played for the first time in Boston, proved an amusing novelty, with brief and ludicrous parodies of the old-fashioned waltz, polka, and galop.

The Franck Symphony, Respighi's "Rossiniana," two of Debussy's Nocturnes, and Chabrier's "Espana" were Mr Casella's other numbers. These fortnightly Sunday concerts have been successful from every point of view, so that their continuance in future seasons ought to be insured.

Mr Casella's reading of Franck's familiar symphony was not wholly satisfactory. The lento introduction to the first movement was dragged. The finale, though marked "allegro non troppo," was taken at a very rapid pace. These tempi may perhaps be justified, though they are not customary. But the conductor showed little feeling for Franck's characteristic melody and his even more characteristic harmony from which the melody can scarcely be disentangled. The orchestra made too much noise, and at times the wrong things in the score stood out so strongly as to obscure what Franck meant to have come uppermost in the listening ear.

Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," on the other hand, were very well played, with a beautiful logic and clarity of style and plenty of imaginative energy. Chabrier's rhapsody, which Mr Casella did not vulgarize as most conductors seem to do, was unusually impressive and appealing last evening.

Stravinsky's suite, written, it would seem, some years ago, is a very clever and entertaining trifle, taking but a few moments to perform. It would no doubt amuse the symphony subscribers if it were to be played at the regular concerts.

"Rossiniana," drawn by Respighi from "Les Riens," a work which Rossini obviously, as the title proves, did not regard as important, is fluent and mildly entertaining music, rather too lusciously scored for orchestra. The performance of this, as of all the latter part of the program left little to desire.

The special programs announced for the remaining fortnight of the Pops season, which will end Saturday, June 30, are the annual request night Thursday, June 21; a program of dance pieces Saturday, June 23; a Russian program Monday, June 25, and a Wagner program Wednesday, June 27. Boston University has taken the seats for tonight, and the Friends of the Yiddish Art Theatre have reserved the hall for Wednesday, when Arthur Fiedler is to conduct a program for the most part of pieces by Jewish composers.

P. R.

At The Pops Tonight

Second Military March..Schubert-Casella
Minuet for String Orchestra...Valensin
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
"The Roman Carnival," Overture..Berlioz
Suite for Small Orchestra, No. 2..Stravinsky
"Pines of Rome," Symphonic Poem Respighi
"Orpheus and Eurydice".....Boardman
Nocturne for Flute and Small Orchestra .....Jacobi
Humoresque on Two American Folk Songs .....Kramer
Russian Lullaby .....Berlin
Irish Rhapsody .....Herbert
Conductor: A. Casella

"Symphonic" Finale; Novelties for Fillip

SUNDAY evening Mr. Casella conducted the last of this year's so-called "Symphonic Pops." The audience was of good size, filling the balconies and most of the floor. Better, it counted among its numbers some of the musical notables of the metropolitan Boston. Best of all, it was an exceedingly enthusiastic audience, calling the orchestra to their feet several times. The program was one that alternated between favorites and novelties. Franck's Symphony, Debussy's two Nocturnes—"Clouds" and Festivals"—Chabrier's "Espana" made up the former; Respighi's "Rossiniana" and Stravinsky's second suite for small orchestra the latter.

Franck's Symphony ranged from the mystic and the melancholy to the energetically brilliant. Applause long and loud was the reward. Debussy's subtleties as his vividness gave pleasure. And the vigors of Chabrier—as always—gave exciting close.

But it was concerning the two novelties that expectation ran highest. Signor Respighi is a composer with his ear to the ground. There have been a Scarlattiana and a Cimarosiana, and they have been popular, why not a Rossiniana? Thus out of the forgotten "Les Riens" the signor constructs four movements—a barcarolle and siciliano entitled "Capri and Taormina," a lament, a short and intriguing intermezzo, a tarantelle, the mad rush of which stops just long enough to allow a solemn religious procession to pass by. The piece abounds in pleasing tunes, which though obvious, have charm. Being of Rossini, it lacks not in startling rhythmic and dynamic effects. And Respighi, in his succession and arrangement of moods, has by no means forgotten the old conservative symphonic plan.

Stravinsky's little suite—a march, a waltz, a polka, a galop—is merely a piece a la mode. If to be "amusant," and ironically so at that, is a criterion, then this suite is a little masterpiece. The four dances it puts through their paces, slyly referring to this or that work in the form, all the while having its little laugh at their expense. The audience caught the spirit. Long before the suite was over, it laughed, too.

A. H. M.

Mr. Philip Hale

The scholarly, modest gentleman whom Dartmouth honored yesterday with a degree has chosen deliberately to be a Boston journalist all his life. Except for an occasional magazine article, he has confined his later work to The Herald and Boston Symphony programs. The latter, filed in the Boston Public Library, are a lasting monument of his untiring industry and his amazing erudition. Written in that straightforward, unadorned style which Herald readers know so well, they are unmatched in any other country or in any other language. His newspaper articles, today a concert review, tomorrow a dramatic criticism, the next day a symphony notice, all written against time, probably receive more attention from students of music and the drama here and abroad than the comment of any other critic in the United States. In spite of repeated invitations from publishers in the United States and England to write books, he has chosen to devote his years to a newspaper and the symphony orchestra programs. Similarly, he has turned his back on the metropolis time and again in order that he might continue his work in a city which he loves and understands, and which understands and loves him. The Herald has a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Hale and rejoices that Dartmouth has bestowed its degree so fittingly.

TRANS. JUNE 22

At The Pops Tonight

Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" ..... Gretry-Mottl
Tambourin
Minuet ("The Nymphs of Diana")
Gigue
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Invitation to the Dance..Weber-Berlioz
Ballet Suite, "Namouna" ..... Lalo
Theme and Variations
Fête Foraine
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
"The Convent on the Water"...Casella
Children's Round
Old Ladies' Dance
Dance of Salomé from "Salomé" R. Strauss
"La Valse," Cnoregraphic Poem..Ravel
"Ballet of the Hours" from La Gioconda ..... Ponchelli Waltz, "Artists' Life" ..... Strauss
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin

Conductor: A. Casella

Concert Chronicle

Conclusion of The Pops

ONE week earlier than customary, the current season of The Pops reaches conclusion on Saturday evening, June 30. Special programs mark the progress of the final six evenings, starting on Monday with selections chosen exclusively from Russian composers. Included in the music for that evening will be the well-remembered "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakov, and his less familiar prelude to "Khovantchina," Liadov's "Kilimora," the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Balakirev's "Islamey" and the thrice familiar measures of Rachmaninov's "Prelude" and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave." On Tuesday evening the request program of last Thursday will be repeated for those who were unable to gain admission for the first performance. Wednesday will be distinguished by Wagnerian music including selections from "Tannhauser," "Tristan and Isolde," "Rienzi," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Siegfried," "Lohengrin," "Parsifal" and "The Valkyrie." On Friday there will be a Tchaikovsky program, including the "Marche Slave" once more, Italian caprice, the Symphony Pathetique, the Nutcracker ballet suite, "Song Without Words" and the 1812 overture.

Thursday and Saturday alone of the week's program will be general in nature. On the former evening the selections will include an arrangement by Casella of Schubert's "First Military March," a suite from "Carmen," the overture to "Sicilian Vespers," overture to Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," the bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espanol," the overture to "Le Maschere" and the intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" of Mascagni, and "The Marche Slave." On the concluding evening there will be Elgar's showy "Pomp and Circumstance," the Liszt-Herbert "Love's Dream," the overture to "Tannhauser," likewise the overture to "Leonore," Handel's 'Largo," the Rakoczy March from Berlioz, Sibelius's "Valse Triste," "The Ride of the Valkyries," Brahms's "Hungarian Dance [illegible] Major," Kriesler's "Caprice Viennois," with Casella's "Italia" rhapsody for finale.

Fifth Week of Pops at Symphony Hall

Mr Casella has arranged for this week, the fifth of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, another remarkably attractive set of programs. For Memorial Day there will be a concert of "Music of Heroes," including Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. This is the first time that a complete symphony has appeared on one of the weekday Pops programs. Friday night is M. I. T. night. Arthur Fiedler will conduct a program of the type customary 30 years ago on such occasions. This concert is open to the public. Next Sunday the third of the special Sunday concerts will be devoted to Mozart's E-flat major Symphony, Bach's concerto for two violins, and familiar Wagner excerpts, a list that ought to crowd the hall.

The programs in detail follow. There is no concert this evening. Concerts begin at 8:15 and last until about 10:45:

Monday, May 28—Overture to "Il Matrimonia Segreto," Cimarosa; ballet suite, Gluck-Mottl; overture to "Matilde de Shabran," Rossini; overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; "A Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; "Salome's Dance," from "Salome," R. Strauss; prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; entra'acte from "Messidor," Bruneau; Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

TUESDAY, MAY 29

"Coronation March," from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; "Polovtsian Dances," from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "Kol Nidrei," Bruch; "Italia," rhapsody, Casella; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein; overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30

Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Siegfried, "Forest Murmurs," Wagner; overture to "Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; "Eroica," symphony, Beethoven; Finlandia, Sibelius; overture, Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

THURSDAY, MAY 31

First Military March, Schubert-Casella; Petite Suite, Debussy; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov; Lyric Suite, Grieg; Italia, Rhapsody, Casella; Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; overture to "Semiramide," Rossini.

FRIDAY, JUNE 1

"Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; ballet of the hours from "Gioconda," Ponchielli; "The Lost Chord," Sullivan; "Mississippi Suite," Grote; selection, "Good News," De Sylva; waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; "American Patrol," Meacham; stein song, Bullard.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2

Tannhauser, "Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," Wagner; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; suite, "Namouna," Lalo; overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; two nocturnes, Debussy; "Rossiniana" suite, Rossini-Respighi; Hungarian dance, Brahms; waltz from "The Bat," Strauss; Italian caprice, Tchaikovsky.

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

Symphony in E flat major, Mozart; concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra; "Tannhauser," Bacchanale; "Lohengrin," prelude to act 3; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death; "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries; magic fire music, Wagner.

TRANSCRIPT

JUN 1928

the United States.

Now there is talk of taking the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its 110 musicians under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, to Europe for a 10 weeks' tour next Spring after the close of the regular season. Tone poems, modern "music" and all?

LAUDS FEIDLER

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—I have noticed with great interest the letters in your columns concerning the "Pops." It is clearly evident that the public is not satisfied with the music rendered in the season which closes this week.

Mr. Jacchia has been praised, and rightfully so, for his able and efficient years of service.

But I doubt very much if Mr. Jacchia could be persuaded to return. Mr. Jacchia filled Symphony Hall during the past seasons and the public was well pleased.

Whatever may be said of Mr. Casella, the fact remains the "Pops" are on the decline. He seems to have not been able to "balance" the programme with popular as well as classical music.

On several occasions this year we have glimpsed the days of Jacchia again. The director of the evening was an American, a fact which should be noted; he understood his audiences and the results were that everyone was pleased and moreover the house was packed on every occasion that Mr. Feidler conducted.

I think that the "powers that be" in Symphony Hall should carefully study Mr. Feidler's success and act accordingly. All music lovers and especially Bostonians are behind him.

LEO [illegible]ORAN.

[3]

Programs of the Week

Sixth Week of the Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin tonight the sixth week of their 43d season. Alfredo Casella, the celebrated Pops conductor, announces the following programs for this week:

Sunday, June 3—Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, Bach (solo violins, Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen); "Tannhauser," Bacchanale, Wagner; "Lohengrin," prelude to Act III, Wagner; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and Love-Death, Wagner; "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music, Wagner.

Monday, June 4—Polonaire from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikowsky; Valse Triste," Sibelius; Largo, Handel; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; "Fountains of Rome," Respighi; "Italian Caprice," Tchaikowsky; overture to "Le Maschare," Mascagni; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; overture to "Nebuchadnezzar," Verdi.

Tuesday, June 5—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; songs by Boston Square and Compass Club choir; overture to "Oberon," Weber; prelude to Act III, "Traviata," Verdi; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Marche Ecossaise," Debussy; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "William Tell," Rossini.

Wednesday, June 6—Overture in C minor, Foroni; Meditation from "Thais," Massenet; Suite, "Namouna," Lalo; Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Largo from "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem, Liszt; Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky.

Thursday, June 7—Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Valse triste, Sibelius; Ballet Suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner; Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods," Wagner; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Russian Lullaby, Berlin; March, "Lorraine," Ganne.

Friday, June 8, Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Ballet music from "Faust," Gounod; overture to "The King of Ys," Lalo; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Largo, Handel; "Capriccio Espagnol," Rimsky-Korsakov; Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; march, "The Garden City," C. R. Spalding.

Saturday, June 9, march from "Aida," Verdi; Ballet Suite, Gluck-Mottl; overture, "The Italian in Algiers," Rossini; "Marche Joyeuse," Chabrier; "Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; "Scarlattiana" (piano solo, Alfredo Casella), Casella; ballet of the hour, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; dance of the waves, "Lorelei," Catalani; Ride of the Valkyries,

SYMPHONIC POP CONCERT

High Grade Pieces Relished by Large Audience

Post Jun 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Styled symphonic pop concerts, Mr. Casella's Sunday evening entertainments might quite as well be described as popular symphony concerts. Save for the fact that its concluding number, Chabrier's "Espana" seems definitely to have been dropped from the winter repertory of our orchestra, the programme that was heard and relished by a large audience last evening might easily have been offered by Mr. Koussevitzky in the course of the regular season.

For beginning came the Symphony of Cesasr Franck, once "caviar to the general" and now on a fair way to take its place with Dvorak's "From the New World" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" in the affection of the musical public. As already stated, the ever-popular Rhapsody of Chabrier brought the end, and the other pieces were Respighis delightful Suite, "Rossiniana," recently played for the first time anywhere at a weekday pop concert; Debussy's Nocturne's "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Stravinsky's Second Suite for small orchestra, the last-named previously unheard in this city.

At Mr. Casella's hands the Symphony of Franck, making its first appearance on a pop programme, came to a stirring performance, in which more emphasis was laid upon the music's vigors and exultations than upon its supposed mystical fervors. The audience received it warmly. And although it seemed for a moment uncertain how to take the dissonant conceits of Stravinsky's relatively early and frankly amusing suite of dance pieces, the assembled company ultimately accepted this ingenius and engaging music with whole-hearted enthusiasm. The four trifles out of Rossini's "Les Riens," as amplified, elaborated and fetchingly orchestrated by his countryman, make a direct appeal and at the same time avoid banality, a fortunate and not too frequent combination. They were brilliantly played last evening, as were the diverting pieces of Stravinsky and Debussy's "Festivals." To all the audience was cordial, a convincing endorsement of Mr. Casella's policies.

gaflSase"masrlloa niSoaseha meoacmm

Eighth Week of the Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter tonight upon the last week but one of their 42d season. A number of special nights are in store for the Pops patrons.

Alfredo Casella will conduct the last Sunday concert of the season tonight; next Thursday will be the Annual Request Night, the program for which has been determined entirely by public ballot; while on Saturday there will be a program of music of the dance. Next Monday and Wednesday are exceptions to the general rule that all nights are open to the public.

The programs for the week follow:

Sunday, June 17—Symphony in D minor, Franck; "Rossiniana," Respighi; Two Nocturnes, Debussy; Suite No. 2, for small orchestra, Stravinsky; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier.

Tuesday, June 19—Second Military March, Schubert-Casella; Minuet for String Orchestra, Valensin; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Suite for Small Orchestra, No. 2, Stravinsky; "Pines of Rome," Respighi; "Orpheus and Eurydice," Boardman; Nocture for Flute and Small Orchestra, Jacobi; Humoresque on Two American Folk Songs, Kramer; "Russian Lullaby," Berlin; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert.

Thursday, June 21, Request Night—Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; "Italia," Rhapsody, Casella; waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Largo, Handel; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Friday, June 22—Overture to "The Magic Flute" (Mozart); Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" (Tschaikowsky); overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op 72 (Beethoven); Rakoczy March (Berlioz); "Sadko" (Rimsky-Korsakov); "Pacific 2-3-1" (Honegger); Magic Fire Music, from "The Valkyrie" (Wagner); Prelude for a Modern Drama (McClain); waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" (Strauss); Second Hungarian Rhapsody (Liszt).

BE Sun—17

Saturday, June 23, Music of the Dance—Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" (Gretry-Mottl); Minuet (Boccherini); Invitation to the Dance (Weber-Berlioz); Ballet Suite, "Namouna" (Lalo); Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens); "The Convent on the Water" (Casella); Dance of Salome from "Salome" (R. Strauss); "La Valse" (Ravel); "Ballet of the Hours" (Ponchielli); waltz, "Artists' Life" (Strauss); Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" (Borodin).

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Casella, for the last of his special Sunday night Symphonic programs at the Pops, has turned from the great German composers whose works have furnished the chief items on the earlier programs to non-Germans. Tonight the symphony is Franck's, and the novelties are by Stravinsky and Rossini as arranged by Respighi. These Sunday night concerts have proved unusually enjoyable, and attracted audiences which have been each time nearer to filling the entire hall.

It is again reported that the Boston Symphony will visit Europe next Spring at the end of the season here, but the great expense and the interference with the Pops season here are still obvious obstacles to a scheme which is, if gossip does not err, dear to Mr Koussevitzky's heart.

Three well-known members of the Boston Symphony are retiring from that organization at the end of this season. Alfred Holy, first harpist for 19 years; George Wendler, first horn, a member of the orchestra for 15 years, and Joseph Keller, 'cellist, a member for 30 years. All of them are at the end of their active careers. No other changes in personnel are anticipated. Mr Holy, a remarkable harpist, will be particularly hard to replace, just as it has proved impossible to replace Mr Neumann at the tympani.

Doris Estey, the young Brockton pianist who played the solo part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at the Pops Tufts night, June 7, will repeat it June 20. Miss Estey, a pupil of Frederic Tillotson, is sailing in September for London, where she is to spend a year studying under Tobias Matthay.

Pops Request Program Is Decided for Thursday

All the ballots from the brown box in Symphony Hall have been counted and the annual request program has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The Request Night will take place next Thursday, June 21.

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. AMER SUN 16

The program will be as follows, here listed according to the number of ballots cast for each number:

Largo ..... Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of Sugar Fairy from "Nutcracker" Suite ..... Tchaikovsky
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini

MUSIC

Continued From Page 48 Gen

Musical America that "all of the 92 scores submitted in this contest were considered solely on the ground of intrinsic musical merit," so that the prize did not go to Bloch for his patriotic "program."

Ernest Bloch is an American only by adoption. He has lived in this country since 1915. By birth he is a Swiss Jew. In America he has taught theory and composition in New York, Cleveland and San Francisco, where he now lives and directs the Conservatory there.

His first American encouragement came from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915, when Dr Muck invited him to conduct his "Three Jewish Poems" at a pair of Symphony concerts. He was at the time stranded, almost penniless in New York, owing to the failure of the engagement to conduct for a well-known dancer which had brought him to America.

Bloch was already well known in Europe by 1915, however. In Pizzetti's "Musicisti Contemporanei," a volume of essays published in 1914, the "contemporaries" discussed are Puccini, Debussy, Charpentier, Alberic Magnard, Ravel and Bloch.

There will be much anticipation of the first performances of Bloch's "America." That he has imaginative intensity, technical skill, musical originality and power, his previous works have made manifest to audiences. However grandiose the program of the new prize composition may sound, there is a good prospect that Bloch will have written music sufficiently powerful to carry it.

HANDEL'S LARGO LEADS

Most Popular of All Pieces for Pops Request Night

Post Jun 16

All of the ballots from the brown box in Symphony Hall have been counted and the annual request programme has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The request night will take place next Thursday, June 21.

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture still holds second place. The only newcomer upon the request programme, as finally fixed, will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. This number, the only one on the programme which has what might be termed a "respectable winter standing," indicates that the Pops public is eager for "the best." In electing this classic, Pops fans evidently much prefer it to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic."

Close contenders among the suites were the "Peer Gynt" and "Nutcracker" suites, and among the rhapsodies, Casella's "Italia" and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. The first mentioned suite and rhapsody won by a very small count.

The programme will be as follows, here listed according to the number of ballots cast for each number:

"Largo" ..... Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ..... Sousa
"Ave Maria" ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
"Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of Sugar Fairy from "Nutcracker" Suite ..... Tchaikovsky
"Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini

Concerts Next Week

Progress of The Pops

SPECIAL nights will mark the Pops concerts next week, the last week but one of the current season. Thursday evening will be the annual "request" night, the program for which is determined by public ballot. On Saturday there will be exclusively music of the dance: For Monday evening the hall has been reserved for students and friends of Boston University, and for Wednesday evening the concert is for the Friends of the Yiddish Art Theater. Tickets for the latter evening will be available at Symphony Hall at prices slightly above the usual rates. The difference will go to the worthy purposes of the Art Theater.

For Sunday evening, the last of the symphonic programs, Mr. Casella will offer the following selections:

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Rossiniana, Suite from "Les Riens," Rossini ..... Respighi
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Suite No. 2, for Small Orchestra ..... Stravinsky
"Espana," Rhapsody ..... Chabrier

IRNS JUN 16

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Ballet Suite ..... Gluck-Mottl
Minuet for String Orchestra ..... Valensin
Overture to "Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Introduction and Bridal Procession from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Kikimora ..... Liadov
"On the Steppes of Central Asia" ..... Borodin
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy ..... Balakirev
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"Forest Murmurs," from Siegfried ..... Wagner
"Magic Fire Music," from The Valkyrie ..... Wagner

Conductor: A. Casella

Pops to Hold Request Night

All of the ballots from the brown box in Symphony hall have been counted and the annual request program has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The request night will take place next Thursday, June 21. TRAN SUN 16

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture still holds second place. The only newcomer upon the request program, as finally fixed, will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. This number, the only one on the program which has what might be termed a "respectable winter standing," indicates that the Pops public is eager for "the best." In electin gthis classic, Pops fans evidently much prefer it to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic."

Close contenders among the suites were the "Peer Gynt" and "Nutcracker" suites, and among the rhapsodies Casella's "Italia" and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. The first mentioned suite and rhapsody won by a very small count.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JUN 19 192

A Bostonian's Holiday

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of Boston for many years. He had not been in New York for fifteen years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem. He chose the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall.—Variety.

[4]

Programs of the Week

Sixth Week of the Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin tonight the sixth week of their 43d season. Alfredo Casella, the celebrated Pops conductor, announces the following programs for this week:

Sunday, June 3—Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; concerto in D minor, for two violins and string orchestra, Bach (solo violins, Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen); "Tannhauser," Bacchanale, Wagner; "Lohengrin," prelude to Act III, Wagner; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and Love-Death, Wagner; "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music, Wagner.

Monday, June 4—Polonaire from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikowsky; Valse Triste," Sibelius; Largo, Handel; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; "Fountains of Rome," Respighi; "Italian Caprice," Tchaikowsky; overture to "Le Maschare," Mascagni; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; overture to "Nebuchadnezzar," Verdi.

Tuesday, June 5—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; songs by Boston Square and Compass Club choir; overture to "Oberon," Weber; prelude to Act III, "Traviata," Verdi; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Marche Ecossaise," Debussy; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "William Tell," Rossini.

Wednesday, June 6—Overture in C minor, Foroni; Meditation from "Thais," Massenet; Suite, "Namouna," Lalo; Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Largo from "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem, Liszt; Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky.

Thursday, June 7—Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Valse triste, Sibelius; Ballet Suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner; Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods," Wagner; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Russian Lullaby, Berlin; March, "Lorraine," Ganne.

Friday, June 8, Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Ballet music from "Faust," Gounod; overture to "The King of Ys," Lalo; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Largo, Handel; "Capriccio Espagnol," Rimsky-Korsakov; Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; march, "The Garden City," C. R. Spalding.

Saturday, June 9, march from "Aida," Verdi; Ballet Suite, Gluck-Mottl; overture, "The Italian in Algiers," Rossini; "Marche Joyeuse," Chabrier; "Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; "Scarlattiana" (piano solo, Alfredo Casella), Casella; ballet of the hour, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; dance of the waves, "Lorelei," Catalani; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Eighth Week of the Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter tonight upon the last week but one of their 42d season. A number of special nights are in store for the Pops patrons.

Alfredo Casella will conduct the last Sunday concert of the season tonight; next Thursday will be the Annual Request Night, the program for which has been determined entirely by public ballot; while on Saturday there will be a program of music of the dance. Next Monday and Wednesday are exceptions to the general rule that all nights are open to the public.

The programs for the week follow:

Sunday, June 17—Symphony in D minor, Franck; "Rossiniana," Respighi; Two Nocturnes, Debussy; Suite No. 2, for small orchestra, Stravinsky; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier.

Tuesday, June 19—Second Military March, Schubert-Casella; Minuet for String Orchestra, Valensin; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Suite for Small Orchestra, No. 2, Stravinsky; "Pines of Rome," Respighi; "Orpheus and Eurydice," Boardman; Nocture for Flute and Small Orchestra, Jacobi; Humoresque on Two American Folk Songs, Kramer; "Russian Lullaby," Berlin; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert.

Thursday, June 21, Request Night—Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; "Italia," Rhapsody, Casella; waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Largo, Handel; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Friday, June 22—Overture to "The Magic Flute" (Mozart); Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" (Tschaikowsky); overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op 72 (Beethoven); Rakoczy March (Berlioz); "Sadko" (Rimsky-Korsakov); "Pacific 2-3-1" (Honegger); Magic Fire Music, from "The Valkyrie" (Wagner); Prelude for a Modern Drama (McClain); waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" (Strauss); Second Hungarian Rhapsody (Liszt).

Saturday, June 23, Music of the Dance—Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" (Gretry-Mottl); Minuet (Boccherini); Invitation to the Dance (Weber-Berlioz); Ballet Suite, "Namouna" (Lalo); Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens); "The Convent on the Water" (Casella); Dance of Salome from "Salome" (R. Strauss); "La Valse" (Ravel); "Ballet of the Hours" (Ponchielli); waltz, "Artists' Life" (Strauss); Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" (Borodin).

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Casella, for the last of his special Sunday night Symphonic programs at the Pops, has turned from the great German composers whose works have furnished the chief items on the earlier programs to non-Germans. Tonight the symphony is Franck's, and the novelties are by Stravinsky and Rossini as arranged by Respighi. These Sunday night concerts have proved unusually enjoyable, and attracted audiences which have been each time nearer to filling the entire hall.

It is again reported that the Boston Symphony will visit Europe next Spring at the end of the season here, but the great expense and the interference with the Pops season here are still obvious obstacles to a scheme which is, if gossip does not err, dear to Mr Koussevitzky's heart.

Three well-known members of the Boston Symphony are retiring from that organization at the end of this season, Alfred Holy, first harpist for 19 years; George Wendler, first horn, a member of the orchestra for 15 years, and Joseph Keller, 'cellist, a member for 30 years. All of them are at the end of their active careers. No other changes in personnel are anticipated. Mr Holy, a remarkable harpist, will be particularly hard to replace, just as it has proved impossible to replace Mr Neumann at the tympani.

Doris Estey, the young Brockton pianist who played the solo part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at the Pops Tufts night, June 7, will repeat it June 20. Miss Estey, a pupil of Frederic Tillotson, is sailing in September for London, where she is to spend a year studying under Tobias Matthay.

Pops Request Program Is Decided for Thursday

All the ballots from the brown box in Symphony Hall have been counted and the annual request program has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The Request Night will take place next Thursday, June 21.

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory.

AMER SUN 16

The program will be as follows, here listed according to the number of ballots cast for each number:

Largo ..... Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of Sugar Fairy from "Nutcracker" Suite ..... Tchaikovsky
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini

MUSIC

Continued From Page 48

Musical America that "all of the 92 scores submitted in this contest were considered solely on the ground of intrinsic musical merit," so that the prize did not go to Bloch for his patriotic "program."

Ernest Bloch is an American only by adoption. He has lived in this country since 1915. By birth he is a Swiss Jew. In America he has taught theory and composition in New York, Cleveland and San Francisco, where he now lives and directs the Conservatory there.

His first American encouragement came from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915, when Dr Muck invited him to conduct his "Three Jewish Poems" at a pair of Symphony concerts. He was at the time stranded, almost penniless in New York, owing to the failure of the engagement to conduct for a well-known dancer which had brought him to America.

Bloch was already well known in Europe by 1915, however. In Pizzetti's "Musicisti Contemporanei," a volume of essays published in 1914, the "contemporaries" discussed are Puccini, Debussy, Charpentier, Alberic Magnard, Ravel and Bloch.

There will be much anticipation of the first performances of Bloch's "America." That he has imaginative intensity, technical skill, musical originality and power, his previous works have made manifest to audiences. However grandiose the program of the new prize composition may sound, there is a good prospect that Bloch will have written music sufficiently powerful to carry it.

HANDEL'S LARGO LEADS

Most Popular of All Pieces for Pops Request Night

Post Jun 16

All of the ballots from the brown box in Symphony Hall have been counted and the annual request programme has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The request night will take place next Thursday, June 21.

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture still holds second place. The only newcomer upon the request programme, as finally fixed, will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. This number, the only one on the programme which has what might be termed a "respectable winter standing," indicates that the Pops public is eager for "the best." In electing this classic, Pops fans evidently much prefer it to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic."

Close contenders among the suites were the "Peer Gynt" and "Nutcracker" suites, and among the rhapsodies, Casella's "Italia" and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. The first mentioned suite and rhapsody won by a very small count.

The programme will be as follows, here listed according to the number of ballots cast for each number:

"Largo" ..... Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ..... Sousa
"Ave Maria" ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
"Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of Sugar Fairy from "Nutcracker" Suite ..... Tchaikovsky
"Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini

Concerts Next Week

Progress of The Pops

SPECIAL nights will mark the Pops concerts next week, the last week but one of the current season. Thursday evening will be the annual "request" night, the program for which is determined by public ballot. On Saturday there will be exclusively music of the dance. For Monday evening the hall has been reserved for students and friends of Boston University, and for Wednesday evening the concert is for the Friends of the Yiddish Art Theater. Tickets for the latter evening will be available at Symphony Hall at prices slightly above the usual rates. The difference will go to the worthy purposes of the Art Theater.

For Sunday evening, the last of the symphonic programs, Mr. Casella will offer the following selections:

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Rossiniana, Suite from "Les Riens," Rossini ..... Respighi
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Suite No. 2, for Small Orchestra ..... Stravinsky
"Espana," Rhapsody ..... Chabrier

TRNS SUN 16

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Ballet Suite ..... Gluck-Mottl
Minuet for String Orchestra ..... Valensin
Overture to "Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Introduction and Bridal Procession from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Kikimora ..... Liadov
"On the Steppes of Central Asia" ..... Borodin
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy ..... Balakirev
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"Forest Murmurs," from Siegfried ..... Wagner
"Magic Fire Music," from The Valkyrie ..... Wagner

Conductor: A. Casella

Pops to Hold Request Night

All of the ballots from the brown box in Symphony hall have been counted and the annual request program has been made strictly in accordance with the vote of the Pops audience. The request night will take place next Thursday, June 21.

TRAV SUN 16

Handel's Largo, as has been the case for many seasons, leads the voting by a large count, thus remaining the most popular as well as the oldest piece in the Pops repertory. Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture still holds second place. The only newcomer upon the request program, as finally fixed, will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. This number, the only one on the program which has what might be termed a "respectable winter standing," indicates that the Pops public is eager for "the best." In electin gthis classic, Pops fans evidently much prefer it to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic."

Close contenders among the suites were the "Peer Gynt" and "Nutcracker" suites, and among the rhapsodies Casella's "Italia" and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. The first mentioned suite and rhapsody won by a very small count.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JUN 19 192

A Bostonian's Holiday

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of Boston for many years. He had not been in New York for fifteen years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem. He chose the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall.—Variety.

...as shown, for ...increased cost.
...$4.00, now

140.50

High Grade Pieces Relished by Large Audience

Post Jun 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Styled symphonic pop concerts, Mr. Casella's Sunday evening entertainments might quite as well be described as popular symphony concerts. Save for the fact that its concluding number, Chabrier's "Espana" seems definitely to have been dropped from the winter repertory of our orchestra, the programme that was heard and relished by a large audience last evening might easily have been offered by Mr. Koussevitzky in the course of the regular season.

For beginning came the Symphony of Cesasr Franck, once "caviar to the general" and now on a fair way to take its place with Dvorak's "From the New World" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" in the affection of the musical public. As already stated, the ever-popular Rhapsody of Chabrier brought the end, and the other pieces were Respighis delightful Suite, "Rossiniana," recently played for the first time anywhere at a weekday pop concert; Debussy's Nocturne's "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Stravinsky's Second Suite for small orchestra, the last-named previously unheard in this city.

At Mr. Casella's hands the Symphony of Franck, making its first appearance on a pop programme, came to a stirring performance, in which more emphasis was laid upon the music's vigors and exultations than upon its supposed mystical fervors. The audience received it warmly. And although it seemed for a moment uncertain how to take the dissonant conceits of Stravinsky's relatively early and frankly amusing suite of dance pieces, the assembled company ultimately accepted this ingenius and engaging music with whole-hearted enthusiasm. The four trifles out of Rossini's "Les Riens," as amplified, elaborated and fetchingly orchestrated by his countryman, make a direct appeal and at the same time avoid banality, a fortunate and not too frequent combination. They were brilliantly played last evening, as were the diverting pieces of Stravinsky and Debussy's "Festivals." To all the audience was cordial, a convincing endorsement of Mr. Casella's policies; gnSase"masrlloa niSoaseha meoacmm

[4]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JUN 10 1917

SOME MORONS AND AN AMERICAN CRITIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT WAS only the other day that we found ourselves, somewhat to our surprise, defending the audience of our symphony concerts against an assault upon their taste and intelligence made by a visting foreign musician, Monsieur Pierre Monteux, late guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is no part of our intention to elect ourself defender of the faith that our American concert audiences are worthy of esteem (they have their deficiencies, heaven knows); yet we confess to squirming a bit when we find the much abused American concertgoer being charged with faults of which, as a matter of fact, he is largely innocent; and we squirm with especial uneasiness when the accuser is not a disgruntled foreigner, but an American whom one would expect to be fair-minded and acute.

* * *

WHAT is this new indictment of the American concertgoer in his character as patron of our symphony concerts? It is a comprehensive and a savage one—it is, indeed, an indictment not only of our orchestral concertgoers, but of the majority of the principal conductors who appear before them (only Mr. Frederick Stock and Mr. Koussevitzky are excepted), of the management of our orchestras, and (of course) of that incorrigible miscreant, "the press." The author of the indictment, which is spread upon the pages of "Harper's Monthly Magazine" for June, is Professor Daniel Gregory Mason, head of the Music Department of Columbia University.

* * *

ONE might almost suspect that Professor Mason and Monsieur Monteux had been in cahoots, and that they had planned a joint offensive against the despised American concertgoer, against the conductors whom he applauds and the conditions that shape his symphonic activities.

Professor Mason does not mince matters. The patrons of our symphony concerts are of several types, all odious. One is "the moronic conservative," who "swears by the classics, not because he perceives their beauty (a highly active process) but because he recognizes their names. . . . This music that he burdens with his love he regards not as a living and growing art, to which he might himself creatively contribute by understanding it, but as something long ago finished and conveniently classified, something kept on the shelves of libraries and exhibited in concert halls by famous conductors. . . . And this 'museum music' of the moronic conservative thus becomes one of the ghosts, never laid, that mislead us from the pursuit of the real flesh-and-blood music which would make us happy."

* * *

FROM this it would appear that, in Professor Mason's mind, there is a genuine antithesis between "museum music"—by which, we afterward learn, he means such music as the best loved works of Bach, Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Brahms—and what he calls "the real flesh-and-blood music which would make us happy." We confess that this baffles us. Are not the greater works of Bach, Beethoven and the others "real flesh-and-blood music" for Professor Mason? Is it possible that the Brandenburg Concertos and the Seventh Symphony do not "make him happy"?

If it is "moronic" to "burden with your love," in Professor Mason's phrase, the greater works of the masters, one is almost tempted to conclude that moronism has its points.

But is there not some confusion of thought here on Professor Mason's part? He tells us that "the moronic conservative" swears by the classics "not because he perceives their beauty, but because he recognizes their names." Yet this is the same moron who, in Professor Mason's next paragraph, "burdens with his love" these classics which he swears by. Obviously, if the moron loves this music, he occupies a much more vital and organic relation to it than if he merely bowed to it because he "recognized its name." Either he loves it or he offers it mere lip service. Professor Mason cannot have it both ways.

* * *

ANOTHER odious type of symphonic concertgoer, less numerous than the moronic conservative, "but far more vociferous, and unfortunately just as unintelligent," is "the moronic radical." Both, says Professor Mason, "are the victims of mental inertia: the only difference is that the laziness of the one cares only for what is old, that of the other only for what is new. He demands the latest because he lacks the taste to recognize the best. His preference is for whatever is crudely eccentric, bizarre, ugly and cynically sophisticated. He is ready to proclaim any one a genius who will but write for percussion instruments only, or accompany his music with colored lights thrown on a screen, or strike the piano with his fists or forearms."

* * *

ALSO, there are the concertgoing morons who dote on "war-horses." These "war-horses" are "the works of Liszt, Strauss, Tchaikovsky and Wagner, the chief purveyors of them"—composers from whom Professor Mason, one gathers, withholds his esteem. But it is not only the low-lifes in the audience who corrupt the body musical by their passion for "the works of Liszt, Strauss, Tchaikovsky and Wagner"; it is that other pet abomination of Professor Mason's, the "guest" or "prima donna" conductor, who muddies the tonal waters by his love for these works, which "afford unequaled opportunities for personal display," since "they lend themselves particularly to the posings, exaggerations, artificial and specious effects of the prima donna conductor."

It is Professor Mason's contention that the symphonic concert world in America is going to the dogs because of the devotion of audiences and conductors to these "war-horses." He feels that our orchestras "are run on purely business lines to supply the demands of the majority" . . . in which orchestral music is to follow, perhaps, "along the dismal path of our commercial theater" (it will perhaps be news to Mr. Clarence Mackay and Mr. H. H. Flagler that the orchestras for the sake of which these gentlemen have yearly been meeting deficits of hundreds of thousands of dollars were commercial institutions).

Professor Mason sets off the composers of "war-horses"—Liszt, Strauss, Tchaikovsky and Wagner—against composers of such "purer and greater music" as that of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms. He would lead us to think that these "war-horses" are not only "well adapted to the low stage of mentality of those 'fans' in every audience who conceive performers not as artists but as 'stars,'" but are the chief excuse for the prevalence of that heinous type, the "guest" or "prima donna" conductor.

* * *

WHAT are the facts? Did New York (which Professor Mason seems to regard as the chief den of symphonic iniquity in America)—did New York hear, this last season, a preponderance of war-horses, "purveyed" to its moronic audiences by reprehensible conductors? Did "the works of Liszt, Strauss, Tchaikovsky and Wagner" bulk larger on the season's orchestral programs than the music of the pure in heart (has it ever occurred to Professor Mason, by the way, that Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture is one of the most hard-ridden of all war-horses?)?

Let us see. A survey of the programs of the concerts given here during the past season by the Philharmonic, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Beethoven, and other local and visiting orchestras, including the Society of the Friends of Music (except for choral works occupying all or most of the program), discloses the fact that Beethoven had 59 performances, Brahms 31, Mozart 24, Bach 21, Handel 13, Haydn 11, Vivaldi 10, Franck 9, Weber 8, Schubert 8, Schumann 8, Cherubini 7. Surely, all this is "pure" music, even if it is not all equally great, and it totals 209 performances.

How do the disreputable quartet of Professor Mason's war-horses stand up against this record? We find that Wagner had 82 performances, Tchaikovsky 24, Richard Strauss 23 and Liszt 15. War-horse total, 144, as against 209 for the pure and great (or near-great). If we add the representations of such reasonably pure composers as Debussy (23), Ravel (23), Mendelssohn (13), De Falla (9), Elgar (7), Corelli (4), Scarlatti (4), D'Indy (4), it will be evident that the war-horses are simply nowhere.

* * *

PROFESSOR MASON'S heaviest guns are not, however, fired at the various kinds of morons who, according to him, compose our audiences, but at that subversive and abandoned creature, the "prima donna" conductor, whose distinguishing characteristics, it appears, are "posings," "exaggerations," a love of "artificial and specious effects."

Who are, at the moment, the successful "prima donna" conductors on the American scene (the unsuccessful ones will not return, so they need worry neither Professor Mason nor ourselves). Is Mr. Stokowski the head devil among them, in Professor Mason's view? It would seem so, for he singles out the programs of the Philadelphia Orchestra for their "sensationalism," and adduces in particular its programs of three years ago (which seems, as the farmer said of the ox-tail purée, to be going pretty far back for soup). But does Mr. Stokowski, as a conductor, indulge in "posings, exaggerations, artificial and specious effects"? That will strike the more penetrating observers among Mr. Stokowski's audiences as an odd way to describe the almost savage intentness of his conducting. If Mr. Stokowski is really devoted to "specious effects," he is indulging in waste effort; for no conductor in America is less in need of resorting to claptrap than the eloquent and deeply musical leader who directs the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Is Mr. Mengelberg among the culprits? It seems unlikely. "Exaggerate" he may, but only because he feels music with extraordinary and absorbing intensity. The trouble, if any, with Mr. Mengelberg is not "artificiality," not a tendency to "pose," but rather an excess of earnestness. As a matter of fact, a little honest self-consciousness would improve him as a conductor.

Mr. Koussevitzky? No. Mr. Koussevitzky is given a clean bill of health by Professor Mason (as the editor of "Harper's" helpfully reminds us, "Profes Mason's symphony was performed by Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Boston last winter"; and it is not to be supposed that Professor Mason would have yielded his score to a "prima donna" conductor).

Is Mr. Toscanini given to "posings, exaggerations, artificial and specious effects"? Not many have noticed it.

Sir Thomas Beecham? Well, it is impossible to deny that Sir Thomas is extremely active upon the conductor's stand; but we doubt very much if Sir Thomas would bore himself to the extent of posing. He does not have to. A brilliant and poetic conductor, he prevails by the authority, the finesse, the musical quality of his performances. His gestures may seem "exaggerated," but his interpretations are as sensitive as they are vital. Certainly his programs are not those of a "sensationalist" (a word which appears to be synonymous in Professor Mason's mind with "prima donna" conductors). Sir Thomas played no "war-horses" in New York—unless you choose to call the "Meistersinger" Prelude one. On the contrary, he played music which was almost defiantly outside the standard orchestral repertoire—unfamiliar works by Handel, Paisiello, Delius, Grétry, Mozart.

* * *

UPON one point of historical fact, by the way, Professor Mason is in error. He asserts that Wilhelm Furtwängler, former guest conductor of the Philharmonic, "failed in New York" largely because he "could not or would not cut the necessary capers." Mr. Furtwängler failed in New York largely because he had the misfortune to follow on the heels of Arturo Toscanini. Nobody wanted him to cut any capers. Mr. Toscanini had accustomed Philharmonic audiences to other things than capers. Those who had been swept off their feet by the superlative beauty and justness of Mr. Toscanini's conducting looked to Mr. Furtwängler to give them something at least as fine as Mr. Furtwängler's own best, as he had disclosed it here the season before.

But the unhappy Mr. Furtwängler, dismayed and rattled by the overwhelming triumph of his Italian predecessor, was not content to stick to his last and do his best, going his own way with dignity and independence. He lost his head, attempted to placate those in power, sought to curry favor with influential critics. He kept hot the telephone wires at the other end of which sat those from whom he sought advice. Should he play a certain work to please Mr. * * *, the music critic of * * *? He had decided not to play another work because Mr. * * *, of the * * *, was said to dislike it. A third critic, Mr. * * *, had attacked his interpretation of such and such a composer. What should Mr. Furtwängler do—answer him in print?

In other words, it was not because Mr. Furtwängler disdained to "cut capers" that he "failed" in New York: it was because, in Professor Mason's own words as applied to prima donna conductors, he made a "servile attempt to placate the public," via the critics. If he had put Toscanini out of his mind, and had bidden his critics to go to the devil, he might have remained among us, lucratively employed. But Mr. Furtwängler paid the penalty exacted of the artist who seeks success by compromise.

The pathetic legend of the misused Furtwängler is—a legend. Mr. Furtwängler killed himself.

* * *

PROFESSOR MASON complains, finally, because American concertgoers prefer to hear Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner and Mozart ("museum music," as he so grotesquely calls it) rather than "any potential great new music that might be coming to birth among us"—by which he means new music composed by Americans.

It seems difficult for Professor Mason and his kind to realize that no one would welcome more eagerly any "great new music" that might come to birth among us than our conductors and our audiences. But, first, obviously, it must come to birth—it must survive its embryo stage. What can the conductors and the audiences do but wait? Heaven knows, they have waited, and are waiting, patiently enough, in spite of their bitter disappointment over innumerable stillborn symphonic infants.

Does Professor Mason really believe that if an American composer should produce a piece of music as unmistakably salient and distinguished as the best work of Americans in other æsthetic fields—as good, for example, as the best of Eugene O'Neill, Edward Arlington Robinson, Thornton Wilder, Sherwood Anderson, Arthur B. Davies, Eugene Speicher, Rockwell Kent—it would not be received with shouts of acclamation from Boston to San Francisco?

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
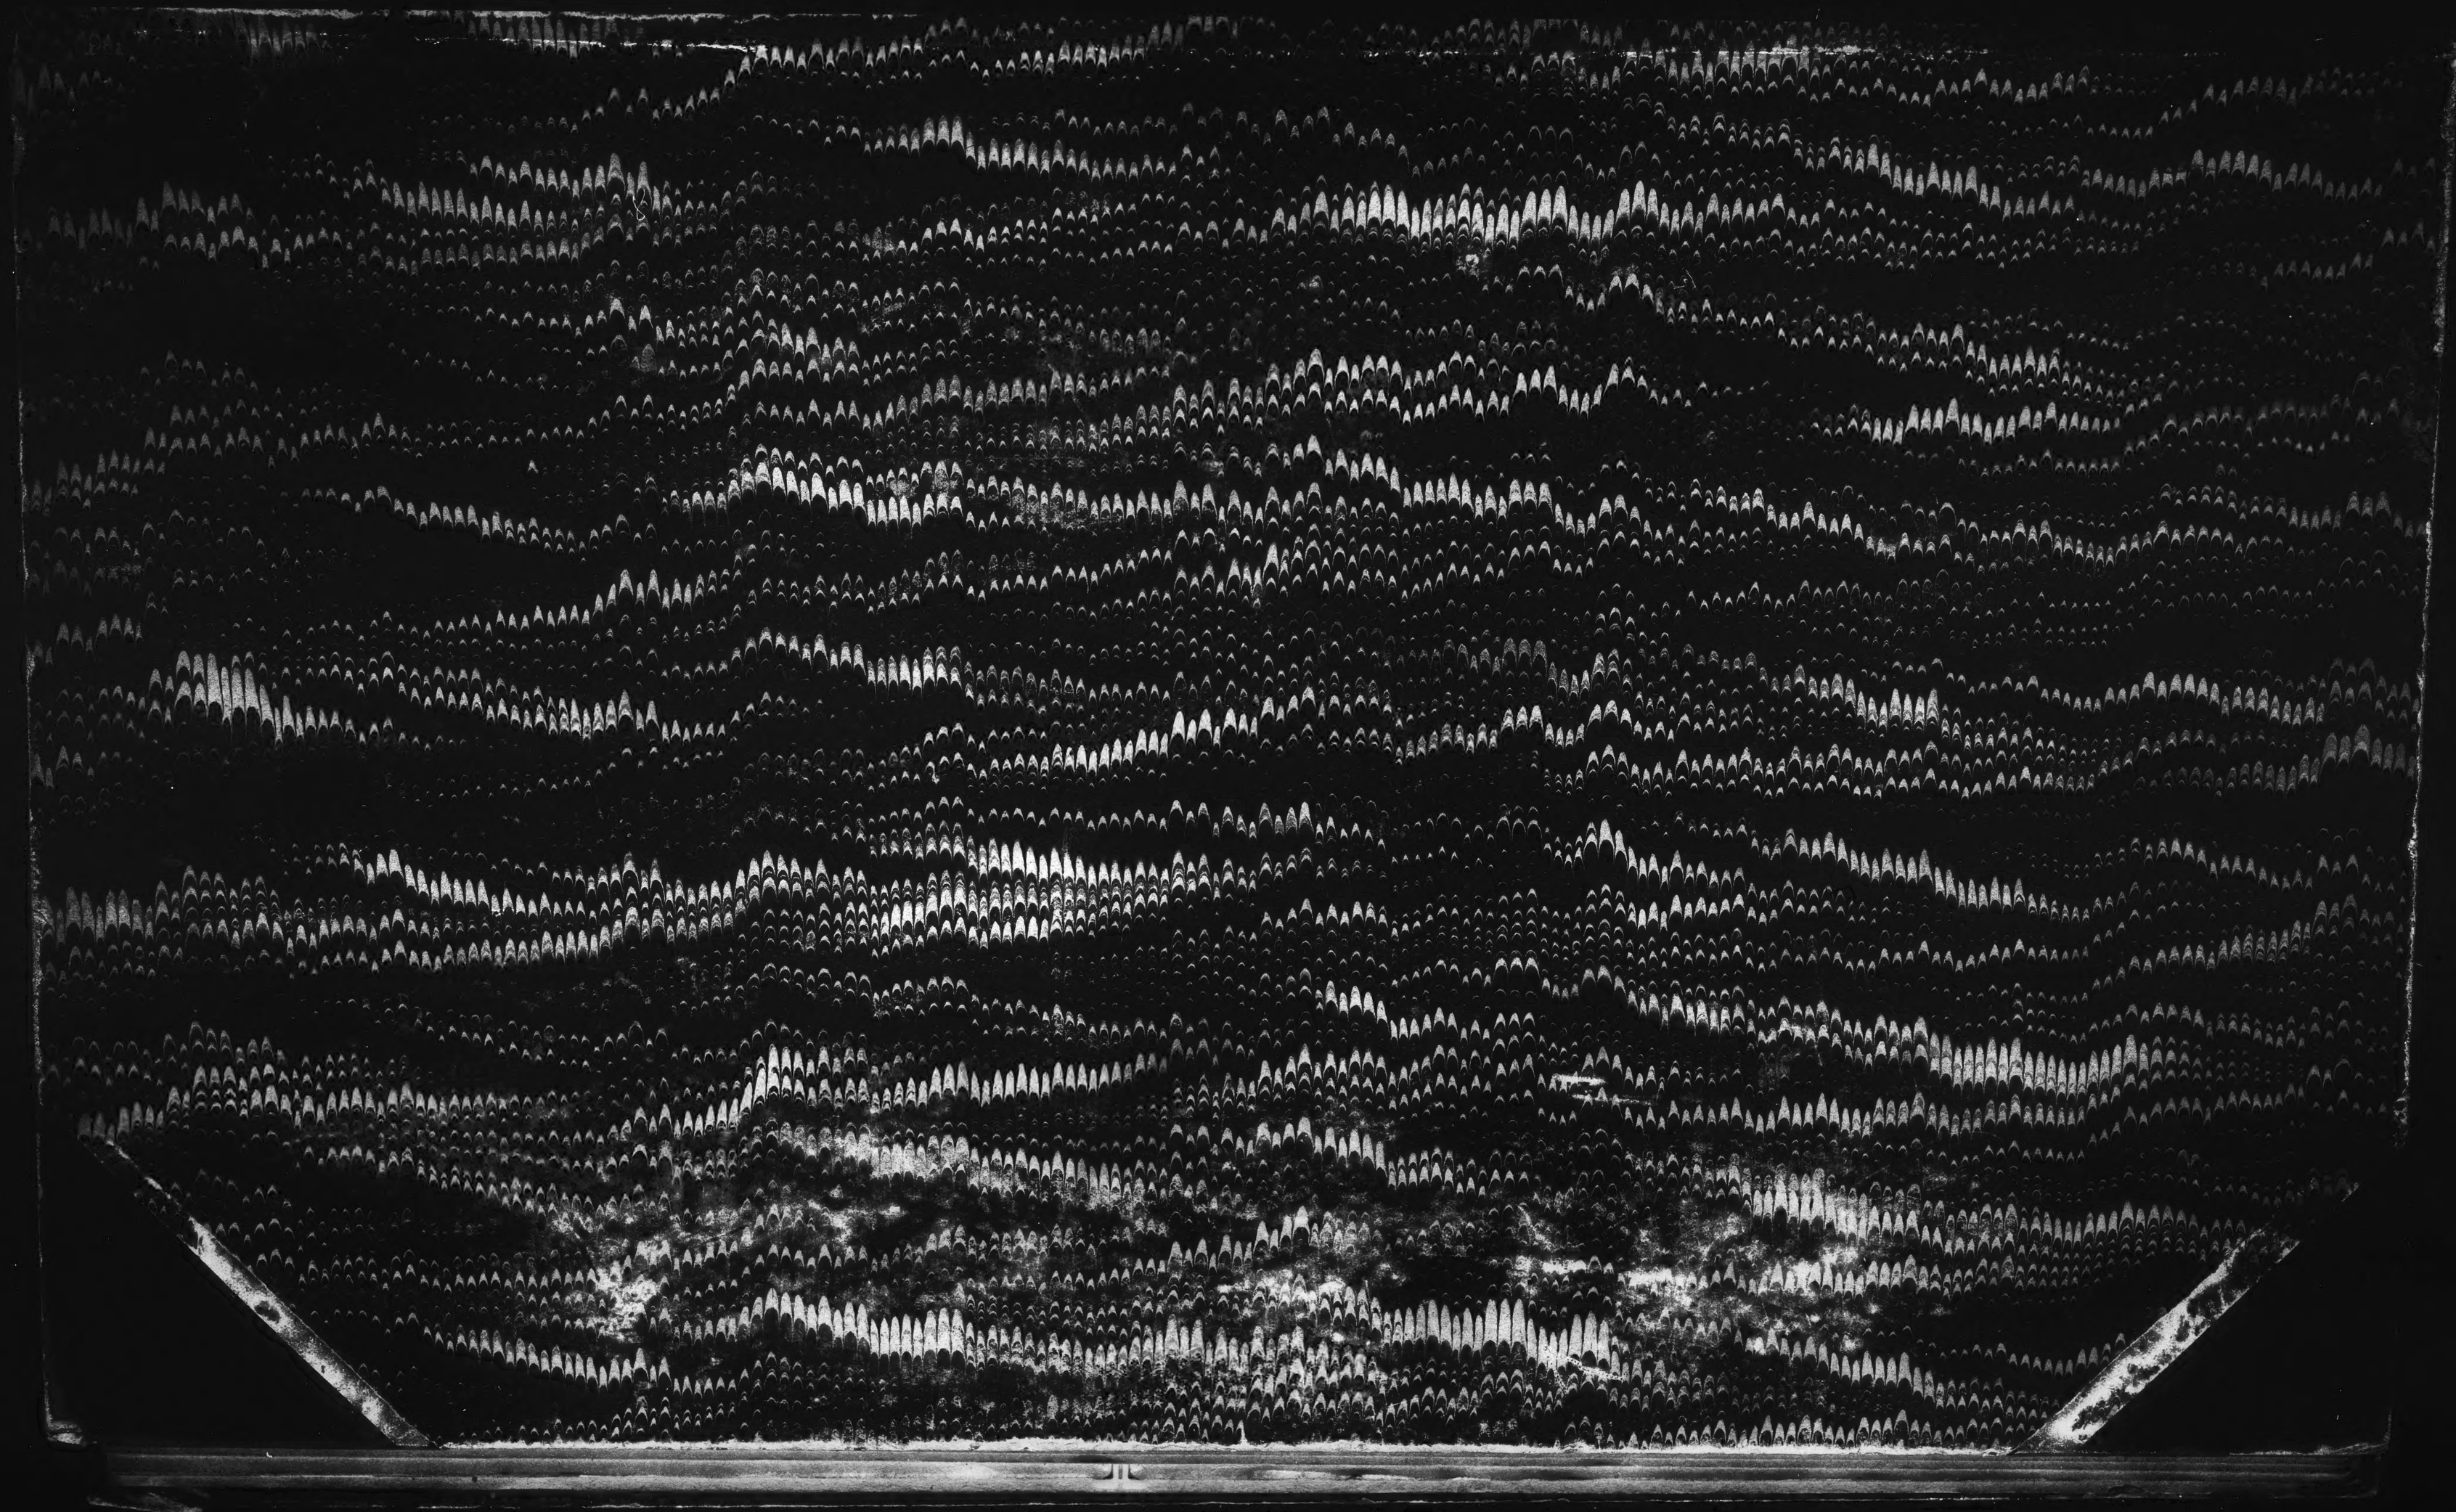
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND